

THE COLUMBIA
ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MODERN DRAMA

EDITED BY

Gabrielle H. Cody & Evert Sprinchorn

THE COLUMBIA ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

THE COLUMBIA ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MODERN DRAMA

Modern Drama

EDITED BY GABRIEL BOGARD

ADVISORY BOARD

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

JOHN GALT

ALBERT EINSTEIN

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

EDITORS Gabrielle H. Cody

Evert Sprinchorn

EDITORIAL ADVISORY BOARD

Asbjørn Aarseth

Awam Amkpa

John Bell

Albert Bermel

Jeremy Dauber

Craig Decker

Nancy Dersofi

Wenwei Du

Kathy Foley

Adrian Frazier

Daniel Gerould

Bent Holm

Samuel L. Leiter

James Magruder

Jeffrey D. Mason

Erin B. Mee

Kerry Moore

Deborah Paradez

Stanley R. Richardson

Richard Schechner

Mike Sell

Peta Tait

Egil Törnqvist

Gerald Weales

Eva Woods

Nick Worrall

THE COLUMBIA ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

Modern Drama

Edited by GABRIELLE H. CODY and EVERT SPRINCHORN

Volume 2

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York

Columbia University Press

Publishers Since 1893

New York Chichester, West Sussex

Copyright © 2007 Columbia University Press

All rights reserved

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The Columbia encyclopedia of modern drama / edited by Gabrielle H. Cody and Evert Sprinchorn.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-231-14032-4 (set : alk. paper)

978-0-231-14422-3 (v. 1 : alk. paper)

978-0-231-14424-7 (v. 2 : alk. paper)

1. Drama—Bio-bibliography—Dictionaries. 2. Drama—
20th century—History and criticism. 3. Theater—History—
20th century—Encyclopedias. I. Cody, Gabrielle H., 1956–
II. Sprinchorn, Evert.

PN1861 C65 2007

809 2003—dc22

2006051841

Columbia University Press books are printed on permanent and durable acid-free paper.

This book is printed on paper with recycled content.

Printed in the United States of America

C 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

MACDONALD, ANN-MARIE (1958–)

Ann-Marie MacDonald is a highly recognized and widely respected playwright, actor, and bestselling novelist. In addition to being an international bestseller, her first novel, 1996's epic Fall on Your Knees, was the winner of the Commonwealth Writers Prize for Best First Book. MacDonald's second novel, the loosely autobiographical 1950s family saga The Way the Crow Flies, was released in 2003 and nominated that same year for CANADA's distinguished Giller prize.

MacDonald's best-known play GOOD NIGHT DESDEMONA (GOOD MORNING JULIET) (1990) parodies several Shakespearean TRAGEDIES, most specifically Othello and Romeo and Juliet. Already performed extensively worldwide, this COMEDY successfully incorporates absurdist wordplay, intertextual references to Renaissance texts (often working with William Shakespeare's own dialogue), and same-sex love narratives and playfully invokes several Shakespearean conventions that leave the original tragedies reading more like a feminist-flavored comedy. Among its many accolades, the play was awarded the Governor General's Award, the Chalmers Award, and the Canadian Author's Association Award. As with many of her plays, this comedy invokes feminist issues within a broader satirical context.

Not unlike her young protagonist Madeleine in The Way the Crow Flies, MacDonald was born on a Royal Canadian Air Force Base in Baden-Baden, GERMANY (on October 29, 1958), where her father was stationed as a military accountant. The family spent several happy years there before returning to Canada, where MacDonald eventually graduated from the National Theatre School of Canada. In addition to growing up Roman Catholic and the frequent relocations because of her father's career, MacDonald's Cape Breton roots have had a significant effect on her storytelling powers and her subject matter. She also credits an early and relentless love of reading as a formative experience of her life.

MacDonald has performed extensively onstage, on television, and in film. Her supporting role in the 1987 feature I've Heard the Mermaids Singing garnered her a Genie Award nomination, and she was nominated for a Gemini Award in 1989 as a result of her work in the television film Where the Spirit Lives. MacDonald also had a major role in Anne Wheeler's feature film Better than Chocolate, a romantic comedy about two lesbians who move in together and the mother-in-law who moves in with them. In her current role as the host of CBC's Life and Times, she is seen by television viewers weekly in the award-winning biography program that profiles the lives of famous Canadians. Early in her writing career, in addition to her frequent appearances on Canadian television, MacDonald supported herself writing regularly for television. Her most recent film work is Cassandra Nicolaou's 2002 feature film Interviews with My Next Girlfriend. In 2003 MacDonald married Alisa Palmer, with whom she adopted a baby girl.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: The Arab's Mouth (1990); Goodnight Desdemona (Good Morning Juliet) (1990); Nigredo Hotel (1992); The Attic, the Pearls and 3 Fine Girls (1997)

FURTHER READING

Djordjevic, Igor. "Goodnight Desdemona (Good Morning Juliet): From Shakespearean Tragedy to Postmodern Satyr Play." Comparative Drama 37, no. 1 (2003): 89–116.

Hengen, Shannon. "Towards a Feminist Comedy." Canadian Literature 146 (Autumn 1995): 97–110.

Mackay, Ellen. "The Spectre of Straight Shakespeare." Canadian Theatre Review 111 (Summer 2002): 10–15.

"Meet the Writers: Ann-Marie MacDonald." barnesandnoble.com.

<http://www.barnesandnoble.com/writers/writerdetails.asp?userid=s04JQdx9tR&cid=749287#interview>. August 9, 2004 [Print and audio interview with Ann-Marie MacDonald].

L. Bailey McDaniel

MACDONALD, BRYDEN (1960–)

Born in 1960 in Glace Bay, Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, Bryden MacDonald became successful in his thirties. Openly homosexual, MacDonald's preoccupation with the marginalization of gay culture influences his plays, which validate diverse sexual identities. MacDonald's breakthrough came in the early 1990s, when his first published play, WHALE RIDING WEATHER (1991), was produced in Toronto, Halifax, and Vancouver. The play received a number of prestigious awards and nominations and has been revived several times since. An aging inner-city "queen," Lyle clings desperately to his young lover, Auto, who gradually tears himself away from the broken-down Lyle's stultifying influence.

The Weekend Healer was produced at Toronto's Factory Theatre in 1994. MacDonald's tendency to depict characters behaving melodramatically is clear. Set in Scarborough, the thirty-one-year-old Lindalou endures a visit to her difficult mother, Betina. On Friday, as Lindalou prepares to return to Cape Breton, her adolescent brother, Curtis, disappears, causing panic. A weekend of agitation, argument, and near hysteria ensues. Although the use of verse dialogue in Whale Riding Weather and The Weekend Healer may suggest that MacDonald favors poetry over clarity, he is very much a practical dramatist: only three actors are needed for each play, making the plays economically viable for small companies.

MacDonald's first two plays depict the chaos of fragmenting, unconventional families. His third play, Divinity Bash / Nine Lives (published 1999), is chaotic on a larger scale. Nothing stays still in the play: walls collapse, as do fixed ideas about society. Intellectually nihilistic, the play is theatrically and thematically descended from the absurdist plays of SAMUEL BECKETT and EUGÈNE IONESCU, from Shakespearean and 19th-century fairy tales, and from Salvador Dalí's surrealist paintings. A distinction is drawn between the confusing, deafening world of the present and some imagined, far-off nirvana of peace and tolerance. The play dramatizes the "nine lives" of nine diverse characters—one is an outlandish hermaphrodite prostitute, Glorious. MacDonald's central argument is that lifestyles and sexual identities are necessarily more amorphous and fluid than Canadian conservatives would suggest.

MacDonald personally directed the 2002 production of Divinity Bash at the Du Maurier Theatre, Toronto: he has also won acclaim for his direction of work by gay playwrights TENNESSEE WILLIAMS and JOE ORTON (CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF and What the Butler Saw). His direction of JUDITH THOMPSON's Perfect Pie won a 2002 Ottawa Capital Critics Circle Award. MacDonald has also produced musical shows inspired by popular Canadian musicians: Sincerely, a Friend celebrates Leonard Cohen's songs; When All the Slaves Are Free celebrates Joni Mitchell's work. MacDonald's most personal musical revue is Shaking the Foundation, an homage to the 1980s band Rough Trade, particularly its Carole Pope-written lyrics. Years previously, Pope's honest, upfront lesbianism partly influenced MacDonald's decision to come out. Despite the success of these musical shows and his directing, MacDonald continues to write plays, most recently The Ecstasy of Bedridden Riding Hood (2005) and Beyond the Beaded Curtain (2005).

MacDonald, a key voice in CANADA's growing canon of gay drama, uses his technical theatrical expertise to great effect when teaching at the National Theatre School of Canada, Montreal.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: Whale Riding Weather (1991); The Weekend Healer (1994); Divinity Bash / Nine Lives (publ. 1999); The Ecstasy of Bedridden Ridinghood (2005); Beyond the Beaded Curtain (2005)

FURTHER READING

Hastings, To. "Gay and Lesbian Writing." In Encyclopedia of Literature in Canada, ed. by William H. New. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 2002. 418–422.

Martin, Robert K. "Gay Literature." In The Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature, ed. by Eugene Benson and William Toye. Toronto: Oxford Univ. Press, 1997. 449–454.

Kevin De Ornellas

MACEDONIA

The proximity of ancient GREECE influenced the cultural life of the Slav tribes that settled in ancient Macedonia. Dionysian Bacchic rites and theatrical performances left deep traces, some of which are still present to this day in the folklore traditions of the Macedonian people. After the Hellenistic and Illyrico-Thracian period, Macedonia was for centuries under Roman dominion. Some Roman theatrical repertory was performed in amphitheaters in Macedonian settlements. The antagonism between the Old Slavic pagans and the Byzantine Christians marked the end of one culture and the beginning of another. Even after they accepted Christianity, the Macedonians preserved features of their ancient inheritance. During the five centuries of rule of Macedonia by the Ottoman Empire, between the 14th and the end of the 19th century, there was no theatrical activity in the European sense of the word. Some chamber theater performances were given by traveling showmen, karagyozy and medahi who entertained in the cafes and tearooms. The karagyozy tradition was similar to the Chinese theater of shadows.

During the Macedonian cultural revolution in the 19th century, attempts were made to use the local language and mother tongue in the theater. Theatrical performances played a major role in the Macedonian national emancipation. There were the so-called school theaters, initiated by the important pedagogue, philologist, and playwright Jovan Hadji Konstantinov-Djinot (1821–1882). The primary aim of his playwriting was patriotic and educational.

At the turn of the 20th century, playwright Vojdan Chernodrinski (1875–1951), the founder of modern Macedonian theater, brought Macedonian culture under the influence of the theater of the Western world with his Macedonian Blood Wedding (1900). This process was also furthered by the regular performances of visiting theaters from Sofia and Belgrade and by the work of the followers of Djinot and Chernodrinski. This significant development was halted during the Balkan wars (1912–1913), when the territory of ethnic Macedonia was divided among BULGARIA, SERBIA, GREECE, and Albania.

During these times the Macedonian people fought for their own independence, a fight that used the theater as a weapon. A whole generation of authors started to write in their mother tongue. The most famous were Marko Cepenkov (1829–1920), Nikola Kirov-Majski (1880–1962), Anton Panov (1905–1968), Risto Krle (1900–1975), and Vasil Iljovski (1902–1995). Their plays were very popular and helped inspire the Macedonians in their struggle and rebellion for freedom. During the 1941–1944 antifascist National Liberation War, a theater of resistance developed, which produced plays such as Hitler in His Death-Throes by M. Shulakovski and Giore of the Five Names by Vlado Maleski. After 1945 the rapid development of postwar Macedonian theater was the work of a number of gifted playwrights who have embraced various genres and contemporary styles.

One of the most thematically and stylistically innovative is Kole Chashule (1921–), who began with psychological REALISM in A Twig in the Wind (1957) and later explored the harsh fate of his nation in Darkness (1961), Whirlpool (1968), and Judgement (1978).

But his work also deals with more universal phenomena such as totalitarianism and dictatorship, bureaucracy, and ALIENATION in A Partiture for One Miron (1967) and As You Please (1971).

At about the same time the prolific playwright Tome Arsovski (1928–) began his career. Works such as The Paradox of Diogenes (1961), Hoops (1965), and A Step Into Autumn (1969) were characterized by strong social commitment and analysis of social anomalies and their effect on the fate of the individual. In contrast to Arsovski's realism, Branko Pendovski (1927–) cultivated the tragic FARCE and the grotesque. The influence of the Theater of the Absurd is evident in such works as Flood (1974), Travelling (1978), and Victim of the Pantheon (1985). The work of Bogomil Gjuzel (1939–) is marked by a preoccupation with the demystifying of history and showing revolution as a destructive social phenomenon in Alexiada (1978), Apocalypse (1987), and Adam and Eve and Job (1971). Georgi Stalev (1930–) has a special place in contemporary Macedonian theater. He seeks inspiration in the rich tradition of folklore and archetypal myths in his poetic plays The Wounded Hero (1971) and Angelina (1972).

GORAN STEFANOVSKI (1952–) is a major figure in modern Macedonian drama and one of the most important and widely performed Macedonian playwrights of all time. As a representative of the third wave of 20th-century Macedonian writers, he speaks with a national voice, despite his absorption of Western European influences. In his work he shows his mastery of all the thematic materials that Macedonian drama had previously dealt with, but he is always looking ahead, never content to repeat himself. Stefanovski has an original and up-to-date way of looking at and analyzing the traditional Macedonian templates. His plays include Jane Zadrogaz (1974), Wild Flesh (1979), Flying on the Spot (1981), Hi-Fi (1983), The False Bottom (1984), Tattooed Souls (1985), The Dishevelled Alphabet (television serial, 1985), The Black Hole (1987), Long Play (1988), Shades of Babel (1989), and Chernodrinski Is Coming Home (1991). Sarajevo (Tales from a City) (1992–1993) was an international project that went on an extensive tour across Europe in the summer of 1993, including the London International Theatre Festival (Riverside Studios, Hammersmith) and the Hamburg International Summer Festival. Bacchanalia appeared in 1996, Casabalkan in 1997, and Euralien in 1998. Euralien, a huge site-specific project on the themes of alienation and nationalism, was commissioned by Intercult, Stockholm, for the 1998 European Cultural Capital; it was performed by fifty actors and staged by thirteen directors. Hotel Europa (2000) was a major European theatrical production and site-specific project, directed by nine Eastern European directors, which toured festivals in Vienna, Bonn, Avignon, Stockholm, and Bologna.

Jordan Plevnes (1953–) has most often dealt with themes from Macedonia's national past and present in Erigon (1982), Mazedonische Zustände (1984), and R (1987). Among other plays and playwrights one should mention Mara's Wedding, by Vladimir Kostov (1932–); Nothing Without Tripholio (1986), by Rusomir Bogdanovski (1948–); Showaby Up (1989) and Dies Irae (1990), by Zanina Mircevska (1967–); The Powder Keg (1992) and The Balkans Are Not Dead (1992), by Dejan Dukovski (1969–); Whose Are You (1991), by Sashko Nasev (1966–); The Porcelain Vase (1995), by Jugoslav Petrvski (1969–); A Stake (1985), by Bratislav Dimitrov (1952–); and The Night in Which the Lantern Should Not Go Off (1996), by Trajche Kacarov (1959–).

FURTHER READING

Aleksiev, Aleksandar. Osnovopoložnici na makedonskata dramska literatura [Founders of Macedonian Drama]. Skopje: Misla, 1972.

Ilic, Vojislav. Lice i maska [Face and Mask]. Skopje: NIO "studentski zbor," 1988.

Siljan, Rade. Makedonska drama XIX i XX vek [Macedonian Drama: The Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries]. Skopje: Makedonska kniga, 1990.

Stefanovski, Risto. Letopis na makedonskata drama i na teatarot vo Makedonija [Review of Macedonian Drama and Theatre in Macedonia]. Skopje: Direkcija za kultura i umetnost, 1998.

———. Teatarot vo Makedonija [The Theater in Macedonia]. Skopje: Misla, 1990.

Risto Stefanovski

MACHADO, EDUARDO (1953–)

Eduardo Machado is an important contemporary Cuban American playwright many of whose works involve the displacement suffered by his family in the wake of the Cuban Revolution led by Fidel Castro. Born in Havana, CUBA, on June 11, 1953, he and his family fled to Florida after the Cuban Revolution and settled in the San Fernando Valley, close to Los Angeles. A precipitous drop in social standing caused a radical dislocation in the family members.

Machado started as an actor, but in 1977 he became associated with MARIA IRENE FORNES, who mentored his debut into playwriting. He has received three National Endowment for the Arts fellowships and a Rockefeller fellowship and currently heads the playwriting component of Columbia University's Theatre Arts Division.

Machado presents frescoes of large groupings of characters, allowing them to utter the unsayable, even as their greatest obsessions go unspoken. Machado's plays, like ANTON CHEKHOV's, capture onstage the critical point at which momentous political events intersect with and influence intimate family crises. He has authored over twenty-seven plays, such as Don Juan in NYC (1988), a baroque epic about a bisexual filmmaker's juggling of loves and career; A Burning Beach (1988), a play of political allegory, representing the U.S. takeover of Cuba following the Spanish American War in 1898; and Havana Is Waiting (2001), a dramatization of the playwright's return trip to his homeland in 1999.

His best and most representative works, however, are the four plays of The Floating Island series, notably Fabiola (1985) and Broken Eggs (1984). Fabiola, a play in six scenes, encompasses the years of Castro's rise to power through his takeover and eventual embracing of Soviet-style communism. The Marquez family, prosperous factory owners, at first enthusiastically back Castro with money and strategy, since he promises to stand up to the North American giant that has made Cuba a puppet. Cusa, the lady of the house, follows the revolution's progress on the radio, while a cousin, Octavio, bursts on the scene, his fingernails mutilated during a torture session with Batista's thugs. They never imagine being obliged to vacate their home altogether, even as it is confiscated by the government, or having to emigrate. Ultimately, Castro's milicianos swarm through the house, triumphantly ordering about their social superiors and toying with knickknacks. The brewing social upheaval is epitomized in the person of Sara, a servant, who is humiliated in the first act by her sister-in-law Clara. This same servant joins the revolution in the second act, refusing to aid the family, who, oblivious to the injustice in which they had been complicit, cannot fathom her disloyalty. In the play's foreground is a web of interpersonal conflicts among family members. Most prominent is the long-term sexual relationship between the two brothers, Osvaldo and the alcoholic Pedro, echoed by the patriarch Alfredo, who keeps a mistress. All these peccadilloes are swept under the carpet—known but unmentioned. Into the sexual and political threads is interwoven the story of Fabiola, Pedro's wife who had died but whose ghost apparently starts records playing and curtains fluttering. She represents the spirit of the carefree, sybaritic Cuba that is being banished forever.

Broken Eggs finds the same family, now displaced in California. The occasion is the wedding of Lizette, the young Americanized daughter, who is trying to bury her Latino roots by marrying the offspring of a Jewish family, the Rifkins. The setting is a waiting room of a "wedding mill" and so in the wings of the main action—the ceremony. Here, off to the side, we see how the family structure and traditional roles have all crumbled. Family members are afflicted by divorce, addictions to cocaine and alcohol, and infidelities. Some members, like the mother, are ineffectually clinging to lost traditions, even as they are forced into greater assimilation. The comic preparations for the wedding and the way they go dizzily awry yield a parade of quick scenic encounters. Whatever should not happen to make for a successful wedding does happen, which results in a hilarious social FARCE. The title represents the fate of the family victimized by the revolution and the saying "You can't make an omelette without breaking a few eggs." What we see, then, is the dying gasp of Cuba's dynastic grandeur, rendered comic.

[See also Avant-Garde Drama; Political Theater in the United States]

PLAYS: Worms (1981); Rosario and the Gypsies (1982); The Modern Ladies of Guanabacoa (1983); There's Still Time to Dance in the Streets of Rio (1983); Broken Eggs (1984); Fabiola (1985); When It's Over (with Geraldine Sheman, 1987); Why to Refuse (1987); A Burning Beach (1988); Don Juan in NYC (1988); Cabaret Bambu (1989); Related Retreats (1990);

Stevie Wants to Sing the Blues (1990); In the Eye of the Hurricane (1991); Breathing It In (1993); Havana Is Waiting (2001)

FURTHER READING

- Machado, Eduardo. The Floating Island Plays. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1991.
 Madison, Cathy. "Writing Home." American Theatre (October 1991).
 Osborn, M. Elizabeth. On New Ground: Contemporary Hispanic-American Plays. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1987.

David Paul Willinger

MACHINAL

In the spring of 1927, SOPHIE TREADWELL attended a sensational trial in which Ruth Snyder, a Long Island housewife, and Judd Gray, her lover, were accused of murdering Snyder's husband; both were found guilty and executed in January 1928. Using the case as a springboard, Treadwell speculated on the circumstances that could have driven Snyder to commit such a violent act.

Described in the text as being a story of "a woman who murders her husband—an ordinary young woman, any woman," Machinal offers nine scenes, each depicting "the different phases of life that the woman comes in contact with and in none of which she finds any place, any peace." A nameless, "tender" Young Woman endures a harsh existence: clamoring office-workers, a repulsive boss, a self-serving mother, an opportunistic lover, and at the end, an insensitive priest. Described by one critic as being "torn along with the current, weak and bruised, too unresourceful to save herself" (Atkinson, 1926), she must contend with marriage to the boss she does not love; momentary, joyful happiness comes in a love affair with a man who later testifies against her after she kills her husband.

When first produced at the Plymouth Theatre on September 7, 1928, Arthur Hopkins's directing and ROBERT EDMOND JONES's set and lighting matched Treadwell's spare, lean script. Brooks Atkinson (1926) described Jones's scenery as creating an atmosphere of "quiet delicacy and beauty" containing "no superfluous detail."

Machinal uses music and sound meant to assault the senses of the audience. Treadwell specifies that before the curtain rises, the audience hears the sounds of office machines that continue throughout the scene and accompany Young Woman's thoughts when the scene goes black; rapidly paced rhythms of machinery underscore and punctuate the clipped, hurried dialogue of office-workers. When Young Woman attempts to talk with her mother at the dinner table, noise interferes: the buzzer, the janitor's voice, a baby's cry, and conversation coming through an open window. In Young Woman's cell, "the voice of a Negro singing, the whirl of an aeroplane flying," and the droning prayers and chants of the priest all lend quiet terror to her last moments.

Reviewers were in accord with their praise of the 1928 showing, comparing the play favorably with ELMER RICE's ADDING

MACHINE and EUGENE O'NEILL'S THE EMPEROR JONES and STRANGE INTERLUDE (Dickey, 1999). Oliver M. Saylor described Machinal as successfully merging "expressionist form and expressionist content," while Brooks Atkinson (1926) called the production "a triumph of individual distinction, gleaming with intangible beauty." He concluded that "Machinal speaks to the mind."

Machinal was produced in London in 1931 under the title The Life Machine and in Moscow in 1933. Treadwell, who traveled to Moscow, became the first American playwright to receive royalties from a Soviet production. In recent years, scholarly and critical interest in Machinal has grown, aided, in part, by two prominent productions: the New York Shakespeare Festival in 1990 and London's Royal National Theatre in 1993.

[See also Expressionism; Feminist Drama in the United States; United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

Atkinson, J. Brooks. "Against the City Clatter." New York Times (September 16, 1926).

Bywaters, Barbara L. "Marriage, Madness, and Murder in Sophie Treadwell's Machinal." In Modern American Drama: The Female Canon, ed. by June Schlueter. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson Univ. Press, 1990. 97–110.

Dickey, Jerry. "The Expressionist Moment: Sophie Treadwell." In The Cambridge Companion to American Women Playwrights, ed. by Brenda Murphy. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999. 66–81.

Wynn, Nancy. "Sophie Treadwell: Author of Machinal." Journal of American Drama and Theatre 3 (Winter 1991): 29–47.

Sherry D. Engle

MACIVOR, DANIEL (1962–)

One of CANADA's most popular playwrights, Daniel MacIvor is also well known as an actor. Born in 1962 in Cape Breton, MacIvor has a theater company in Toronto where he now makes his home. With the assistance of producer Sherrie Johnson, da da kamera has become one of Toronto's foremost experimental theater companies.

MacIvor's plays almost always inquire into the nature of the theatrical medium. Self-reflexive performance vehicles, they always remind (and challenge) the audience about their relationship to the stage. In addition to their inquiry into theatrical presence, MacIvor's plays also often deconstruct identity (his plays have been called "postmodern") as character and actor blur and truth and fiction coincide. Here Lies Henry (1996), for example, plays on the double meaning of the title: we never really know if Henry is telling the truth. Another one-person show, House (1992) explores Victor's storytelling by using the device of a therapy group as the rationale for his inventions.

In their close attention to presence, theatrical and otherwise, MacIvor's plays depend as much on a precise theatrical design as they do on dialogue and text, constantly reminding the audience of an awareness and delight in the "now." Movement is often tightly choreographed; effects such as lighting and sound are integrated into textual choices. As vehicles for actors, his plays present performance challenges. Two of his fairly recent plays, You are Here (2002) and Cul-de-Sac (2003), are one-person shows that feature twelve and fifteen characters.

In particular, MacIvor's plays often deconstruct masculinity and a compulsory heterosexuality, as in Never Swim Alone (1993) and 2-2-Tango (1992). MacIvor is openly gay, and many of his plays address sexuality. In Never Swim Alone, two men directly address the audience in a competition about their relative success, refereed by a girl on a lifeguard tower. As the play unfolds, the story of the girl becomes central to the relationship between the two men and an early childhood trauma. In 2-2-Tango, the formal nature of the dance becomes a mechanism for exploring the relationship between Jim and James as they fall in love and drift apart.

Primarily trained as a performer, MacIvor usually acts in his own plays, often in one-person shows (Wild Abandon [1990], House, Here Lies Henry), drawing on his own considerable charisma. He also collaborates frequently with other theater artists, such as Daniel Brooks, who often directs his work. He has also written for and collaborated with actor Caroline Gillis. Though he draws on REALISM in Marion Bridge (1999) and The Soldier Dreams (1997), his most effective and most popular plays are those that challenge theatrical conventions and engage with the unexpected. In recent years, MacIvor has turned more to writing for film: he wrote and acted in Past Perfect, in 2002, his first feature film. His plays have garnered a number of awards—House and Here Lies Henry (Chalmers New Play Awards in 1991 and 1997); In on It (Village Voice Obie Award in 2002)—but they have not attracted much attention in academic circles.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

SELECT PLAYS: See Bob Run & Wild Abandon (1990); House (1992); 2-2 Tango (1992); Never Swim Alone (1993); This Is a Play (1993); Here Lies Henry (1996); The Soldier Dreams (1997); Theatre Omaha's Production of The Sound of Music (1998); Marion Bridge (1999); Monster (1999); In on It (2001); You Are Here (2002); Cul-de-Sac (2003)

FURTHER READING

Knowles, Ric. Theatre of Form and the Production of Meaning: Contemporary Canadian Dramaturgies. Toronto: ECW Press, 1999.

MacIvor, Daniel. "This Is an Article." Theatrum (September–October 1992): 15–17.

Wallace, Robert. "The Victor(y) of the Subject." Introduction to Daniel MacIvor's House Humans. Toronto: Coach House Press, 1992. 7–14.

Wilson, Ann. "Lying and Dying: Theatricality in Here Lies Henry." Canadian Theatre Review 92 (Fall 1997): 39–41.

Marlene Moser

MACKAYE, PERCY (1875–1956)

When Percy MacKaye delivered the 1897 commencement address to his classmates at Harvard, titled “The Need of Imagination in the Drama of Today,” he was already immersed in American theater. Three years earlier, he had lost his father, STEELE MACKAYE, who developed realistic scenography and supported realist drama. Though Percy worked closely with his father and was an enthusiastic promoter of his memory, the younger man was more interested in creating new symbolic and poetic theater. As a playwright, Percy found kinship with modernist designers Edward Gordon Craig and ROBERT EDMOND JONES, the latter a longtime friend of his.

MacKaye was born on March 16, 1875, in New York City. The earliest phase of his career focused on historic verse drama; his first success was with The Canterbury Pilgrims (1903), a dramatization of Geoffrey Chaucer’s “The Wife of Bath’s Tale,” mounted in Atlanta. His other verse dramas, including Jeanne d’Arc (1906) and Sappho and Phaon (1907), were also more successful at university, amateur, and “little” theaters than on the major commercial stages.

His supernatural play The Scarecrow (1911) showed similar historic overtones but abandoned the limitations of verse. During its brief New York run, critics remarked that the play was “comparatively free of that pedantic humor which has marred so much of Mr. MacKaye’s work.” The Scarecrow proved to be MacKaye’s most enduring play.

MacKaye is most noteworthy for his leadership in the historical and civic pageantry movement in America and for his theories about pageants as communal ritual. Devoted to the sociological purposes of theater, MacKaye worked to develop community performance, with large casts of amateur and professional actors, as a means of fostering social unity. MacKaye declared, “For community drama is nothing else than the technique of neighborliness—the art, par excellence, of resolving the estrangement and conflict of social elements into harmony.”

MacKaye’s first pageant was The Gloucester Pageant (1909), a revision of The Canterbury Pilgrims presented in Massachusetts with a cast of more than a thousand. Caliban, by the Yellow Sands (1916) was a pageant written to commemorate the tercentenary of William Shakespeare’s death. Performed in New York (where it drew 15,000 spectators to each of its ten performances) and Boston, Caliban had 2,500 actors and featured a performance by Isadora Duncan. Robert Edmond Jones designed Caliban as well as Washington (1920), The Evergreen Tree (1917), and The Roll Call (1918).

During the 1920s, MacKaye worked less with historic pageants, seeking instead to promote community spirit by preserving the poetry and folktales of rural America, especially Appalachia; the results were This Fine Pretty World (1923) and Napoleon Crossing the Rockies (1924).

He also experimented with opera, writing The Immigrants (1914) and Sinbad the Sailor (1913) on commission by the Boston Opera House and adapting his play The Canterbury Pilgrims as an opera for the Metropolitan Opera House.

In 1920 MacKaye was appointed to the American Fellowship in Poetry and Drama at Miami University, Ohio. One of his final writing projects was The Mystery of Hamlet, King of Denmark (1943), a tetralogy of plays exploring the larger story of Old Hamlet. MacKaye died on August 31, 1956, in Cornish, New Hampshire.

[See also United States]

PLAYS: A Maid of Lydon (1900, with Evelyn Greenleaf); The Canterbury Pilgrims (1903); Fenris the Wolf (1905); Jeanne d’Arc (1906); Sappho and Phaon (1907); Mater (1908); The Canterbury Pilgrims (1909); The Gloucester Pageant (1909); Anti-Matrimony (1910); A Garland to Sylvia (1910); A Masque of Labor (1910); The Scarecrow (1911); Chuck: An Orchard Fantasy (1912); Gettysburg: A Woodshed Commentary (1912); Sam Average (1912); Yankee Fantasies: Five One-Act Plays (1912); Sanctuary: A Bird Masque (1913); Sinbad the Sailor (1913); A Thousand Years Ago (1913); Tomorrow (1913); The Immigrants (1914); Saint Louis: A Civic Masque (1914); The Antick (1915); Caliban, by the Yellow Sands (1916); The New Citizenship: A Civic Ritual (1916); The Evergreen Tree: A Masque for Christmas (1917); The Roll Call (1918); The Will of Song (1919); Rip Van Winkle (1920); Washington: The Man Who Made Us (1920); The Cat Boat (1921); This Fine Pretty World (1923); Napoleon Crossing the Rockies (1924); Wakefield (1932); The Mystery of Hamlet, King of Denmark (1943)

FURTHER READING

- Brock, D. Heyward, and James M. Welsh. “Percy MacKaye: Community Drama and the Masque Tradition.” Comparative Drama 6 (1972): 68–84.
- Marks, Patricia. “The Scarecrow: Percy MacKaye’s Adaptation of ‘Feather-top.’” Nathaniel Hawthorne Review 14, no. 1 (Spring 1988): 13–15.
- Potter, Vilma Raskin. “Percy MacKaye’s Caliban for a Democracy.” Journal of American Culture 19, no. 4 (Winter 1996): 71–79.
- Quinn, Arthur Hobson. “Percy MacKaye and the Drama as Spectacle.” In A History of the American Drama from the Civil War to the Present Day. New York: F. S. Crofts, 1936.
- Smigel, Libby. “Sophocles and Shakespeare in the Nation’s Service: Percy MacKaye’s Theory of an American Popular Theatre.” Mid-Atlantic Almanac 8 (1990): 35–56.

DeAnna M. Totten Beard

MACKAYE, STEELE (1842–1894)

James Morrison Steele MacKaye was born on June 6, 1842, in Buffalo, New York, to the wealthy northern family of Colonel James MacKaye and Emily Steele MacKaye. He traveled to Paris as a young man but returned home to join the Seventh Regiment of the Union army during the Civil War. Although an ardent abolitionist, malaria forced him to resign his original commission, so he returned as a volunteer and worked specifically with companies of black soldiers. Following the war, he returned to Europe and studied acting with François Delsarte in Paris. He later used this knowledge to become one of the earliest exponents of the Delsarte method in the UNITED STATES.

In October 1884 MacKaye founded America's first dramatic school, the Lyceum Theatre School of Acting in New York. His goals for the school were to promote Delsarte's theories of ACTING and to improve the condition of the acting profession in America. He told the first group of students, "Twenty-five years ago, when I desired to go on the stage, there was no school where I could prepare, except the ballet" (MacKaye, 1927). Six months later, in April 1885, MacKaye opened the companion Lyceum Theatre, which debuted with his play Dakolar.

MacKaye worked to develop training methods for more believable acting, and he was a supporter of the realistic drama then emerging in Europe. His interest in naturalistic stage illusion and the science of stagecraft was manifest in his many patents for new theater technology, many of which he actually realized. At Madison Square Garden, he created a two-story elevator stage, the "double stage," which made spectacular scene changes of large interior sets possible in less than one minute. MacKaye also redesigned other areas of Madison Square Garden, making the theater more appropriate for the new realistic trends in theater. He removed the proscenium doors, eliminated the fore-stage, and moved the orchestra pit to create additional seating closer to the stage.

His other theater inventions include air cooling, ventilation and purification systems, fireproofing of scenery, the sliding stage, the floating stage, and technological novelties like the "luxauleator" (curtain of light), the "nebulator" (cloud creator), and devices for creating sun, moon, and rainbow special effects.

MacKaye's most elaborate plans were for the Spectatorium, a theater for "musico-dramatic art" proposed for the 1893 Chicago World's Fair. The Spectatorium was to be enormous: 480 feet long, 380 feet wide, and 275 feet high; the stage opening was to be 150 feet wide and seventy feet high. The planned theater would have seated 10,000 spectators and showcased all of MacKaye's devices for theater spectacle. Because of the size, complexity, and cost of the project, the Spectatorium was never completed. Instead, he and his son PERCY MACKAYE built the Scenitorium, where he staged his final play, The World Finder (1894), an elaborate pageant depicting Christopher Columbus's journey to the New World. MacKaye died on February 25, 1894, on a train near Timpas, Colorado.

MacKaye was a prolific writer, publishing many articles during the 1880s about acting theory, new theater technology, and innovative stage design. He also wrote numerous plays, including pageants such as The Drama of Civilization (1886), written for Buffalo Bill Cody, and the highly successful MELODRAMA HAZEL KIRKE (1880).

SELECT PLAYS: Marriage (1872); Monaldi (with Francis Durivage, 1872); Arkwright's Wife (with Tom Taylor); Clancarty (with Tom Taylor, 1874); Rose Michel (1875); Queen and Woman (with J. V. Pritchard, 1876); Twins (with A. C. Wheeler, 1876); Won at Last (1877); Through the Dark (1879); Hazel Kirke (1880, first produced as An Iron Will in 1879); A Fool's Friend (1881); Dakolar (1885); In Spite of All (1885); The Drama of Civilization (1886); Rienzi (1886); Paul Kauvar (first produced as Anarchy, 1887); A Noble Rogue (1888); Sir Alan's Wife (1888); An Arrant Knave (1889); Colonel Tom (1890); Money Mad (1890); The World Finder (1894)

FURTHER READING

Fort, Tim. "Steele MacKaye's Lighting Visions for The World Finder." Nineteenth Century Theatre 18 (Summer–Winter 1990): 35–41.

MacKaye, Percy. Epoch: The Life of Steele MacKaye, Genius of the Theatre. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.

Ruyter, Nancy Lee Chalfa. "The Delsarte Heritage." Dance Research 14 (Summer 1996): 62–74.

Woodard, Debra J. "Steele MacKaye's Marriage: The Beginning of a Movement Toward American Realism." Theatre Survey 23 (November 1982): 189–195.

DeAnna M. Toten Beard

MACLEISH, ARCHIBALD (1892–1982)

Celebrated poet, playwright, and essayist Archibald MacLeish was born on May 7, 1892, in Glencoe, Illinois. He won Pulitzer Prizes for Conquistador (an epiclike chronicle of the conquest of Mexico, 1932), Collected Poems 1917–1952, and J.B.: A Play in Verse (a redaction of Job, 1958), and his The Eleanor Roosevelt Story (film script, 1965) received an Academy Award. He reflected the changing aesthetics and politics of 20th-century America. Two early poems in dramatic form, "Our Lady of Troy" (1917) and Nobodaddy (1926) assert the superiority of imagination and self-consciousness in an indifferent universe but stay within the aesthetic boundaries set in his famous poem Ars Poetica. While editing at Fortune magazine in the 1930s, his writing moved toward more engaged "public speech." In his works a lively mind wrestles rhetorically with the problem of uniting many individuals in one task, family or nation, while retaining individual freedom.

His ballet libretto Union Pacific (1934) lauds the Irish and Chinese railroad workers over the so-called empire builders. His first stage play Panic (1935) faults the pusillanimous capitalists and the Marxists. Believing a radical Blind Man's prophecy of capitalism's demise, hero J. P. McGafferty loses his ability to lead a chorus of Bankers and save the People in the street. McGafferty, his mistress, bankers, and radicals speak in five-beat lines; the street people, in three-beat lines.

MacLeish's "radio plays"—Air Raid (1938) and better THE FALL OF THE CITY (1937), anticipating a blitzkrieg and a conquest—more effectively use the same sprung rhythm and expressionistic place and "characters," plus a narrating Announcer, to demand American mobilization against the fascist forces. The States Talking (1941), literally, in verse, justifies the American system over the Axis's. The American Story: Ten Radio Scripts (1944) glorified the new continent by excerpting historical narratives of discovery and exploration. His verse plays The Trojan Horse (1952) and

This Music Crept by Me Upon the Waters (1953) were both staged after initial broadcasts. While This Music laments passing opportunities, he intended the Greek-filled horse that Troy accepts to parallel the monstrously destructive lie of McCarthyism.

J.B. is MacLeish's most appreciated drama. A modern Job, surviving the wager between divine Zuss and diabolic Nickles that triggers the devastation of his life, declares that self-conscious love, not faith or reason, allows him to continue. Critics have faulted MacLeish's plays for their lack of sympathetic characters. Scratch (in prose, 1971) argues the balance between freedom and the Union as Daniel Webster, flawed by his vote for the Fugitive Slave Law, defeats the Devil to redeem himself and a sold soul. MacLeish's verse TRAGEDY Herakles (1965) is underestimated. Returning from triumphant labors that cleansed the world of monsters, a Nobel-winning scientist and Herakles must face their madness: murdering their wives and sons in metaphor and the myth.

MacLeish died on April 20, 1982, in Boston, Massachusetts.

[See also United States]

PLAYS: Our Lady of Troy (1917); Nobodaddy (1926); Union Pacific: An American Folk Ballet in One Act and Four Scenes (1934); Panic: A Play in Verse (1935); The Fall of the City; A Verse Play for Radio (1937); Air Raid: A Verse Play for Radio (1938); The States Talking (1941); The American Story: Ten Radio Scripts (1944); The Trojan Horse: A Play (1952); This Music Crept by Me Upon the Waters: A Play (1953); J.B.: A Play in Verse (1958); The Secret of Freedom (1960); The American Bell (1962); The Dialogues of Archibald MacLeish and Mark Van Doren (1962); The Eleanor Roosevelt Story (1965); Herakles: Verse Play (1965); An Evening's Journey to Conway, Massachusetts: An Outdoor Play (1967); The Play of Herod (adaptation of a Medieval Mystery Play, 1968); Scratch (1971); The Great American Fourth of July Parade: A Verse Play for Radio (1976)

FURTHER READING

Donaldson, Scott, with R. H. Winnick. Archibald MacLeish: An American Life. Boston: Houghton, 1992.

MacLeish, Archibald. A Time to Speak. Boston: Houghton, 1941 [essays].

Smith, Grover C. Archibald MacLeish. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1975.

John G. Kuhn

MACLEOD, JOAN (1954–)

Joan MacLeod was born in 1954 in Vancouver, British Columbia. She earned creative writing degrees from the University of Victoria (B.A., 1978) and the University of British Columbia (UBC) (M.F.A., 1981). After graduating from UBC she set off for the Banff School of Fine Arts to attend a six-week-long poetry workshop but soon discovered the adjacent workshop for playwrights and immediately, in her own words, "got hooked." She did not begin writing for the theater until she was thirty-one.

In 1985 the Tarragon Theatre in Toronto, Ontario, readily accepted JEWEL, her first play, and asked MacLeod to join its Playwrights Unit that same year. She became the playwright-in-residence at Tarragon for six years, and after their production of Jewel in 1987, her next three plays, Toronto, Mississippi (1987), Amigo's Blue Guitar (1990), The Hope Slide (1992), all premiered at the Tarragon as well. But MacLeod's first produced work for the theater came two years before Jewel. The Secret Garden, a libretto based on the classic Victorian novel and written with composer Stephen MacNeff, was presented by Toronto's Comus Music Theatre in 1985 and won MacLeod a Dora Mavor Moore Award for best new musical.

Jewel is a one-act, one-character play that takes place on Valentine's Day in 1985. Marjorie Clifford is a young widow who attempts to reconcile her current and past selves by conversing with her dead husband, a victim of the 1981 Ocean Ranger oil-rig disaster. The play received both Dora and Chalmers Award nominations and was later reworked as a radio production titled Hand of God.

Although MacLeod's preferred dramatic format is the monologue—and she in fact begins writing each of her plays this way—only Jewel, The Hope Slide, and The Shape of a Girl (2001) keep as their visual focus the figure of a solitary woman onstage. The Hope Slide won the Chalmers Canadian Play Award in 1993. It charts the journey of an actress who, by using her own traveling show about Doukhobors as a vehicle, tries to come to terms with the AIDS epidemic and the death of her best friend. In The Shape of a Girl we see a young teenager who again grapples with the idea of senseless death, even though the dead is this time not a loved one but someone she only knows through others. Drawing on MacLeod's own experience as a life-skills mentor, Toronto, Mississippi tells the story of a single mother and her mildly mentally handicapped daughter Jhana and the upset this mother-daughter relationship undergoes when Jhana's estranged father, an Elvis impersonator, makes an impromptu appearance.

Amigo's Blue Guitar won the Governor General's Award for drama in 1991 and, like Toronto, Mississippi, probes the meaning of family. When a Salvadoran refugee is sponsored to fulfill a college project requirement, neither he nor the British Columbia family he comes to live with anticipate the degree of compassion and frustration that a shift in their respective family dynamics will bring about. Little Sister (1994) examines the psychology of eating disorders and in 1995 won the Chalmers Award in the Theatre for Young Audiences category. MacLeod's play 2000 (1996) delves into the world of a middle-aged, middle-class couple who exemplify living at the edge and the anxieties this position necessarily produces.

MacLeod currently lives in Victoria, British Columbia, and teaches in the University of Victoria's Department of Writing.

[See also Canada]

PLAYS: Jewel (1985, revised 1987); Toronto, Mississippi (1987); Amigo's Blue Guitar (1990); The Hope Slide (1992); Little Sister (1994); 2000 (1996); The Shape of a Girl (2001); Homechild (2006)

FURTHER READING

Leshon, Glynis. Preface to The Hope Slide, by Joan MacLeod. Burnaby: Talonbooks, 1999. 11–13.

McIntyre, Joanna. Preface to Little Sister, by Joan MacLeod. Burnaby: Talonbooks, 1999. 47.

Wasserman, Jerry, ed. "Joan MacLeod." In Modern Canadian Plays: Vol. II, 4th ed. Vancouver: Talonbooks, 2001. 225–227.

Michelle Lindenblatt

MACLIAMMOIR, MICHEÁL (1899–1978)

Am I beautiful too? Of course I am. Still beautiful. Look.

—Michael MacLiammóir All for Hecuba, 1946

Micheál MacLiammóir, actor, designer, and author, was born on October 25, 1899, in Willesden, London, as Alfred Willmore. His father dealt in oats for London horse stables. In his autobiographical novel Enter a Goldfish (1977), MacLiammóir says that when he first saw his mother with her top off, he wished to have two such beautiful breasts himself, and at his first pantomime, he admired the legs of the actor playing Dick Whittington. OSCAR WILDE became young Alfred Willmore's hero as the homosexual aesthete. At age eleven, he was cast for a part, along with NOËL COWARD, in Lila Field's Goldfish, the beginning of a career as a beautiful child star with the nickname "Bubbles." In 1912, he played Oliver Twist opposite Beerbohm Tree. After his voice broke, Willmore, a talented book illustrator, attended art school. Reading W. B. YEATS's essays inspired him with a passion for Celtic aestheticism.

He moved to IRELAND during World War I, joined the Gaelic League, and by 1919 called himself Micheál MacLiammóir from Cork, a second identity he maintained until his death. In the late 1920s, he found work onstage with the traveling Shakespeare company of Anew McMaster, his brother-in-law. There he met his partner and lifelong love, Hilton Edwards, an actor and director. After starting up the first Irish-language theater in Ireland, An Taibhdhearc, which premiered his first play, Diarmuid agus Grainne (August 27, 1928), MacLiammóir started a new theater company in Dublin, the Gate, which at first operated out of the Abbey Theatre's studio space ("The Peacock") and later acquired a home at the Rotunda, a prominent city-center building, where the Gate still thrives.

The daring style of Edwards's direction paired with MacLiammóir's glamorous acting and decorative designs won the admiration of Irish audiences. In the 1930s, the Gate shows surpassed those of the Abbey Theatre in production values. MacLiammóir and Edwards gave a uniquely satisfying representation of Denis Johnston's The Old Lady Says, "No!" (1929), an expressionist fantasia rejected by the Abbey. MacLiammóir's Hamlet was celebrated in Dublin (he continued to play the part into his mid-fifties), but it failed to impress London audiences. His acting was often romantic and grandiloquent, not in the more psychological style of his more famous rival, Lawrence Olivier. MacLiammóir plays Iago as a homosexual in Orson Welles's Othello (1952), his best acting to be caught on film.

The greatest success of MacLiammóir's many roles and thirteen plays was a one-man show on the life of Wilde, The Importance of Being Oscar (1963), which went on a profitable world tour and influenced other shows of the kind, such as Simon Callow's The Mystery of Charles Dickens (2000).

MacLiammóir died on March 6, 1978, in Dublin, Ireland. The Dublin funeral of the beloved actor was attended by thousands, including the leaders of the Irish government.

[See also England]

PLAYS: Diarmuid agus Grainne (1928); The Ford of the Hurdles (1929); Easter 1916 (1930); Where Stars Walk (1940); Dancing Shadows (1941); Ill Met by Moonlight (1946); Home for Christmas (1950); The Importance of Being Oscar (1963); Prelude in Kasbek Street (1973)

FURTHER READING

Barrett, John, ed. Selected Plays of Michael MacLiammóir. Irish Drama Selections. Washington, D.C.: Catholic Univ. of America Press; Gerrards Cross, Bucks.: Colin Smythe, 1995.

Fitz-Simon, Christopher. The Boys: A Double Biography. London: Nick Hern, 1994.

MacLiammóir, Micheál. Enter a Goldfish: Memoirs of an Irish Actor, Young and Old. London: Thames & Hudson, 1977.

Adrian Frazier

MADAME DE SADE

Madame de Sade (Sado Kōshaku Fujin, 1965), a three-act Japanese SHINGEKI play by MISHIMA YUKIO, premiered at his theater company the New Literary Theatre (NLT). The most highly formalized play in Mishima's oeuvre, it presents conversations in the drawing room of Madame de Montreuil, mother of Renee, Marquise de Sade, in the years 1772, 1778, and 1790. Every monologue and conversation is devoted to the attempt to understand who de Sade really is and what he means to France, to society, to politics, and to the lives of each of the women. Alphonse, the Marquis de Sade, never appears in the play.

The author himself best states his inspiration and intentions: Reading The Life of the Marquis de Sade by Shibusawa Tatsuhiko I was most intrigued by the riddle of why the Marquise de Sade, after having demonstrated such absolute fidelity to her husband during his long years in prison, should have left him the moment that he was at last free. This riddle served as the point of departure for my play, which is an attempt to provide a logical solution.

This play might be described as "Sade seen through women's eyes." I was obliged therefore to place Madame de Sade at the center, and to consolidate the theme by assigning all the other parts to women. Madame de Sade stands for wifely devotion; her mother, for law, society, and morality; Madame de Simiane for religion; Madame de Saint-Fond for carnal desires; Anne, Madame de Sade's younger sister, for feminine guilelessness and lack of principles; and the servant Charlotte, for the common people. I had to involve these people with Madame de Sade and make them revolve around her, with something like the motions of the planets. (Mishima, 1967)

The solution to the riddle that induced Mishima to write the play—why Madame de Sade refused to meet her husband ever again after he left prison—is constructed from Madame de Sade's own convictions and her understanding of what the other women tell her about carnal desire, Christian purity and salvation, and self-preservation. Madame de Sade creates a beautiful, idealized image of her husband, in which “he piles evil on evil, and mounts on top, building a back stairway to heaven” (Mishima, 1967). Her memories of him as a blond, handsome youth are “as if preserved in amber.” When told of his current physical decrepitude, she is unwilling to relinquish her fantasies and memories and face the sordid reality of what her husband has become.

Madame de Sade has enjoyed more stage performances than any Mishima play except for Rokumeikan and has a strong record of performance abroad. A 1995 survey of fifty-four Japanese theater scholars and critics concluded that Madame de Sade is JAPAN's finest 20th-century play.

[See also Shin Kabuki]

FURTHER READING

- Canby, Vincent. “Theater Review, Mishima's View of Marquis de Sade.” New York Times (June 9, 1995). <http://theater2.nytimes.com/men/theater/treview.html?res=990CE1D9143BF93AA35755CoA963958260>
- Domoto Masaaki. Gekijin Mishima Yukio [Yukio Mishima the dramatist]. Tokyo: Geki Shobo, 1994.
- Mishima Yukio. Five Modern No Plays. Tr. by Donald Keene. New York: Knopf, 1957.
- . Madame de Sade. Tr. by Donald Keene. New York: Grove, 1967.

Laurence Kominz

THE MADMAN AND THE NUN

In the anthill civilization which is coming individualism will be limited like a man in a strait jacket. . . . True artists . . . will be kept in special institutions for the incurably sick and will be, as vestigial specimens of former humanity, the subject of research by psychiatrists.

—Stanisław Witkiewicz, New Forms in Painting, 1918

Written in 1923 and first staged in 1924, The Madman and the Nun [Wariat i zakonnica], or There Is Nothing Bad Which Could Not Turn Into Something Worse is one of STANISŁAW IGNACY (“Witkacy”) WITKIEWICZ's most widely performed dramas. Dedicated to “all the madmen of the world,” the play takes as its theme the tyranny of society over the individual. The author himself felt threatened by insanity—an expression of rebellious individuality—and the play may be considered an ironic portrait of the artist.

In The Madman and the Nun (the title of one of Witkacy's paintings exhibited in 1921), the creative personality becomes victim of cultural repression when science and state, abetted by religion, form a totalitarian alliance to bring about enforced happiness and social tranquility through psychiatric confinement. Witkacy's decadent poet and drug addict Walpurg exemplifies the destiny of exceptional beings who are locked in padded cells and trapped in ever-widening circles of incarceration by body, family, and society.

The Freudian psychiatrist Grün hopes to cure Walpurg by rendering him normal and restoring him to society lobotomized of the madness that constitutes his genius. The fettered poet (whose consciousness alone is free) and the psychic healer prying into the recesses of his brain are a complementary pair. Grün is both the observing self, voyeuristically watching the instinctual behavior of his alter ego, and the controlling self attempting to curb the explosive creative energy of his double. The doctor alternately provides Walpurg with paper and pencil—tools of creation—and binds his arms in a straitjacket, encouraging his art and yet restricting it. Grün reduces PSYCHOANALYSIS to a mechanistic system for fabricating puppets ready for the anthill society.

As the only way out of imprisonment, Walpurg seduces his nurse (the beautiful Sister Anna), murders one of his doctors, and hangs himself. Here Witkacy introduces a spectacular coup de theater that cancels the seemingly inevitable tragic ending. Stepping over his own corpse lying on the floor, the handsome young Walpurg—an elegantly dressed dandy—enters the cell, bids farewell to his keepers, who are now locked up as insane, and goes off to town with Anna. Witkiewicz's favored device of the risen corpse violates the laws of both nature and conventional dramatic logic; the play subverts its own premises and calls into question the entire rational world that constructs madhouses. Walpurg's feat of dissociation—splitting in two and leaving behind his outer shell—is deeply ambiguous. Has the poet created a new form for himself or merely accepted society's validation of a stereotype? Are his suicide and escape a triumph of mind over matter or a step backward on the treadmill of Eternal Recurrence, repeating the same punitive story?

Pure Form (the modality of the final act) can allow for multiple endings and accommodate contradictory meanings. In the double denouement of The Madman and the Nun Witkacy, incorporating Werner Heisenberg's principle of complementarity and Niels Bohr's uncertainty principle, plays bold theatrical tricks on the audience in order to dispose of the dead conventions of stage REALISM along with Walpurg's dead body. Witkacy's protest against psychiatric confinement anticipates strategies of the post-1968 AVANT-GARDE: creative madness, anarchic violence, liberating sexuality, and emancipation through dreams.

[See also Poland]

FURTHER READING

- Gerould, Daniel. Witkacy: A Critical Study of Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz as an Imaginative Writer. Washington, D.C.: Univ. of Washington Press, 1980.
- Witkiewicz, Stanisław Ignacy. The Madman and the Nun. New York: Applause Books, 1990.
- . The Witkiewicz Reader, ed. and tr. by Daniel Gerould. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern Univ. Press, 1992.

Daniel Gerould

THE MADNESS OF GEORGE III

Late in ALAN BENNETT's play The Madness of George III, and film The Madness of King George, the recovering King George presses his Lord Chancellor Thurlow to act out the reunion scene of Lear and Cordelia. Hearing George's compassionate rendition of Lear's speech, Thurlow finds the king seems more like himself. George sagely replies, "I have always been myself—I have just learned how to seem. What, what?" George's "what, what?" confirms that his sanity has returned, but his slant on appearance becomes the pivotal metaphor in Bennett's play, a complex, seriocomic drama with political overtones appropriate to both the 18th and 19th centuries.

The Madness of George III chronicles, with poetic license, the troubled rule of George III—known affectionately as "Farmer George" to his subjects because he loved the land and its people. George's monarchy is threatened when he suffers from the neurological disease porphyria, which turns his urine blue and him temporarily demented. The play opens with George angered over the loss of the American colonies. Members of his court, including his faithful wife Queen Charlotte and their fifteen children, cannot help but notice as he descends from a plain, pedantic lord into a sleepless, often delirious paranoid. George surrenders to his irrational fears of a second Noah's Flood and acts out his suppressed erotic fantasies by assaulting the matronly Lady Pembroke, the queen's mistress of robes. The deranged monarch is surrounded by a circle of family, friends, and foes all far madder than he. Consumed by fever, he loses his capacities and his freedom as Parliament brews with disloyalty and upheaval. When sane, George uses the phrase "what, what!" in order to fill the spaces in his conversation. When mad, context disappears, and his problems become paranoia and incessant chatter.

Diagnosing his madness invites problems because, as king, George's actions are beyond questioning. Nonetheless, the fat, petulant, fashionable Prince of Wales ("Prinny"), seeing his father's weakness as an opportunity to control the crown, rallies a slew of supporters including the great orator Charles James Fox. Fox, crazy for power, leads the struggle against the famous British prime minister, Pitt the Younger who, for Bennett, is a sexually repressed alcoholic, aloof, robotic, preoccupied with parsimony, and desperately clinging to his office by utterly denying the king's illness. Secreted away, George is treated by ignorant doctors whose barbaric methods include bleeding, scalding, and restraint. Conspirators deny Charlotte access to George, and the king consequently becomes an isolated, Lear-like figure at the mercy of charlatans and cruelty. Coincidentally, when a new doctor, Dr. Willis, is engaged, the king shows signs of improvement. Yet the king's salvation relies on time and on the support of the most potent medicine—the queen herself.

The play spotlights the power games, family scandals, and personal intrigues that take place under an incapacitated ruler. Within its COMEDY, Madness raises provocative questions about leadership and public perception. Bennett challenges viewers to weigh their allegiances, determine when facts are credible, and question whether following impaired authority is prudent.

[See also England, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Bennett, Alan. The Madness of George III. London: Faber & Faber, 1992.
- Kendle, Burton S. "Alan Bennett." In Contemporary Dramatists, ed. by K. A. Berney. 1973. 5th ed., London: St. James, 1993.
- Wu, Duncan. Six Contemporary Dramatists: Bennett, Potter, Gray, Brenton, Hare, Ayckbourn. London: St. Martin's, 1995.

LynnDianne Beene

MADSEN, SVEND ÅGE (1939–)

Freud: Which story . . . why are you against my theories?

Pirandello: Because you try to make man a rattling machine tied to one single story from which he can't liberate himself.—I think we have innumerable stories inside us from which we choose.

— Act 1, Naked Masks

Svend Åge Madsen's work is marked by constant experiments with the possibilities of fiction and an extensive relativism, making him akin to authors like LUIGI PIRANDELLO and Jorge Luis Borges. He is not an easily accessible writer, but his self-reflecting works with their changing narrator perspectives and often very complicated network of parallel actions and stories have nevertheless procured him a large public in DENMARK and abroad, especially in FRANCE. He is primarily known for his novels or antinovels but has also written a good twenty plays for stage and radio—Svejk in the Third World War (Svejk I 3. Verdenskrig, 1984), Dr Strangelove (1985), The Last Sigh (Det sidste suk, 1986), and Naked Masks (Nøgne masker, 1987), all four written when he was a dramatist in residence at Århus Theatre.

Naked Masks is a typical Madsen work and one of his most interesting plays, confronting two highly influential cultural personalities of the last century: Pirandello and Sigmund Freud. During this fictive meeting, Madsen also gets an opportunity for self-reflection. Like Pirandello, Madsen does not tell stories only for the stories' sake. He belongs to what Pirandello called the "philosophical" writers who admit solely stories and characters that have been soaked in a particular sense of life—the author's—to acquire from it a universal value. Madsen has a fancy for playing with genres and styles. Naked Masks operates on three stylistic levels. On the left part of the stage, representing Pirandello's study, the acting style is "Italian social REALISM"; on the central stage, the ruins of a Greek roman theater in Sicily and the acting place of Pirandello and his theater troupe, the style is "symbolic, playful and theatrical"; and on the right side of the stage, the quay of the Tiber, where Pirandello and Freud confront each other, the style is "COMEDY." The play is also characteristic of Madsen's Chinese box technique and numerous mystifications. At the beginning of Naked Masks, a group of actors is planning a play on Pirandello's life in which Freud, who is on a short vacation in Rome, becomes involved with the result that we are continuously left in doubt about when Pirandello is Pirandello or an actor who acts Pirandello and when Freud is the real doctor from Vienna or an actor.

Freud enters the play to solve a problem on the central stage where Pirandello and his actors live in a state of harmony in mutual love to the mystic woman Laura who once was washed ashore like the seaborne Venus. The harmony is broken when Laura's son Doro arrives from the war and claims to know his father's identity. Freud is rapidly changing the play into an Ibsenite TRAGEDY with relentless unveiling of the past, raising doubts about whether the former happy Arcadia can ever be restored.

Madsen makes heavy intellectual demands on his audience, but Naked Masks is also an extremely witty play—for example, the two central scenes where Freud and Pirandello relieve each other on the bench of the psychiatrist. In the first confrontation, dealing with the question of whether man is bound to one single story or contains many different stories, Pirandello seems to have the leading hand. Against Freud's Oedipus complex Pirandello comes up with a Robinson Crusoe complex, built on man's fundamental feeling of being totally alone in the world as if he were on an isolated island—a basic situation leaving man free to create himself from scratch without becoming a slave of his past. During this confrontation, Freud listens attentively to Pirandello's interpretations of his dreams as symptoms of his fear of change and longing for creating a new identity for himself. The second confrontation is more complex. Here Freud takes over to prove that Pirandello's relativism is nothing but an escape from responsibility and leaves a still more dizzy Pirandello, who at the end of the play receives his doom from The Unknown, a through-going symbolic figure and commentator: "You shall pursue life, reach out for it—and perpetually see it disappear. You shall gain fame and honour—and in your heart know that your works become more and more lifeless, empty and fossilized"—a doom not only applied to Pirandello but also to the postmodernist Svend Åge Madsen?

SELECT PLAYS: Hopla, We . . . Dot, Dot, Dot (Hopla, vi . . . prik, prik, prik, 1967); In Reality (I virkeligheden, radio play, 1972); Kasper in Search of Existence (Kasper søger efter tilværelsen, radio play, 1982); Svejk in the Third World War (Svejk I 3. Verdenskrig, 1984); Dr Strangelove (1985); The Last Sigh (Det sidste suk, 1986); Naked Masks (Nøgne masker, 1987); The Theatre of Death (Dødens Teater, 1987); The Copyist (Kopisten, 1994)

FURTHER READING

Christoffersen, Erik Exe. Teaterpoetik [Theater poetics]. Århus: Klim, 1997.
Gemzøe, Anker. Metamorfoser i Mellemtiden. Studier i Svend Åge Madsens forfatterskab 1962–1986 [Metamorphosis in the meantime. Studies of Svend Åge Madsen's work 1962–1986]. Holte: Medusa, 1997.

Kela Kvam

MAETERLINCK, MAURICE (1862–1949)

Maurice Maeterlinck was born on August 29, 1862, in Ghent. His greatest contribution was to bring the ideals of the symbolist movement to the dramatic stage. Beneath the surface of a conventional upbringing—Jesuit schooling followed by a degree in law—Maeterlinck consistently nurtured an interest in writing, publishing his first poem in La Jeune Belgique in 1883. After graduating from law school in 1885, Maeterlinck moved to Paris, where he befriended poet Stéphane Mallarmé and novelist Villiers de l'Isle Adam, both of whom encouraged Maeterlinck to develop his writing in accord with the burgeoning symbolist movement.

Maeterlinck returned to BELGIUM in 1886, and with the publication of his play Princess Maleine (La Princesse Maleine) in 1889, he achieved sudden fame. Octave Mirbeau reviewed the as-yet-unperformed script in Le Figaro (Aug. 24, 1890), proclaiming it "the work of this age most full of genius, and the most extraordinary and most simple as well." Despite his newfound celebrity, Maeterlinck's work was not performed until 1891, when Paul Fort's Théâtre d'Art hesitantly included The Intruder at the end of a matinee program. A production of The Blind later that year featured a performance by Aurélien Lugné-Poë, who would become an important director of the playwright's work. Traditional plot development was anathema in Maeterlinck's writing, which required exploration of new staging techniques. Lugné-Poë's staging of a single matinee production of Pelléas and Mélisande (Pelléas at Mélisande) in 1893, for example, was influenced by the moody paintings of Puvis de Chavannes and featured a bare stage separated from the audience by a gauze curtain, lending the action behind it a dreamlike quality. The production was lit unconventionally from above, and the actors spoke with an artificial intonation.

Maeterlinck's works of the 1890s constituted a reaction against naturalist preoccupations. Like other symbolist artists, Maeterlinck explored the ineffable and the mystical, relishing moods of angst and dread. Although Maeterlinck's plays knew little success on the English-speaking stage, their influence was far-reaching. ANTON CHEKHOV was a great admirer of Maeterlinck, recommending his works to the MOSCOW ART THEATRE; VSEVOLD MEYERHOLD turned to Maeterlinck's plays repeatedly to test staging techniques for his "New Drama." In 1902, Claude Debussy's operatic version of Pelléas and Mélisande premiered after nine years of preparation, securing Maeterlinck's place in the history of opera. ANTONIN ARTAUD considered Maeterlinck the first to introduce "the diverse wealth of the unconscious" into literature, and some critics view Maeterlinck as a precursor to the Theater of the Absurd. For a time, his works became less pessimistic, as testified by his popular The Blue Bird (L'Oiseau Bleu 1908), which was twice adapted for film.

In 1911, Maeterlinck won the Nobel Prize for Literature. Shortly thereafter, as a result of his prose work Death (La Mort), Maeterlinck was placed on the Index of the Catholic Church, and his complete works were prohibited. After 1920, his physical health and literary abilities declined. His marginal position was exacerbated by his move to the UNITED STATES from 1939 to 1946. His last years were spent secluded with his wife, Renée Dahon, in Nice, where his literary output dwindled. Maeterlinck died on May 6, 1949, in Orlamonde near Nice.

[See also France; Naturalism; Symbolism]

SELECT PLAYS: Princess Maleine (La Princesse Maleine, 1889); The Intruder (L'Intruse, 1891); The Blind (Les aveugles, 1891); Pelléas and Mélisande (Pelléas at Mélisande, 1893); Interior (Intérieur, 1894); The Death of Tintagiles (La Mort de Tintagiles, 1894); Monna Vanna (1902); The Blue Bird (L'Oiseau Bleu, 1908); The Betrothal (Les Fiançailles, 1918)

FURTHER READING

Halls, W. D. Maurice Maeterlinck: A Study of His Life and Thought. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1960.

Knapp, Bettina. Maurice Maeterlinck. New York: G. K. Hall, 1975.

Konrad, Linn Bratteteig. Modern Drama as Crisis: The Case of Maurice Maeterlinck. New York: Peter Lang, 1986.

Daniel Mufson

MAFUNE YUTAKA (1902–1977)

Japanese SHINGEKI and SHINPA playwright, director, novelist, and theater group founder, Mafune Yutaka was born in 1902 to a wealthy landowner and sake brewer in Fukushima, JAPAN. He was adopted in boyhood by a successful businessman and family friend in Hokkaidō. Treated as a common houseboy, Mafune awoke to the ugliness of human nature. He soon fled from his adopted household back to Fukushima.

As a student of English literature at Waseda University in Tokyo, Mafune was introduced to the works of such classic modern Western playwrights as J. M. SYNGE, HENRIK IBSEN, and AUGUST STRINDBERG and to the revolutionary syndicalism of the Irish revolutionary James Connolly. Inspired by Connolly and others, Mafune left school to engage in rural activism in provincial Japan. Mafune's first play, The Weasel (Itachi, 1931), written while in forced confinement at his father's house, deals with landlord-peasant conflict and was written entirely in the local dialect of Fukushima. The Weasel, directed by KUBOTA MANTARŌ at the Sōsakuza in 1934, won critical acclaim that established Mafune's firm foundation as a successful playwright.

Later Mafune turned his pen from a single-minded depiction of the dark, ugly side of human nature to satire, devotedly writing a series of plays in that genre, including Children of the Sun (Taiyō no Ko, 1936), The Naked City (Hadaka no Machi, 1936), The Stranger (Mishiranu Hito, 1936), Escapade (Tonsōfu, 1937), Mold (Kabi, 1938), and Deserted Garden (Haien, 1938), all of which were staged by shingeki, shinpa, and shinkokugeki theater groups; a few were also adapted to film.

The end of World War II marked a critical turning point in Mafune's work. He changed his topics from satiric to human COMEDY, starting with Nakahashi Household (Nakahashi Kōkan, 1946), which deals with a Japanese family stuck in CHINA after the end of the war. From 1948 on, Mafune was also markedly active in writing scripts for radio drama, such as Snow, The Owl, The Sleeping Cat, and Winter Chats.

In the 1950s, he dedicated most of his energies to FARCE, establishing his own studio theater, Mafune Yutaka Library Theatre (Mafune Yutaka Shosai Gekijō) for the production and staging of his own plays. Famed actor-director SENDA KOREYA was a self-styled devotee of Mafune and presented Mafune's plays The Yellow Room (Kiirō no Heya, 1943) and Nakahashi Household in hopes of revitalizing the shingeki movement in the early postwar period. Mafune himself directed his plays Pastorale (Den'en, 1941) and Farce: The Lightning (Farusu: Inazuma, 1951) for Bungakuza in 1943 and 1952, respectively.

Mafune's plays are conspicuous in their total abstinence from contemporary politics, even during the highly nationalized period of the 1930s and early 1940s, which made them continuously popular with the shingeki theater world, Bungakuza in particular.

From 1948 to 1950, Mafune's complete works were published in five volumes. Although widely known in Japan, his work thus far has hardly been critically examined by the English-speaking world. He died in 1977.

SELECT PLAYS: Winter Geese (Kangamo, 1927); The Weasel (Itachi, 1931); Children of the Sun (Taiyō no Ko, 1936); The Naked City (Hadaka no Machi, 1936); The Stranger (Mishiranu Hito, 1936); Escapade (Tonsōfu, 1937); Deserted Garden (Haien, 1938); Mold (Kabi, 1938); Pastorale (Den'en, 1941); The Yellow Room (Kiirō no Heya, 1943); Nakahashi Household (Nakahashi Kōkan, 1946); Farce: The Lightning (Farusu: Inazuma, 1951); The Loquacious Parrot (Ōmu no Gyōzetsu, 1958); The Blacksmith on an Solitary Island (Kotō no Kajiya, 1959); A Life of Zenkō (Zenkō no Isshō, 1963); Do Not Tread on Flowers (Hana wo Fumunakare, 1964); A Glass Doll (Biidoro Ningyō, 1965); Father's Visit to Classwork Day (Chihioya no Sankanbi, 1966); The Man of Volte-Face (Hyōhen Jinbutsu, 1968)

FURTHER READING

- Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama, Criticism. New York: Henry Holt, 1984.
- Mafune Yutaka. Mafune Yutaka Senshū [Selected works of Mafune Yutaka]. Tokyo: Koyama Shoten, 1948–1950.
- . Mafune Yutaka Rajio Dorama Senshū [Selected Radio Plays of Mafune Yutaka]. Tokyo: Hōbunkan, 1951.
- Powell, Brian. Japan's Modern Theatre: A Century of Continuity and Change. London: Japan Library, 2002.

Rokuo Tanaka

MAGGIE AND PIERRE

Maggie and Pierre by LINDA GRIFFITHS and PAUL THOMPSON was first performed in the Backspace at Theatre Passe Muraille in Toronto, in 1979. Originally, the play was wildly successful and enjoyed extensive cross-CANADA touring. Later remounts of the production have frequently been criticized as being dated.

Maggie and Pierre is a unique one-person, three-character play that investigates the intimacies and public image of one of Canada's most famous and infamous political couples, the former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and his former wife Margaret Sinclair Trudeau. The play is ambitious in its scope, tracing the development of the relationship between Pierre and Margaret, as well as the rise and decline of Pierre as prime minister of Canada. It is also theatrically demanding, using only one actress to play the three parts: Pierre, Margaret, and Henry (a journalist). Furthermore, it is this aspect that shapes the intimacy of the play itself. This is not simply political satire, or political history, for that matter, although it engages both genres; this is an intimate fantasy of the people who lead the country through one of its most turbulent times in the nation's contemporary history. The portrayal of all three characters by one actress emphasizes the intimacy the play seeks to depict, by physically linking the characters, conversations, internal monologues, and character transformations through the actress's own physicality.

The thematic center of the play is the conflict between public myth and private personae and between Pierre's Cartesian rationality, his learned self-assurance (often interpreted as arrogance) and Margaret's childlike innocence, and her narcissistic attempts to embrace the 1960s counterculture. More simply put, it is a classic drama of the values of the old and the new. According to the play, despite the couple's embrace of liberality, they seem to remain trapped within the limitations of gender, public opinion, and national expectations. In a poignant moment, Margaret is depicted as realizing her own trapped existence as she wanders by the Rideau canal, feeling that she is always being watched, always being corrected: "What's that underneath the water? It looks like wings, like wings beating underneath the water. Pierre would say, 'no, Margaret. It's just the intersection of the wind and the rain causing that configuration on the surface.' But I know it's wings. Is it possible to think if someone is always watching you?"

While Margaret struggles, she might also be speaking on behalf of her husband, who was also subject to the prying and voyeuristic eyes of the Canadian press and public and trapped within the expectations of the mythic status imposed upon him. When he states, "The only way to stay alive is to avoid their wish to define you," Pierre is referring not only to himself but also to the slippery subject of Canadian identity. However, the close degree to which this couple's relationship is monitored by the nation is finally revealed and placed back into private perspective when Pierre learns that his wife has "run off with the Rolling Stones." He invites Henry to "enter his emotional world," an invitation that is in fact impossible. Once the personal anguish of this public man is aired through his prayer, it is no longer possible to hold him in mythical ideal. Trudeau loses the next election, while Maggie is depicted as dancing alone, stopping only to deliver her final monologue, stating that she is Margaret Trudeau, "the woman who gave freedom a bad name." However, her final lines suggest that it was not all for naught, that perhaps if freedom has a price, then it must be paid. She reveals her own recovery from the ordeal when she is able to freely and flirtatiously ask the audience, "Which do you think is my best feature, my legs . . . or my bum?"

FURTHER READING

- Maggie and Pierre*. Encyclopedia of Canadian Theatre. <http://www.canadiantheatre.com/>.
- Miller, Mary Jane. "Billy Bishop Goes to War and Maggie and Pierre: A Matched Set." Theatre History in Canada 10, no. 2 (1999): 188–198.

Jolene Armstrong

THE MAGISTRATE

The fourth of ARTHUR PINERO's plays to be produced, The Magistrate (1885) is a clever three-act FARCE that pokes fun at the absurdities of middle-class British respectability, especially the deceptions that solid guardians of the social order engage in to keep from revealing secrets and unpleasant truths. Pinero's achievement was to draw on the techniques of French farce, but not its risqué subject matter, to create a more lighthearted, distinctly English form of farce.

The play, which takes place in London, revolves around the misadventures of Aeneas Posket, the magistrate of the Mulberry Street Police Court, who is married to a lively widow, Agatha. Mrs. Posket has been keeping her true age from her husband and safeguards her secret by pretending that her nineteen-year-old son from a previous marriage, Cis Farrington, is only fourteen. This skeleton in the family closet is the occasion for much of the humor in the play and the rather weak mainspring for much of the action. Although he seems actually to believe that he is only fourteen, Cis has an active (although secret) social life and displays a lively interest in gambling, women, and late-night carousing. Playfully, he takes his stepfather on a round of misadventures. While dining at a club after hours, the two are surprised by a police raid and nearly discovered, but they manage to escape, and Posket arrives at his magistrate's room at court the next morning shaken and disheveled. Posket, the model of rectitude, is thrown into confusion when his own wife (who had gone to the same club to meet Colonel Lukyn, an old friend of both, and convince him not to reveal her true age) is brought before him for sentencing, having been taken into custody when discovered in the club after hours. The magistrate, of course, is as guilty as the accused. But in the end, all comes to light and everyone is forgiven.

The initial success of the play revived the failing fortunes of the Court Theatre, where The Magistrate was first produced on March 21, 1885 and where it ran for more than 300 performances, a record at the time for a London production. Critics agree that it was The Magistrate and two other farces (The Schoolmistress and Dandy Dick) that Pinero created for the Court Theatre company that made his name. Although the premise of the play is almost preposterous (how can anyone think that Cis is only fourteen?), The Magistrate is carefully constructed, and its minor characters are well drawn, revealing Pinero as a conscientious and skilled craftsman.

Early audiences of The Magistrate, along with theater critics, greeted the play enthusiastically. A Boston Herald review regretted that the play would be on the stage in that city for only three weeks. One critic characterized it as a "lightface" that "never descends for a moment to the level of knockabout farce." Other reviewers called the play "pure fun," "ludicrous, but not silly," and Pinero's "merriest COMEDY," while acknowledging the plot as "the slightest of slight threads." The play has been revived throughout the 20th century.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Bratton, J. S. Introduction to Trelawny of the "Wells" and Other Plays, by Arthur Wing Pinero. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1995.
- Dawick, John. Pinero: A Theatrical Life. Niwot: Univ. Press of Colorado, 1993.

Elaine Brousseau

MAHABIDROHA See THE GREAT REBELLION

THE MAIDEN STONE

There is nothing, nothing you cannot be when their eyes are on you.
Nothing.

—Harriet, Act 1, Scene 6

Premiered at the Hampstead Theatre, London, in 1995, The Maiden Stone was the recipient of the inaugural Peggy Ramsay Award. Jean Findlay in The Scotsman (1995) calls it a "savagely wild rumbustious mix of fantasy and fable, birth and death, extreme hardship and bitter cold," and it is certainly the most striking of RONA MUNRO's works in terms of the vigorous interweaving of legend, storytelling, and ballad with an exploration of what it means to be a woman, a mother, and an artist. The dialect in which the Scottish characters speak is expressive, sinuous, but Munro has counted it a handicap to the play's wider success.

Set in northeast SCOTLAND during the 19th century, the play takes place on a series of farm and roadside settings where two wanderers, Harriet, an actress, and Bidie, a traveling woman, meet with their respective family groups. Harriet has come to fulfill a nonexistent engagement at the local castle, while Bidie, sometime farmhand and washerwoman, is also the wet nurse Harriet needs to feed her babies.

The Maiden Stone is a play about transformation, from the legend of the stone by the road, or Harriet sending her reluctant daughter Miriam to beg for food in an assumed character, to wild child Mary's desire to become an actress caught up in Harriet's tales of the transforming power of performance, and Miriam's rejection of her mother's plans for her, to assume the role of a severely conventional schoolteacher. All are choices dearly paid for by the women to become someone of their own choosing.

The action is filled with striking stage pictures; howling winds and snowstorms test the characters, while Bidie's animalistic brood roam the stage, sometimes becoming the ghosts of children long dead, sometimes inhabiting the wild creatures that own the land. The Maiden Stone also features some of the most supportive male/female relationships within Munro's writing. Archie, Harriet's loving but weak husband, and Nick, Bidie's occasional lover and soulmate, both provide the women with moments of joy amid the daily struggles for existence. Bidie, both seeking and fearing Nick's fleeting visits, is anchored by her role as mother, providing emotional love and physical nurture for her children, her knowledge of the landscape sustaining them in hard times. Harriet is determined to make an independent life for herself and her children and does not scruple about how this is to be achieved, but she is out of her setting, her education of little use in finding food and shelter, so that she becomes increasingly dependent on others.

The action covers an extended period of time during which Bidie is aged by the rigors of her life, but Harriet is changed totally, from proud, calculating, driven artist to a spent force, broken by one pregnancy too many and the treachery of Miriam. The two women are on journeys that cannot end but with death; and at the last, Harriet hands over her means of escape, her art, to Mary, who leaves for Edinburgh, and Harriet is absorbed into the Maiden Stone of the legend.

FURTHER READING

- Horvat, Ksenija, and Barbara Bell. "Sue Glover, Rona Munro and Lara Jane Bunting: Echoes and Open Spaces." In Contemporary Scottish Women Writers, ed. by Aileen Christianson and Alison Lumsden. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 2000. 65–78.
- Macdonald, Jan. "Food as Signifier and Symbol in the Work of Contemporary Scottish Women Dramatists." In A Theatre That

- Matters: Twentieth-Century Scottish Drama and Theatre, ed. by Valentina Poggi and Margaret Rose. Milan: Edizioni Unicopli, 2000. 89–110.
- Scullion, Adrienne. "Contemporary Scottish Women Playwrights." In Modern British Women Playwrights, ed. by Elaine Aston and Janelle Reinelt. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000. 94–118.
- Triesman, Susan. "Transformations and Transgressions: Women's Discourse on the Scottish Stage." In British and Irish Women Dramatists Since 1958, ed. by Trevor R. Griffiths and Margaret Lewellyn-Jones. Buckingham: Open Univ. Press, 1993. 124–134.

Barbara A. E. Bell

THE MAIDS

The Maids (Les Bonnes), an intense drama, was the first of JEAN GENET's plays to reach a wide audience. Originally consisting of four acts with a large cast (titled The Tragedy of the Confidantes [La Tragédie des confidentes]), the piece was compressed into a single act for three players under the dramaturgical guidance of JEAN COCTEAU, who brought Genet's play to the attention of Louis Jouvet, an acclaimed actor-artistic director. Jouvet, in search of a production for his 1947 season, was immediately drawn to Genet's hypnotic account of two maids rehearsing a murder.

The play reveals the secret life of Claire and Solange, sisters working as live-in domestics for a glamorous and entitled young woman known simply as "Madame." During nightly games in Madame's bedroom, the two young women variously impersonate each other and their mistress, raiding both the latter's couture-filled closet and litany of admonitions to play out scenarios of intimidation and rebellion. Fueled by their fantasies, they conspire to destroy Madame, whose lover they have denounced in a series of anonymous letters to the police. But when the lover is suddenly released on bail, the sisters fear their plot will be discovered and decide to poison their mistress. Their plan goes awry, however, and Claire, play-acting as her mistress, deliberately drinks the poison instead. Solange is left alone to imagine herself as a magnificent murderess liberated from servitude.

The Maids had a "true crime" resonance for its initial audiences, as the play is based on the notorious 1930s case of the Papin sisters, who tortured, killed, and mutilated the mother and daughter for whom they worked. But Genet's portrayal of the maids' stylized rituals of dominance and humiliation is more of an examination of the psychological violence of imposed roles than it is of actual physical brutality. Genet biographer Edmund White (1993) finds echoes of AUGUST STRINDBERG and Jean Racine in the play's exploration of the master-servant power dynamic and its use of formal rhetoric to express explosive feeling, as well as the influence of ANTONIN ARTAUD's Theater of Cruelty. Genet himself cited the Catholic Mass and the play of children as models for The Maids's alternately hallucinatory and matter-of-fact style.

The Maids premiered in Paris in April 1947, as the curtain-raiser for JEAN GIRAUDOUX's more decorous The Apollo of Bellac. Genet's play was a slap in the face of postwar audiences who were not yet ready to be told that everything they had fought for was ultimately a sham; with a few exceptions, critics savaged the play, calling it "crude" and "unhealthy." Hissing and catcalls interrupted most of its initial run of ninety-two performances. JEAN-PAUL SARTRE was among the play's earliest and ardent defenders, calling Genet's play a "Black Mass" that aimed to "strike at the root of the apparent" and so lay bare the hidden sadism and despair beneath society's pretenses of civility (Genet, 1954). Sartre also claimed that Genet had envisioned the maids to be played by men, a bit of apocrypha that influenced directorial approaches for half a century, although Genet later denied this.

[See also France; Gay and Lesbian Drama]

FURTHER READING

- Brooks, Peter, and Joseph Halpern, eds. Genet: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979.
- Genet, Jean. The Maids and Deathwatch. Two Plays by Jean Genet. Tr. by Bernard Frechtman, with an introduction by Jean-Paul Sartre. New York: Grove, 1954.
- . The Selected Writings of Jean Genet. Ed. and with an introduction by Edmund White. Hopewell, N.J.: Ecco Press, 1993.
- Webb, Richard, comp. File on Genet. London: Methuen Drama, 1992.
- White, Edmund. Genet: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1993.

Charlotte Stoudt

MAILLET, ANTONINE (1929–)

Canadian playwright and novelist Antonine Maillet was born in Bouctouche, New Brunswick, in 1929. She is best known for her work celebrating Acadian life, past and present. Maillet's body of work includes twelve published plays, fifteen novels, children's books, television and radio scripts, articles, and translations of William Shakespeare's Richard III and Twelfth Night. In addition, Maillet is known nationally and internationally as a keynote speaker and storyteller par excellence and has taught as a visiting professor at universities in North America and Europe.

Maillet's writings characteristically showcase Acadian heritage and culture in their story lines. Acadian herself, Maillet draws from her own background and celebrates the life of this small but resilient group of Canadians. Originally Acadia (located roughly in CANADA's Maritime Provinces) was colonized by the French, but because of the growing threat of Acadian solidarity, they were displaced by the ruling British in La dispersion or "The Great Deportation" of 1755. Many Acadians relocated to America, settling largely in Louisiana, but some returned to their homes years later. Maillet descends from these hearty people and in her work makes sure they are not forgotten.

Maillet's works are groundbreaking in that they are written in Acadian French, a language specific to the Acadian people (similar to 17th- and 18th-century French) and one that had, up until Maillet, been solely an oral language. In her works she celebrates Acadian strength and perseverance, giving a body and a voice to a forgotten people. Rather than belaboring the injustice of the past, Maillet's work, though still social criticism, focuses more on the fortitude and ingenuity that helped the Acadians survive against great challenges to their way of life. Maillet champions the Acadian Spirit in its finest form.

The Slatern (La sagouine, 1971), Maillet's most widely known drama, is considered by some critics to be a modern masterpiece, forging new territory in Acadian theater and giving a voice where there formerly was none. Written as a monologue, The Slatern is filled with the musings of an old Acadian scrubwoman as she cleans, all the while thinking about her heritage, what has happened to her people, and the downtrodden state in which they find themselves.

Maillet's writings, particularly her novels, have received much acclaim, earning her such honors as the Prix Champlain for Pointe-aux-coques (Clam Point, 1958), the Canadian Governor General's Award for Fiction for Don l'original (The Tale of Don L'original, 1972), Le Grand Prix de la Ville de Montréal and the Prix France-Canada for Mariaagêlas (1973 and 1975), and the Floyd S. Chalmers' Canadian Play Award for The Slatern (1980). She holds the honor of being the first nonnative of France to win the celebrated Prix Goncourt with her work Pélagie-la-charrette (Pélagie: The Return to a Homeland, 1979). She holds honorary degrees from more than twenty-five universities and has been appointed to national councils for arts and culture in Canada, France, and Monaco. Maillet was appointed Companion of the Order of Canada, Canada's highest civilian honor, for her life's literary work.

PLAYS: The Grimy Ones (Les crasseux, 1968); The Slatern (La sagouine, 1970); Gapi and Sullivan (Gapi et Sullivan, 1973); Évangéline Deusse (1975); Gapi (1975); The Mad Widow (La veuve enragée, 1977); The Middle-Class Gentleman (La bourgeois gentleman, 1978); The Smuggler (La contrebandière, 1981); The Humorous, Horrible, and Terrible Adventures of Panurge, Friend of Pantagruel (Les drolatiques, horribles, et épouvantables aventures de Panurge, ami de Pantagruel, 1983); Garroche in Paradise (Garroche en paradis, 1986); Margot the Insane One (Margot la Folle, 1987); William S. (1991)

FURTHER READING

Godin, Jean-Cleop, and Laurent Mailhot, eds. Théâtre Québécois. Montreal: Hurtubise HMH, 1980.

Northwest Passages: Canadian Literature Online. "Antonine Maillet: A Selected Bibliography." <http://www.nwpassages.com/bios/maillet2.asp>.

Smith, Donald. Voices of Deliverance: Interviews with Quebec & Acadian Writers. Toronto: Anansi, 1986.

Kate Maurer

MAJOR BARBARA

A play by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, written in 1905 and first performed at the Court Theatre, London, in the same year, Major Barbara has remained a popular and frequently performed play. It is a robust, challenging work that memorably defines the dilemmas that perennially confront reforming idealists when they come to grips with the realities of power in society. Like Saint Joan, her successor in Shaw's dramatic writings, Major Barbara has achieved iconic status as an image of a courageous individual woman pitting her will and faith against the hostile forces of her surrounding world. Equally impressive and enduring as a dramatic image is Shaw's portrait of the munitions manufacturer, Andrew Undershaft, as an unrepentantly successful, engaging but ruthless modern business tycoon.

The action of Major Barbara embodies an imaginatively conceived allegory about different forms of power, bringing into dynamic confrontation with one another the brute force of "money and gunpowder," the spiritual energies of religious idealism, and the civilizing agencies of humanistic culture and philosophy. The intellectual debate in the work is anchored in a human drama involving family loyalties and division, a love affair put to trial in the crucible of ideological conflict, and an intricate pattern of coercive power-play that appears in many areas of action, including the subtly connected subplot about the belligerent Bill Walker. The work is enlivened by searching humor, comic inventiveness, and complex, richly ambiguous characterization.

Having been born into an upper-middle-class family as the daughter of Lady Britomart and her estranged husband Undershaft, Barbara has joined the Salvation Army and is in charge of a shelter in the poverty-stricken district of West Ham in London that is under threat of closure because of lack of funds. Barbara becomes disillusioned when it is revealed that the only way the shelter can be saved is by acceptance of donations from her immensely wealthy father, Undershaft, and Sir Horace Bodger, an owner of whisky distilleries. She suffers a crisis of faith when her jubilant fellow Salvationists, having accepted Undershaft's bounty, follow him offstage in a parody of a Dionysian revel. Undershaft's unconventional ideas, that poverty is a crime, perpetrated by society as a whole, and that the moral virtues can only flourish in a proper economic environment, are underscored by the act 3 visit to his model village of Perivale St. Andrews, which is part of the munitions factory complex.

The play shows the influence on Shaw of William Blake's subversion of conventional ideas of good and evil in such works as The Marriage of Heaven and Hell and Songs of Innocence and Experience and also of the translation of Euripides's The Bacchae by the Australian-born professor of Greek Gilbert Murray, on whom the character of Cusins is modeled. Shaw disclaimed the influence of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE on his play in the preface to Major Barbara. But well before 1905 he was aware of the ideas in the German philosopher's work Beyond Good and Evil. The Nietzschean assault on simplistic categorizations of good and evil, right and wrong, is paralleled in Major Barbara.

The development of the play is toward a synthesis of the opposing forces presented in its first two acts. In their final assent to the ideas that "life is all one" and that "the way of life lies through the factory of death" Barbara and Cusins are imaginatively creating a Shavian marriage of heaven and hell. Those who would do good in the world cannot do so by turning their backs on the realities and energies of evil. In recognizing that, for all its virtues, Undershaft's model village of Perivale St. Andrews does not answer all the needs of the human spirit, Barbara rediscovers her sense of religious purpose. There is work for her among the full-fed, snobbish creatures in her father's materialist dream-town. But even as Shaw was writing the play, Undershaft's counterparts in real life were manufacturing the weapons that, within less than a decade, were to be employed in one of the worst wars in human history. The prospect held out in Major Barbara of a union of intelligence, spiritual enlightenment, and power was shattered in 1914, and Shaw's wartime work HEARTBREAK HOUSE grimly reflects that fact.

[See also Ireland]

FURTHER READING

- Albert, Sidney P. "Barbara's Progress." Shaw: The Annual of Bernard Shaw Studies 21 (2001).
 Crompton, Louis. "Major Barbara." In Shaw the Dramatist. Lincoln: Univ. of Nebraska Press, 1969.
 Gibbs, A. M. "Action and Meaning in Major Barbara." In The Art and Mind of Shaw: Essays in Criticism. London: Macmillan, 1983.
 Grene, Nicholas. "Giving the Devil More than His Due." In Bernard Shaw: A Critical View. London: Macmillan, 1984.
 Morgan, Margery M. "Major Barbara." In The Shavian Playground. London: Methuen, 1972.
 Wisenthal, J. L. "Major Barbara." In The Marriage of Contraries: Bernard Shaw's Middle Plays. Cambridge: Harvard Univ. Press, 1974.

A. M. Gibbs

MÅKESPISERE See SEAGULL EATERS

MAKINO NOZOMI (1959–)

Makino Nozomi, Japanese dramatist and artistic director, and head of the theater company Makino Office Productions (MOP), founded in 1984, came to prominence during the upsurge in regional theater activities in JAPAN during the 1990s. A Tokyo resident at present, he attended Dōshisha University in Kyoto, where MOP is located.

Fascinated by the famous 1970s playwright TSUKA KŌHEI's satirical COMEDIES, Makino produced mainly Tsuka's works in the 1980s, especially THE ATAMI MURDER CASE (1973); since the 1990s Makino has focused on writing his own works. He shares with such playwrights as Nagai Ai and Mitani Kōki a reputation for producing well-made plays. He is active both in commercial theater, working with popular television celebrities, and in serious little theater (ANGURA or shōgekijō) productions with MOP.

The first notable characteristic of Makino's theater is his preference for historical figures and contexts rather than contemporary social problems. His works treat the dilemma of youth torn between personal desire and national concern during major transitional periods in history, such as the drastic change from the Tokugawa (1603–1868) to the Meiji period (1868–1912). The second striking characteristic of his plays is their pervasive optimism and good humor. His characters live enthusiastically and authentically, however dismal the social circumstances may be. His protagonists include cultural heroes such as outlaw samurai Sakamoto Ryōma in the HAPPY MAN series, poet Yosano Akiko and the literary group surrounding her in Mother—Do not Laugh (1994), and novelist Okamoto Kanoko in Kanojo i (1997).

His best-known play, Tokyo Atomic Klub (1997), for which he won the prestigious Yomiuri Literary Award in 1997, is a fictionalized account of the youth of Nobel Prize winner in physics Tomonaga Shinichirō between 1932 and 1946. It depicts the scientist's life at a boardinghouse with a motley group of residents when he was studying at the Science Research Institute in Tokyo. The play is controversial for depicting without guilt the excitement of scientists over the development of the atomic bomb.

Another work of his about a famous physicist is Fuyuhiko and the Good Luck Cat (1997), which received the 1998 Yomiuri Theatre Award. It comically treats the family life of scientist Terada Torahiko (1878–1935), who was also a disciple of novelist Natsume Sōseki. The fictional Terada has difficulty exerting his patriarchal authority over his lively second wife and his rebellious daughter. Having disappointed his wife by canceling a trip, Terada suggests celebrating Christmas at home in the new fashionable Western way by ordering sushi and exchanging presents. It turns out that she is not as resistant to trying Western customs as first appears. In addition, his daughter runs away from home when Terada forbids her to marry a certain young man. This work was produced at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London, in 2001.

Makino received the 2001 Tsuruya Nanboku Drama Award for Something Far Above (2000) and the Kinokuniya Theatre Award in the Individual Category for Red Shirt (2003).

PLAYS: HAPPY MAN 2: The Great Shanghai Adventure (HAPPY MAN 2: Shanhai Daibōken, 1990); HAPPY MAN 3: Goodbye Ryōma (HAPPY MAN 3: Sayonara Ryōma, 1990); Pisuken (Pis-ken, 1991); Angel Eyes (Enjeru Aizu, 1992); Oldies But Goldies (Orudiiizu batto Gōrudiiizu, 1993); MOTHER—Do Not Laugh (MOTHER—Kimi Waraitamōkoto Nakare, 1994); Fuyuhiko and the Good Luck Cat (Fuyuhiko, 1997); Kanoko (1997); Tokyo Atomic Klub (Tokyo Genshikaku Kurabu, 1997); Love Suicides at Sonezaki, New Version (Shin Sonezaki Shinjū, 1998); Something Far Above

(Takaki Kanomono, 2000); The Black Handkerchief (Kuroi Hankachifu, 2001); Red Shirt (Aka Shatsu, 2003)

FURTHER READING

- Makino Nozomi. Tokyo Atomic Klub (Tokyo Genshikaku Kurabu). Tr. by John D. Swain. In Half a Century of Japanese Theater, Vol. 1: 1990s Part I. Tokyo: Kinokuniya, 1999. 327–410.
- Senda Akihiko. Butai wa Kataru: Gendai Engeki to Myūjīkaru no Mikata [The stage speaks: How to view modern Japanese theater and musicals]. Tokyo: Shūeisha Shinsho, 2002. 100–103.

Mari Boyd

MALAYSIA

Modern Malaysian drama, primarily a post-World War II phenomenon, includes plays in Malay (the national language) as well as English, Mandarin, Tamil, and other languages of this multilingual society. Malaysia's diverse population is also reflected in the characters, themes, settings, and production styles of scripted and performed works. Diversity was already inherent in the Malay opera or bangsawan (literally, "nobility"), an improvisational theater that developed as an offshoot of wayang parsi (Parsi theater) performed by Indian troupes in Penang in the latter quarter of the 19th century. Especially popular in the 1920s and 1930s, bangsawan troupes, performing in Malay, adapted stories from many sources—Arab, Persian, Indian, Malay, Chinese, and Western, such as William Shakespeare—to entertain their broad-based audiences. The progenitor of Malaysia's modern drama, bangsawan waned with World War II, as film, radio, and later television gained in popularity.

The 1950s through the 1970s saw the emergence of three distinct forms of modern Malay drama: sandiwara, realistic drama, and experimental theater. The first Malay playwrights (1950–1960s), including SHAHAROM HUSAIN, Kalam Hamidy, Ali Aziz, and Usman Awang, wrote sandiwara (literally, "drama") scripts that recreated history at a time of rising Malay nationalism, prior to and after independence from ENGLAND in 1957. Sandiwara plays also examine the moral dilemmas characters confront in the modern period, especially as they shift from rural to urban settings. Influenced by troupes from INDONESIA as well as Shakespearean models, sandiwara playwrights created works that were anticolonialist, antifederal, and pro-democratic.

Realistic plays, depicting the multifarious social problems challenging the new nation, emerged in the 1960s. Playwrights sought to balance the drive for progress with an appreciation of traditional Malay values. Indonesian authors and Western realists, such as HENRIK IBSEN, were important influences on this modern style. Most realistic authors preferred positive endings that reflect the optimism of a newly independent nation. These social dramas usually focus on the Malay community, with the sitting room of the main characters' household the central locale. Memorable plays that epitomize the era are Awang Had Salleh's For Wiping Away the Tears (Buat Menyapu Si Air Mata, 1963), Mustapha Kamil Yassin's Tiled Roof, Thatched Roof (Atap Genting Atap Rembia, 1963), and Kalam Hamidy's The Unfortunate Is Lucky (Sial Bertuah, 1963).

Some later realistic works feature unconventional settings, complex intercultural relationships, and/or uncertain endings. Plays such as Usman Awang's Visitors at Kenny Hill (Tamu di Bukit Kenny, 1967) and Anna (1972) by Kemala (né Ahmad Kamal Abdullah) indicate that the optimistic resolutions of earlier realistic drama are no longer guaranteed. Theatrical innovations are at hand.

The third trend is the stylistically inventive plays of the 1970s, which represent a clear break with REALISM. Experimental writers explored the irrational in life in the aftermath of the ethnic riots that occurred in the country on May 13, 1969. During this critical period, as issues of development—social, political, and religious—become more "sensitive," playwrights expressed their concerns symbolically and discretely. They distanced themselves from Western realism and sought to create a clearly Malay style of theater, often combining SURREALISM and traditional Malay performing arts to produce novel stage images. They explored a rich heritage of traditional forms, including wayang kulit (shadow puppetry); dance dramas, such as mak yong, menora, mek mulong, and randai; trance performances, such as kuda kepang and main puteri; dikir barat (poetic call and response); boria (comic sketch and processional), and the penglipur lara (traditional storyteller). NOORDIN HASSAN's landmark play It Is Not the Tall Grass Blown by the Wind (Bukan Lalang Ditiup Angin, 1970), an allegory of the 1969 ethnic violence, initiated the new production style.

The 1970s "third generation" of Malay playwrights, notably Dinsman, Johan Jaafar, and Hatta Azad Khan, popularized a more abstract, AVANT-GARDE theater. Dinsman's (né Z̄aruddin Othman) MONODRAMA It Is Not Suicide (Bukan Bunuh Diri, 1974) spotlights a young college student who rejects both secular and religious teachings to find personal truth and God. In Dry Wind (Angin Kering, 1976) and The One (Dia, 1977), Johan Jaafar presents an ironic world in which rich and poor alike futilely pursue illusions and material comfort. In Hatta Azad Khan's futuristic Corpse (Mayat, 1978), a group of nameless individuals confront outsiders who seem responsible for the mysterious disappearance of their deceased friend. However, innovative as the experimental dramatists were, the increasingly esoteric nature of their work created dissonance between artist and audience. Theater attendance diminished.

By the 1980s, there was a decrease in drama activity. As a consequence of fluctuating economic conditions and Islamic revivalism, which affected theater participation, the government significantly reduced its sponsorship of Malay plays. In this artistic vacuum there emerged an English-language theater renaissance.

There had been an active English-language theater in Malaysia prior to 1969, with plays by Edward Dorall, Lee Joo For, Patrick Yeoh, and Syed Alwi. However, in the aftermath of May 13, Malaysian dramatists felt little incentive to write in English. Since the root cause of the riots was attributed to Malay poverty, the government increased educational and employment opportunities for the Malay community. A national cultural policy sought to establish Malay culture as the foundation culture in the country, with Islam identified as the basis of Malay culture. Although other ethnic groups were acknowledged as playing a relevant cultural role, government funds were mainly channeled to Malay artists.

By the mid-1980s, the cultural atmosphere began to change. Kee Thuan Chye's 1984 Here and Now, first performed in 1985, was the harbinger of a renewed English-language drama. The work exposes submerged tensions between Malays and Chinese but ultimately demonstrates the constructive role that theater can play as a catalyst for social integration. Plays by Shakespeare also experienced a comeback on the English, Malay, Mandarin, and Indian stage, beginning with the 1989 production of Romeo and Juliet. Although Shakespeare's influence was profound in the early development of Malaysian theater, his plays rarely surfaced on Malaysia's postcolonial stage from the 1960s through most of the 1980s.

During the 1990s, Malaysian theater as a whole flourished once again. The government recommitted substantial support to the performing arts—contributing to English as well as Malay theater. New theater venues opened, including the impressive National Theatre (also called Palace of Culture). New, short Malay comedies, more realistic in form, successfully wooed Malay audiences back to the theater. Large-scale productions of Malay plays, including efforts to revive bangsawan, grew increasingly evident. New Malay theater groups, such as The Alternative Stage, a politically and socially attuned company, have also recently emerged. Chinese theater attracts large audiences for productions of Western as well as traditional and modern Chinese plays. Within the Malaysian Indian community, the Temple of Fine Arts is a prominent performing arts organization that draws upon Indian and other artistic sources to create impressive, large-scale productions. Presentations by international troupes have also increased.

Meanwhile, English-language theater comprises a diverse network of artists. Veteran drama critic and director Krishen Jit and the Five Arts Center he co-founded have contributed significantly to this renewed theater trend. The group initially cultivated ethnic plays, such as K. S. Maniam's The Cord, a profound tale of Indian immigration to Malaysia, and LEOW PUAY TIN's Three Children, an insightful exposé of three troubled Chinese siblings. Then the Center developed multicultural plays, such as Work and Us, which highlight the country's diversity through multilingual dialogue. Their 1994 multi-art extravaganza, Maniam's transcultural tour de force Skin Trilogy, asks: what is the humanity that ultimately lies beneath the various colors and textures of our skin? Other active English-language companies, which promote new works by engaged writers sensitive to the issues of the day, include the Actors Studio Theatre, Instant Café Theatre, Dramalab, Straits Theatre Company, and Kuali Works. Malaysia remains blessed with an impressive array of socially and artistically responsive theatrical talent.

FURTHER READING

- Abdullah, Ahmad Kamal, et al. "Drama." In History of Modern Malay Literature. Kuala Lumpur: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, 1992. 2: 251–328.
- Diamond, Catherine. "Parallel Streams: Two Currents of Difference in Kuala Lumpur's Contemporary Theatre." The Drama Review 46, no. 2 (174) (Summer 2002): 7–46.
- Ishak, Solehah. Histrionics of Development: A Study of Three Contemporary Malay Playwrights. Kuala Lumpur: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka and Kementerian Pendidikan Malaysia, 1987.
- Ishak, Solehah, and Nur Nina Zuhra (Nancy Nanney). "Malaysia." In World Encyclopedia of Contemporary Theatre, ed. by Don Rubin. Toronto: York Univ., 1995. 5: 282–306.
- Nur Nina Zuhra (Nancy Nanney). An Analysis of Modern Malay Drama. Shah Alam, Malaysia: Biroteks, MARA Institute of Technology, 1992.
- Tan Sooi Beng. A Social and Stylistic History of Popular Malay Opera. Singapore: Oxford Univ. Press, 1993.

Nancy Nanney

LES MAMELLES DE TIRÉSIAS See THE BREASTS OF TIRESIAS

MAMET, DAVID (1947–)

David Mamet is one of the UNITED STATES' leading playwrights, as well as one of its most prolific writers in any genre. Since 1969 he has written more than sixty plays, adaptations, screenplays, and books about theater. He has also authored five novels, six children's books, and dozens of essays and magazine articles, many of which have been collected in book form. He has won numerous awards for his writing, including the Pulitzer Prize for Drama for GLENGARRY GLEN ROSS (1984); Obies for AMERICAN BUFFALO and SEXUAL PERVERSITY IN CHICAGO (1976), Edmond (1983), and The Cryptogram (1995); two Tony Award Nominations for Glengarry Glen Ross (1984) and Speed-the-Plow (1989); and two Academy Award Nominations for The Verdict (1982) and Wag the Dog, with Hillary Henkin (1997).

Born on November 30, 1947, in Chicago, Illinois, to a labor lawyer and a schoolteacher who divorced when he was ten years old, Mamet spent his teen years acting in community theater, as well as working a variety of odd jobs, including an oft-cited stint as a waiter in Chicago's noted Second City Comedy Club. He later studied acting at Sanford Meisner's Neighborhood Playhouse in New York City, before earning a bachelor's degree in English literature from Goddard College in Vermont, where he wrote his first play, Camel, as his senior thesis. Following his graduation, Mamet returned to New York for a brief period as stage manager of The Fantasticks. In 1971, while teaching at Goddard as artist-in-residence, Mamet met actors William H. Macy and Steven Schacter, with whom he would cofound the St. Nicholas Theater Company. Mamet would later say that his decision to become a playwright was clinched by the company's need for nonroyalty material.

Mamet first achieved notoriety as a playwright in Chicago, and his subsequent success in New York and in regional productions helped establish that city's reputation as a center for innovative theater in the 1970s and 1980s. From the New York premiere of his two one-act plays, Sexual Perversity in Chicago and The Duck Variations, at the OFF-OFF-BROADWAY St. Clements Theater in 1975, Mamet established his reputation as one of the most distinctive voices in contemporary drama. His edgy, rhythmic, and often profane dialogue was hailed by early critics as a highly realistic rendering of the American vernacular, an accurate depiction of the real-life speech of salesmen, con artists, petty thieves, and other working-class characters who inhabit plays such as American Buffalo (1975) and Glengarry Glen Ross (1983). More recent scholarship, however, suggests that Mamet's characteristic use of language reflects the influence of both his urban Jewish upbringing and his study of existential playwrights such as HAROLD PINTER and SAMUEL BECKETT. "My main emphasis," Mamet told the Village Voice in 1976, "is on the rhythm of language—the way action and rhythm are identical. . . . [T]he language we use, its rhythm, actually determines the way we behave, more than the other way around" (Kane, 2001).

While Mamet's early works are fragmentary, consisting of many short scenes strung together around a loose narrative, later plays such as Speed-the-Plow (1988) and OLEANNA (1992) are more conventional in form, following a three-act structure. This increased attention to plot and structure is explored at length in his 1998 book Three Uses of the Knife. "Dramatic structure," Mamet writes, "is not an arbitrary—or even a conscious—invention. It is an organic codification of the human mechanism for ordering information. Event, elaboration, denouement; thesis, antithesis, synthesis; boy meets girl, boy loses girl, boy gets girl; act one, two, three."

For most of his career Mamet has written screenplays as well as stage plays. Among the many films he has written are The Postman Always Rings Twice (1981), The Untouchables (1985), and Hoffa (1992), as well as film versions of his plays Glengarry Glen Ross (1992), Oleanna (1994), and American Buffalo (1996). Beginning with House of Games (1987), Mamet has directed several of his own screenplays, including Homicide (1990), The Spanish Prisoner (1997), State and Main (2000), and Spartan (2004). His 1991 book On Directing Film advocates the clean, no-frills approach to storytelling that is his cinematic trademark.

Though his career has been made as a writer, Mamet has never strayed far from his roots as a performer. In 1983 he founded the Atlantic Theater Company with actor William H. Macy and a group of New York University acting students. In addition to producing plays on and off Broadway since 1985, the company's Atlantic Acting School has trained hundreds of students in "Practical Aesthetics," their unique approach to acting. Though Mamet is no longer active in the administration of the school, he published his own thoughts on actor training in the controversial book True and False: Heresy and Common Sense for the Actor (1997). In it, Mamet rejects American Method acting in favor of a less emotional approach that emphasizes precision, honesty, and the words of the playwright.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Lakeboat (1970, revised 1980); The Duck Variations (1972); Sexual Perversity in Chicago (1974); American Buffalo (1975); Reunion (1976); Dark Pony (1977); A Life in the Theater (1977); The Revenge of the Space Pandas (children's play, 1977); The Water Engine (1977); The Woods (1977); Mr. Happiness (1978); Lone Canoe, or the Explorer (1979); Edmond (1982); Glengarry Glen Ross (1983); The Shawl and Prairie du Chien (1985); Speed-the-Plow (1988); Bobby Gould in Hell (1989); Oleanna (1992); The Cryptogram (1994); The Old Neighborhood (1997); Boston Marriage (1999); Romance (2005)

FURTHER READING

Bigsby, Christopher, ed. The Cambridge Companion to David Mamet. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2004.

Kane, Leslie, ed. David Mamet in Conversation. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 2001.

Mamet, David. True and False: Heresy and Common Sense for the Actor. New York: Pantheon Bks., 1997.

———. Three Uses of the Knife: On the Nature and Purpose of the Drama. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1998.

Henry Bial

MAN AND SUPERMAN

Man and Superman, a play by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, was written in 1901–1902 and first performed at the Court Theatre, London, in 1905. The work includes an act 3 Dream scene (sometimes performed separately under the title Don Juan in Hell and sometimes omitted from performance of the play) and a prefatorial "Epistle Dedicatory" addressed to the theater critic A. B. Walkley, which constitute major expressions of Shaw's ideas about the life force and his creed of creative evolution. When the work was published in 1903, Shaw added a section called "The Revolutionist's Handbook," supposedly written by the gentleman-socialist in the play, Jack Tanner.

The character of Jack Tanner, who is in some respects a Shavian self-portrait, is conceived as that of a modern Don Juan who is the "marked-down prey" rather than the pursuer in the duel of sex. The action of the COMEDY is set in motion with the appointment of the revolutionary Tanner and the old-fashioned liberal Roebuck Ramsden as joint guardians of the guileful Ann Whitefield. A reverse love-chase in motor cars occurs when Tanner, in company with his Wellsian New Man chauffeur Straker, is pursued to the Sierra Nevada by Ann, who has rejected her poet-suitor Octavius. The conflict between Ann, Tanner, and the father-figure Ramsden links the play to the form of the classical New Comedy, in which, typically, systems of patriarchal authority are overthrown by members of a younger generation. But the Shavian twist to this pattern is that, as far as marriage is concerned, Tanner is a reluctant participant in the struggle, maintaining almost to the last his ineffectual resistance to Ann's designs on him as a partner. A skilfully constructed subplot of the comedy brings America and Mathew Arnold into the play's range of satirical subjects.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Don Giovanni is a salient point of reference in the grand debate of the Dream scene, where Tanner turns into a majestic Don Juan engaged in lengthy disputation with the Devil, Ramsden becomes The Statue, and Ann becomes Doña Anna. "The Revolutionist's Handbook" includes a collection of epigrammatic statements, titled "Maxims for Revolutionists," written in a manner resembling the style of the Maximes of François de La Rochefoucauld and William Blake's The Marriage of Heaven and Hell. Some of the "Maxims for Revolutionists"—for example, "He who can, does. He who cannot, teaches"—are among Shaw's best-known sayings.

In the portrayal of heaven and hell in the Dream scene there are no restrictions of movement between the two states. "People" are perfectly at liberty to come and go as they choose, according to their tastes. But it is made clear that those in hell are certain to find heaven—the home of serious-minded realists, philosophers, poets, and visionaries, the seekers by contemplation of "the inner will of the world"—boring. Hell is the natural home of the seekers of pleasure, happiness, and romance, the shunners of reality, the bon viveurs, the celebrators (like Mozart's Don Juan) of wine, women, and song, the connoisseurs of the fine arts and good taste, the lovers of music, here described as "the brandy of the damned." The Shavian hell is a place "where you have nothing to do but amuse yourself."

Despite the fact that it includes expression of the meliorist philosophy of creative evolution, Man and Superman contains some of Shaw's most pessimistic and denunciatory writings about humankind. In the Dream, the Devil describes Man as the most predatory of all the animals and as most skillful in the arts of destruction. And in a section of "The Revolutionist's Handbook" titled "Progress an Illusion," it is argued that history has shown that each attempt at civilization is followed by rapid and disastrous backward slidings into savagery, and each high point of civilization is "but a pinnacle to which a few people cling in giddy terror above an abyss of squalor." The play proper, on the other hand, is generally lighthearted in spirit and contains some of Shaw's finest passages of comic dialogue.

[See also Ireland]

FURTHER READING

Amalric, Jean-Claude. "Shaw's Man and Superman and the Myth of Don Juan." Cahiers Victoriens et Édouardiens (April 1991).

Crompton, Louis. "Man and Superman." In Shaw the Dramatist. Lincoln: Univ. of Nebraska Press, 1969.

Gibbs, A. M., ed. Bernard Shaw: "Man and Superman" and "Saint Joan": A Casebook. London: Macmillan, 1992.

A. M. Gibbs

MANN, EMILY (1952–)

I feel the need to tell people's stories and reflect what I see and what I hear. . . . I think it is important, in the end, for me to be, in a way, invisible. I give voice to the voiceless, I give voice to people who are often not heard of, or heard from. Their stories aren't famous enough, they didn't make the tabloids.

—Emily Mann, 1994

American playwright, director, and the artistic director of the McCarter Theatre at Princeton University since 1990, Emily Mann was the preeminent American documentary playwright of the late 20th century. Born on April 12, 1952, in Boston, Massachusetts, Mann grew up under the formidable influence of her historian father Arthur Mann, who taught at Smith College and wrote the biography of New York City mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, a work that led to one of Emily Mann's first theatrical experiences, the musical Fiorello!

The knowledge that history and theater can be part of the same endeavor became the basis for Mann's later development of DOCUMENTARY playwriting. Like her father, who also worked on a Holocaust oral history project, Mann began collecting stories. This led her to POLAND, and the kitchen of her best friend's aunt, who, while making chicken soup, described her own Holocaust story. The result was Mann's first play, Annula Allen: The Autobiography of a Survivor, produced in Minneapolis in 1977.

Mann's documentary plays are created from extensive interviews, documents, and newspaper accounts. After the stream of consciousness of Annula and Still Life (1979), a play about the Vietnam War's impact on domestic lives in the UNITED STATES, Mann wrote documentary plays that were more like retrials in the court of public opinion. Execution of Justice (1983) and Greensboro: A Requiem (1995) respectively reexamined the 1978 murder of Harvey Milk, the first openly gay mayor of San Francisco, and the 1979 murder of five anti-Ku Klux Klan demonstrators during a march in North Carolina. A theme common to all Mann's plays is the ways in which communities have their own unwritten systems of ethics—lawful or unlawful—by which they live.

Mann's plays have appeared on Broadway and at regional theaters, and she is the recipient of a number of awards including the Helen Hayes, Bay Area Theatre Critics Circle, and the HBO New Plays USA Awards for Execution of Justice; six Obie Awards including Distinguished Playwriting, Distinguished Direction, and Best Production for Still Life; the Greater Los Angeles NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) Best Director Award; and The Beverly Hills/Hollywood Area NAACP Award for Best Director for Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992. She won the Joseph Jefferson Award for Best Play and Best Direction and the Dramatist Guild's Hull-Warriner Award for Best Play for Having Our Say (1994); her screenplay of that drama won the Peabody Award and the Christopher Award. Mann won an Obie for her direction of All Over and has been the recipient of Guggenheim and McKnight Fellowships.

[See also Feminist Drama in the United States]

PLAYS: Annulla Allen: The Autobiography of a Survivor (1977); Still Life (1979); Execution of Justice (1983); Betsey Brown: A Rhythm and Blues Musical (with Ntozake Shange and Baikida Carroll, 1985); Having Our Say: The Delaney Sisters' First 100 Years (1994); Greensboro: A Requiem (1995)

FURTHER READING

Mann, Emily. Testimonies. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1997.

—. "In Conversation." Theatre Topics 10, no. 1 (2000).

Mann, Emily, and David E. Roessel, eds. Political Stages: Plays That Shaped a Century. New York: Applause Bks., 2002.

Carol Martin

LAS MANOS DE DIOS See THE HANDS OF GOD

MA RAINEY'S BLACK BOTTOM

White folks don't understand about the blues. They hear it come out, but they don't know how it got there. They don't understand that's life's way of talking. You don't sing to feel better. You sing cause that's a way of understanding life.

—Ma Rainey, Act 2

AUGUST WILSON's Ma Rainey's Black Bottom opened on October 11, 1984, on Broadway at the Cort Theatre and was an instant success. It ran for 276 performances and marked Wilson's successful Broadway debut. Set in Chicago in 1927, the play focuses on white-owned record companies' exploitation of black musicians.

The play begins with a group of four black studio musicians gathering to wait in the studio for Ma Rainey (who has taken time off from touring to record several songs) to arrive. Through the musicians' conversation, which comprises much of the first act, Wilson reveals that Ma Rainey has been selling well in the South but not in the North and that her style of music is losing its commercial appeal. Wilson draws the distinct personality of each of the four waiting members in detail, and even the way they play their instruments reflects their character. The waiting members are Cutler, the trombone player, who is the leader of the group; Toledo, the well-read piano player; Slow Drag, the upbeat bass player; and Levee, the band's talented but disgruntled trumpet player, who wants to move beyond his role as Ma Rainey's backup. Levee is determined to alter the "jug band" sound of Ma's blues, which he finds reminiscent of minstrel music. Levee has composed his own music and hopes to change the direction of the blues by finding his own voice as an artist.

As a successful commercial artist, Ma Rainey defies the oppressive studio system. However, she is unable to recognize the merits of Levee's efforts and fires him when she first hears his new versions of her standard songs. Unfortunately, Sturdyvant, the white studio owner, ultimately cheats Levee out of his compositions. This element of the play further drives home the TRAGEDY behind the white domination of the studio system that controls the distribution of black music. Levee eventually explodes with a final act of tremendous violence in an effort to reclaim his dignity. The play follows the band's attempt to complete the recording session despite Ma Rainey's problems with the law and the record label. The play ends in tragedy due largely to the intense personal conflicts and power struggles between Ma Rainey and the band.

Charles Dutton made his Broadway debut and earned a Tony nomination for his performance as Levee in the original production. The play was first performed at the Yale Repertory Theatre in New Haven, before coming to Broadway. Through the telling of Ma Rainey's story (the real Ma Rainey was born in 1889 as Gertrude Pridgett and died in 1939), the play also depicts the struggles inherent in developing black music in a white-dominated music industry. In 2002, Ma Rainey's Black Bottom enjoyed a revival on Broadway at the Royale Theatre. It was directed by Marion McClinton and starred Charles Dutton and Whoopi Goldberg. Ma Rainey's Black Bottom was the first installment of Wilson's ten-play cycle examining the African American experience to reach the stage.

[See also Black Arts Movement; Political Theater in the United States; United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

Bogunil, Mary L. Understanding August Wilson. Columbia: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Perlira, Kim. August Wilson and the African-American Odyssey. Urbana: Univ. of Illinois Press, 1995.

Wilson, August. The Ground on Which I Stand. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2001.

Ellen Anthony-Moore and Christopher Moore

MARAINI, DACIA (1936–)

One of ITALY's most famous, bestselling contemporary authors, Dacia Maraini was born in 1936 in Florence and began her literary career at the age of twenty-six as a novelist. Her first novel, The Vacation (1962), met with unexpected success and signaled the beginning of Maraini's over forty-year career as journalist, scriptwriter, and prize-winning poet, novelist, and playwright.

Influenced by the work of LUIGI PIRANDELLO, Carlo Goldoni, and especially BERTOLT BRECHT, Maraini's plays privilege the word and the text over the image favored by experimental theater. Maraini's theater is double-sided: on the one hand, she offers' feminist revisions of the great myths and explores such universal issues as the moral and ethical dimensions of justice. For example, she revisits Aeschylus's The Oresteia in DREAMS OF CLYTEMNESTRA (1978) and the myth of the seducer, Don Juan, in Don Juan (1976), The Gecko (Il Geco, 1987), and Giovanni Tenorio (1988). On the other hand, many of these same plays are simultaneously inspired by contemporary events, such as southern Italian immigration or the student movements of the late 1960s. Thus her writing is linked both to current events and to the mythical or historical roots of current events and grapples with profound and transcendent questions of human existence, human relations, the notion of power, the formation of identity, and the function of the unconscious.

Maraini's career as a playwright started in 1967, when she participated in founding small theater companies, such as Compagnia del Porcospino, La compagnia blu, and Teatroggi. Influenced by the LIVING THEATRE, Maraini's companies performed in the streets and operated shoestring theaters in garages. This was called decentramento, the decentralizing of theater production away from state-funded, bourgeois theaters, which sponsored canonical plays, and toward an autonomous theater that would reach, educate, and be shaped by the working-class audience.

The class struggles of the late 1960s offered not only topics to write about but also a democratization of theater duties. In these theater companies, Maraini learned every aspect of theater production—for example, cleaning, costume repair, lighting, and directing—but shunned acting. All this helped her fare teatro, "to make theater."

By the 1970s Maraini was writing and directing for both street theater and traditional venues. In 1973 she helped to open the famous underground women's theater Teatro della Madalena, a collaborative theater company devoted to women's issues, which closed in 1990 for lack of funding. Maraini has always been "on the side of women," and women's issues, already evident in her 1960s plays, became central in the 1970s, at the height of the second-wave Italian feminist movement. Maraini's plays denounce sexual violence and oppressive social institutions like the patriarchal family, the Catholic Church, and marriage. They criticize Italy's medical, educational, and penal systems. In the 1970s, theater and activism often united. For example, Maraini fought for and wrote about the right to abortion, which was legalized in 1981 in Italy. Among her most controversial and radical plays, and also one of her most often performed, is the Dialogue Between a Prostitute and Her Client (Dialogo di una prostituta con un suo cliente, 1973), which brings together many of her recurring concerns: prostitution, the dehumanization of the female body, the suppression of female sexuality, and the role of the actress.

One of Maraini's great contributions to Italian theater is her development of complex female characters, fictional and historical, which offer a rich repertoire for actresses tired of stereotypical roles. Maraini has written TRAGEDIES and COMEDIES about women as prostitutes, women as housewives, women as writers, and religious women, many of them transgressive characters. Her innovative Mary Stuart (Maria Stuarda, 1980), about Mary Queen of Scots, continues to be her most performed play. It won the 1980 Lysistrata Prize (International Siges Festival) and opened in 1987 in New York City at the experimental theater La Mama.

Maraini's plays have enjoyed great international success. Now a world-renowned playwright, Maraini receives many invitations to lecture as more and more translations of her work appear. In fact, much of Maraini's play writing, as she herself points out, is on request, since she no longer has a theater company. One of her more recent plays, The Head-Chopper at Villa Borghese (Il tagliatore di teste a Villa Borghese, 2003), was commissioned for the centennial of the Villa Borghese, located in Rome where Maraini has lived for decades. Her plays, she says, have a life of their own and are being produced all over the world, often without her knowledge. This allows her, after many years of struggling with production, to concentrate on her writing.

PLAYS: Centocelle: The Years of Fascism (Centocelle: Gli anni del fascismo, 1971); Dialogue Between a Prostitute and Her Client (Dialogo di una prostituta con un suo cliente, 1973); Don Juan (1976); Dreams of Clytemnestra (I sogni di Clitennestra, 1978); Mary Stuart (Maria Stuarda, 1980); The Gecko (Il Geco, 1987); Giovanni Tenorio (1988); Crime at the Tennis Club (Delitto, 1994); Love Letters: Unedited Letters by Gabriele D'Annunzio Presented as Theatre (Lettere d'amore: Lettere inedite di Gabriele D'Annunzio rilette in forma teatrale 2002); The Head-Chopper at Villa Borghese (Il tagliatore di teste a Villa Borghese, 2003)

FURTHER READING

- Diaconescu-Blumenfeld, Rodica, and Ada Testaferri, eds. The Pleasure of Writing: Critical Essays on Dacia Maraini. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue Univ. Press, 2000.
- France, Anna Kay, and P. J. Corso, eds. International Women Playwrights: Voices of Identity and Transformation—Proceedings of the First International Women Playwrights Conference, October 18–23, 1988. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, Press, 1993 [includes discussion by Maraini].
- Merry, Bruce. Dacia Maraini and the Written Dream of Women in Modern Italian Literature. Townsville, Australia: James Cook Univ. of North Queensland, 1997.
- Picchiotti, Virginia. Relational Spaces: Daughterhood, Motherhood and Sisterhood in Dacia Maraini's Writings and Films. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson Univ. Press, 2002.
- Weinberg, M. Grazia Sumeli. Invito alla lettura di Dacia Maraini [Invitation to a reading of Dacia Maraini]. Pretoria: Univ. of South Africa, 1993.
- Wright, Simona. "Intervista a Dacia Maraini" [Interview with Dacia Maraini]. Italian Quarterly 34 (Winter–Spring 1997): 71–91.

Tommasina Gabriele

MARAT/SADE

Fifteen years after his assassination, the death of Marat is staged by the Marquis de Sade in the Asylum of Charenton, where dissidents and misfits were warehoused during FRANCE's political restoration under Napoleon. Though purely fictional (Marat and de Sade never met), PETER WEISS's play within a play, The Persecution and Assassination of Jean-Paul Marat as Performed by The Inmates of the Asylum of Charenton Under the Direction of the Marquis de Sade (Die Verfolgung und Ermordung Jean Paul Marats dargestellt durch die Schauspielgruppe des Hospizes zu Charenton unter Anleitung des Herrn de Sade, 1964), is grounded in two historical facts: de Sade did stage theater productions in the asylum (it became fashionable for the Parisian "glitterati" to attend them); and de Sade did deliver a speech commemorating Marat upon his death.

The dramatic tension in Weiss's play occurs through a clever theatrical device: the revolutionary Marat is given the chance to explain and defend his position under the "direction" of his antipode de Sade. The former has been assassinated, and his political legacy is being obliterated by Napoleon Bonaparte; the latter has been "contained" in the asylum where he will eventually die. Neither Marat's nor de Sade's view of the world appears compelling when the play within the play is staged: the social revolution and the revolution of the body have failed. But this is the point of Weiss's play: these revolutions are still to be carried out. Karl Marx and his successors' visions have been realized (as Weiss saw it) in one part of the world, but there the development of the individual to true freedom is prevented by a regressive moral and artistic code. In the other half of the world, the individual is free to experiment in art and with psychoanalytic theories that promise liberation from neuroses and a repressive upbringing, but the individual is kept ignorant of the ultimate cause of his or her oppression, the economic system.

The asylum provides an aesthetic vacuum in which the two worldviews can confront each other as if in a scientific experiment. However, through a series of anachronisms built into the play (Marat speaks of "agents of the stock market" and of those in power as living "in fortresses built of marble and steel"), Weiss indicates that it is not so much the past that is at stake but the present of the two political systems on German soil. In the East, the revolution dictated from above has ended in a German version of Stalinism and the empowerment of a new caste of paranoid petit bourgeois anxiously watching over the privileges they have awarded themselves. In the West, where the promise of individual freedom has ended in pure consumerism, the sociopolitical system tries to keep its customers happy by constantly reinventing itself through new "waves" (e.g., the "eating wave," the "travel wave," the "sex wave"). The asylum indicates the precarious situation of both political systems, which have to keep their own promises alive to justify themselves, while simultaneously having to contain the masses from taking those very promises too far. As the play ends and the inmates threaten to get out of control (they want both "Revolution Revolution" and "Copulation Copulation"), the repressive state apparatus in the form of the nursing staff wields its baton under the command of Coulmier, the director of the asylum.

The play reflects Weiss's view of the author forced to write in a divided world. Marat gets censored in the West; de Sade, in turn, gets censored in the East. Weiss's attempts to combine calls for political revolution with insistence on artistic innovation and his love for historic figures like Leon Trotsky (1879–1940) and Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843) (who in his view were working toward the same goal) made Weiss, both literally and intellectually, an exile of both Germanys. Accordingly, the first productions of the play in East (Rostock, 1965) and West GERMANY (West Berlin, 1964) were both inadequate, as they were not able to go beyond the dichotomy between the social revolution and the revolution of the body, finding it necessary to favor one position over the other. Weiss had attempted to preempt such one-sided interpretations by incorporating so many elements of uncertainty into the play that it becomes impossible to say whether the author himself favors one side. De Sade is the director, but he is also an inmate. The inmates play their roles in the play within the play but also their roles as inmates; when they "act insane," they are still playing their parts. Marat gets the opportunity to speak but only as directed by de Sade. The events of 1808 (the time of the play within the play) comment on the events of 1793 (the year of Marat's death), but both sets of events are seen from the perspective of the 20th century. It thus becomes clear that whenever one side appears to be "winning," a new set of historical circumstances could reverse the positions.

FURTHER READING

- Chaudhuri, Una. "Marat/Sade and the Politics of Interpretation." In Reading Plays: Interpretation and Reception, ed. by Hanna Scolnicov and Peter Holland. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1991. 216–226.
- Holderness, Graham. "Weiss/Brook: 'Marat/Sade.'" In Twentieth-Century European Drama, ed. by Brian Docherty. New York: St. Martin's, 1994. 162–171.
- Sontag, Susan. "Marat/Sade/Artaud." Partisan Review 32, no. 2 (1965): 210–219.

Friedemann J. Weidauer

MARBER, PATRICK (1964–)

Patrick Marber's plays are urbane, witty, and sardonic in tone; in terms of content, they represent a departure from the anti-Margaret Thatcher polemics that often dominated the British stage during the previous decade. The work of Marber—along with that of MARTIN McDONAGH, Joe Penhall, Jez Butterworth—marked the arrival of a new generation of British playwrights, whose work cannot be conveniently placed under any particular label or catchphrase. In contrast to the so-called In-Yer-Face contingent (SARAH KANE, MARK RAVENHILL, ANTHONY NEILSON), Marber's work tends to be more polished and less graphic in tone and subject matter.

Born to a Jewish family in Wimbledon, ENGLAND, in 1964, and educated at Oxford, Marber is a rare specimen in the world of British theater because he came to the stage after establishing a successful career in television and stand-up COMEDY. Marber's break came when the National Theatre decided to produce his first play Dealer's Choice in 1995. Much like DAVID MAMET's dissection of the real estate industry in GLENGARRY GLEN ROSS, Dealer's Choice is an astute study of a very particular milieu—the Sunday night game of poker. Though ostensibly concerned with gambling, the play is really about male relationships and power struggles.

CLOSER (1997), Marber's follow-up to Dealer's Choice, represents the playwright's foray into the gender conflict. Marber's acerbic look at the politics of intimacy was immediately compared to DAVID HARE's Skylight and HAROLD PINTER's BETRAYAL. Closer examines the genealogy of two couples and their intimate ties—they fall in and out of love, swap partners, and eventually become estranged from each other. Thus, the play's subject matter—infidelity and its effects—is examined from a distance. What is disturbing is not the act of infidelity itself but the aftermath and how the various characters obsessively attempt to remain truthful about their behavior and their motivations. Avoiding didacticism, Marber's play unflinchingly exposes the most brutal aspects of interpersonal relationships.

The third play of Marber's London trilogy, Howard Katz (2001), was less well received by the London critics. The play is concerned with a caustic Jewish talent agent who is in the throes of a midlife crisis. Several reviewers compared Marber's tragic hero to Willy Loman of DEATH OF A SALESMAN. However, the comparison is ill chosen because Howard Katz, unlike Willy Loman, is a financially successful dealmaker who is feared and respected. Hence, Marber's TRAGICOMEDY is actually about a man who is bored with success and its rewards. Howard Katz's spiraling self-destruction suggests parallels with Hermann Hesse's Steppenwolf and David Mamet's Edmond and offers a caustic appraisal of contemporary society—its conception of success, and its mindless veneration of celebrity culture.

Given Marber's interest in sexual politics, it is not surprising that he turned to AUGUST STRINDBERG's MISS JULIE. Marber updates Strindberg's 1888 text by setting the TRAGEDY in a specifically English setting—a country estate just outside of London on the eve of Labour's election victory in 1945. Marber's After Miss Julie (1995), which was successfully staged at the Donmar Warehouse in 2003, is an inventive rewrite that boldly dramatizes the Gordian knot of gender, sex, and class conflict that is characteristic of Marber's work.

PLAYS: After Miss Julie (1995, 2003); Dealer's Choice (1995); Closer (1997); Howard Katz (2001); The Musicians (2004)

FURTHER READING

Droomgoole, Dominic. The Full Room: An A-Z of Contemporary

Playwrighting. London: Methuen, 2000.

Riggs, Thomas, ed. Contemporary Dramatists. 6th ed. Detroit: St. James Press, 1999.

Sierz, Aleks. In-Yer-Face Theatre British Drama Today. London: Faber, 2000.

James L. Penner

MARCEL POUSSUIVI PAR LES CHIENS See

MARCEL PURSUED BY HOUNDS

MARCEL PURSUED BY HOUNDS

Unlike the furor with which THE SISTERS-IN-LAW (Les belles soeurs) entered Québécois stages, Marcel Pursued by Hounds (Marcel poussuivi par les chiens, 1992), by MICHEL TREMBLAY, enters the theatrical scene more quietly after Tremblay had already fully established his presence, his characters, and joul as mainstays of Québécois theater. Like Tremblay's oeuvre in general, this play also seeks to depict the working class and underclasses of the Montreal urban landscape in the stark reality of idiomatic joul and unapologetic characters: Marcel as lost innocent, epileptic, possibly insane, but more likely the product of alienation, and Thérèse as alcoholic waitress in a strip club. Marcel is first observed by the "sisters" as running. They discuss the last time they saw him and remark upon the changes in his physicality. He collapses in front of the women, an adolescent of fifteen years old, believing he is being pursued by "the dogs," or the police (but could just as easily be interpreted as the hounds of conscience or traumatic memory), fearing for his life that he will be framed for a murder which he has just witnessed of a stripper. Marcel had gone to the strip club where his sister works in order to borrow money to pay for a pair of sunglasses he bought from a young hustler on the Main. The sunglasses are symbolic of Marcel's desire to view an alternate reality, to escape his painful life. Through the sunglasses, Marcel becomes invisible. While searching for his sister in the back rooms, he happens upon the murder of Carmen in a bathtub by the owner of the club.

This play consists of six characters, four of which are best understood as the three Fates (Rose, Violette, Mauve) and their mother (Florence), who endlessly knit baby booties. Marcel and his sister Thérèse comprise the remainder. The Fates function as an omniscient chorus that describes the state of the characters, offering to the audience an intimacy that Marcel and Thérèse are likely to be incapable of revealing, due to their own traumatized state of being. The presence of such a chorus inspires the audience to recall the grand TRAGEDIES of classical Greek theater, thereby suggesting that the fates of the people of Montreal's Main are players in the same scope of tragedy as the characters of the Greek classical age. Additionally, this play features the reappearance of Marcel and Thérèse from Tremblay's In Detached Parts (En pièces détachées, 1969), in which Thérèse is established as an alcoholic waitress locked into an unhappy marriage with Gérard. Audiences learn in Marcel Pursued that Thérèse was forced to marry due to her premarital pregnancy but that she gives up the child to be raised by a neighbor; she visits the child every day. This play depicts the continuing struggle for survival in a society that functions within outmoded social and moral codes, poverty, and its offspring dysfunctionality; it depicts the meniality of urban life in a working-class neighborhood. It also engages the notion of home and the emptiness when one realizes that one cannot go home to a home that was never there, nor can one return to the safety of childhood if that had also been robbed.

[See also Canada]

FURTHER READING

- Moss, Jane. "Québécois Theatre: Michel Tremblay and Marie Laberge." Theatre Research International 21, no. 3: 196–207.
- Oddipov, Helene. "French Variation and the Teaching of Québec Literature: A Linguistic Guide to a littérature joualisante." The French Review 67, no. 6 (1994): 944–953.
- Usmiani, Renate. Michel Tremblay. Vancouver: Douglas and McIntyre, 1982.

Jolene Armstrong

MARCHESSAULT, JOVETTE (1938–)

A major figure in Québécoise lesbian, feminist, francophone, and native literature, Jovette Marchessault began her career as an artist and sculptor and later wrote prolifically. Many of her French plays and prose works have been translated into English. Although Marchessault has experimented widely with novels that veer between fiction and autobiography and with plays exploring unconventional staging techniques, her themes are consistent. Marchessault lambasts what she perceives as the stifling legacy of Catholic clerical misogyny, masculinist historiography, domestic violence, patriarchy within Quebec, homophobia, and poverty.

A typical strategy in a Marchessault play involves a quest to reclaim some lost paradise. Typically, the characters will be historical women, who examine history, emphasizing their sex's contribution to society—a contribution overlooked in male-dominated histories. The quest for a lost paradise relates to Marchessault's biographical circumstances. Marchessault enjoyed her childhood. After Jovette's Montreal birth, the family moved outside of the city for wartime munitions work. Her grandmother, a half-Indian herbalist, permanently influenced Marchessault—particularly her anger about the destruction of Amerindian civilization. Her father lost his job after the war. At thirteen, Jovette left school (her wide learning is largely the result of autodidacticism) to work in a textile factory. Many years of unsatisfying, menial jobs followed, giving Marchessault her lifelong affinity with the working classes, particularly with badly paid working-class women.

By 1975, after much traveling in search of her identity and roots, Marchessault was a successful artist and an author. Her first novel, 1975's Comme une Enfant de la Terre (Like a Child of the Earth), won the Prix France-Québec in 1976. Her first play was performed in 1979 at Montreal's Théâtre du Nouveau Monde: its success inspired Marchessault to turn to drama. Night Cows (Les Vaches de nuit, 1978) is a monologue adapted from Marchessault's prose work Triptych Lesbian (Triptyque Lesbien). On the 1980 publication of that work, Marchessault announced her homosexuality publicly. In the play, all divine and earthly power is wielded by nonviolent, responsible females—the women are imagined as responsible, mutually respectful, loving milk cows.

SAGA OF THE WET HENS (La Saga de Poulers Mouillées) was produced at the Tarragon Theatre, Toronto, in 1982. Four historical Quebec women writers meet in an imagined vortex of time and space, celebrating female agency and memories. They dream of future triumphs for women. The Ground Is Too Short, Violette Leduc (La Terre est trop courte, Violette Leduc) was performed by Montreal's Théâtre Experimental des Femmes, also in 1982. This ambitious play features twenty-one characters. Leduc, a real-life friend of JEAN-PAUL SARTRE and Simone de Beauvoir, battles inner demons and social pressures to express herself creatively. Then 1987's Anaïs in the Tail of Comet (Anaïs dans la Queue de la Comète) celebrates the controversial woman of letters Anaïs Nin. Many more plays have followed: The Splendid Voyage of Emily Carr (Le Voyage Magnifique d'Emily Carr) won the Governor General's Award for its production at Montreal's Théâtre d'Aujourd'hui in 1990; The Lion of Bangor (Le Lion de Bangor) was performed at the Théâtre L'Aire de Jeu in 1993. In 2000, Marchessault returned to her theatrical beginnings. The ninety-minute monologue, The Peregrine Cherubnic (La Pérégrin Chérubinique) was performed at Théâtre d'Aujourd'hui by Marchessault's original dramatic collaborator Pol Pelletier.

[See also Canada; Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: Night Cows (Les Vaches de nuit, 1978); The Ground Is Too Short, Violette Leduc (La Terre est trop courte, Violette Leduc, 1982); Saga of the Wet Hens (La Saga de poulers mouillées, 1982); Anaïs in the Tail of Comet (Anaïs dans la queue de la comète, 1987); The Splendid Voyage of Emily Carr (Le Voyage magnifique d'Emily Carr, 1990); The Lion of Bangor (Le Lion de Bangor, 1993); The Peregrine Cherubnic (La Pérégrin Chérubinique, 2000)

FURTHER READING

- Forsyth, Louise. "Jovette Marchessault." In The Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature, ed. by Eugene Benson and William Toye. Toronto: Oxford Univ. Press, 1997. 726–728.
- Gaboriau, Linda. "Jovette Marchessault: A Luminous Wake in Space." Canada Theatre Review 43 (1985): 91–99.

- Hannan, Annika. "Jovette Marchessault." In Encyclopedia of Literature in Canada, ed. by William H. New. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 2002. 710–711.
- Rosenfeld, Martha. "The Development of a Lesbian Sensibility in the Work of Jovette Marchessault and Nicole Brossard." In Traditionalism, Nationalism, and Feminism: Women Writers of Quebec, ed. by Paula Gilbert Lewis. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1985. 227–239.

Kevin De Ornellas

MARGARET FLEMING

It is such damn scoundrels as you that make and destroy homes.

—Doctor Lyn, Act 1

By using a domestic narrative to challenge dual sexual standards and class assumptions, JAMES HERNE introduced a new level of American dramatic REALISM with his play Margaret Fleming (1890). The play frankly depicts a woman's response to the discovery that her businessman husband has abandoned a female former employee who has died bearing his child.

No original scripts for Margaret Fleming survive; a 1909 fire at the Herne home destroyed all known drafts. Five years later, Katherine Corcoran Herne, the playwright's wife, collaborated with Hamlin Garland to recreate the script from memory.

Philip Fleming seems to embody masculine camaraderie, shrewd business ethics, and paternal benevolence. A series of conversations quickly shows that his prosperity rests precariously on questionable trade practices. Larkin, the family doctor, calls to reveal the Flemings' home life as equally illusory. Philip's former mistress and employee has given birth to Fleming's illegitimate son. Philip rejects responsibility, claiming, "I've done all I could for her." Margaret learns of the child through the mother's sister, nurse to the Fleming's little girl. The mother has refused to name the father. Margaret visits the nurse and sister, arriving just after the woman has died, and learns the truth from a letter to Philip. Shock aggravates the glaucoma that Larkin diagnosed earlier, blinding Margaret. The child cries for food, Margaret sightlessly begins to nurse it, and the act closes as Philip enters the room unnoticed.

The brief final act opens in the Fleming home, following Philip's weeklong absence. He returns to explain that he has been hospitalized after wandering homeless and finally attempting suicide. Margaret urges him to stay and resume his career. She agrees to forgive him but adds that "the wife-heart has gone out of me." She confronts him with his hypocrisy, asking, "Suppose—I—had been unfaithful to you?" Stunned into recognition, Philip vows to regain Margaret's affection. The play ends hopefully; surgery likely will restore Margaret's sight, Philip agrees to raise the child, and reconciliation seems at least possible.

The restored script includes major changes that move it closer to MELODRAMA than earlier accounts suggest. Herne altered the script several times himself, however, with Katherine's collaboration. Prior versions included a seven-year gap before the final act, the boy's death, Margaret's continued blindness, and most significantly, her clear break with the now-alcoholic Philip.

Literary realists and some critics hailed the play, but others attacked it. Garland (1893) called it "one of the most radical plays from a native author ever performed in America," and Herne's comparison to HENRIK IBSEN lasted well into the 20th century. The simulation of Margaret baring her breast to nurse the child shocked many, as did the frank portrayal of illegitimacy and infidelity, and Boston theater owners blocked production. Convinced of the play's value, Herne renovated a hall above the Chickering Piano Company into an intimate space, following ANDRÉ ANTOINE's example. The Hernes' investment and production support led to near insolvency. Ironically, the play that gave Herne lasting fame and his strongest effect on American dramatic realism never made money during his life.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

- Bucks, Dorothy S., and Arthur H. Nethercot. "Ibsen and Herne's Margaret Fleming: A Study of the Early Ibsen Movement in America." American Literature 17, no. 4 (January 1946): 311–332.
- Garland, Hamlin. "The Future of Fiction." The Arena 7 (April 1893): 543.
- Hewitt, Barnard. "Margaret Fleming in Chickering Hall: The First Little Theatre in America?" Theatre Journal 34, no. 2 (May 1982): 165–171.
- Knowles, Lawrence John. "Psychological Realism in James A. Herne's Margaret Fleming: An Empirical Test." Ph.D. diss., Southern Illinois Univ., 1989.
- Pizer, Donald. "An 1890 Account of Margaret Fleming." American Literature 27, no. 2 (May 1955): 264–267.
- . "The Radical Drama in Boston, 1889–1891." New England Quarterly 31 (September 1958): 589–591.
- Wegner, Pamela S. "Margaret Fleming: James A. Herne's Contributions to American Realism." New England Theatre Journal 1, no. 1 (1990): 19–29.

Ron West

MARGOLIN, DEB (1951–)

Deb Margolin, born in Westchester County, New York, in 1951, is an internationally recognized playwright and performance artist whose work has shaped and generated feminist theater in the United States since the early 1980s. Margolin majored in English as an undergraduate at New York University, although during her senior year she had the realization that she "knew nothing about matter" and decided to finish her degree by studying science. In addition to touring the UNITED STATES and Europe as a founding member of SPLIT BRITCHES Theater Company, Margolin has authored seven full-length solo performance pieces, as well as numerous plays, that she has toured throughout the United States.

Margolin launched into the world of performance writing when she joined Lois Weaver and Peggy Shaw to found the groundbreaking lesbian performance group Split Britches. At the time, Weaver and Shaw were working on a show about three women (distant relatives of Weaver's) who had spent their lives in Virginia, living in almost complete isolation. Margolin accidentally became the company's scriptwriter after composing a significant portion of the monologues, scenes, and songs for what would become Split Britches, the company's signature piece. The three-woman white, "lesbian" troupe would go on to produce a variety of shows such as Upwardly Mobile Home, Little Women: The Tragedy, Beauty and the Beast, and Lesbians Who Kill, which have set the stage of lesbian and feminist performance through their witty and audacious deconstructions of canonical texts, cabaret forms, lip synching, vaudeville, and unrelentingly probing explorations of class and gender violence.

Although Margolin's time with Split Britches as a writer, collaborator, and ultimately a performer marked some of the most prolific years of her life, she felt the need to use language to explore other images more closely related to her own experience, "images of divinity and mortality," and images and language that would allow her to engage with her heteronormativity. Margolin's solo performance work attends to the small moments of the everyday, savors ordinary exchanges, and tracks the minutia that enliven and compose our desires. Her work is "a theater of desire"—it is written from the body and is highly erotic. Margolin's work tracks the boundaries between the mimetic and the real, pushes beyond the unspeakable of language, and invents ever more subtle and supple ways for performance to upend commonly held notions of temporality.

Margolin's work has been performed in New York City venues including P.S. 122, HERE Arts Center, Women's Interart Theater, and Dixon Place. Margolin's play Three Seconds in the Key, loosely based on her relationship with her son during a recent bout with cancer, was performed by New Georges at the Baruch Performing Arts Center in New York City in 2004. Index to Idioms, Margolin's recent performance piece, opened at The Culture Project in 2005. Prior to becoming an instructor in theater studies at Yale University, she was an instructor at universities around the country.

[See also Feminist Drama in the United States]

SELECT PLAYS: Of All the Nerve (1989); 970-DEBB (1990); Gestation (1991); Of Mice, Bugs and Women (1993); Carthieves! Joyrides! (1995); O Wholly Night and Other Jewish Solecisms (1996); Critical Mass (1997); Three Seconds in the Key (2004); Index to Idioms (2005)

FURTHER READING

Margolin, Deb, and Lynda Hart. Of All the Nerve: Deb Margolin SOLO. London and New York: Cassell, 1999.

Vernon, Alexia. "Crossing Over the Line: An Evening with Deb Margolin."

Kerry Moore

MARINETTI, FILIPPO TOMMASO (1876–1944)

Filippo Tommaso Marinetti was a revolutionary force in modernist theater, establishing the AVANT-GARDE in ITALY through his many writings and public activities. He wrote five groundbreaking manifestos: "The Manifesto of Futurist Playwrights" (1911), later published under the title "The Pleasure of Being Boomed" (1915); "The Variety Theatre Manifesto" (1913); "The Manifesto of the Dynamic and Synoptic Declamation" (written in 1914, published in 1916); "The Manifesto of Futurist Synthetic Theatre" (1914); and "The Theatre of Surprise" (1921).

Marinetti is widely recognized as a pioneer who called into question turn-of-the-century theatrical conventions and sought to expand the range of possibilities for the genre. According to Marinetti and the futurists, dramatic works should be written onstage, not at the playwright's desk. His theatrical debut took place in Paris in 1909, with King Revel (aka The Feasting King) (Le Roi Bombance), and his early years were characterized by a fiercely polemic stance vis-à-vis traditional forms of drama and the bourgeois theater represented by GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO and his followers. King Revel was met with mixed reviews, but the attention it received served to propel the movement and its appeal. The same can be said of the play Electric Dolls (Poupées électriques), performed in Turin under the title The Woman Is Fickle (La donna è mobile) in January 1909 and later as Electricity (Elettricità).

As early as 1910, Marinetti and his followers gathered in cafés for theatrical evenings, called serate, which effectively brought their political-poetic agenda to the public. Performances were often preceded by readings of manifestos and poems. Their program resembled a collision course, juxtaposing traditional forms with avant-garde experimentation in every conceivable way, often inspiring violent outbursts among patrons. Futurist theater was also designed to surprise to the point of hilarity, absurdity, and even to cajole spectators out of passivity through a unique blend of improvisation with the mesmerizing effects of constant change and perpetual motion. In its earliest and purest form, ITALIAN FUTURISM under Marinetti had a profound impact on other European movements, most notably DADAISM, SURREALISM, and RUSSIAN FUTURISM.

"Futurist Synthetic Theatre" is a collection of plays written in 1915–1916 by Marinetti and his closest collaborators that reflect the principles of the avant-garde as a programmatic agenda to transform the performing arts. Marinetti maintained that theater must appeal primarily to the senses rather than the intellect, relying on the culture of the music hall and café-concert. Based on improvisation and the talent of the performers themselves, this form promised to bring out a new freshness and immediacy that would shake the practice of theater to its foundations.

"The Manifesto of the Dynamic and Synoptic Declamation" offered guidelines for performers, aiming to create the illusion of mechanical beauty through technical agility. "The Theatre of Surprise" (1921) consisted of a touring company directed by Rodolfo de Angelis that set out to bring every element of debate, novelty, and surprise from the stage to the audience and subsequently to the streets, with the aim of making an indelible mark on the public consciousness. By 1921, however, futurist theater had found itself diluted by new voices, including LUIGI PIRANDELLO, Luigi Antonelli, and Rosso di San Secondo.

With the advent of second futurism in the late 1920s and 1930s, the creative strength of the movement was compromised due to Marinetti's ambivalent attitude toward fascism under Benito Mussolini. The novelty and freshness of the Italian avant-garde and its influence on European culture faded away during the course of World War II, ending with Marinetti's death in 1944 more than three decades after the publication of "The Variety Theatre Manifesto."

SELECT PLAYS: The Woman Is Fickle (La donna è mobile, 1909); Electricity (Elettricità, 1913); Zang Tumb Tumb (1914); Synthetic Theater (Teatro Sintetico, 1915–1916); Theater of Surprise (Teatro della Sorpresa, 1921); The Fire Drum (Il tamburo di fuoco, 1922); Prisoners (Prigionieri, 1925); Volcano (Vulcano, 1926); The Ocean of the Heart (L'oceano del cuore, 1927); The Prisoners and the Love (I prigionieri e l'amore, 1927); Fast Lights (Luci veloci, 1929); The Prompter Knot (Il suggeritore nudo, 1929); Simultaneous One (Simultanina, 1931)

FURTHER READING

Antonucci, Giovanni. Lo spettacolo futurista in Italia [The futurist show in Rome]. Rome: Studium, 1976.
 Berghaus, Günter. Italian Futurist Theatre, 1909–1944. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1998.
 Kirby, Micheal, and Victoria Nes Kirby. Futurist Performance. New York: PAJ Pubs., 1986.

Daria Valentini

MARRIED TO A CELESTIAL LADY

Married to a Celestial Lady (Tianxian pei, Huangmei xi) by Lu Hongfei is the most famous example of an opera style called Huangmei xi (Huangmei opera), which takes its name from its place of origin Huangmei in eastern Hubei Province on the border with Anhui. Huangmei opera is currently most popular in Anhui Province.

Originally a small-scale folk style, Huangmei opera was first brought to Shanghai in the early 1930s. Its heyday was the 1950s, when significant numbers of professional companies and a training system were established, old artists assisted with the rearrangement of traditional items, and scenery was added to performances of items like Married to a Celestial Lady. The Chinese Cultural Revolution led to the virtual suspension of Huangmei opera, but it was restored afterward, with fifty-three professional companies operating in 1983. Although the style retains a following, modernization has led to its decline.

According to tradition, the repertoire of the early Huangmei operas was small, with only thirty-six major items and seventy-two minor ones. After 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) organized Huangmei opera artists to rearrange some of these items to remove the factors they found politically unacceptable and give play to those the CCP favored, such as showing the poor in a favorable light. The CCP also had some new items written to show contemporary life in ways it favored.

Married to a Celestial Lady was among the traditional items. Awarded the first prize in the East China Festival of Tradition Dramas in 1954 and 1955, it is a fairy story based on the historical character Dong Yong of the second century C.E., famed for his filial piety, and has existed in many versions and in many different regional styles.

In the story, Dong Yong is unable to pay for his dead father's funeral, so he borrows the necessary money on condition that he becomes his creditor's slave for three years. The Jade Emperor's Seventh Daughter sympathizes with his plight; she secretly comes to earth and marries him, arranging with the creditor for repayment in embroidery. She weaves enough in one night to enable Dong Yong to shorten his enslavement from three years to a hundred days. However, with the period over, the Jade Emperor forces his daughter to return to heaven, leaving Dong and Seventh Daughter devastated at being compelled to part.

Lu's rearrangement of the piece eliminates the element of destiny and strengthens the hostility to the feudal system of society by showing the TRAGEDY of separation of lovers who have come together not by parents' arrangement but by choice. In older versions, Dong Yong eventually marries the daughter of the family that has enslaved him, but this is removed in the new version. The characterization of the Seventh Daughter brings out her strength as a woman, while Dong Yong is shown as a loyal and pure peasant, both on the side of the people.

[See also China]

FURTHER READING

Lu Hongfei et al. Tianxian pei [Married to a Celestial Being]. In Zhongguo difang xiqu jicheng, Anhui sheng juan [Collection of Chinese Local Traditional Dramas, Anhui Province], comp. by Chinese Dramatists Association and Anhui Provincial Cultural Bureau. Beijing: Chinese Theatre Press, 1959. 129–193.
 Wen Nian. "Huangmeixi" [Huangmei opera] and Tianxian pei [Married to a Celestial Being]. In Zhongguo da baike quanshu, xiqu quyi [China encyclopedia, traditional theatre and balladry], comp. by Zhang Geng et al. Beijing, Shanghai: China Encyclopedia Press, 1983. 132–133, 390–391.

Colin Mackerras

MARTÍNEZ SIERRA, GREGORIO (1881–1947)

Gregorio Martínez Sierra was a renowned playwright, director, and producer of early-20th-century theater in SPAIN. His career as a playwright started in 1909 with The Shadow of the Father (La sombra del padre). Two years later, Martínez Sierra wrote his most celebrated play, Cradle song (Canción de cuna, 1911). Later on he not only wrote but also proceeded to direct and produce his own work. Other significant plays by Martínez Sierra include Mother (Mamá, 1912), Madame Pepita (1912), Dawn (Amanecer, 1915), Rosina Is Fragile (Rosina es frágil, 1918), Dream of One Night in August (Sueño de una noche de agosto, 1920), Don Juan of Spain (Don Juan de España, 1921), and Triangle (Triángulo, 1930).

A cultivated intellectual with a humanist background, Martínez Sierra married María O. Lejárraga in 1900. They did not have any children, a significant detail in view of the fact that his plays deal mostly with femininity and maternity. According to different critics (Patricia O'Connor, Alda Blanco, and Antonia Rodrigo), María actively collaborated, to put it euphemistically, in the writing of the majority of the plays attributed to Gregorio. He was directly involved in the publication of many literary magazines, such as Vida Moderna (1901), Helios (1903), and Renacimiento (1907). Thereafter, he continuously toured the most important Spanish and Latin American cities with his company. In 1917 Martínez Sierra founded a publishing company, Estrella.

On September 24, 1916, a play written by Martínez Sierra titled The Kingdom of God (El reino de Dios) premiered in his Eslava Theater in Madrid. This premiere was the beginning of a campaign called "Teatro de Arte" that would completely change the way theatrical staging was done in Spain. Martínez Sierra directed and produced his own plays, as well as works by classical and romantic writers and by contemporary European dramatists. He also helped premiere new performances of plays by consecrated Spanish authors as well as helped launch the careers of promising new playwrights.

Martínez Sierra's most important contribution to Spanish literature harks back to his roles as director and producer, for in these capacities he exercised a tremendous influence. As a playwright he contributed little to the renovation of the theater. His COMEDIES have been classified as conventional and soft, charged with excessive sentimentalism. They portray a cheerful vision of the world in which characters, moved by noble feelings, are inclined to act in a generous way. Nevertheless, the predominance of roles for women in his plays helped expose the female side of social reality in his day. The woman is portrayed as victim and redeemer of masculine power, while the role of mother is always a dignified one in his works. This feminine perspective is inherent in plays like Mother and Cradle Song, a work that shows the maternal instincts that emerge when some nuns unwittingly adopt a baby girl. Through the protagonist of The Master of the House (El ama de la casa), Martínez Sierra—or should we say María Martínez Sierra?—intertwines femininity and maternity, thereby affirming that woman and mother are one and the same.

SELECT PLAYS: The Shadow of the Father (La sombra del padre, 1909); Cradle Song (Canción de cuna, 1911); Madame Pepita (1912); Mother (Mamá, 1912); Dawn (Amanecer, 1915); Rosina Is Fragile (Rosina es frágil, 1918); Dream of One Night in August (Sueño de una noche de agosto, 1920); Don Juan of Spain (Don Juan de España, 1921); Triangle (Triángulo, 1930)

FURTHER READING

Douglas Francés, José. "Gregorio Martínez Sierra." Hispania 5–6 (1922–1923).

London, John. Reception and Renewal in Modern Spanish Theatre: 1939–1963. Leeds, England: W. S. Maney & Son, 1997.

O'Connor, Patricia W. Gregorio and Maria Martínez Sierra. New York: Irvington, 1977.

Reyero Hermosilla, Carlos. Gregorio Martínez Sierra y su teatro de arte [Gregorio Martínez Sierra and his theater of art]. Madrid: Fundación Juan March, 1980.

Benito Gómez and Jorge Herreros

MARY NO KUBI See HEAD OF MARY

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS GOT HER HEAD CHOPPED OFF

I ask you, when's a queen a queen
And when's a queen juist a wummin?
—La Corbie, Act 1

Mary Queen of Scots Got Her Head Chopped Off is one of Scottish poet and playwright LIZ LOCHHEAD's most popular plays. Commissioned by the Comunicado Theatre Company to mark the 400th anniversary of the death of Mary Stuart, it was first performed at the 1987 Edinburgh Festival, where it won a Scotsman Fringe First Award.

As the title suggests, the play is about Mary Queen of Scots (1542–1587), in history usually presented as a romantically tragic figure, and the suffering heroine of, for example, Friedrich Schiller's play Maria Stuart (1800). Lochhead steps away from the popular myth and emphasizes the subjective and constructive nature of historical narrative. Accordingly, she has the chorus-figure La Corbie announce that the setting is SCOTLAND but that "it depends. . . . Ah dinna ken whit like your Scotland is / Here's mines."

The play begins with La Corbie cracking her whip and bringing the historically based characters of Mary, Elizabeth, Darnley, Bothwell, Riccio, and Knox onto stage like animals into a circus arena. The following two acts cover the major events in Mary's life, from the rivalry between her and Queen Elizabeth of England and her struggle with the authoritarian Protestant reformer John Knox, to her marriage with Lord Darnley, the birth of their son James VI, her affair with David Riccio, and finally, her disastrous alliance with Bothwell and the events leading to her imprisonment and execution.

Interestingly, Queen Mary's ending, ironically referred to in the title and especially familiar to Lochhead's Scottish audiences, is not played out. Instead, the final scene illustrates the story's modern bearing by transforming the characters of Elizabeth and Knox into Wee Betty and Wee Knoxxy, 20th-century children who bully a little Catholic girl named Marie.

Mary Queen of Scots Got Her Head Chopped Off is structured around the juxtaposition of Mary and Elizabeth, “two queens in one island, both o’ the wan language—mair or less.” The actresses who play the queens also double as their maidservants, emphasizing the interchangeable nature of their situation, because despite their difference in background, character, and appearance, both queens similarly struggle to combine their role as sovereign and woman. For Lochhead, the historical narrative is therefore primarily a framework within which to explore general issues from a modern and essentially feminist viewpoint. Various anachronistic props and symbolic references illustrate the time-less relevance of the play’s main themes. Lochhead’s John Knox, for example, walks with an Orangeman’s gait, a satirical allusion to contemporary events. This illustrates Lochhead’s claim that her Mary Queen of Scots is more a metaphor for today rather than a history play.

The enormous energy in Lochhead’s play is established mainly through its lively and often humorous dialogues and its great variety in nonnaturalistic performance styles. By means of music and costuming, Lochhead achieves a Brechtian ALIENATION EFFECT, warning her audience, once again, that they are witnesses to a dramatic interpretation and not a historical representation of fact.

FURTHER READING

- Crawford, Robert, and Anne Varty, eds. Liz Lochhead’s Voices. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 1993.
Findlay, Bill, ed. A History of Scottish Theatre. Edinburgh: Polygon, 1998.
Fraser, Antonia. Mary Queen of Scots. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1969.
Gifford, Douglas, and Dorothy McMillan, eds. A History of Scottish Women’s Writing. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 1997.
Stevenson, Randall, and Gavin Wallace, eds. Scottish Theatre Since the Seventies. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 1996.

Astrid Van Weyenberg

MA SEN (1932–)

Ma Sen was born in Mainland CHINA in 1932 and started writing and acting at school in 1949. After he received secondary education, he moved to Taiwan. He received his M.A. degree from National Taiwan Normal University in 1959. He went to Paris to study directing and acting. He received his Ph.D. in sociology from the University of British Columbia in 1977. From 1979 to 1987, he taught at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London. In 1987, he joined the faculty of the National Cheng Kung University in Taiwan, as a professor. From 1988 to 1989, he was the chief editor of Unitas (Lienhe Wenhsieh), a well-known literary journal in Taiwan. After retiring from National Cheng Kung University, he joined the faculty of the Graduate School of Literature at Fou Guang University in Taiwan as a professor. His publications include fiction, prose, film scripts, plays, and scholarly studies of Chinese drama.

Ma’s plays influenced the LITTLE THEATER MOVEMENT in the 1980s in Taiwan. His plays and drama criticism have deeply influenced theater, academia, and society in Taiwan, especially from the 1980s to the 1990s. His plays are also well regarded by university drama groups in Mainland China, AUSTRALIA, CANADA, and Taiwan as representative works of the experimental theater in the 1980s.

Ma Sen’s play Flower and Sword (Hua Yu Jian) tells the story of a young person’s return to his homeland to visit his father’s grave. In this play, Ma Sen used a subconscious dreamlike, symbolist style to describe the tormented young person’s desperate attempt to free himself from the voice that has been haunting him all through his adult life. As Martha Cheung and Jane Lai point out in An Oxford Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama (1997), this play could be interpreted as “the dramatization of a painful attempt to deal with the history of one’s origins.” Rather than adopting REALISM and NATURALISM, this play is full of stylization in the set, costumes, and acting.

Ma Sen’s recent plays are different from his previous one-act plays and include three new kinds of drama: COMEDY, operalike musical, and pictorial drama. Since 1990, Ma Sen has focused more on music and dance, for instance, in his musical Frogs Play (Wa xi, 2002).

Ma Sen has lived in many countries, including Mainland China, Taiwan, FRANCE, ENGLAND, and MEXICO and these different cultures and languages have inspired his work. As Ma Sen pointed out in Ma Sen xiju luen ji (Ma Sen’s dramatic criticism, 1985), by writing literary works, he attempts to communicate with people as a solitary soul. Ma Sen’s research includes the Western and Chinese dramas, in addition to comparing modern Chinese drama in Singapore and Taiwan.

SELECT PLAYS: The Weak (Ruo Zhe, 1970); and Frogs (Wa xi, 1970, revil 2002); A Bowl of Cold Congee (Yi Wan Liang Zhou, 1977); The Sex Worker Who Works in the Mei Li Hua Pub Saves People in Prostitution (Meilihua jiunu jiu fengcheng, 1990); We Are All Thieves Who Rob People by Lies (Women doushi jinguangdang, 1995); Balcony (Yangtai, 2001); A View Outside of a Window (Chuang wai fengjing, 2001)

FURTHER READING

- Hwang, Mei-Shu. Zhonghua xiandai wenxue daxi—xiju juan [Chinese Modern literature: Volume of drama]. Taipei: Guo Go, 1989.
Ma Sen. “Thoughts on the Current Literary Scene.” Tr. by Janice Wickeri. 1991. http://www.renditions.org/renditions/sps/s_35-36.html.
———. Ma Sen xiju luen ji [Ma Sen, Dramatic Criticism]. Taipei: E. Y. Press, 1985.
———. Flower and Sword. Tr. by David E. Pollard. In An Oxford Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama, ed. by Martha P. Y. Cheung and Jane C. C. Lai. Hong Kong: Oxford Univ. Press, 1997.

Peng, Yiou-Chuen. "Ma Sen dui hua ju xianshi zhuyi chuantong de chao yue yu huigui" [Ma Sen's transcendence and return to realism in drama]. Qian Xu (Hwai Yang College School Newspaper—The Section of Philosophy, Social Science) (March 22, 2000).

Xu, Jing-Cheng. "Ma Sen jinqi xiju (1990–2002) de bian yu bu bian—yi pian gailun" [Change and not-change in Ma Sen's recent plays (1990–2002)]. Ph.D. diss. abstract, Fou Guang University, Taiwan, 2003.

Xu, Xue, and Duo Keng. "Lun Ma Sen dumuju de guannian hexin yu xingshi duchuang" [On the core concept and unique creative form of Ma Sen's one-act play]. Taiwan Research Journal 1 (1994).

Iris Hsin-chun Tuan

MASON, BRUCE (1921–1982)

Bruce Mason, born on September 28, 1921, in Wellington, NEW ZEALAND, is New Zealand's first major playwright and a vigorous champion of local theater. He was also an actor, short-story writer, literary and musical critic, and in his later years, the country's leading theater critic—in the mold of ENGLAND's Kenneth Tynan. Mason is best known for his plays examining relations between Maori and Pakeha (New Zealanders of British/European extraction) and his bravura solo works.

Mason's first plays, short realist pieces written for Wellington's Unity Theatre, included The Bonds of Love (produced 1953), about a prostitute; The Evening Paper (produced 1953), a suburban drama that was subsequently expanded and revised for radio and television as well as the stage; and The Verdict (produced 1958), based on a recent murder trial. The full-length Birds in the Wilderness (produced 1957), about migration, won first place in the 1958 Auckland Festival competition and had a brief run in London's West End.

Mason's most performed play The Pohutukawa Tree (1960) tells the tragic story of an important elder, Aroha Mataira, and her harshly puritanical reaction to her daughter's and son's transgressions. Living in a Pakeha community, Aroha feels greatly shamed, but, ironically, those wrongdoings serve to reunite the children with their tribe. Maori material allowed Mason to cultivate the ornate elocution that characterizes his writing. This is especially marked in Awatea (1969, produced 1968), whose second-act hui (tribal conference) provides the occasion for particular rhetorical flourish. Awatea and Mason's other Maori plays—The Hand on the Rail (produced 1965, published 1987), Swan Song (produced 1965, published 1987), and Hongi Hika (produced 1968, published 1974/1987)—were initially written for radio and for renowned operatic bass Inia Te Wiata.

Frustrated by the limited opportunity for productions of his plays and inspired by EMLYN WILLIAMS's stage biographies of Charles Dickens and DYLAN THOMAS, in 1959 Mason wrote a solo piece that he could perform himself, without any theatrical trappings. The End of the Golden Weather (1962) draws on his childhood in the 1930s Depression, whose grim intrusion into the paradisaal world of the beach at Te Parenga signals the end of innocent idealism. The florid writing was matched by the virtuosity of Mason's performance—his rotund voice and grandiloquent gestures—which impersonated some forty characters. In 1987 the play was adapted for a larger cast, and in 1991 it was made into a film.

Mason wrote another five solo plays, giving nearly 2,000 performances, abroad as well as in New Zealand, between 1959 and 1978. They include To Russia with Love (produced 1965, published 1981), written and rehearsed in one week when Downstage faced a financial crisis. Other plays are Zero Inn (1970), about a hippy rock group, and Blood of the Lamb (1981), in which Henry and Eliza Higginson are obliged to reveal to their adult daughter that her father is actually her mother and has lived disguised as a man. Henry's outré persona and language inject into long passages of narration a compensatory theatricality.

SELECT PLAYS: The Licensed Victualler (operetta, 1954); A Case in Point (1956); Wit's End (1956); The Pohutukawa Tree (1960); We Don't Want Your Sort Here (1963); The Last Supper (solo piece, 1965); The Waters of Silence (solo piece, 1965); Awatea (1969); Virtuous Circle (1978); Courting Blackbird (solo piece, 1981); Not Christmas But Guy Fawkes (solo piece, 1981)

FURTHER READING

Balme, Christopher. "Staging Intertextuality: Alternative Models of New Zealand Culture in Bruce Mason's Blood of the Lamb." In Across the Lines: Intertextuality and Transcultural Communication in the New Literatures in English, ed. by Wolfgang Klooss. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1998. 261–270.

Dowling, David. Introducing Bruce Mason. Auckland: Longman Paul, 1982.

Harding, Bruce. "Liberal Man Encounters 'Kremlin Man' and Russian Man: The Politics of Exclusion and the Meeting of Minds in Bruce Mason's Courting Blackbird and To Russia, with Love." New Zealand Slavonic Journal (1999): 247–272.

Hedback, Ann-Mari. "Purely Local Signs? Bruce Mason's The Pohutukawa Tree and Awatea." Association of Commonwealth Literature and Language Studies 7, no. 3 (1986): 26–35.

McNaughton, Howard. Bruce Mason. Wellington, N.Y.: Oxford Univ. Press, 1976.

Stuart Young

DIE MAßNAHME See THE MEASURES TAKEN

THE MASTER BUILDER

Just once more, master builder! Do the impossible again!

—Act 3

The Master Builder (Bygmester Solness) was the first play HENRIK IBSEN wrote after his return to NORWAY in 1891, and it inaugurates the last period of his work, which ends with the so-called epilogue, WHEN WE DEAD AWAKEN, also including LITTLE EYOLF and JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN. This final "cycle," and especially The Master Builder, is sometimes interpreted as a more or less allegorical meditation on the social and moral conflicts of the artist, sometimes as a modern version of the archetypal tragic myth, and sometimes as Ibsen's critical analysis of the guilt and moral weakness of typical characters in his own contemporary capitalist society.

Halvard Solness, the master builder, started his career as a highly respected builder of churches, but when the family home of his wife was conveniently destroyed in a fire, it became possible for him to climb to the top of the real estate business as a building contractor. This change of career from church building to the building of small houses for common people leaves him, however, with a strong feeling of guilt, since he and his wife Aline also lost their twin sons as a result of the fire. The guilt is augmented by Solness's strained relations with his employees, father and son Brovik, the old man having been overthrown by Solness on his way to the top, whereas the son is held in a subservient position, unable to make a career of his own. One of the consequences of this complex feeling of guilt is Solness's anxiety of being overthrown in his turn by the vitality and force of a younger generation. Into this situation Hilde Wangel enters, a young girl who ten years earlier was so deeply impressed by the flamboyant master builder that she felt it like a seduction and an erotic promise, which she now expects to be redeemed by the master builder. Thus the play develops on three levels. The moral conflict in relation to Aline is deepened but never really solved. The social and moral conflict with Knut and Ragnar Brovik is solved when Solness permits Ragnar to start his own business; but this conflict is never really deepened. More and more the stage is dominated by the enigmatic conversations between Hilde and Solness, partly serious, partly playful, and through and through infused with a strong erotic power. At the end Hilde succeeds in cutting Solness loose from his guilty conscience and in remobilizing his power of imagination and will, so that he is able to repeat the impossible heroic act performed ten years earlier, climbing once more, in spite of his dizziness, as high as he builds. But this victory is also a mortal defeat: having reached the top of the tower of the new house he is building, the master builder falls down and is killed.

No matter how the play is interpreted, Halvard Solness is undoubtedly one of Ibsen's most complex male characters, and Hilde Wangel occupies a distinguished place in the series of equally complex female characters that starts with Furia in Catilina (1950), ends with Irene in When We Dead Awaken, and includes such enigmatic women as Hjördis, Gerd, Rebecca West, and Hedda.

FURTHER READING

Binswanger, Ludwig. "Ibsen's The Masterbuilder." In European Literary Theory and Practice. From Existential Phenomenology to Structuralism, ed. by Vernon W. Gras. New York: Dell, 1973.

Holtan, Orley I. Mythic Patterns in Ibsen's Last Plays. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1970.

Saari, Sandra E. "Of Madness or Fame: Ibsen's Bygmeister Solness." Scandinavian Studies 50 (1978): 1–18.

Atle Kittang

"MASTER HAROLD" . . . AND THE BOYS

"Master Harold" . . . and the boys is the most celebrated play by the highly regarded South African playwright ATHOL FUGARD. Set in 1950 in Port Elizabeth, SOUTH AFRICA, the play offers an unsettling and ultimately harrowing depiction of the corrosive effects of racism and, more specifically, of the institutionalized racism of the apartheid system in South Africa.

The play is set in a tearoom on a wet and dreary afternoon. There are no customers, and two black employees—Sam, a waiter, and Willie, a custodian—are killing time. While carrying on a free-ranging conversation, they practice the dance steps that they hope will enable them to win an approaching ballroom dance contest.

The seventeen-year-old son of the owner, named Hally, arrives at the tearoom. There is an immediate sense of easy camaraderie between him and the two black men. It is gradually revealed that Hally's father is a demanding cripple and an abusive alcoholic and that the two black men have frequently protected Hally from the abuse or have comforted him after he has been abused. In addition, Sam in particular had spent time with Hally, teaching him things that his father has not bothered to teach him, such as how to make and fly a kite. As he has gotten older, Hally has reciprocated by teaching Sam some of the things he has learned in school, at a time when black South Africans were forbidden access to much education. Still, despite his sense of connection to the two men, Hally unself-consciously uses racially derogatory language and seems unaware that Sam and Willie will naturally find it offensive.

Throughout the play, Hally makes uneasy references to his father's pending release from the hospital, where he has had surgery. The play builds steadily to its crisis, a phone call from Hally's father indicating that he is being released from the hospital that very day. Having had a long reprieve from his father's abuse, Hally is pushed to the psychological brink by the inevitability of its resumption.

In a bitterly ironic turn in the play's action, Hally suddenly lashes out at Sam and Willie, transferring his anguish onto them. The pain that this verbal attack causes the two men is so palpable that Hally is forced to recognize that the racism that has pervaded every aspect of his upbringing has made him as unreasonably hateful as his father. He is filled with a terrible self-loathing that overwhelms even his repudiation at his father's return.

FURTHER READING

Beck, Ervin. "Fugard's Master Harold and the Boys." Explicator 58 (Winter 2000): 109–112.

- Jordan, John O. "Life in the Theater: Autobiography, Politics, and Romance in Master Harold and the Boys." Twentieth Century Literature 39 (Winter 1993): 461–472.
- Post, Robert. "Racism in Athol Fugard's Master Harold and the Boys." World Literature Written in English 30, no. 1 (1990): 97–102.
- Wertheim, Albert. "Ballroom Dancing, Kites and Politics: Athol Fugard's Master Harold and the Boys." Journal of the South Pacific Association for Commonwealth Literature 30 (April 1990): 141–155.

Martin Kich

MÄSTER OLAF See MASTER OLOF

MASTER OLOF

Master Olof (Mäster Olaf) is the umbrella title for three versions of this historical play, all of them in five acts, by AUGUST STRINDBERG. The first and best known, the so-called prose edition, was written in 1872 and not published until 1881, when it received its premiere at the New Theater in Stockholm. The so-called middle drama, also in prose, is a modified, unsuccessful version of the prose edition. The verse edition, written in 1875–1876, was published in 1878 and first performed in 1890. There is also a fragmentary epilogue to the play, probably written in 1872, then published in 1912.

The action of Master Olof takes place in 16th-century SWEDEN, during the reign of Gustav Vasa. Olaus Petri (1493–1552), the play's Master Olof, helps to introduce Lutheranism to Sweden, not realizing at first that he is the king's instrument: Gustav Vasa needs money and backs the Reformation to secure an income for the state by confiscating the property of the Church. Whereas Olof initially believes in cooperation between state and church, the anarchist Gert rejects both. In a classical manner, the reformist is put against the revolutionary. Olof finally joins Gert in his plans to have the king murdered. Caught by the king's men, Gert faces death defiantly, whereas Olof is reprieved after he promises to be loyal to the king.

In his autobiography I Röda Rummet (In the Red Room, Part 3 of The Son of a Servant) Strindberg comments on this drama of ideas. Strindberg (1996) said that in each historical character we see some aspect of him.

In Olof he would appear as the idealist, in Gustav Vasa as the realist, and in the Anabaptist Gert as the Commune, because he had now discovered that the men of the Paris commune [in 1870–1871] had only applied what Buckle had taught [i.e. the relativity of truth]. Through his three major characters he would express these three principles as three different points of view. To say what he really want[ed] to say he let Gert . . . pretend to be insane, Olof retract his ideas, and Gustav Vasa be right, and no one be wrong. The enemy from the old camp, Hans Brask, he treated with respect, too, as the person who has been right but, who, with the passing of time, had become wrong. For that reason, he had intended to call the play What Is Truth? But to get it played both of the tentative titles [the other was The Renegade] were rejected for the more indifferent Master Olof.

Events that in reality were spread out over more than twenty years are, in the play, compressed into a short period. Many of the characters have hardly more than a name in common with their real counterparts—true, for example, of both Olof and Gert. And the connection between the anabaptists and the plot against the king is Strindberg's invention. As a model for the play, Strindberg mentions especially William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar with its alternating public and private scenes. Scholars have also pointed to the influence of the tavern scenes in Shakespeare's Henry IV and act 2 in Master Olof.

Because of its unconventional treatment of historical characters and its straightforward language, the prose version of Master Olof met for some time with strong resistance. It is now considered the first modern Swedish drama and is still regularly performed in Sweden.

FURTHER READING

- Andersson, Hans. Strindberg's Master Olof and Shakespeare. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1952.
- Johnson, Walter. Strindberg and the Historical Drama. Seattle: Univ. of Washington Press, 1963.
- Lamm, Martin. August Strindberg. Tr. and ed. by Harry G. Carlson. New York: Blom, 1971.
- Strindberg, August. The Son of a Servant. London: Jonathan Cape, 1967.
- . I Röda Rummet [In the Red Room]. In Samlade Verk [Collected Works]. Vol. 21. Stockholm: Stockholm Univ., 1996.

Egil Törnqvist

MATURA, MUSTAPHA (1939–)

Mustapha Matura was born in Trinidad in 1939 and attended the Belmont School. In 1961 he moved to London and started writing in 1966. His theater writing earned him a reputation for biting satire and mordant wit, and he became the first playwright to consider the lives and problems of West Indians living in Britain. One of his earliest works, Black Pieces, a series of short plays, was produced in 1970 at the ICA (Institute of Contemporary Art) in London. In the following year, he achieved considerable success with his satirical COMEDY of manners As Time Goes By. The play won both the George Devine and the John Whiting awards.

Matura's work featured a variety of characters from his West Indian origins, and he became known for a remarkable talent in reproducing the speech rhythms of his native island. In 1974 he was awarded the Evening Standard Most Promising Playwright Award for Play Mas, which premiered at the Royal Court Theatre before moving to the West End with additional productions on OFF-BROADWAY and in Chicago. The first act is set on the eve of Trinidad's independence from Britain while Carnival, the defining cultural event of the island, takes place. The second act takes place some years after independence, and the work is infused with the sense of political crisis and social and cultural change that define that era. The play is one of the few to explore such issues through Carnival, the period of licensed chaos and misrule. Peter Minshall, celebrated and award-winning Carnival creator, designed the costumes for the premiere production. The title of the play is the West Indian term for playing masquerade, taking part in Carnival.

In 1978 Matura co-founded the Black Theatre Co-operative with the director Charlie Hanson. The aims of the company were to support and produce work by black writers in Britain. The new company produced Another Tuesday (1978), More, More (1978), Welcome Home Jacko (1979), A Dying Business (1980), and One Rule (1981). In 1991 the company revived Matura's Meetings at the Tricycle Theatre and on tour. It had first been produced in New York City at the Phoenix Theatre in 1981 and at the Hampstead Theatre in London in 1982. In 1983 Matura was the co-writer with Farrukh Dhondy of the first black-created sitcom for British television. The Black Theatre Co-operative continues to produce under a new name, Nitro, and is Britain's oldest, continuously producing company committed to work by black theater artists.

Matura continued to have work produced at the Royal Court Theatre such as Black Slaves, White Chains (1975) and Rum an' Coca Cola (1976). In 1979 Independence opened at the Bush Theatre in a touring production by Foco Novo. Playboy of the West Indies, Matura's 1950s Trinidadian rendering of J. M. SYNGE's Irish drama, was first staged at the Oxford Playhouse in 1984 and aired on the BBC in the following year. His use of established plays from the Western canon continued with his Trinidad Sisters, his Caribbean take on ANTON CHEKHOV's THREE SISTERS, which premiered at the adventurous Tricycle Theatre in London (1988).

In 1991 the National Theatre premiered Matura's The Coup—A Play of Revolutionary Dreams in the Cottesloe Theatre, the first commissioned work by a black writer to be seen in one of the National's main theaters. The farcical piece, while providing genuine insight into West Indian culture, attitudes, and manners, explored the fictional military takeover of government in independent Trinidad and Tobago and featured Matura's favored theme of the contradictions and responsibilities of nationhood.

[See also England, 1940–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: Black Pieces (1970); As Time Goes By (1971); Play Mas (1974); Black Slaves, White Chains (1975); Rum an' Coca Cola (1976); Another Tuesday (1978); More, More (1978); Independence (1979); Welcome Home Jacko (1979); A Dying Business (1980); Meetings (1981); One Rule (1981); Playboy of the West Indies (1984); Trinidad Sisters (1988); The Coup—A Play of Revolutionary Dreams (1991)

FURTHER READING

Joseph, May. "Performing the Postcolony: The Plays of Mustapha Matura." In Late Imperial Culture, ed. by Roman De La Campa, E. Ann Kaplan, and Michael Sprinker. New York: Verso, 1995.

Lee, Simon. "The Man in the Corner." Sunday Guardian (December 19, 1999). http://www.nalis.gov.tt/Biography/bio_MustaphaMatura_playwright.htm.

Maslon, Laurence. "Matura Is a Lover of Language: He Captures the Voices and Politics of Trinidad." American Theatre, vol. 6, Issue 6, (1989): 56.

Paquet, Sandra Pouchet. "Mustapha Matura's Playboy of the West Indies: A Carnival Discourse on Imitation and Originality." Journal of West Indian Literature 5, nos. 1–2 (1992): 85–96.

Stone, Judy S. J. Studies in West Indian Literature and Theatre. London: Macmillan, 2001 [with a chapter on black British theater].

Lesley Ferris

MAUGHAM, WILLIAM SOMERSET (1874–1965)

A drawing by Bernard Partridge in a 1908 issue of Punch depicts William Shakespeare looking worried. He sees a range of playbills, all lauding a young playwright who is so popular that Shakespeare's status is threatened. Shakespeare's rival is W. Somerset Maugham. The drawing seems bizarre today, since many of Maugham's plays were merely ephemeral hits (or misses) in the commercial theaters. Now, Maugham is more renowned for his novels than for his naturalistic plays, which display mastery of characterization, plot development, unpretentious dialogue, and entertaining diversion. His plays are largely forgotten but significant because of the sheer quantity that he produced.

Maugham was born in Paris on January 25, 1874, the youngest son of an English solicitor. By the time that he was ten, both of his parents were dead through illness. Maugham was then reared by Parisian servants and by childless relatives in England. He moved to Heidelberg at sixteen, keen to learn German (his first language was French). There he was influenced by the older John Ellingham Brooks, who seduced him. Maugham was primarily homosexual but later denied that he had ever been gay. After moving back to England when eighteen, he qualified as a doctor but did not practice.

Maugham wrote novels and sought energetically to get his plays staged. His first performed play, about a selfish groom who accepts money from his wife's erstwhile partner, Marriages Are Made in Heaven, opened in Berlin in 1902. Maugham's first London production was in 1903, when A Man of Honour ran briefly. The play, about a Londoner who marries his pregnant girlfriend, causing misery, attracted some acclaim, but Maugham's commercial clout was established five years later.

Lady Frederick, a COMEDY about an heir whose love for an older woman is resisted by his wealthy family, opened at the Court Theater, London, in October 1907. Immediately popular and critically respected, the play ran for 422 performances. By the summer of 1908, four Maugham plays were running in London: Mrs. Dot, Jack Straw, The Explorer, and Lady Frederick—such unprecedented success inspires Shakespeare's anxiety in Partridge's humorous drawing. Capitalizing on his success, enjoying financial and social triumphs, Maugham crafted plays prolifically. His more melodramatic dramas, such as The Explorer (1908) and Smith (1909), were influenced by HENRIK IBSEN and ARTHUR PINERO. Richard Brinsley Sheridan and OSCAR WILDE influenced his comedies of manners. His 1909 Penelope, which ran for 246 performances at London's Comedy Theatre, centers on a clever wife who reacts with calm ingenuity to her husband's cheating, winning him back by letting him learn the follies of his behavior through harsh experience. Maugham's successful plays earned American productions, too, receiving often mixed reactions. Generally, Maugham's plays about English upper-class mores, bourgeois greed and dishonesty, and moneyed but spineless husbands did not translate well to non-British audiences.

After 1910, Maugham's personal life became complex and peripatetic. He married, disastrously, Syrie Wellcome (1897–1945), in America in 1917—divorce came, eventually, in 1929. A thirty-year relationship with Gerald Haxton (1892–1944) began around 1914. Haxton and Maugham traveled widely. Maugham's most lucrative comic plays were written during the early years of his relationship with Haxton. The Unattainable (1916) features the amorous dalliances of a widow, Caroline Ashley, who enjoys a love affair with the unmarried Robert Oldham, orchestrating intricate plots to ensure that society does not coerce her into marriage. Our Betters premiered in New York's Hudson Theatre in 1917, surviving for 112 performances, despite cool reviews. The play's satire about an American heiress's greed and desire for social enhancement is tough: contemporary reviewers found the play excessively acerbic and cynical. Maugham generates sympathy for neither the American heiress nor the aristocratic family she marries into. Other successful comedies from the period include Home and Beauty (1919) and THE CIRCLE (1921). The latter, which compares husband-leaving conduct by women of different generations, ran for 181 performances at London's Haymarket Theatre and has been revived several times. Deft and intricate in its examination of change between generations and its notice of society's gender-based moral values, The Circle is regarded as Maugham's most significant and least-dated play. Maugham's last significant comedy was THE CONSTANT WIFE, which failed in London in 1927 but ran for 295 performances at New York's Maxine Elliott's Theatre. Other, more serious 1920s plays work as dramatic companion pieces to Maugham's "exotic" prose works. These include East of Suez (1922) and the adultery-focused The Letter (1927)—both plays feature Britons living in Asia.

Maugham's later plays were sometimes successful, sometimes not. Maugham stopped being theatrically commercial after 1930, writing his most serious and important plays: his examinations of English society, For Services Rendered and SHEPPEY, were not produced in America, indicating their narrow appeal. For Services Rendered ran for seventy-eight performances at the Globe Theatre, London, from November 1932. The play dramatizes the post–Great War decline of a once-flourishing, well-off Kent family, the Ardsleys. Morally, physically, and economically maimed by the war, family members endure insanity, disastrous marriages, blindness, terminal illness, and suicide. Their contribution to Britain's war effort is overlooked by an ungrateful nation: the play challenges the value of self-sacrificing "service." John Gielgud directed the production of Sheppey at Wyndham's Theatre, London, in 1933. Eighty-three performances were staged, but the play baffled audiences and critics. The plot, about a barber who gives lottery-won money to the poor, alienating his godless, cash-devoted family, is straightforward, but the play, unusually for Maugham who disliked theatrical experimentation, combines NATURALISM with unrealistic SYMBOLISM. Maugham, ahead of his time with Sheppey, never wrote another play, although many of his stories were adapted dramatically by other playwrights.

After Haxton's death from tuberculosis in 1944, Maugham's personal and professional status declined. Maugham's reputation for bitterness, vituperation, and denial of truths (such as his homosexuality) was tempered by his many philanthropic gestures and bequeathments. He died in Nice, FRANCE, on December 15, 1965. Maugham's comedies impacted massively upon the commercial theaters of the early-20th century and remain seminal reading for any scholar of that period's dramatic conventions or of crowd-pleasing, theatrical craftsmanship.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

SELECT PLAYS: Marriages Are Made in Heaven (1902); A Man of Honour (1903); Lady Frederick (1907); The Explorer (1908); Jack Straw (1908); Mrs. Dot (1908); Penelope (1909); Smith (1909); The Unattainable (1916); Our Betters (1917); Home and Beauty (1919); The Circle (1921); East of Suez (1922); The Constant Wife (1927); The Letter (1927); For Services Rendered (1932); Sheppey (1933)

FURTHER READING

- Bassett, Troy James. "W. Somerset Maugham: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism." English Literature in Transition 41, no. 2 (1998): 133–184.
- Connon, Bryan. Somerset Maugham and the Maugham Dynasty. London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1997.
- Mander, R., and J. Mitchenson. Theatrical Companion to Maugham. London: Rockliff, 1955.
- Meyers, Jeffrey. Somerset Maugham: A Life. New York: Knopf, 2004.
- Rogal, Samuel J. A Companion to the Characters in the Fiction and Drama of W. Somerset Maugham. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- . A William Somerset Maugham Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
- Sanders, Charles. "W. Somerset Maugham." In Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 10, Part 2, Modern British Dramatists, 1900–1945, ed. by Stanley Weintraub. Detroit: Gale Res., 1982. 22–42.

Kevin De Ornellas

MAYAKOVSKY, VLADIMIR (1893–1930)

Vladimir Mayakovsky was born in Bagdadi, Georgia, on July 7, 1893. Although best known as one of the foremost poets of RUSSIAN FUTURISM, Mayakovsky wrote several important plays. His earliest drama depended heavily on collaboration with other futurist poets and painters.

His first work for the stage, A Tragedy (Tragediia, 1913), alternated in repertory with Aleksei Kruchonykh's Victory Over the Sun. Although the futurists proclaimed an absolute break with the past, Mayakovsky's Tragedy owes much to Greek TRAGEDY and to such immediate predecessors as ALEKSANDR BLOK and NIKOLAI EVREINOV. The influence of Evreinov's MONODRAMA is particularly apparent in the protagonist's fragmented personality, various aspects of which become other characters. Mayakovsky unifies all the disparate aspects of "his" personality through the myth of "himself" as a Christ-like figure, who suffers for all. This production was crucial to the development of futurism. Always experimental in form and genre, Mayakovsky exploited a rather grotesque admixture of mystery play and low, sometimes crude and blasphemous COMEDY in his next play, MYSTERY-BOUFFE (Misteriia-buff, 1918). The basic plot concerns a battle between seven pairs of "Clean" bourgeois and seven pairs of "Unclean" proletariat, who survive a cataclysmic flood. Written for the first anniversary of the October Revolution, the play portrays the triumph of the latter, who eventually deposit the "Clean" in hell, reject heaven as their reward, and return to the paradise on earth of communism. VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD's production, in collaboration with Mayakovsky and with set designs by Kasimir Malevich, had a short run and did not appeal to the conservative aesthetic tastes of the Bolsheviks, despite praise for its "democratic" forms.

Although he greeted the revolution enthusiastically, Mayakovsky became disillusioned and in THE BEDBUG (Klop, 1928) created a scathing satire of Soviet bureaucracy and philistinism. In the first half of the play, the protagonist, Prisyppkin, mouths Soviet platitudes but leads a profoundly bourgeois existence. His ostentatious wedding deteriorates into a bout of public drunkenness, which leads to a fire that kills everyone but Prisyppkin, who cannot be found. Some fifty years pass before his frozen but preserved body is discovered. The remainder of the play focuses on his "resurrected" life in the perfected future and on his alienation from it. Still "contaminated" by irrational impulses, such as love, and parasites, such as bedbugs, he is considered a danger to society and confined to a cage. The pathos of his situation is affecting. Meyerhold's production lent a stylistic brilliance to this, Mayakovsky's most successful play.

In his last play, THE BATHHOUSE (Bania, 1930), Mayakovsky goes after Soviet bureaucracy and its stultifying effect on society. The protagonist, Pobedonosikov, rules by red tape, which threatens to obscure the inventor Chudakov's time machine. Nonetheless, Chudakov successfully transports a "Phosphorescent Woman" from the future right into Pobedonosikov's living room. She warns Pobedonosikov that the future will only accept what is consonant with it. It turns out to be resistant to bureaucracy, and the time machine spits out those of the would-be time travelers who are out of step with the future. Despite its sometimes striking language, the play suffers from frequent longueurs. Even Meyerhold could not save it. Coupled with the poet's overwhelming personal crises, the demise of The Bathhouse contributed to his suicide soon afterward on April 14, 1930, in Moscow.

Mayakovsky also wrote a number of "agit-plays," or AGITATION-PROPAGANDA plays, as well as plays for the circus.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

SELECT PLAYS: A Tragedy (Tragediia, 1913); Mystery-Bouffe (Misteriia-buff, 1918; revised 1921); The Bedbug (Klop, 1928); The Bathhouse (Bania, 1930)

FURTHER READING

Briggs, A. D. P. Vladimir Mayakovsky: A Tragedy. Oxford: William A. Meeuws, 1979.

Brown, Edward J. Mayakovsky: A Poet in the Revolution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1973.

Markov, Vladimir. Russian Futurism: A History. Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1968.

Shklovsky, Viktor. Mayakovsky and His Circle. Tr. by Lily Feiler. London: Pluto Press, 1972.

Timothy C. Westphalen

MAYAMA SEIKA (1874–1948)

A Japanese novelist, historian, and playwright, Mayama Seika trained as a doctor in his native city of Sendai and briefly practiced in the poverty-stricken rural areas nearby. Conceiving literary ambitions, Mayama, like other young literary hopefuls of the time, gravitated to Tokyo, where he attracted attention with his naturalist stories, particularly those based on the rural poverty that he had witnessed firsthand. His first two plays were naturalist in method, one about a polar explorer desperate to have the world believe him and one about a young man with a hereditary condition, both of which owe something to HENRIK IBSEN.

Mayama's career as a novelist was cut short, however, because he offended the main publishing houses, and from the beginning of 1914 he started a decade in which almost all of his considerable creative output went into SHINPA. Here he willingly applied himself to learning the trade of playwrighting in spite of the social stigma attached to a hack playwright's occupation.

In the mid-1920s Mayama came into his own as a literary playwright (with pieces that were hardly performed but were discussed as literature) and as a playwright for shinkokugeki, specifically its charismatic leader Sawada Shōjirō. Instead of writing to please shinpa actors, Mayama now wrote to challenge Sawada, and the most powerful play to come out of this collaboration/competition was Sakamoto Ryōma (1928). This study of a mid-19th-century political activist shows a man drawn into a historical process (the ending of the feudal era in JAPAN) but at the mercy of his own temperament and developing ideas. Sakamoto, like other Mayama heroes of these years (especially the 10th-century rebel Taira no Masakado in the two plays with his name in the titles), wants just to be a human being (Masakado wants to “live littlely”), but his almost dialectical changes of political commitment make him many enemies, and he is killed.

In the 1930s Mayama, mainly in conjunction with the kabuki actor Ichikawa Sadanji II, developed a type of SHIN KABUKI characteristic of himself and much in contrast to that of OKAMOTO KIDŌ (who also worked with Sadanji). Mayama prided himself on his historical research but was not afraid to exaggerate or change emphasis for the sake of the play. His dialogue is dense (“no gaps,” commented one kabuki actor), and conflicts between characters are expressed in hard-hitting language.

Mayama based his plays on a variety of subjects (including 17th-century prose works by Ihara Saikaku), but history was his first love, and much of his energies in the 1930s went into his ten-play dramatization of the Chūshingura vendetta story (1934–1941). The colorful Lord Tsunatoyo at His Seaside Estate (1940) is still popular today. Sukeemon, one of the vendetta members, taunts the future shogun (Tsunatoyo) to his face in a desperate attempt to discover his attitude toward the vendetta. In the last scene, Sukeemon lunges at a figure obscured by a heavy nō costume, thinking it is the target of the vendetta, when it is in fact Tsunatoyo himself.

Mayama died in 1948, but his daughter Mayama Miho has over the past thirty years put a whole generation of younger kabuki actors through a process of learning to cope with the complex dialogue of her father's plays through her patient but very persistent directing style.

SELECT PLAYS: Genboku and Choei (1924); Sakamoto Ryōma (1928); Death of Yoritomo (Yoritomo no Shi, 1932); Onatsu and Seijūrō (Onatsu Seijūrō, 1933); The Shogun Leaves Edo (Shōgun Edo o Saru, 1934; the third of the trilogy Edojō Sōzeme [General Attack on Edo, 1926, 1933, 1934]); Loyal Retainers in the Genroku Period (Genroku Chūshingura, ten plays, 1934–1941)

FURTHER READING

Ōyama Isao. Mayama Seika, Hito to Sakuhi. Tokyo: Bokujisha, 1978.
Powell, Brian. Kabuki in Modern Japan, Mayama Seika and His Plays. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1990.
Tanabe Akio. Mayama Seika. Tokyo: Hokuyōsha, 1976.

Brian Powell

MA ZHONGJUN (1957–)

A contemporary Chinese playwright, Ma Zhongjun was born in 1957 in Shanghai, CHINA. Entering a junior high school, he started writing poems and became interested in aesthetics and in literary theory. He was assigned to work in a factory right after graduation. In April 1979, Ma was enrolled in a workshop on playwriting at the Shanghai Municipal Workers' Cultural Center, where he formed a friendship with his classmate Jia Hongyuan.

In 1980 the two of them, in cooperation with Qu Xinhua, wrote a short play titled There Is Warmth Outside the House (Wu wai you re liu), which won recognition from the Ministry of Culture and garnered a prize as one of the best plays of 1980–1981. Afterward, Ma and Jia Hongyuan co-wrote Man Wearing National Emblem (Dai guohui de ren, 1981), Road (Lu, 1981), and Trendy Red Dress (Jie shang liuxing hong gunzi, 1984). He also collaborated with Qin Peichun in writing the play Red Room, White Room, Black Room (Hong fangjian, bai fangjian, hei fangjian, 1986), which he also adapted into an award-winning film script. In 1988 he wrote the historical play The Legend of Old Bawdy Town (Lao fengliu zhen). For a time, he served as a full-time playwright at China Youth Art Theater, but since the mid-1990s, he has been a producer and written several film scripts and television play series.

Notable for his AVANT-GARDE exploration, Ma constantly tries to borrow new ideas and novel theatrical forms from both classical Chinese drama and foreign theater to serve as springboards for expressing the ideas, lives, and pursuits of contemporary Chinese youth. As a one-act play, There Is Warmth Outside the House is characteristic of Ma's playwriting practice. Influenced by ARTHUR MILLER'S DEATH OF A SALESMAN in terms of its social concern, the play depicts the lives of the three children of the Zhao family. Suffering the loss of both parents during China's Cultural Revolution, Zhao Changkang, the eldest son, goes to Heilongjiang province to work as a farmer, while his younger brother and sister remain in Shanghai as workers. Pitting the latter two against Changkang in terms of lifestyle and hence different moral attitudes, the play realistically shows the mental lives of the “lost generation” in the post-Cultural Revolution era and their eventual awakening. The play marks a breakthrough with traditional theater by employing a surrealistic depiction of the psychological conflicts among these three characters in a poetic setting. The overall symbolic contrast between the cold inside and the warmth outside suggests two attitudes toward life and two value systems. Because of its novel modes of theatrical expression, the play was a great hit when it was first staged in Beijing in 1980. It has since been regarded as one of the earliest exploration plays during the post-Cultural Revolution period.

SELECT PLAYS: There Is Warmth Outside the House (Wu wai you re liu, 1980); Road (Lu, 1981); Trendy Red Dress (Jie shang liuxing hong gunzi, 1984); Red Room, White Room, Black Room (Hong fangjian, bai fangjian, hei fangjian, 1986); The Legend of Old Bawdy Town (Lao fengliu zhen, 1988)

FURTHER READING

Jia Hongyuan and Ma Zhongjun. “Xie Wu wai you re liu de tansuo he sikao” [Exploration and thoughts in writing There Is Warmth Outside the House]. Juben (Play Scripts) 6 (1980).

Lin Kehuan. "Shenhao yu yishu de re liu—ping Wu wai you re liu" [The warmth in life and art: On There Is Warmth Outside the House]. Juben (Play Scripts) 8 (1980).

Ma Zhongjun. The Legend of Old Bawdy Town (Lao fengliu zhen). Tr. by Janice Wickeri. In An Oxford Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama, ed. by Martha P. Y. Cheung and Jane C. C. Lai. Hong Kong: Oxford Univ. Press, 1997. 185–262.

Zhou Yuming. "Liang ge yongyu tansuo de qingnian yeyu zuozhe—jieshao Wu wai you re liu de bianju Jia Hongyuan he Ma Zhongjun" [Two amateur playwrights who are bold at exploration: Introducing Jia Hongyuan and Ma Zhongjun, The Two Playwrights of There Is Warmth Outside the House Juben (Play Scripts) 8 (1980).

Hongchu Fu and Cai Xingshui

MCDONAGH, MARTIN (1970–)

Wee Thomas was a friendly cat. He would always say hello to you. . . . He won't be saying hello no more, God bless him. Not with that lump of a brain gone.

—Davey, Act 1, The Lieutenant of Inishmore

Few dramatists have had as spectacular a debut as Martin McDonagh, whose use of outrageous violence, cruel humor, and melodramatic storytelling has brought him acclaim. He is one of the most discussed writers in world drama: loved by audiences and detested by many critics, his plays provoke strong reactions everywhere they are performed.

McDonagh was born in London in 1970 to Irish parents. His early efforts at playwriting floundered because, McDonagh has stated, his writing was too much influenced by DAVID MAMET and HAROLD PINTER. In an attempt to free himself of this influence, McDonagh decided to write in an exaggerated version of the idiom he had heard during childhood visits to IRELAND.

The result was The Beauty Queen of Leenane, a black COMEDY set in rural Ireland, which was premiered in Galway by Druid Theatre Company in 1996. Its success encouraged Druid to premiere two further McDonagh plays the following year when, together with The Beauty Queen, his A Skull in Connemara and The Lonesome West were presented as The Leenane Trilogy. The Trilogy then transferred to Britain, where the Royal National Theatre's production of The Cripple of Inishmaan was also playing, earning McDonagh the rare honor of having four of his plays run simultaneously in the West End.

These plays brought McDonagh instant success—but his work was not welcomed universally. His characters are violent and idiotic, and their use of language is engaging but inarticulate. This exposed McDonagh to the accusation that he was reinforcing negative Irish stereotypes. His defenders state that he is in fact critiquing those stereotypes—a fair point but one that fails to deal with the fact that many audiences persist in taking McDonagh's plays as literal representations of Irish life.

The debate about McDonagh's work has been complicated by his high public profile: with a series of outspoken comments and a notorious public argument with the actor Sean Connery, he has antagonized many of his supporters.

The resulting backlash against McDonagh made it difficult for him to have later plays produced, and he provoked much media attention by claiming that the Royal Court and Royal National Theatre had rejected The Lieutenant of Inishmore—about a psychopathic Irish terrorist—owing to its political content. Both theaters deny this claim. When that play was finally produced by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 2001, it proved hugely popular, although the debate about the authenticity of McDonagh's Irish characters persisted. McDonagh has stated in response that he considers himself neither Irish nor English—as shown in 2003 when THE PILLOWMAN, a comedy set outside Ireland, was produced in London.

Because McDonagh tends to provoke strong feelings, his work has not received much objective critical attention. This is unfortunate: while his plays show little variation in characterization and language, they are excellent examples of comic storytelling and audience manipulation. But they are, most important, incisive but frequently misunderstood satires of Irish identity.

PLAYS: The Beauty Queen of Leenane (1996); The Cripple of Inishmaan (1997); The Lonesome West (1997); A Skull in Connemara (1997); The Lieutenant of Inishmore (2001); The Pillowman (2003)

FURTHER READING

Feeney, Joseph S. J. "Martin McDonagh: Dramatist of the West." Studies 87, no. 345 (Spring 1998).

Kurdi, Maria. Codes and Masks: Aspects of Identity in Contemporary Irish Plays in an International Context. Frankfurt am Main: P. Lang, 2000.

Lanters, José. "Playwrights of the Western World: Synge, Murphy, McDonagh." In A Century of Irish Drama: Widening the Stage, ed. by Stephen Watt, Eileen Morgan, and Shakir Mustafa. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 2000.

Merriman, Vic. "Decolonisation: The Theatre of Tiger Trash." Irish University Review (Autumn–Winter 1999): 305–317.

Patrick Lonergan

MCGEE, GREG (1950–)

Greg McGee was born in 1950 in Oamaru, NEW ZEALAND. His Foreskin's Lament (1980) was hailed by many, including BRUCE MASON, as the Great New Zealand play. Its concern with national identity was stated aggressively in the sixfold "Whaddarya?" ("What are you?") addressed to the audience by the eponymous hero at the final curtain. Foreskin's Lament is about rugby union, New Zealand's national game. The first act is set in a changing shed after a local team practice and the second act at the after-match party. The trenchant REALISM of the play—very confrontational in the country's generally intimate theaters—was signaled by the locker room with its "strong smell of liniment" and the players' naked bodies.

Dramatic conflict arises because Clean, a Vietnam veteran and policeman, surreptitiously kicks the captain in the head. As a consequence, loyalties are tested. For coach Tupper, "the town is the team," and the team is, of course, a metaphor for New Zealand society. As fullback, Foreskin is somewhat removed from the rest of the team, his detachment exacerbated by his "university" education. Foreskin's role as commentator culminates in his final harangue, an oratory tour de force, which starts as a parody of an after-match speech and becomes an extravagant lament for the shattered myths of tribal identity.

The play's timeliness was confirmed by the notorious 1981 South African rugby tour of New Zealand. In 1985 McGee actually revised the play, shifting the action from 1976 to the wake of that Springbok tour. He also severely abridged and toned down Foreskin's lament, but the most significant change foregrounded the issue of race: Clean became a Maori as well as a policeman on duty during the tour. The changes were generally deemed injudicious, and later productions reverted to the original text.

As a Junior All Black (national football team) and trialist for the All Blacks, McGee was well qualified to write about rugby; his training as a lawyer served his next play, Tooth and Claw (1983), set in a legal office where shady business dealings occur against a background—represented by projections on a screen upstage—of street riots and urban disintegration.

Out in the Cold (1983), based on a short story by McGee, is a situation COMEDY about Judy, a solo mother, who tries to pass as a man in order to secure a job at the local abattoir. The slaughterhouse is a metaphor for the masculine world, whose attitudes Judy attempts to challenge until, inevitably, her true identity is discovered. A television version screened in 1985.

Whitemen (produced 1986), a satirical FARCE about a rugby union committee debating whether to invite a South African team to tour New Zealand again, was judged clumsy, and the large, expensive production was forced to close prematurely. Since then McGee has written almost exclusively for television and film. However, he returned to the stage with This Train I'm On (produced 1999), about two lifelong friends facing marital and professional failure.

PLAYS: Foreskin's Lament (1980); Out in the Cold (1983); Tooth and Claw (1983); Whitemen (1986); This Train I'm On (produced 1999)

FURTHER READING

Black, Sebastian. "Playboys of the South Pacific: The Plays of Greg McGee." Australasian Drama Studies 17 (October 1990): 183–202.

Carnegie, David. "The Metamorphoses of Foreskin's Lament."

Australasian Drama Studies 17 (October 1990): 202–220.

Cordery, Gareth. "Tom Brown's Schooldays and Foreskin's Lament: The Alpha and Omega of Rugby Football." Journal of Popular Culture 19, no. 2 (1985): 97–105.

Crawford, Scott. "A National Ethos in Three Dimensions: Rugby in Contemporary New Zealand Fiction." Arete: The Journal of Sport Literature 4, no. 1 (1986): 57–72.

Stuart Young

MCGRATH, JOHN (1935–2002)

The theatre can never cause a social change . . . it can be the way people can find their voice, their solidarity and their collective determination.

—Introduction to the Methuen edition of The Cheviot, the Stag and the Black, Black Oil, 1981

John McGrath was born in Birkenhead, ENGLAND, in 1935. His death in London in 2002, at the age of sixty-seven, deprived the world of one of its most prolific playwrights and directors who combined intellectual rigor with a commitment to vital, engaging theater. A complete list of his works would include over fifty original plays and about the same quantity of adaptations for theater, film, and television. After Oxford University, McGrath worked for the BBC (1960–1965), notably on Z Cars. This police series broke away from the cozy paternalism of shows such as Dixon of Dock Green to focus on the social issues underpinning the narrative. Rehearsed for a week, with large casts and multiple sets, and broadcast live, it also provided extensive experience in structuring dramatic action.

A committed socialist, McGrath was at the center of the alternative theater movement in Britain, and in 1971, with his wife Elizabeth MacLennan, he formed 7:84 Theatre Company, named for the statistic that seven percent of the population owned eighty-four percent of Britain's wealth. British alternative theater was divided roughly between those left-leaning groups who played to like-minded and mainly middle-class audiences and those, like 7:84, who sought out audiences who had been ignored by the mainstream, in venues where the commercial theater would not play. They dramatized the issues, political and domestic, that concerned these communities most immediately, from labor disputes to social ills, usually with a more or less unspoken call to action within the play.

McGrath's writing has been compared to BERTOLT BRECHT and DARIO FO in its vigorous utilization of popular theater techniques, such as music, to underpin the political message. It also owed a good deal to Joan Littlewood's work during the 1930s. McGrath extended his ideology to his working methods, continually seeking collective ways of making theater and running his companies. As the 1980s and 1990s saw Britain shift to the Right and public subsidies became scarcer and hedged about with regulation, McGrath came increasingly into conflict with the arts councils.

Throughout what characterized McGrath was his continued commitment to marginalized audiences and venues, when other left-wing playwrights had departed for the commercial stage, and his ability to articulate his ideas. His books A Good Night Out and The Bone Won't Break are closely argued, yet highly readable, manifestos from a master of popular theater.

Writing in 1992 Christopher Innes, while applauding the "continuing political vitality and popular appeal" of McGrath's work, contrasted his career with that of playwrights such as HOWARD BARKER who had escaped the "stylistic limitations" of AGITATION-PROPAGANDA. Now those "stylistic limitations" may now read differently to a generation whose visual/graphic vocabulary gleefully embraces the cartoon, sampling, popular culture heritage of agit-prop. Indeed, in McGrath's last work, Hyperlynx (2002), premiered after his death by Elizabeth MacLennan and directed by their daughter Kate, he demonstrates that his feel for political currents was acute to the last, writing, as Michael Billington in The Guardian (August 17, 2002), declared with "a controlled anger and a belief in the validity of personal protest" of the danger that the power of the multinationals will polarize the peoples of the world into violent conflict.

SELECT PLAYS: Events While Guarding the Bofors Gun (1966); Random Happenings in the Hebrides (1970); The Cheviot, the Stag and the Black, Black Oil (1973); The Games a Bogey (1974); Little Red Hen (1975); Yobbo Nowt (1975); Out of Our Heads (1976); The Rat Trap (1976); Joe's Drum (1979); The Life and Times of Joe of England (1979); Blood Red Roses (1980); Nightclass (1981); Six Men of Dorset (1984); All the Fun of the Fair (1986); Mairi Mhor (1987); Border Warfare (1989); John Brown's Body (1990); Watching for Dolphins (1991); Half the Picture (1994); Ane Satire of the Four Estates (1996); Hyperlynx (2002)

FURTHER READING

- DiCenzo, Maria. The Politics of Alternative Theatre in Britain, 1968–1990: The Case of 7:84 (Scotland). Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1996.
- Innes, Christopher. Modern British Drama 1890–1990. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1992.
- Mackenney, Linda. "The People's Story: 7:84 Scotland." In Scottish Theatre Since the Seventies, ed. by Randall Stevenson and Gavin Wallace. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 1996. 65–74.
- McGrath, John. A Good Night Out. Popular Theatre: Audience, Class and Form. London: Methuen, 1981.
- . The Bone Won't Break: On Theatre and Hope in Hard Times. London: Methuen, 1990.
- Patterson, Michael. Strategies of Political Theatre: Post-War British Playwrights. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2003.

Barbara A. E. Bell

MCGUINNESS, FRANK (1953–)

Lord, look down on us. Spare us. I love—. Observe the sons of Ulster marching towards the Somme. I love their lives. I love my own life. I love my home. I love my Ulster.

—Kenneth Pyper, Part 4, Observe the Sons of Ulster Marching Towards the Somme

Frank McGuinness is the leading Irish playwright of his generation, noted for a powerful body of original plays and adaptations. He was born in 1953 in Buncrana, County Donegal, a town that is politically part of the Republic of IRELAND but geographically within the natural hinterland of Derry City in Northern Ireland. Growing up with a sense of these two different political entities occupying one landscape has clearly had an impact on McGuinness: his work constantly attempts to blend apparent opposites, such as the sacred and the profane, love and hate, masculinity and femininity, and many others.

He began writing plays in 1980, after attending a workshop run by Patrick Mason, who would later direct many of his most successful plays. That workshop resulted in The Factory Girls, a celebration of the working-class Donegal culture in which McGuinness was reared. The play was well received when it premiered at the Abbey Theatre in 1982, but its lighthearted tone and formal simplicity gave no indication of the power or subject matter of McGuinness's next major play, OBSERVE THE SONS OF ULSTER MARCHING TOWARDS THE SOMME (1985). A treatment of protestant Irish soldiers fighting in World War I, it strongly challenged social attitudes in both parts of Ireland—and was the play that first brought McGuinness to international attention.

Throughout his subsequent career, McGuinness has continued to rebel against social and theatrical conventions. His response to the 1972 "Bloody Sunday" killing of thirteen Derry civilians by the British army was Carthaginians (1988), in which Dido, a drag queen, directs a mock Irish play in a Derry graveyard. For the Royal Shakespeare Company, he produced Mary and Lizzie (1989), which presents Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels from the perspective of Engels's Irish maids. For the Royal National Theatre in Britain, he wrote Mutabilitie (1997), a play that challenged English audiences by presenting two of their most cherished writers—Edmund Spenser and William Shakespeare—in an unflattering Irish context. And as a gay man living in Ireland—where homosexuality was criminalized until 1992—McGuinness has never shied from presenting homosexuality at the heart of the national experience.

His work is also characterized by a strong interest in relationships—between countries, family members, lovers, and friends. This was most powerfully the case in Someone Who'll Watch Over Me (1992), which presented a trio of American, English, and Irish hostages in 1980s Beirut—and it was also a feature of Dolly West's Kitchen (1999), a treatment of a family's life during World War II.

Compassionate and courageous, McGuinness's plays have not always been well received—in part because of his often-challenging subject matter, as well as his frequent use of impressionistic theatrical techniques. Yet he remains much respected as one of the liveliest imaginations now working in the theater.

PLAYS: The Factory Girls (1982); Borderlands (1983); Baglady (1985); Gatherers (1985); Observe the Sons of Ulster Marching Towards the Somme

(1985); Innocence (1986); Rosermsholm (after Henrik Ibsen; 1987); Yerma (after Gabriel García Lorca; 1987); Carthaginians (1988); Peer Gynt (after Ibsen; 1988); Times In It (1988); Beautiful British Justice (1989); Mary and Lizzie (1989); The Bread Man (1990); Three Sisters (after Anton Chekhov; 1990); The House of Bernarda Alba (after García Lorca; 1991); The Threepenny Opera (after Bertolt Brecht; 1991); Someone Who'll Watch Over Me (1992); The Man With the Flower in His Mouth (after Luigi Pirandello; 1993); The Stronger (after August Strindberg; 1993); The Bird Sanctuary (1994); Hedda Gabler (after Ibsen; 1994); Uncle Vanya (after Chekhov; 1995); The Caucasian Chalk Circle (after Brecht; 1997); A Doll's House (after Ibsen; 1997); Electra (after Sophocles; 1997); Mutabilitie (1997); Barbaric Comedies (after Ramón María del Valle-Inclán; 1999); Dolly West's Kitchen (1999); Miss Julie (after Strindberg; 1999); The Storm (after Aleksandr Ostrovsky; 1999); Gates of Gold (2002); Hecuba (after Euripedes; 2004); Rebecca (after Dane Daphne du Mauries; 2005); Phaedra (after Jean Racine; 2006); Speaking Like Megpies (2006); There Came a Gypsy Riding (2007)

FURTHER READING

Jordan, Eamonn. The Feast of Famine: The Plays of Frank McGuinness.

Berne: P. Lang, 1997.

Lojek, Helen, ed. Stages of Mutabilitie. Dublin: Carysfort Press, 2002.

Murray, Christopher. Twentieth Century Irish Drama: Mirror Up to Nation. Manchester: Manchester Univ. Press, 1997.

Roche, Anthony. Contemporary Irish Drama: From Beckett to McGuinness. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1994.

Patrick Lonergan

MCNALLY, TERENCE (1939–)

If a play isn't worth dying for—not to mention months, perhaps years of rewrites and frustration—maybe it isn't worth writing.

—Terrence McNally, 1998

Terrence McNally, whose plays represent an examination of war, homosexuality, AIDS, and obsession, has often been the center of controversy. His first Broadway production, And Things That Go Bump in the Night (1964), was condemned by critics for its violence and pessimistic outlook. Although Lips Together, Teeth Apart (1991) ran successfully in New York and regionally, it was banned in Cobb County, Georgia, for being “a gay play.” The Manhattan Theater Club canceled Corpus Christi (1998), a modern retelling of Christ's life from a gay perspective, when threatened with violence. The Theater Club eventually presented the piece after McNally's contemporaries came to his defense and metal detectors were installed at the theater entrance. Yet for four decades, McNally, a four-time Tony Award winner, has managed to sustain a career as one of America's leading dramatists.

Born on November 3, 1939, in St. Petersburg, Florida, and raised in Texas, McNally moved to New York to attend Columbia University. He graduated in 1960 with a bachelor's degree in English literature and saw himself as a journalist who would write the next Great American Novel. Instead, he wrote a play—This Side of the Door (1962)—which he sent to the Actors' Studio. As a result, he was asked to join the Studio's Playwrights' Unit, where he learned stagecraft by observing actors and directors in action and working as a stage manager.

Several of his plays were produced in the late 1960s, establishing him as a writer of COMEDIES. His irreverent treatments of volatile topics, such as Vietnam in Botticelli (1968) and political assassination in Witness (1968), were well received. He achieved his first big commercial success with his FARCE The Ritz (1974), for which he also wrote the screenplay. In 1985, It's Only a Play was produced, a drama about waiting for first-night reviews that marked a change in McNally's writing style. While it still possesses a satirical tone, the play is more heartfelt than farcical.

Although McNally was not trained in music or dance, both elements are important to his work. He fell in love with opera as a young Catholic schoolboy and views dance as an extraordinary means of expressing love. Love! Valour! Compassion! (1994) includes a ballet section, and Master Class (1995) is entirely devoted to Maria Callas. In 1992, he collaborated with John Kander and Fred Ebb on Kiss of the Spider Woman, winning a Tony Award for Best Book. His dramatic writing includes the books for several other musicals, as well as the libretto for the opera version of Dead Man Walking (2000). As a writer who draws inspiration from contemporary cultural concerns, McNally has been strongly influenced by the HIV/AIDS crisis. Although not necessarily a central theme in all of his plays, it undeniably informs the subtexts of his characters. In Andre's Mother (1988, whose 1990 PBS version won an Emmy Award), McNally does deal directly with the subject. Written when the UNITED STATES and its theater community were struggling to deal with the crisis, the drama elucidates the impact of AIDS-related deaths on those left behind.

In addition to numerous awards from the theater community, McNally has also been recognized by the Pulitzer Prize Committee.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: The Side of the Door (1962); The Lady of the Camellias (1963); And Things That Go Bump in the Night (1964); Next (1967); Tour (1967); Botticelli (1968); Cuba Si (1968); Noon (1968); Sweet Eros (1968); Witness (1968); Bring It All Back Home (1969); Last Gasps (1969); Where Has Tommy Flowers Gone? (1971); Let It Bleed (1972); Whisky (1973); Bad Habits (1974); The Ritz (1975); It's Only a Play (1985); Frankie and Johnny in the Clair de Lune (1987); Andre's Mother (1988); The Lisbon Traviata (1989); Prelude & Liebestod (1989); Lips Together, Teeth Apart (1991); A Perfect Ganes (1993); The Wibble, Wobbly, Wiggly Dance that Cleopatterer Did (1993); Hidden Agendas (1994); Love! Valour! Compassion! (1994); Master Class (1995); Dusk (1996); Corpus Christi (1998)

FURTHER READING

- Bigsby, C. W. E. Modern American Drama 1945–2000. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000.
- DiGaetani, John L. A Search for a Postmodern Theater: Interviews with Contemporary Playwrights. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Kolin, Philip C., and Colby H. Kullman, eds. Speaking on Stage: Interviews with Contemporary American Playwrights. Tuscaloosa: Univ. of Alabama Press, 1996.
- MacNicholas, John, ed. Twentieth-Century American Dramatists: Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 7. Detroit: Gale Res., 1981.
- Zinman, Toby Silverman, ed. Terrence McNally: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1997.

Meghan Duffy

MCPHERSON, CONOR (1971–)

Boredom. Loneliness. A feeling of basically being out of step with everybody else. Fear. Anxiety. Tension. And of course a disposition to generally liking the whole . . . thing of drinking until you pass out.

—John, Part 3, A Dublin Carol

Conor McPherson is an Irish dramatist, filmmaker, and director. Most of his work for the stage has been written in the form of monologues, usually presented by deeply flawed and often self-deceptive male characters. His plays represent a moving anatomization of loneliness and masculinity—and are, furthermore, among the finest recent examples of theatrical storytelling.

McPherson's earliest plays were performed in fringe venues in Dublin; his first success was This Lime Tree Bower (1995), a series of three interlinked monologues, which he later filmed as Saltwater. Produced in Dublin to mixed reviews, the play was more successful when it transferred to London's Bush Theatre—which also produced St Nicholas (1997), in which a drunken Irish theater critic falls in with a group of vampires.

McPherson was then commissioned by the Royal Court to write a naturalistic play for an ensemble of actors. The result was The Weir (1997), a fiercely moving drama set in a rural Irish pub, in which the local clientele entertain a visitor from Dublin by telling her ghost stories. The Weir was very successful, transferring to Dublin and Broadway. It was followed by A Dublin Carol (2000), in which an alcoholic undertaker is confronted by his estranged daughter.

While The Weir and A Dublin Carol appeared to suggest that McPherson has abandoned the monologue, both were strongly dependent on storytelling as a means of representing character. It was therefore unsurprising that McPherson returned to the monologue with Port Authority (2001), which presents three generations of dysfunctional Irish males.

In 2001, McPherson became a victim of the kind of lifestyle represented in his plays, when he was hospitalized for pancreatitis associated with heavy drinking. This illness and his subsequent recovery have done nothing to diminish his output: his films Saltwater and The Actors were released in 2001 and 2003, and he directed Eugene O'Brien's Eden in Dublin and the West End in 2001–2002.

McPherson's reception has not been universally positive. Some commentators regard his representation of women as unsympathetic; others suggest that he needs to explore forms other than the monologue to develop fully as a playwright. McPherson has countered that the monologue offers a uniquely theatrical experience to audiences, who must listen not only to his character's words but also to their silences, unfinished sentences, and slips.

McPherson's contribution to Irish theater is significant. The success of his monologues helped to create an audience for similar work by Enda Walsh, Mark O'Rowe, and others. And although premiered in 1997, The Weir was voted by Irish Times readers as one of the best Irish plays of the 20th century. This shows the immediacy of the impact of a playwright who has quickly emerged as one of the most exciting young voices in Irish theater.

[See also Ireland]

PLAYS: Concerning Communication (1992); Rum and Vodka (1992); A Light in the Window of Industry (1993); The Good Thief (1994); Inventing Fortune's Wheel (1994); The Stars Lose Their Glory (1994); This Lime Tree Bower (1995); St Nicholas (1997); The Weir (1997); A Dublin Carol (2000); Come on Over (2001); Port Authority (2001); Shining City (2004); The Seafarer (2006)

FURTHER READING

- Greene, Nicholas. The Politics of Irish Drama: Plays in Context from Boucicault to Friel. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000.
- Jordan, Eamonn, ed. Theatre Stuff: Critical Essays on Contemporary Irish Theatre. Dublin: Carysfort Press, 2000.
- Wood, Gerard. Imagining Mischief. Dublin: Liffey Press, 2003.

Patrick Lonergan

THE MEASURES TAKEN

BERTOLT BRECHT's The Measures Taken (Die Maßnahme) premiered in a midnight performance at the Berlin Philharmonic on December 13, 1930. Thematically and aesthetically, it was and remains Brecht's most controversial play.

Four Communist Party agitators, sent by Moscow to CHINA to spread propaganda and foment revolution, return to report that they shot a young comrade and threw his corpse into a lime pit. They submit their case to the Party's judicial organ, the Control Chorus, and reenact, in eight parables, the events leading up to and including the murder. The agitators easily recruit the young comrade to guide them across the border where unrest is rife. However, the same moral outrage at human misery that compels him to swear allegiance to the ABCs of communism and join the underground cell makes the young comrade temperamentally unfit to sustain the deception necessary to maintain Party discipline. Four times he fails to fulfill his charge, and four times he endangers the world revolutionary struggle when his actions threaten to betray the presence of the foreign communist agents. The mercy he shows the coolies in laying stepping stones at their feet as they trudge along the slippery embankment, towing the rice barge upriver, only serves to draw their scorn and to attract the unwanted attention of the overseer. The justice he demands from the police officer, who falsely charges a scab with distributing strike leaflets, draws the ire of the textile workers and undermines worker solidarity. The honor he asserts in refusing to dine with the arms merchant, who proudly proclaims, "I don't know what a man is, I only know his price," undermines the attempt to arm the coolies in the fight against British imperialism. And finally, when, in righteous indignation at the exploitation of the working class, he tears away his mask and calls prematurely for revolution, his howling in the night literally awakens the masses from their slumber, causing them to cry out against the foreign agitators. This final act of betrayal leads to the decision to murder the young comrade as the only means of forestalling the retreat of the Party vanguard. "In the interest of Communism" and "the forward march of the proletarian masses of all nations," the young comrade acquiesces to his own murder.

The discordant sounds of Hanns Eisler's (1898–1962) musical score and the unrhymed, irregular verse of Brecht's libretto symbolize the dissonant social relations under capitalism. Brecht and Eisler drew on disparate poetic and musical traditions (didactic poetry, the Passion oratorio, agit-prop [AGITATION-PROPAGANDA] theater, actus oratorius, the brass orchestra, workers choirs, atonal music) to convey the contradiction between Christian virtue and socialist morality. Critical reviews were equally wide-ranging and discordant. While one socialist critic lamented the scriptural overtones of the LEARNING PLAY, another lambasted Brecht for instructing the working class in false ethical dilemmas. Excitement about the new music and new theater for the working class vied with horror at the anti-humanistic impulse reflected in the willingness to sacrifice a human life in the service of an ideological end. Despite attempts to elevate the play to the level of a TRAGEDY, the critical consensus sees it as a piece of experimental theater and as part of Brecht's political and artistic journey.

[See also Germany]

FURTHER READING

Cohn, Ruby. "Theatrum Mundi' and Contemporary Theater."

Comparative Drama 1 (1967): 28–35.

Mews, Siegfried, ed. Critical Essays on Bertolt Brecht. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.

Schoeps, Karl-Heinz. "Brecht's Lehrstücke: A Laboratory for Epic and Dialectic Theater." In A Bertolt Brecht Reference Companion, ed. by Siegfried Mews. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997. 70–87.

Wirth, Andrzej. "The Lehrstück as Performance." Drama Review 43, no. 4 (1999): 113–121.

Kathy Brzovic

MEDOFF, MARK (1940–)

My work is simply a reflection of my own spirit, my fears, sorrows, and fires.

—Mark Medoff, 1980

Mark Medoff was born on March 18, 1940, in Carmel, Illinois, but much of his work focuses on the American Southwest. Medoff's earliest works were written and produced in Las Cruces, New Mexico, during the late 1960s and early 1970s. His early plays reflect the political and social turmoil of America in the late 1960s. In 1973 his play When You Comin Back, Red Ryder? brought the playwright an Obie Award, a Drama Desk Award, and national attention. Set in Foster's Diner in the forgotten reaches of New Mexico, the action of the play involves an eclectic group of characters representing a wide range of social backgrounds and takes place in the shadow of the Vietnam War. At the center of the action is Stephen Ryder, a nineteen-year-old cook, who prefers to be called Red. He has ambitions of leaving his small-town existence but appears incapable of pursuing his dream. While all of the patrons are stuck in the diner, a wild Vietnam War veteran named Teddy arrives, saying he is on his way to Mexico. Using a wide variety of clever methods, Teddy aggressively confronts the other characters, uncovering their fears and desires and eventually motivating young Stephen to leave and realize his life's ambition. The play is crafted with wit and insight and formed one portion of The Hero Trilogy, which also includes The Majestic Kid (1985) and The Heart Outright (1986).

In 1977 Medoff met deaf actor Phyllis Frelich at a theater workshop in Rhode Island and began to write a play for her, Children of a Lesser God (1979), which was produced on Broadway in 1980. Recognized as a unique and innovative triumph, the drama takes place on an almost bare stage and is set in the mind of teacher James Leeds, chronicling his journey to help a deaf student move forward in her life. Using both spoken and sign language, the play provided a touching and imaginative insight into the world of the deaf. Critically acclaimed and commercially successful, the play ran for 887 performances and won Tony Awards for Best Play, Best Actress (Frelich), and Best Actor (John Rubinstein). Medoff co-adapted the play for the screen (with Hesper Anderson) and received an Academy Award nomination (1986). Other notable collaborations with Frelich include The Hands of Its Enemy (1984), Gila (1998), and Road to a Revolution (2001), which focuses on the riots at the primarily deaf Gallaudet University in Washington, D.C., in the late 1980s.

In 2004 Medoff's play Prymate closed after only five official performances on Broadway. The play dealt with issues of race, AIDS, and animal rights; however, Medoff's choice to have an African American male play the role of a violent gorilla caused controversy. "My work is usually issue-driven," acknowledges Medoff (NBlake, 2004). In addition to his success as a playwright, Medoff has worked as an actor, novelist, director of stage and screen, screenwriter, and educator.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: The Wager (1967); Doing a Good One for the Red Man (1969); The Froegle Dictum (1971); The Kramer (1972); The War on Tatem (1972); When You Comin Back, Red Ryder? (1973); The Odyssey of Jeremy Jack (1974); The Ultimate Grammar of Life (1974); The Halloween Bandit (1976); The Conversion of Aaron Weiss (1977); Firekeeper (1978); Children of a Lesser God (1979); The Last Chance Saloon (1979); The Hands of Its Enemy (1984); Kringle's Window (1985); The Majestic Kid (1985); The Heart Outright (1986); Big Mary (1989); Stumps (1989); The Homage that Follows (1994); Crunch Time (1998); Gila (1998); Showdown on Rio Road (1998); Road to a Revolution (2001); Tommy J & Sally (2002); Gunfighter: A Gulf War Chronicle (2003); Prymate (2004)

FURTHER READING

- Erben, Rudoff. Mark Medoff. Boise, Idaho: Boise State Univ. Press, 1995.
- Green, Blake. "Big, bold, a bit racy." Newsday, May 2, 2004. <http://www.newsday.com/entertainment/news/ny-ftthe3778468may02,0,5639693.story?coll=ny-nyc-entertainment-headlines>
- Zachary, Samuel J. The Dramaturgy of Mark Medoff—Five Plays Dealing with Deafness and Social Issues. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2004.

Ellen Anthony-Moore and Christopher Moore

MEE, CHARLES (1938–)

The defining moment of Charles Mee's life came at the age of fourteen, when what he has described as a vibrant youth was interrupted by a case of polio that would leave him disabled for the rest of his life. In his memoir, Mee finds the roots of his dark, fragmentary writing style in his struggle with his own body: "Intact people should write intact books. . . . That is not my experience of the world. I like a book that feels like a crystal goblet that has been thrown to the floor and shattered."

Mee was born on September 15, 1938, in Evanston, Illinois. After he graduated from Harvard University, he briefly worked on Wall Street before taking a job at the American Heritage publishing company. His first play was produced in 1962 at the Writers' Stage Company, and over the next two years he would have additional plays produced by theaters such as La MaMa E.T.C. He also worked on The Drama Review in various editorial capacities from 1963 until 1965, at which point he lost confidence in pursuing a career in the theater. From 1965 until the early 1980s, he was for the most part a historian; he worked as editor of Horizon, a magazine on history and the arts, and wrote numerous books on European and American history.

Mee's interest in history and politics did not abate when he returned to playwriting with The Investigation of the Murder in El Salvador (1989). Even when adapting numerous Greek TRAGEDIES, he injected allusions to contemporary events and samples of contemporary texts into the dialogue. Indeed, Mee has referred to his works as assemblages or COLLAGES because they consist in no small part of excerpts taken from numerous texts integrated with material written by himself—and sometimes co-authored by theater ensembles with whom he collaborates. In The Berlin Circle (1998), for example, Mee takes the story of BERTOLT BRECHT'S THE CAUCASIAN CHALK CIRCLE (which was taken from other sources itself) and imposes its structure on East Berlin just as the Soviet Union is crumbling. His daughter, who has directed Mee's The Imperialists at the Club Cave Canem (1988) and First Love (2001), has characterized the plays as "blueprints for events" that are "full of excess" in terms of language, movement, themes, and dramaturgical structure. True to his own creative process, Mee (2006) has posted his scripts online and, as part of a "(re)-making project," invited others to take the texts and "pillage" them to build an "entirely new piece out of the ruins."

Mee has worked with some of America's most prominent directors, such as Anne Bogart and Robert Woodruff, and he shared an Obie with director Les Waters for their 2001 collaboration on Big Love (1999). As recently as December 2001, however, critic Jeremy McCarter writing for the New York Sun, could complain that Mee's plays deserve "more scrutiny than they've received," singling Mee out as the "rare serious artist whose innovations make his work more popular and more accessible without making it any less serious." Critics such as Robert Brustein have ranked Mee with the likes of WALLACE SHAWN and JOHN GUARE, but few lengthy studies of Mee's work have been published.

[See also Avant-Garde Drama, United States; Political Theater in the United States; United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Vienna: Lusthaus (1986); The Imperialists at the Club Cave Canem (1988); The Investigation of the Murder in El Salvador (1989); Another Person Is a Foreign Country (1991); The Constitutional Convention: A Sequel (1991); Orestes (1992); Agamemnon (1995); The Trojan Women: A Love Story (1996); The Berlin Circle (1998); Big Love (1999); bobrauschenbergamerica (2001); First Love (2001); Limonade Tous Les Jours (2002)

FURTHER READING

- Brustein, Robert. "Varieties of Theatrical Experience." The New Republic (December 31, 2001).
- Mee, Charles L. A Nearly Normal Life: A Memoir. New York: Little, Brown, 1999.
- . The (re)-making project. <http://www.charlesmee.org/html/prod.html>. (Oct. 12, 2006).
- Mee, Erin B. "Shattered and Fucked Up and Full of Wreckage: The Words and Works of Charles L. Mee." The Drama Review 46, no. 3 (T175) (Fall 2002).
- Wilder, Matthew. "Fantasizing About Chuck Mee." Theatre Forum, no. 5 (Summer–Fall 1994).

Daniel Mufson

MEI LANFANG (1894–1961)

The best-known Beijing opera dan (female) role master and one of the greatest singer-actor-dancers in Chinese history, Mei Lanfang, stage name of Mei Lan, was born in October 1894 in Taizhou county of CHINA's Jiangsu province. His grandfather and father both being well-known opera actors, Mei began studying Beijing opera at the age of eight and made his debut onstage at ten. He joined the Xiliancheng Theatrical Company in 1907 to begin his professional stage career. Thereafter Mei Lanfang played mostly female roles in Beijing operas, but he was a master in kunqu as well. In 1913 Mei first toured Shanghai for a professional performance that won him a national reputation. After the start of the second Sino-Japanese War (1937–1945), he went to settle in Hong Kong in protest. He returned to Shanghai in 1942 but did not resume his performance until after World War II in 1945. After 1949, Mei Lanfang served as the first president of China Beijing Opera Academy and performed frequently until his death in August 1961.

Chinese Beijing opera has become globally known, thanks to Mei Lanfang's efforts and his tours in JAPAN, the UNITED STATES, and the former Soviet Union. For his contribution to the art of Beijing opera and to his efforts in introducing the traditional Chinese performing art to the world, Mei was awarded an Honorary Doctor of Philosophy degree by Pomona College and University of Southern California, respectively, during his tour to the United States. While visiting Moscow, he won the praise of such dramatic heavyweights as KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY and VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD.

Mei Lanfang's stage life underwent three periods. From the beginning of his career to 1915, it was the early period of Mei's professional life, when he laid a solid foundation for his later achievement and mainly inherited Beijing operatic tradition. The years from 1915 to the eve of the second Sino-Japanese War marked the middle period of his artistic activities, when he made major reforms to the dan roles in Beijing opera by redefining the role of a qingyi, the dignified and graceful female, and the role of a huadan, the vivacious female. The third and last period followed World War II, when he focused on some of his more successful plays for reinforcements. Plays he performed during this period were frequently made into films.

In his fifty years of stage life, Mei Lanfang played over 100 roles of characters. He revolutionized both stage makeup and costumes and systemized and enriched character gestures, expressions, and poses. He also made innovations in play script and accompanying instrument. Especially praiseworthy was his achievement in incorporating singing, gesticulation, elocution, and acrobatics with dancing in operatic performance. His style of performance won such acclaim over the years that it came to be known as the "Mei Lanfang school." The major plays in his repertoire include Beauty Defies Tyranny (Yu zou feng), The Drunken Concubine (Gui fei zui jiu), Hegemon-King Parts with His Concubine (Ba wang bie ji), and Scattering Flowers (Tian nü san hua).

FURTHER READING

- Hu Shih. Mei Lan-fang and the Chinese Drama. Shanghai: Commercial Press, 1931.
- Leung, George Kin, et al. Mei Lan-fang, Foremost Actor of China. Shanghai: Commercial Press, 1929.
- Mei Lanfang. Hegemon King Says Farewell to His Queen (Bawang bieji). A Beijing Opera play adapted by Mei Lanfang. Tr. by William Dolby. In Eight Chinese Plays from the Thirteenth Century to the Present, by Mei Lanfang. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1978. 111–137.
- Scott, A. C. Mei Lan-fang: The Life and Times of a Peking Actor. Hong Kong: Hong Kong Univ. Press, 1971.
- Wu, Zuguang, et al. Peking Opera and Mei Lanfang: A Guide to China's Traditional Theatre and the Art of Its Great Master. Beijing: New World Press, 1981.

Hongchu Fu

MELODRAMA

One of the misunderstood subjects in theater, melodrama is also one of the most resilient. For many people the word conjures up images of threatened heroines, virtuous heroes, and nefarious villains. It is, however, a more complex and even sophisticated subject.

The term melodrama originally comes from the practice of English and French theaters presenting plays with a musical accompaniment. These "melody-dramas" came about as a way to circumvent theater-licensing procedures that restricted non-musical plays to specific theaters.

Music and musical interludes were part of melodrama. They, of course, aided in getting around licensing restrictions. However, it also added a tool for the dramatist or the producer. Music sometimes received use as an underscore to specific scenes. Dramatists used interludes to break the tension of a scene or simply to extend the show's running time. In some cases the interlude was irrelevant to the story line and occurred in order to highlight a specific performer or performers.

Plot, situation, and spectacle rather than well-defined characters drive the plays. The world of the play is a world of poetic justice. The good receive absolution and/or reward; the bad receive their just deserts. A facet of melodrama that evolved over time was spectacle. Producers became increasingly desirous of scenes containing thrilling exploits, scenes where characters performed death-defying deeds. The audiences delighted in the spectacle as well as in the expected "happy ending." The critics, on the other hand, derided melodrama for its non-Aristotelian structure. The observance of the unities was not strict; further, the critics felt, many plot elements depended on wild coincidences and seeming defiance of logic.

Suspense was a major factor in melodrama's hold on its audience. The clever playwright used it to full effect in order to draw his audience into the story. A good example of the "see-saw" battle of good and evil comes from N. Hart Jackson's adaptation of Adolphe D'Ennery and Eugene Cormon's The Two Orphans (1874).

Henriette and Louise, the two orphans of the title, arrive in Paris to meet a person who has offered to shelter them. People bent on abducting Henriette for immoral purposes have waylaid him, and they abduct Henriette. Louise, who is blind, hears the scuffle and cries out for her sister. Unfortunately, La Frochard, the villain of the play, hears her and misleads her into thinking La Frochard will aid her in searching for Henriette.

In the second scene DeVaudrey, a disaffected noble more noble than his peers, rescues Henriette. She is now safe, but Louise's singing assists La Frochard in panhandling the streets. Louise begs for relief from this fatiguing task, but La Frochard refuses.

In scene 2 of act 2 a false ray of hope appears. A doctor encounters Louise and La Frochard in the street. He examines Louise's eyes and declares there is the possibility of restoring her sight. He requests she come to his office. La Frochard agrees to this but really does not intend to give up her panhandling racket using Louise. Further heightening the suspense, Henriette almost finds Louise, but DeVaudrey's uncle, who dislikes her, has her arrested. She is taken away by the guards as Louise's voice grows fainter in the background.

Act 3, scene 1, sees Henriette rescued by a girl named Marianne who Henriette did a kind favor for in act 1, scene 1. Marianne is imprisoned along with Henriette. She fears that she will relapse into her old ways if she returns to the world. She accepts Henriette's sentence of exile (arranged under false pretenses by DeVaudrey's uncle) and gives Henriette the pardon she (Marianne) received. In scene 2, Henriette rescues Louise from La Frochard. Both girls have lovers who want them, and the punishment of the evildoers occurs in due course.

PLAYWRIGHTS

What we consider "modern" melodrama derives from the works of the French playwright Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773–1844). His works achieved great popularity in postrevolutionary FRANCE. His two best-known pieces are Coelina (1800) and The Dog of Montargis (1814). The first play derives from a novel of the period. The second play is pure melodrama: just before an innocent man's unjust execution, a dog identifies the actual murderer.

One of a dramatist's tricks to keep up suspense is to reveal all, or only part, of the mystery to the audience. In Coelina Pixérécourt withholds part of the mystery from the audience. Francisque is a mysterious individual. He is mute and seems fond of Coelina, fond in a paternal way. Truguelin, the villain, has found a way to cheat Coelina of her estate by charging her birth to be illegitimate in a letter to Dufour, Coelina's guardian. Coelina and Francisque are banished. Francisque writes his version of the story in a letter as well. Both the characters in the world of the play and the audience are in quandary. The truth is revealed when Andreon, the doctor, endorses Francisque's version of the story. Earlier in the play Truguelin avoids the doctor; we find out later that Truguelin was responsible for Francisque's crippling. The doctor's testimony solves the mystery. This set a pattern followed by many melodramas. A character such as a minister, judge, doctor, village elder that most (if not all) members of the community respected for their integrity facilitated the revelation of the truth.

VICTORIEN SARDOU (1831–1908) dominated the French melodrama in the latter half of the 19th century. Many of his plays revolved around misplaced objects, and he, like Eugène Scribe, constructed them in the "well-made play" pattern. In 1900, Giacomo Puccini immortalized his 1887 play La Tosca as an opera.

Edward Fitzball (1793–1873), THOMAS TAYLOR (1817–1880), and George R. Sims (1847–1922) are well-known and prolific melodramatists of the English stage. Fitzball had a reputation for the macabre but also wrote melodramas of a nautical theme. The Inchcape Bell (1828) and Jonathan Bradford or, the Murder at the Roadside Inn (1823) are two of his better-known plays. The latter is an example of so-called cause célèbre (celebrated case) melodrama where the story is taken from a real-life criminal case. Taylor was not as flamboyant as Fitzball but contributed a memorable play to the repertoire: The Ticket-of-Leave Man (1863), with the ubiquitous detective Hawkshaw. Sims is most prominent for The Lights o' London (1881) and The Romany Rye (1882). Both of these plays used the theme of the evils of the metropolis, the former dealing with a falsely accused hero and the latter dealing with the abduction and near murder of the hero. Romany Rye also contains a good example of the way logic stretched in melodrama. Two men with murderous intent abduct the hero of The Romany Rye. They bring him to a hideout where they leave him in the hands of an old woman who is to knock him out with a sleep potion. However, the old woman cannot bring herself to participate in the hero's demise because he reminds her of her own son. She urges him to fake his unconsciousness, and this allows him to get the drop on his would-be murderers and vanquish them.

The English stage also received translations of plays from France and GERMANY. Besides Pixérécourt's works the German playwright August von Kotzebue (1761–1819) attained translation in ENGLAND. This prolific writer's best-known play Misanthropy and Remorse (Menschenhass und Reue), written in 1788, shocked its audiences with its radical (for the time) action of having a runaway wife reunited with her husband and children. The Stranger (1792) was the title of its English translation, and it played durably for years. A variation of its plot, the errant wife being forgiven and then dying, is found in ELLEN WOOD's adaptation of her own novel EAST LYNNE (1861). It proved very durable in dramatic form.

The American theater has had many playwrights of the melodramatic form. Some received their influence from the European tradition. Others, especially later, developed a more American point of view.

John Augustus Stone (1800–1834) wrote many plays but is best known for Metamora (1829), written for Edwin Forrest. Louisa Medina (c. 1813–1838) was successful as an adapter of novels to the stage. Her best-known one was The Last Days of Pompeii (1835), which, with twenty-nine performances, set a record for length of run. Her 1838 adaptation of Robert Bird's novel Nick of the Woods contained a spectacular scene of the title character breaking up an attack on some settlers by descending on a cataract in a burning canoe.

George Aiken (1830–1876) wrote the adaptation of Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), which is in most collections. Frank Murdock (1843–1872) wrote DAVY CROCKETT (1872). This play is memorable for the scene where Davy (actually, Davy Junior) saves the villain and the heroine from a pack of wolves by using the “strong arm of a frontiersman” to replace the broken bar on the cabin door.

DIONYSIUS BOUCAULT (1820–1890) traveled between England and the UNITED STATES, producing plays on both shores. One of his best known is The Poor of New York (1858, later renamed Streets of New York). This play became The Streets of London, The Poor of Liverpool, and so on—it took the name of wherever it played.

AUGUSTIN DALY's (1838–1899) plays were famous for their spirited heroines. Daly's UNDER THE GASLIGHT is the first melodrama to feature a rescue from the railroad tracks. The heroine, Laura, driven from her home by the villain's false claim of her illegitimate birth, flees his attempts to abduct her. Seeking the shelter of a shed near a railroad track, an accommodating trainman agrees to lock her in for her protection since the shed also contains tools that need locking up anyway. Snorky, Laura's comic friend, searches for her, but the villain captures him instead. The villain ties Snorky to the tracks as a train sounds in the distance. After the villain leaves, Laura tries in vain against the locked shed door. She remembers the supply of tools. Using an ax, she frees herself and frees Snorky as the train rumbles up.

A similar turn of events occurred in Daly's The Red Scarf (1869). This play contained the first rescue from a buzz saw. Again, a heroine rescued the helpless male victim.

WILLIAM GILLETTE'S (1853–1937) SECRET SERVICE (1896) was a sturdy Civil War story about a spy who must choose between his mission and his love for a woman. However, one of the most famous Civil War melodramas was SHENANDOAH by BRONSON HOWARD (1842–1908). Written in 1873, it languished until 1888, rescued from oblivion by Charles Frohman. It contained a scene of an advancing army, including some horses, troupé endlessly by a mansion.

Along with William Gillette, DAVID BELASCO (1853–1931) exemplifies the “high road” in melodrama. Belasco was one of the pioneers of electric stage lighting. The brighter stage eliminated the need for broad acting and the use of asides since the stage could be seen clearly from all parts of the house, eliminating any need to “coach” the audience. THE GIRL OF THE GOLDEN WEST (1905) was famous for its attention to the detail of a mining camp. It was also known for a very understated scene where the sheriff discovers the hero's hiding place from drops of blood from the hero's wound landing on the sheriff's handkerchief.

Owen Davis (1874–1956) depended on spectacle and thrill for his dramatics. This style of writing was popular in the era from the 1890s to the late 1910s; its name is “blood and thunder” melodrama. Although Davis later switched over to writing standard dramas, he was a prolific writer of melodrama. One of his most famous plays is Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model (1907). Nellie triumphed over the villain in the fourth act despite dropping down an elevator shaft, suffering an explosion, and dropping off a bridge in prior acts. His Through the Breakers (1899) contained a very subdued thrill scene. The hero, a telegrapher, tied up under the covers of a bed by a villain determined to kill him, is apparently helpless. The hero's partner, not knowing about his captive comrade, is about to leave the hut, which would allow the villain to carry out the murderous plan. However, the hero manages to extricate one hand and tap a message in Morse code on the headboard of the bed. The partner, hearing the message, captures the villain and saves his friend.

GENRES

While there are many types of melodramas, it is difficult to categorize them into concrete genres. Some books on melodrama do this in infinitesimal detail, while others use few categories. They can sometimes be found listed by general locale, example, Western, Railroad, Big City, Military. Sometimes they are broken into smaller groups such as Military being broken into Cavalry, Infantry, Shipboard, and so on. It is more useful to place a play in a larger group that gives a general idea of topic of the play. The genres listed here were likely to show up in most listings and mainly describe plays for the American stage, unless otherwise noted. Each topic is listed with a brief description and some example titles.

MYSTERY MELODRAMAS

Mystery melodramas are plays that contained some form of crime and punishment or detection. These include William Gillette's Sherlock Holmes (1898) and Bernard Vieller's The Trial of Mary Dugan (1927).

CAUSE CÉLÈBRE MELODRAMAS

Cause célèbre plays derived their story line from actual criminal cases that were current. Edward Fitzball's Jonathan Bradford, or the Murder at the Roadside Inn (1823) is a prime example of this type. Sometimes the cases were not fully decided when the plays received presentation. Supposedly, in one such case, the protagonist received a last-minute reprieve on Monday, Wednesday, Friday, and alternating matinees. He went to his fate on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday, and alternating matinees.

REFORM MELODRAMAS

Reform melodramas plays addressed topics that affected values or morals. Ten Nights in a Barroom (William Pratt, 1847) and The Drunkard (William Smith, 1844) sermonized on temperance matters. Such plays afforded the person playing the lead with a meaty role since the delirium tremens scenes allowed for extremely broad histrionics. On the other hand, George Aiken's 1852 dramatization of Uncle Tom's Cabin (in its antebellum form) spoke against slavery. Later additions such as dances and songs that exhibited the talents of the players entered the production; not all of them were directly relevant to the story line, however.

BIG CITY MELODRAMAS

The big city melodrama style was shared by the English and American stage. It spoke of the attendant evils involved with living in a seemingly corrupt metropolis. The protagonist of George R. Sims's Lights o' London is forced to live on the streets of London with his wife, while he is pursued by a villain who seeks to have him imprisoned on false charges. The female protagonist of Augustin Daly's Under the Gaslight has lost her social position and must fend for herself in New York while trying to thwart the designs of the villain to exploit her virtue.

HISTORICAL MELODRAMAS

Historical melodramas derive from actual events in American history. Major André (1903) and Nathan Hale (1898) are about figures from the American Revolution. Both of these plays are by CLYDE FITCH. While the action in some plays occurred with a historical event in the background, like Bronson Howard's Shenandoah, the historical melodrama's action received full or partial basis in real people and real events.

SOCIAL MELODRAMA

Social melodrama plays sometimes became satires on certain behaviors others dealt with dramatically. A playwright who wrote in this mode was George Broadhurst (1866–1952). His 1911 play Bought and Paid For dealt with a man who felt his money entitled him to treat everything like a possession, including his wife. Bronson Howard's 1887 play The Henrietta also commented on a family's obsession with money but in a more humorous way. In the end the most successful member of the family was the ne'er-do-well who made money in the stock market by treating it like a huge gambling game.

NAUTICAL MELODRAMA

Nautical melodrama was unique to the English stage because of its maritime position in the world. Black Eyed Susan (Douglas Jerrold, 1829) is one of the most famous of this group. The title character is the wife of the hero. He must risk his life in order to protect her virtue from his own captain.

WESTERN MELODRAMA

Western melodrama was unique to America. Its topics dealt with both the frontier and with the West of contemporary times. David Belasco's The Girl of the Golden West was set in a mining camp of the gold rush era. The heroine's love interest was a highway robber, whom she protected from the sheriff.

Frank Murdock's play Davy Crockett was far more fantastic in its exploits.

FANTASY MELODRAMA

Fantasy melodrama plays had imaginative settings that departed from the real world or from our own culture. The Yellow Jacket (1912) by George C. Hazleton and J. H. Benrimo traced the journey of a young man to attain the yellow jacket of the emperor of CHINA. It contained elements of Chinese theater including an onstage property master. While this play portrayed elements from East Asian culture, racial stereotypes mar the play. An earlier fantasy play is Louisa Medina's Last Days of Pompeii (1835). This is set in the ancient Roman city of Pompeii before the volcanic eruption that destroyed it. The protagonists must fight evil powers; however, the volcanic destruction renders everything moot. Plays of this style where the hero's fight against a supernatural power results in Pyrrhic victory were in vogue before the Civil War. Some authorities refer to them as apocalyptic melodramas.

CASTS

The casts of a typical melodrama consisted of stock characters. These include leading men and ladies, heavies, juvenile men and ingenues, comics and soubrettes, characters, and utility players. While the parts of leading man and lady are the same as today, the use of "juvenile" parts has faded into obscurity. These terms referred to roles assumed to be younger adults. Sometimes the juvenile man or the juvenile lady (many times called the ingenue) was the main character; more often, these players acted in support to the leads. (Many stories abound in theater lore about the companies that had juveniles that were almost twice the normal age of a juvenile.)

What is more important to realize about the cast is that they represented virtues or vices. The play was not about the personal sufferings of an individual; it was about the triumph of the virtuous over the evil. Characters in a melodrama were not three-dimensional. Instead, they were "cardboard cutout" portrayals of attributes of good and evil.

CONCLUSION

Melodrama owed its staying power to its ability to deliver a just answer in a perfect world to an inhabitant of a world that seemed unjust or strange. Pixérécourt flourished in the era that followed the Terror in postrevolutionary France. The people of this era had seen their culture transformed in a way that bewildered them. Social structures and values that were once familiar to them changed in ways they did not completely understand. The world of the melodrama, however, offered a catharsis. Here was a world where honesty and virtue triumphed over a clearly defined evil, providing solace to a person living in an age of turmoil. One can find analogies among other eras where melodrama was the theatrical vogue. There was great turmoil in England during the time when French melodrama received translation for the English stage. Parliament underwent a restructuring during this time, and the romantic movement arose in England as well as Europe, which had an effect on the culture.

America was also undergoing upheaval. By the late 1820s the old order of government passed away under the onslaught of Jacksonian democracy. Heroic and apocalyptic melodrama were the order of the day. As the tensions that led to the Civil War grew, melodrama transformed into moral and temperance plays. After the Civil War, other genres rose into place. Sometimes the plays reflected an arcane worldview such as Thomas Dixon's novel made into the play The Klansman.

Heading toward the fin de siècle from the Civil War, America passed through two major panics and the beginning of the progressive reform movement, which introduced radical (for the time) changes in our society. The old order again transformed, but as the 20th century loomed, changes in theater as well as society began to stir. The American audience matured; consequently, the fare major theaters began offering tended toward the growing REALISM movement. Plays now appeared without happy conclusions; in fact, the endings were not even very tidy. Melodrama tramped on in the form of the "blood and thunder" melodrama, but the venues for that form started to recede.

Many factors contributed to melodrama's loss of ascendancy on the American stage. One of the factors often mentioned is the rise of realism as the dominant standard. While this is not ignorable, it is not the only reason for melodrama's demise. Melodrama, itself, contained the seeds of its own destruction in its increasing need for spectacle as a part of the performance. It became more difficult for stage designers and builders to provide continually increasingly complex effects. The new medium of the film lent itself very neatly to this, however. In addition, film also allowed even more complicated spectacles, which were not possible on the stage.

Boucicault's The Octoroon contains a plot device that made its way into a silent film. The Yankee character Scudder is experimenting with a camera. The film plates of this camera also contain chemicals that cause them to develop themselves after exposure. When the villain, M'Closkey, commits murder in order to steal the letter of credit that can free Zoë (the heroine) from being sold at auction, he stands in front of the camera, not noticing it. He does not know of its activation. This sets the stage for the later revelation, provided by the developed plate, that M'Closkey is the real murderer. This device was later used in Buster Keaton's movie The Cameraman, when the testimony of the villain was disproved by footage from a movie camera accidentally activated.

It was not just the ability of film to deliver spectacle and sensation that caused melodrama's decline; costs of production played a major factor. At the turn of the 20th century, many railroads offered traveling theater troupes special rates for transporting the shows as a way of generating business. As nontheatrical business increased, railroads began to raise rates. Further, nationalization of the railroads during World War I gave priority to war essential freight, which traveling shows were not. Many theater managers learned that the freight on a few cans of film was significantly less than the freight on a theatrical production.

Cost was also a factor with audiences. Tickets for theatrical productions began to rise. Good seats could cost a patron a dollar or two or higher. Most film tickets cost five cents or ten cents, instead.

The melodrama faded away from major venues, replaced by realistic drama, vaudeville, or films. It drifted into circle-stock companies and tent shows. There it enjoyed popularity until the Depression took its toll of those companies. As the minor companies succumbed to financial problems, the "blood and thunder" melodramas transformed into amusing anachronisms. Although its heyday is over, the theater and film still borrow heavily from melodrama's binary "good and bad" world and the use of spectacle.

FURTHER READING

- Booth, Michael. English Melodrama. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1965.
 Disher, Wilson M. Blood and Thunder: Mid-Victorian Melodrama and Its Origins. London: Frederick Mueller, 1949.
 ———. Melodrama: Plots that Thrilled. London: Rockliff, 1954.
 Rahill, Frank. The World of Melodrama. State Park: Pennsylvania State Univ. Press, 1967.
 Vardall, Nicholas A. Stage to Screen. Cambridge: Harvard Univ. Press, 1949.

John M. Bell

MEMOIR

Taking place over the course of a single sweltering Mediterranean afternoon in August 1922, Memoir is playwright JOHN MURRELL's ode both to French actress Sarah Bernhardt and to the enduring and self-deceiving qualities of memory.

At seventy-seven, Bernhardt—la voix d'or (the Golden Voice), the Divine Sarah—the most famous and best-loved actress of her day, finds herself facing only death and obscurity, her life and experiences lost to the crowds. As such, she is busy reworking the second volume of her memoirs, dictating her larger-than-life stories, memories, and adventures to her private secretary and confidante Georges Pitou.

Together in her final few hours, these two relive Bernhardt's past, acting out scenes from Bernhardt's life. We encounter the actress as a shy, frightened child shipped off to a convent, as the wife of a wealthy Greek playboy, as a world-renowned actress called upon by kings.

While Bernhardt never gives up the "starring" role in these memory plays, Pitou gradually begins taking on the role of pivotal figures in the actress's life—he becomes her courtesan mother Judith; Bernhardt's sister, favored daughter Jeanne; the promoter who first brings the actress to the stage, William Jarret; her beloved drug addict womanizing husband, Jacques Damala; and even OSCAR WILDE, whose special affection for Bernhardt was a source of tremendous pride for the aging heroine.

The melancholy and sometimes whimsical voice of memory in the piece is underscored by the way Bernhardt gradually loses herself in the past. As the fragile sanctuary she has created out of her memories welcomes her home, Bernhardt leaves behind the present reality, finally becoming one with her own memoir.

Murrell's first play, Memoir also cemented his place as one of CANADA's preeminent playwrights and earned him a reputation as a writer of lyrical and intellectual sensibilities.

The playwright's decision to frame the piece as a reconstruction of events—acted out and embodied with Bernhardt at center stage and Pitou serving as straight man and foil—rather than as a reliving, adds a dramatic weight to what might otherwise play out as mere device. Instead of coming across as the wandering, bewildered memories of a dying diva, Bernhardt's monologues are bittersweet prose poems: evocative, tender, and rose-colored fragments of a life onstage. Through Pitou, the audience sees how forced are the perspective of these memories, and so are confronted by the inherent fragility and unreliability of all recollection.

The piece initially won first prize in a playwriting competition at the University of Regina, Saskatchewan, in 1976, leading to a full production at the 1977 Guelph Spring Festival in Ontario. Celebrated Irish actress Siobhan McKenna played Bernhardt to Gerald Parkes's Pitou; their acclaimed performances brought the piece to a British tour and an eventual French translation. The Paris production at the Théâtre de l'Oeuvre, starring Georges Wilson and Delphine Seyrig, ran for three years.

Memoir's tremendous success led to a position for Murrell at Canada's famous Stratford Festival and a continuing close association with then-artistic director Robin Phillips.

FURTHER READING

Bernhardt, Sarah. The Art of the Theatre. Tr. by H. J. Stenning. 1924.

Reprint, New York: Blom, 1969.

———. My Double Life: The Memoirs of Sarah Bernhardt. Tr. by Victoria Tietze Larson. 1907. Reprint, New York: Blom, 1977.

Roberts, Mary Louise. Disruptive Acts: The New Woman in Fin-de-Siècle France. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 2002.

Salmon, Eric, ed. Bernhardt and the Theatre of Her Time. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.

Daniel Goldberg

THE MEMORANDUM

VÁCLAV HAVEL began to write The Memorandum (Vyrozumění) in 1960, shortly after his two years of military service, but the play was not produced until July 25, 1965, at the Theatre on the Balustrade, under the direction of Jan Grossman, the artistic head of the theater. In the meantime, Havel had gained experience by working with two major Czech artists (Jan Werich and Alfred Radok) in other theaters, had joined the Balustrade theatre company, written some short sketches for them, and had his first full-length play produced by them in 1963, The Garden Party (Zahradní slavnost), which was directed by Otomar Krejča.

The Memorandum takes the techniques and themes of The Garden Party to a new, more complex level. A nameless bureaucratic institution becomes the only site of action, the characters acquire more psychological facets, and the action is more elaborately structured. Havel's fascination with the use and abuse of language as a determinant of character and action, a system of signs that becomes more significant than reality, is embodied here in the introduction of a nonsensical artificial language, ptydepe. Ostensibly, it is a superior, more scientific language for interoffice communications precisely because it is purged of the emotive imprecisions of human speech; actually, it is a means of gaining power by way of a bizarre series of tactics and manipulations. Grotesquely difficult to learn, it is briefly discarded in favor of traditional language, only to be reconstituted as a new, even more impenetrable language—chorukor. Given the sociopolitical climate of the mid-1960s in CZECHOSLOVAKIA, ptydepe or chorukor could be taken as a metaphor for Marxist-Leninist cant and jargon, but Havel more likely intended it as a symptom of a universal problem: the dehumanization and mechanization of humanity in a postindustrial, cybernetic world.

Speaking in general of his plays, Havel in the 1980s said, "There is a little of the puppet show in them, something of the animated machine." The remark is exemplified in The Memorandum not only in some of the comically repetitious behavior of the characters but also in the schematic plot structure, which consists of a cycle of three scenes (each played in a different setting) repeated four times. The action moves through a variety of trivial and major reversals of the main character, Josef Gross, from a position of seeming power to one of thorough humiliation and back again, though his final position is that of an impotent figurehead.

Seemingly a concerned, reasonable person, Gross is an archetypal Havel figure in his instinctual tendency to admit his defeats and flaws but rationalize them in eloquent speeches that seem honest, humble self-critiques but are actually smoke screens masking utter failures of nerve or will. In Gross's case, it is difficult to tell the extent to which such speeches are consciously self-serving or inadvertently self-deceptive. The other characters are deftly differentiated sketches of bureaucratic types, whose habitual behavior patterns precisely capture the mentality and tone of their era and time in Prague, as well as office life universally.

FURTHER READING

Goetz-Stankiewicz, Marketa. The Silenced Theatre: Czech

Playwrights Without a Stage. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1979.

Trensky, Paul I. Czech Drama Since World War II. White Plains, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1978.

Jarka M. Burian

MEN IN WHITE

Written in three months, SIDNEY KINGSLEY's first play was optioned several times over three years before the two-year-old GROUP THEATRE joined with a pair of independent producers to premiere it on Broadway on September 26, 1933. A paean to the medical profession and the dedication required of its practitioners, the play ran for 357 performances, won the Pulitzer Prize, and received a barrage of enthusiastic critical praise.

Kingsley originally called the play Crisis; it was retitled toward the end of the Group's intense rehearsals at a summer camp in upstate New York. The new name properly shifted attention from the specifics of Kingsley's rather mechanical plot to the inherent heroism of the doctors, interns, and nurses who populate it. While the large-cast play is rife with social and physical details of the big-city hospital in which it is set, its particulars ultimately coalesce into a canvas of almost mythic dimensions.

The plot revolves around a senior physician and researcher, Dr. Hochberg, and his protégé, Dr. George Ferguson. Ferguson is both caring and brilliant, and Hochberg thinks that with another half-dozen years of work and study he could become truly outstanding. But Ferguson's fiancée, Laura Hudson, chafes at George's long hours and threatens to end their relationship if he does not give up his dream and open a comfortable private practice.

Torn between his calling and his desire for an everyday life, Ferguson tentatively accepts a cynically offered administrative post, in return for which Laura's unscrupulous father will bail the hospital out of its financial difficulties. The young man also has a one-night affair with a sympathetic nurse. The play climaxes after Laura learns of the affair when the nurse, having had a botched back-alley abortion of George's unborn child, is brought to the emergency room and dies. George vows to continue his studies, and Laura ultimately accepts his dedication, though their future together is unclear.

Even those few critics unenthusiastic about the play were enthralled by the production directed by Lee Strasberg. Men in White was the young Group's first popular success (ironically so, because many Group members had at first considered the play too conventional to produce); and reviewers applauded the precision ensemble of the acting, notably in the balletic, largely silent emergency-room scene.

Writing in the New York Times, Brooks Atkinson expressed the prevailing critical view: Men in White was "a good, brave play," reflecting "the theatre fully aware of its varied arts" (Beckerman, 1973). John Mason Brown of the Evening Post led the naysayers, calling the work "mildewed in its hokum" (Bailey, 1981). Brown's view is not hard to understand: Laura's party-girl selfishness and naïveté are badly overdrawn, and several smaller figures (including Laura's father and two contrasting doctors, a pompous quack and a once-promising failure) are barely sketched in. Still, the play's passion, its atmospheric verisimilitude, and its courage in tackling the subject of back-alley abortion decades before Roe v. Wade are all admirable.

After winning the Pulitzer, awarded when the Pulitzer advisory committee overruled the recommendation of its critics jury that the prize go to MAXWELL ANDERSON's Mary of Scotland, Men in White was made into a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie in 1934, with Clark Gable as Ferguson.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

Bailey, Paul M. "Sidney Kingsley." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Volume 7: Twentieth Century Dramatists, ed. by John Mac Nicholas. Detroit: Gale Research, 1981.

Beckerman, Bernard, and Howard Siegman. On Stage: Selected Theatre Reviews from the New York Times, 1920–1970. New York: Arno Press, 1973.

Clurman, Harold. The Fervent Years. New York: Hill & Wang, 1957.

Couch, Nena, ed. Sidney Kingsley: Five Prizewinning Plays. Columbus: Ohio State Univ. Press, 1995.

Smith, Wendy. Real Life Drama: The Group Theatre and America, 1931–1940. New York: Knopf, 1990.

Clifford A. Ridley

MES YATS V DEREVNYE See A MONTH IN THE COUNTRY

MEXICO

Prior to 1860, theater in Mexico was basically limited to ZARZUELAS (operettas) and género chico plays (one-act musicals) imported from FRANCE and SPAIN. However, romantic full-length plays by Victor Hugo (1802–1885), Alexander Dumas (1802–1870), JOSÉ ECHEGARAY (1832–1916), and Duque de Rivas (1791–1865) were also common fare. The only Mexican playwright of the romantic period was Manuel Eduardo de Gorostiza (1789–1851) whose famous satire about the naïveté of youth, Through Hell and Highwater for You (Contigo pan y cebolla, 1832), captured the attention of all audiences.

From the mid to the late 19th century, theater was produced primarily for commercial reasons and continued to lack autochthony, as was evident in the expectation that actors use a Spanish Castilian accent in order to be hired. While Echegaray's ROMANTICISM was the main influence on the poet and dramatist Manuel José Othón (1888–1906), HENRIK IBSEN's realist drama inspired Federico Gamboa (1864–1939). In addition, the Spanish zarzuela was imitated with great success by José F. Elizondo (1880–1943), whose Chin-Chun-Chan (1904) reached a thousand continuous performances.

Mexican theater does not come of age until the late 1920s. Before then, as Kirsten Nigro (1994) has remarked, the dictatorial government of Porfirio Díaz (who governed Mexico from 1876 to 1910) provided little encouragement for local talent. Moreover, the Revolution, which lasted from 1910 to 1920, interrupted almost all theater activity. The main topics of plays performed after the war predictably concerned political events related to the Mexican Revolution. Popular theater consisted of vaudeville-type plays known as teatro de carpa (tent shows) or teatro de revista (reviews). They were musicals with melodramatic or satiric scenes, which were principally concerned with ridiculing some politician of the period. In 1923, however, seven young men, Carlos Noriega Hope, Víctor Manuel Díez Barroso, Francisco Monterde, José Joaquín Gamboa, Ricardo Parada León, and the Lozano García brothers founded the Unión de Autores Dramáticos. They organized theater conferences and dramatic readings. In 1926 they issued a newsletter urging the public to stop attending the current mediocre spectacles and instead support the new up-and-coming Mexican writers.

The Unión de Autores Dramáticos helped to pave the road for theatrical groups such as Teatro de Ulises, Teatro de Orientación, and Escolares de Teatro. The first two have garnered more attention from U.S. academic circles because of the participation of writers associated with the literary group Contemporáneos. Salvador Novo (1904–1974) and Xavier Villaurrutia (1903–1950) were two of its members who founded Teatro de Ulises in 1928. Other major players included actresses Isabel Corona and Clementina Otero. With financial backing from Antonieta Rivas Mercado (1900–1931)—whose legendary life and infamous suicide at Notre Dame Cathedral Antonio Saura recreates in his film Antonieta (1982)—Teatro de Ulises is credited with giving rise to AVANT-GARDE theater in Mexico. According to Julio Jiménez Rueda, playwright and theatrical promoter, the purpose of Teatro de Ulises was to build a small experimental theater where amateur actors would put on the best European plays available for an exclusive audience. They performed plays by EUGENE O'NEILL (1888–1953), JEAN COCTEAU (1889–1963), HENRI-RENÉ LENORMAND (1882–1951), and others, but their selective audiences were not enough to sustain the project for more than two years. Outsiders accused the group of supporting foreign exoticisms and of turning their back on national realities.

In 1931, Escolares de Teatro, founded by Julio Bracho, succeeded Teatro de Ulises with a similar avant-garde project. One of its most memorable performances was Proteo, an experimental piece by Francisco Monterde. Teatro Orientación, directed by Celestino Gorostiza (1904–1967), was the last of the series of avant-garde theater groups. It continued to perform translated versions of plays by O'Neill, Cocteau, ANTON CHEKHOV (1860–1904), Molière (1622–1673), William Shakespeare, J. M. SYNGE (1871–1909), GEORGE BERNARD SHAW (1856–1950), and Nikolai V. Gogol (1809–1852) during its two short runs from 1932 until 1934 and from 1938 to 1939. The main translators were Villaurrutia, Gorostiza, Novo, and Augustín Lazo (1898–1971). During the fourth season, Teatro de Orientación performed plays by Latin American writers. These included The Boat (El barco) by Carlos Díaz Dufóo Jr. and Cruel Ifigenia (Ifigenia cruel) by Alfonso Reyes as well as nationalist plays on the Mexican Revolution by Mauricio Magdaleno and Juan Bustillo Oro.

In the 1930s, then, with Celestino Gorostiza and Xavier Villaurrutia at the helm, Mexican theater exhibited interests parallel to those of the surrealists, to ANTONIN ARTAUD's theoretical model, and to LUIGI PIRANDELLO's concept of the relativity of time. According to Ray Williams (1981), the mental processes related to dreams as well as the conscious and the subconscious fascinated Gorostiza. Twenty years later, however, Gorostiza turned toward a theater that is more concerned with social issues.

While Villaurrutia was also mesmerized by the psychology of the individual, he preferred to communicate concepts. Instead of representing social reality, he was more interested in asking, "What is reality?" Between 1933 and 1937 he published five one-act plays under the title Profane Morality Plays (Autos profanos), which Antonio Moreno considers "ingenious plays of dramatic rhetoric" (Luzuriaga, 1975). His most anthologized plays—and therefore the ones with which U.S. audiences are most familiar—include Invitation to Death (Invitación a la muerte, written in 1940 and performed in 1947) as well as two one-act pieces: It Seems a Lie (Parece mentira, 1933) and What Are You Think? (En qué piensas, 1934). These two plays are about the relativity of time and about the different and unusual perspectives through which life is viewed. Moreover, he situates the characters in surrealistic situations that only seem possible in someone's mind. At the same time that these cosmopolitan writers and artists were putting on their experimental plays, other groups opened the Teatro Murciélagos and the Teatro de Ahora with the intention of representing realist national plays with a political content. They were not as concerned with aesthetics and innovation as they were with social reform. Unlike the avant-garde artists, these groups had public support and continued to perform their plays well into the 1940s and 1950s (Nigro, 1994).

The major representative of realist theater writing at the same time was RODOLFO USIGLI (1905–1979), whose play The Impostor (El gesticulador, written in 1938 and performed in 1947) is required reading in most, if not all, Spanish programs. His play represents the hypocrisy of a postrevolutionary Mexican society. Usigli is also famous for the CORONA TRILOGY. These "antihistorical plays," as he called them, include Crown of Shadow (Corona de sombra, 1943), Crown of Fire (Corona de fuego, 1960), and Crown of Light (Corona de luz, 1963). The first, and best known, depicts the life of Carlota Amalia (1840–1927), the wife of the archduke of Austria Fernando Maximiliano (1832–67), who was sent by Napoleon Bonaparte to rule Mexico after the French Invasion of 1863. While their reign was short-lived (it lasted only from 1864 until 1867); she outlived him sixty years. And it is precisely the obscurity of these years that Usigli captures in his play.

At the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, Usigli taught the works of playwrights who also influenced his own plays such as George Bernard Shaw, Eugene O'Neill, ARTHUR MILLER (1915–2005), and TENNESSEE WILLIAMS (1911–1983). Students of his who went on to become accomplished playwrights include Emilio Carballido, LUISA JOSEFINA HERNÁNDEZ, Jorge Ibargüengoitia, Sergio Magaña, and Héctor Mendoza.

Even though critics usually say that Usigli worked in isolation and never belonged to any literary groups, he did know some of the Contemporáneos. Apparently, between 1935 and 1936, he shared an apartment in New Haven with Villaurrutia when they both received Rockefeller fellowships to study dramatic art and comparative literature at Yale University. Critics attribute Usigli the honor of being the first playwright associated with great theater in Mexico. New groups that appeared after Ulises and Orientación include José de J. Aceves's, Proa Grupo; La Linterna Mágica, directed by Ignacio Retes; Teatro del Arte Moderno, by Jebert Darién and Lola Bravo; Teatro Estudiantil Autónomo, by Xavier Rojas; and later Teatro de la Reforma, under the direction of Seki Sano and Luz Alba.

The government's creation of the Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes (INBA) in 1946 contributed to the reform of theater as it took charge of combining the dispersed theater organizations and of incorporating Children's Theatre and the School of Drama. It also put theatrical groups from the city and the provinces in contact with each other and organized important theater festivals and well-run theater seasons. Perhaps due to the impulse of the Institute, new theaters begin to open in 1949.

In the 1950s three prominent writers—ELENA GARRO, Octavio Paz, and Juan José Arreola—started a project called Poesía en Voz Alta. The idea was to make poetic theater, but it never produced more than a few works. Rapaccini's Daughter (La hija de Rapaccini, 1954 or 1956) by Paz is one example. Artists Leonora Carrington and Juan Soriano were also involved in the project.

Critics agree that it is not until the 1960s that Mexican theater broke with traditional Aristotelian theater. This new theater is considered fragmented, rebellious, and even aggressive. External influences are primarily theoretical, especially those of BERTOLT BRECHT (1898–1956), ERWIN PISCATOR (1895–1966), Antonin Artaud (1896–1948), and PETER WEISS (1916–1982). However, critics such as Juan Villegas warn against focusing exclusively on these Western categories because they too easily dismiss the cultural contexts of the plays (Adler, 1999). Some of the playwrights associated with this period are Hugo Argüelles, Luis G. Basurto, Wilberto Cantón, Emilio Carballido, Marcela del Río, Juan García Ponce, Marissa Garrido, Elena Garro, Luisa Josefina Hernández, Jorge Ibargüengoitia, Federico S. Inclán, Vicente Leñero, Sergio Magaña, Hector Mendoza, Rafael Solana, Margarita Urueta, and Maruxa Vilalta.

In addition to the numerous playwrights, the 1960s also produced new dramatic scenes, new theaters, a new audience, and the crowning of creative directors such as Gorostiza, Novo, Xavier Rojas, Fernando Wagner, Seki Sano, Ignacio Retes, and Charles Rooner.

While all of the above are accomplished writers, the one whose name resonates most loudly in theatrical circles is undoubtedly Emilio Carballido. His extensive theatrical production is so varied that it is almost impossible to classify. It covers FARCE, classical TRAGEDY, COMEDY, realistic pieces, conventional theater, surrealist, feminist, and others. His themes range from psychological REALISM to fantasy, and he criticizes the deadening effect of society on the individual. His plays have been translated into many languages and presented all over the world, primarily in Western Europe and throughout Latin America but also in China and some Eastern European countries. The first time his feminist play A Rose of Two Scents (Rosa de dos aromas, 1986) appeared on the stage in Mexico City, it had a four-year run of uninterrupted performances.

The 1970s produced what Ronald Burgess (1991) calls the nueva dramaturgia (new dramatic arts), and it includes playwrights such as SABINA BERMAN, Víctor Hugo Rascón Banda, Pilar Campesino, Carlos Olmos, and Oscar Liera. This generation began to publish their plays between 1967 and 1985. A playwright not included in this generation is Carmen Boullosa, whose plays represent a vital contribution to feminist drama. The playwright who has had by far the most commercial and academic success is Sabina Berman. Her 1992 play Between Villa and a Naked Woman (Entre Villa y una mujer desnuda) was on stage for two consecutive years, and her most recent Molière (2000) and Happy New Century, Doktor Freud (Feliz nuevo siglo, doktor Freud, 2001) also received wide acclaim.

The 1980s and 1990s brought to the Mexican theatrical scene performance theater, which, according to Beatriz Rizk (2000), is the staging of the performer's personal position on life, art, and society with the intention to bring about social change. One of Mexico's most celebrated performance artists is JESUSA RODRÍGUEZ, who dramatizes her commitment to politics and social change through bodily expressions, technological innovations, and political satire, in her own theatrical space El Hábito and the Teatro la Capilla, which was originally conceived by Salvador Novo in 1954.

FURTHER READING

Adler, Heidryn, and Kati Röttger, eds. Performance, Pathos,

Política—de los sexos [Performance, Pathos, Policy—of the sexes].

Madrid: Iberoamericana 1999.

Burgess, Ronald. The New Dramatists of Mexico 1967–1985. Lexington: Univ. Press of Kentucky, 1991.

Costantino, Roselyn. "Visibility as Strategy: Jesusa Rodríguez's Body in Play." In Corpus Delecti: Performance Art of the Americas, ed. by Coco Fusco. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Luzuriaga, Gerardo, and Richard Reeve. Los clásicos del teatro hispanoamericano [The classics of Hispano-American theater]. Mexico City: FCE, 1975.

Nigro, Kirsten. "Twentieth-Century Theater." In Mexican Literature: A History, ed. by David William Foster. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1994. 212–242.

Rizk, Beatriz J. "El arte del performance y la subversión de las reglas del juego en el discurso de la mujer" [The art of performance and the rules of the game in women's discourse]. Latin American Theatre Review 33, no. 2 (Spring 2000): 93–111.

Williams, Ray L. Teatro del Siglo XX [Theater of the 20th century]. Madrid: La Muralla, 1981. <http://www.faculty.ucr.edu/~williarl/LatinTheater.htm>.

Woodyard, George, ed. The Modern Stage in Latin America: Six Plays. New York: Dutton, 1971.

Margarita Vargas

ME XIHC CO TEATRO (MXTEATRO)

Me xihc co Teatro (MxTeatro) is a collaborative of multidisciplinary artists, based in Mexico City, whose artistic mission is the manifestation and expression of the ritual art of theater. The company takes its name from the Nahuatl word for "MEXICO": Me (luna/moon) xihc (ombiligo/navel) co (lugar/place), roughly translated as "the site of the navel of the moon." Founded in 1991 by theater artists MARÍA MORETT and Alvaro Hegewisch, Me xihc co's critically acclaimed productions, all of which are written or adapted by Morett, include The Weeping Woman (La Llorona, 1991), Mozart and the Elves (Mozart y los Duendes, 1994), Death (Muerte, 1995), Alarconeando (1998), QUIJOTES: Wandering Visions (QUIJOTES: Visiones itinerantes, 1998), Crossings: Meeting of the Millennium (Cruces: Encuentro de milenio, 1999), Women in Confinement (Mujeres en el encierro, 2001), and More Labyrinths (Más Laberintos, 2003).

The company readily acknowledges its aesthetic debt to the rich tradition of street theater in Latin America. In addition to performing in indoor and outdoor spaces designed specifically for theater, Me xihc co seeks out alternative performance environments such as prisons, parks, plazas, and streets and inaugurates them as theatrical spaces. Company members also participate in educational and community-based programs such as "Theater in Prisons," presenting plays and conducting theater workshops for inmates throughout Mexico.

Death tells the story of three undocumented immigrants, Andres, el Coyote, and el Mojado, who attempt to cross the Mexico–U.S. border in search of a better life but instead meet up with death. The play chronicles the day-to-day struggle of the Mexican people via songs, memories, danzón and lucha libre. At the same time, Death addresses the artist's passionate relationship with death and the acts of ritual and reverence in the face of its great mystery. As the play unfolds, the dead rise up and remember the living, but in doing so, they must cross over to "the other side." They must die in order to be born and be born in order to die. Death is presented onstage as a doorway, a passage to freedom, punishment, or simply departure.

QUIJOTES is a traveling street theater piece designed to be performed over the course of several days in a variety of open-air spaces. It premiered at the 1998 Festival Internacional Cervantino and was performed over the duration of the festival in the streets, plazas, and passageways of Guanajuato. Written by Morett (with poetry by Miguel de Cervantes, Nobel Prize winner José Saramago, Antonio Machado, and others), QUIJOTES is composed of several short "visions" incorporating music, puppetry, and circus techniques such as clowning, juggling, and stilt-walking: an old, tired-out Quijote; a female spear-bearing Quijote on horseback; a Christ-like Quijote, atoning for the end of the world; a blind, lost Quijote guided by the pudgy, ambitious Sancho; an acrobat Quijote, standing on the brink of danger yet filled with hope. The piece, whose visual style is inspired by the paintings of Francisco Goya, Pablo Picasso, and Salvador Dalí, offers a "moveable feast" of images that are at once humorous, grotesque, stately, and lyrical.

Me xihc co's most recent project is More Labyrinths, a site-specific theater piece inspired by the texts and images of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Remedios Varo, and Rosario Castellanos. Written and directed by Morett, with sets and costumes by Morett, lighting by Alvaro Hegewisch, and original music by Pablo Flores, More Labyrinths opened in October 2003 at the Festival Internacional Cervantino in a co-production with the Instituto Estatal de la Cultura de Guanajuato.

Me xihc co Teatro has toured extensively throughout Latin America, the UNITED STATES, and Europe, appearing at major international arts festivals and collaborating with such international theater artists as MARIA IRENE FORNES, MIGDALIA CRUZ, Ellen Stewart, Peter Schumann, Santiago García, Daniele Finzi, Jordan Simmons, and Cordelia Dvůrák. Since 1998, Me xihc co has been committed to developing binational, bilingual collaborative projects aimed at creating site-specific theater pieces in various Mexican and U.S. cities. This long-term endeavor, whose working title is "Festival Itinerante de Teatro en Espacios Alternativos / Itinerant Site-Specific Theater Festival," involves theater artists from Mexico and the United States, in collaboration with individuals from the participating communities.

Paradoxically, it has been more difficult for Me xihc co Teatro to present its work in Mexico City than throughout the rest of Mexico and abroad. While the Mexican government provides subsidies for large public events such as concerts and parades, financial support for site-specific theater is virtually nonexistent. Morett and Hegewisch admit that their audiences present challenges, as well. They have not purchased tickets, nor have they entered into the tacit agreement, or convention, of silently watching and listening to the performers. They are free to come and go as they please, and talk as loudly as they wish, unless the performance wins over their attention and respect.

Me xihc co Teatro not only accepts but is exhilarated by these challenges. For Morett, her work as a theater artist entails not only an aesthetic and social quest but also the “conquest” of unconventional spaces. Hegewisch emphasizes that street theater allows for the possibility of creating intimacy in public spaces, of sharing these spaces with audiences who have come to the theater “exactly how they are,” without the need for an intellectual or cultural pose. In this manner, Me xihc co seeks to touch, challenge, and transform its audiences, many of whom have never before experienced live theater, infusing street theater with passion and the highest level of aesthetic commitment, complexity, and quality.

FURTHER READING

Cruz Barcenás, Arturo. “Para desarrollar el teatro de calle, los artistas deben ‘aprender el lenguaje de los lobos’” [In order for street theater to develop, the artists must “learn the language of the wolves”]. La Jornada (October 21, 2003).

Itzcovich, Mabel. “Se puede bailar con la muerte” [It is possible to dance with death]. Clarín (March 8, 2001).

Léon Peña-Villa, Ricardo. “De Amor y Teatro. Interview with María Morett and Alvaro Hegewisch.” El Diario/La Prensa (September 1, 2000): 35.

Lipfert, David. Revenue of Muerte and Cruces, by María Morett. CurtainUp (October 29, 2002). <http://www.curtainup.com/fringe2000.html>.

Deborah Saivetz

MEYERHOLD, VSEVOLOD (1874–1940)

One of the world’s greatest and most innovative theater directors, Vsevolod Meyerhold elaborated an AVANT-GARDE poetics of theater that evolved from his early THEATER OF THE GROTESQUE into constructivist theater and finally into the radical October in Theater movement of the early Soviet era. His belief in pure theatricality, as reified in such purely theatrical practices as biomechanics (a theory of acting that privileges the body over the psyche), was combined with a strong sense of the need to bring theater to the forefront of social consciousness.

Born on February 9 (January 28), 1874, in Penza, Meyerhold began as an actor at the newly formed MOSCOW ART THEATRE of Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko and KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY. Meyerhold quickly distinguished himself, and his performance as Treplev in ANTON CHEKHOV’s THE SEAGULL propelled a signature Stanislavsky production. Eventually Meyerhold broke with Stanislavsky over the latter’s extreme naturalistic approach and later outlined his own credo of pure theatricality in essays such as “The Naturalistic Theater and the Theater of Mood” (1906) and “A Puppet Show” (1912).

When an invitation to become a shareholder in the Art Theatre was not forthcoming in 1902, Meyerhold took advantage of this fortuitous setback and began his directing career. He proved to be an effective advocate of contemporary European drama. Even though his production of MAURICE MAETERLINCK’s The Death of Tintagiles and GERHART HAUPTMANN’s Schluck and Jau did not open at Stanislavsky’s personally funded Studio Theater, Meyerhold was nonetheless instrumental in introducing not only HENRIK IBSEN and AUGUST STRINDBERG but FRANK WEDEKIND, Maeterlinck, Hauptmann, KNUT HAMSUN, HUGO VON HOFMANNSTHAL, and STANISLAWA PRZYBYSCZEWSKA to Russian audiences.

However, Meyerhold’s approach crystallized in his productions of the Russian symbolist dramas of ALEKSANDR BLOK, Fyodor Sologub, and their kindred spirit LEONID ANDREEV at the Komissarzhevskaja Theater. His enthusiasm for poetic drama continued through his years as head of the St. Petersburg Imperial opera and drama theaters. Both under and outside the auspices of the Imperial Theaters, Meyerhold staged a great deal more poetic drama, including works by Konstantin Balmont, GABRIELE D’ANNUNZIO, Mikhail Lermontov, and Sologub. It was also at this time in his Meyerhold Studio production of Blok’s A PUPPET SHOW and The Unknown Woman that the director first worked out the basic tenets of constructivist theater.

As radical in his politics as in his aesthetics, Meyerhold answered the call of the cultural commissar, ANATOLI LUNACHARSKY, for artists to rally round the Bolshevik flag after the October Revolution. To celebrate the revolution’s first anniversary, Meyerhold staged “the first Soviet play,” VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY’s MYSTERY-BOUFFE, and later contributed to the civil war struggle with radical reworkings of Emile Verhaeren’s The Dawns (1920), Marcel Martinet / SERGEI TRETYAKOV’s World Rampant (1923) and Ilja Erenburg / Jonathan Kellerman’s D.E.I. (Give Us Europe!) (1924). As self-styled “author of the production” and in response to the Party’s demand for REALISM and respect for bourgeois tradition, Meyerhold virtually rewrote classic plays from RUSSIA’s past such as ALEKSANDR OSTROVSKY’s THE FOREST (1924), Nikolai Gogol’s The Inspector General (1926), and Aleksandr Griboedov’s Woe from Wit (dubbed Woe to Wit by Meyerhold, 1928) for productions that established his reputation as one of the greatest directors of the 20th century.

Meyerhold continued to collaborate closely on the writing and staging of new, often satirical plays by writers such as NIKOLAI ERDMAN, YURI OLESHA, SERGEI TRETYAKOV, Aleksei Faiko, Vsevolod Vishnevskii, and Ilia Selvinskii. For example, Erdman’s The Warrant (1925) and Faiko’s Bubus the Teacher (1925) satirized the renaissance of a new bourgeoisie. After Joseph Stalin’s seizure of power, criticism of society became “anti-Soviet,” but Meyerhold went further and tested the limits in his productions of Mayakovsky’s THE BEDBUG (1928) and THE BATHHOUSE (1930). Meyerhold remained undeterred and sought to stage socially critical plays such as Erdman’s THE SUICIDE (1932) and Tretyakov’s I Want a Baby (1927–1930), which were banned before reaching the stage. Nevertheless, he did succeed in staging Olesha’s A List of Assets (1931), which boldly debated the pros and cons of Soviet power. At the same time he collaborated with Soviet dramatists on plays about the Civil War, Selvinskii's The Second Army Commander (1929), and about a potential fascist threat to the Soviet Union, Vishnevskii's The Last Decisive (1931), which flaunted Meyerhold's genuine communist credentials in the face of the false ones endorsed by the powers that be.

This conflict came to a head in 1934 with the promulgation of SOCIALIST REALISM as official artistic doctrine, reinforced by rigorous theatrical censorship. Anything vaguely nonrealist was now dubbed "formalist" and, hence, anti-Soviet. At a time when everyone else was writing and staging plays about the Five-Year Plan, Meyerhold's decision to stage a "bourgeois" play, Alexandre DUMAS FILS's The Lady of the Camellias (1934), bordered on the suicidal. Under pressure, he sought to rectify matters by staging an ultra-Soviet play based on Nikolai Ostrovskii's novel How the Steel Was Tempered (1937). By this time, however, it was too late. His theater was closed, he was arrested in the summer of 1939, arraigned on trumped-up charges, tortured, and executed in prison on February 2, 1940, in Moscow.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union, Russian Symbolist Drama]

FURTHER READING

Braun, Edward. Meyerhold: A Revolution in Theatre. 2d ed. London: Methuen, 1995.

Gladkov, Aleksandr. Meyerhold Speaks, Meyerhold Rehearses. Tr. and ed. by Alma Law. London: Harwood, 1997.

Hoover, Marjorie L. Meyerhold: The Art of Conscious Theater. Amherst: Univ. of Massachusetts Press, 1974.

Leach, Robert. Vsevolod Meyerhold. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1989.

Meyerhold, Vsevolod. Meyerhold on Theatre. Tr. and ed., with a critical commentary, by Edward Braun. Rev. ed. London: Methuen, 1991.

Rudnitsky, Konstantin. Meyerhold the Director. Tr. by George Petrov and ed. by Sydney Schultze. Ann Arbor: Ardis, 1981.

Schmidt, Paul. Meyerhold at Work. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1980.

Timothy C. Westphalen

MID-CHANNEL

Drama critic William Archer, who championed HENRIK IBSEN and urged British playwrights to deal with serious subjects in their plays, generously praised the social drama Mid-Channel by ARTHUR PINERO, which opened on September 3, 1909, at St. James's Theatre, London. The play tells the story of Zoe Blundell, whose marriage to the bullying stockbroker Theodore Blundell is unravelling and who spends time in the company of men she calls her "tame robins." The play takes place in London and is set in the drawing room of the Blundell household and, five months later, in this same room, in the sitting room of Theodore's apartment, and in the apartment of Leonard Ferris, a younger man who is one of Zoe's admirers.

Zoe has grown tired of her husband of fourteen years, whom she chides for his "elderly ways." After an argument, she travels to ITALY, where she commits the faux pas of writing to Ferris and inviting him to join her in Florence, an indiscretion she hopes will arouse her husband's jealousy. After Zoe's return to London, it looks for a time as though the couple will reconcile. But Theodore is unable to condone his wife's infidelity even though she has forgiven him for the affair he engaged in while she was away. Like Paula Tanqueray in THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY, Pinero's most critically acclaimed play, Zoe commits suicide once she realizes that Ferris (who, at Zoe's urging, has gotten engaged) is not in a position to marry her and that her husband will not take her back.

The play's title refers metaphorically to the rough spots in the "mid-channel" of married life that the well-meaning but meddling Peter Mottram, a mutual friend, compares to the shoals that travelers encounter mid-English Channel between Folkestone and Boulogne. Certainly, the storm that can shake a marriage in midlife is one of the themes the play explores. Pinero's real concern, though, is with the hypocrisy of the sexual double standard that looks the other way at the infidelity of husbands but casts adulterous women aside. Pinero also explores the selfishness at the heart of the marital troubles between Zoe and Theodore—and, by extension, the selfishness and barrenness of middle-class life society—although Zoe's attribution of the couple's problems to their decision to remain childless has a false ring to it.

Despite Archer's praise, Mid-Channel ran for less than two months in London and was greeted with mixed reviews, both in ENGLAND and, early the following year, in the UNITED STATES. While it was considered to be technically masterful, many critics found the characters to be "brutish" and "vulgar," "unpleasant human beings" whom it was impossible to care about. Appraisal of the play itself ranged from "gloomy" and "sordid" to an acknowledgment that Mid-Channel was unpleasant but told the truth. The New York Daily Tribune called the play "a sermon" against the sins of society, while another reviewer hailed the play as "a relentless study of real life in the social borderlands" that always interested Pinero. Several reviewers found the play's ending unconvincing, insisting that straying women like Zoe did not have so few options that suicide would have seemed the only resolution to her predicament.

FURTHER READING

Dawick, John. Pinero: A Theatrical Life. Niwot: Univ. Press of Colorado, 1993.

Dunkel, Wilbur Dwight. Sir Arthur Pinero: A Critical Biography with Letters. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1941.

Elaine Brousseau

MIGHTON, JOHN (1957–)

John Mighton was born in Hamilton, Ontario, on October 2, 1957. Mighton is a two-time winner of the Dora Mavor Moore Award whose plays Possible Worlds and A Short History of Night won the Governor General's Literary Award for Drama in 1992. After taking up writing in 1987, Mighton wrote five plays over the next seven years while also pursuing a Ph.D. in mathematics from the University of Toronto. Mighton's interests in science are central to each of his plays. SCIENTIFIC AMERICANS (1987), for instance, explores the ethical dilemmas faced by weapons researchers at Los Alamos Laboratory, which produced the atom bomb. A Short History of Night (1989) is based on the life of Johannes Kepler and investigates the differences between contemporary scientific attitudes and those of Kepler's era. Possible Worlds (1988) enacts the same relationship between the same two characters as it plays itself out in different possible worlds, where "in one world I'm talking to you right now but your arm is a little to the left, in another you interested in that man over there with the glasses, in another you stood me up two days ago. (This philosophical investigation is based in chaos theory, which suggests that even very small events can have very large results so that there are possible worlds where events—perhaps because one might simply have situated his or her arm differently—played out radically different than they did in the world they are aware of.) While less focused specifically on science, Body and Soul (1994) examines the social forces that shape human desire, drawing a parallel between the extreme fetishization of necrophiliacs and the increasingly acceptable fixations of cybersex enthusiasts.

Even for a playwright, Mighton has had an eclectically successful career. Since 1995 Mighton's playwriting career, at least, has tapered off; his first play in nine years, Half Life, saw preliminary production in 2004. Meanwhile, his credentials in mathematics and playwriting attracted the attention of Matt Damon and Ben Affleck, who hired him to serve as a script consultant for Good Will Hunting (1997—which went on to win the Oscar for Best Original Screenplay), leading to his being cast in a minor role in the film.

He has recently published a bestselling book on tutoring children in mathematics, The Myth of Ability: Nurturing Mathematical Talent in Every Child (2004), and has started a foundation, JUMP (Junior Undiscovered Math Prodigies). JUMP is simultaneously committed to rejecting the myth that mathematical genius is a matter of genetic inheritance and to bringing the tutoring program that Mighton designed to inner-city children in order to break the cycle of ignorance and poverty. Ironically, his own play The Little Years (1995) (as well as Good Will Hunting) includes characters who excel at mathematics without any clear indication of the social environment that gave rise to their genius, leaving the reader to suppose that the gift was in their genes. As time passes it will be worth noting whether or not Mighton's later work serves as a rebuttal of his earlier attitude about the roots of scientific genius.

[See also Canada]

PLAYS: Scientific Americans (1987); Possible Worlds (1988); A Short History of Night (1989); Body and Soul (1994); The Little Years (1995); Half Life (2005)

FURTHER READING

"John Mighton." In Encyclopedia of Canadian Theatre. <http://www.canadiantheatre.com/dict.pl?term=Mighton%2C%20John>.

"John Mighton Wins $100,000 Theatre Prize." CBC Arts (October 25, 2005). http://www.cbc.ca/story/arts/national/2005/10/25/Arts/siminovitch_051025.html.

Stephenson, Jenn. "Metatheatre and Authentication through Metonymic Compression in John Mighton's Possible Worlds." Theatre Journal 58, no. 1 (March 2006): 73–93.

Daniel Jernigan

MIHURA, MIGUEL (1905–1977)

Regarded as one of SPAIN's greatest postwar playwrights, Miguel Mihura also distinguished himself as a comic writer, screenplay author, founder of La Ametralladora (1936–1939), and director of La Codorniz (1941–1944). Mihura renovated Spanish theater with his unconventional and irreverently humorous plays. His first and most important work, Three Top Hats (Tres sombreros de copa, 1932) anticipates the Theater of the Absurd with its irrational style. Because Mihura was unable to stage the play after first writing it, speculations abound regarding the repercussions of this work. His artistic influences include Ramón Gómez de la Serna, Jardiel Poncela, AVANT-GARDE movements, and cinema.

Mihura was born on July 21, 1905, in Madrid, Spain, and spent his childhood and youth in a theatrical atmosphere, as his father was an actor, author, and producer of plays. After Three Top Hats, Mihura co-wrote several plays such as Neither Poor Nor Rich, But All the Opposite (Ni pobre ni rico, sino todo lo contrario, 1939) with Tono and The Case of the Woman Assassin with Álvaro of the Church (El caso de la mujer asesinadita con Álvaro de la Iglesia, 1946). In part because of the controversial reactions aroused from the critics as well as the public, he decided to focus on writing screenplays, most notably the highly successful and popular film by Luís García Berlanga, Welcome Mr. Marshal (Bienvenido Mr. Marshal, 1952). In 1952 he returned to the theater, gradually moving away his avant-garde beginnings to more conventional and accessible plays.

As a playwright, Mihura's seminal moment came in 1952 when an amateur experimental theater company performed Three Top Hats. Amid critical acclaim and public praise, he was awarded the National Theatre Award for it. Three Top Hats tells the story of Dionisio, an average man who spends his last night as a bachelor in a small town hotel. That night he meets an actress from a musical company with whom he falls in love. Paula exposes him to a new world in which fantasy and reality are intertwined, causing Dionisio to question his own mundane and provincial life, which is devoid of fantasy and humor. Three Top Hats is innovative not only for its purely verbal humor, which is disorienting, non-conformist, arbitrary, and even surreal, but also for its almost revolutionary subversion of establishment values.

In 1953 Mihura began to produce solo works. His plays of this period can be classified as bourgeoisie COMEDIES, characterized by intrigue, and humor, although fairly distanced from his earlier innovative theater. He received two National Theatre Awards for My Adored Juan (Mi adorado Juan, 1956–1957) and Maribel and the Strange Family (Maribel y la extraña familia, 1959). In the latter, a prostitute named Maribel meets Marcelino in a bar. Marcelino, a country widow, has come to Madrid to find a more modern wife. A series of misunderstandings arise among Marcelino's mother and aunt and Maribel's cohorts. Maribel is enriched by police intrigue and overtones of mystery, elements that are also prevalent in The Case of the Woman Assassin and Syrup Peach (Melocotón en almíbar, 1958). In 1964, Mihura received the National Literary Award for Ninette and a Gentleman from Murcia (Ninette y un señor de Murcia), an almost reactionary work that mocks a Spanish political exile in Paris. He stopped writing in 1968 and died on October 28, 1977, in Madrid.

SELECT PLAYS: Three Top Hats (Tres sombreros de copa, 1932); Long Live the Impossible! (¡Viva lo imposible! 1939); Neither Poor Nor Rich, But All the Opposite (Ni pobre ni rico, sino todo lo contrario, 1939); The Case of the Woman Assassin (El caso de la mujer asesinada, 1946); The Case of the Wonderful Lady (El caso de la señora estupenda, 1953); To Average Light the Three (A media luz los tres, 1953); The Case of the Gentleman Dressed in Violet (El caso del señor vestido de violeta, 1954); Sublime Decision! (¡Sublime decisión! 1955); My Adored Juan (Mi adorado Juan, 1956); Carlota (1957); Syrup Peach (Melocotón en almíbar, 1958); Maribel and the Strange Family (Maribel y la extraña familia, 1959); The Villa of Madame Renard (El chalet de Madame Renard, 1961); The Entertainments (Las entretenidas, 1962); The Enchanting Dorotea (La bella Dorotea, 1963); Miracle in the López House (Milagro en casa de los López, 1964); Ninette and a Gentleman from Murcia (Ninette y un señor de Murcia, 1964); The Teapot (La tetera, 1965); Ninette (Modus of Paris) (Ninette (Modus de Paris), 1966); The Decent One (La decente, 1967); Only Love and the Moon Bring Fortune (Sólo el amor y la luna traen fortuna, 1968)

FURTHER READING

Ferreras, Juan Ignacio. El teatro en el siglo XX (desde 1939). [The theater in the 20th century (Since 1939)]. Madrid: Taurus, 1988.

McKay, Douglas. Miguel Mihura. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

Pedraza Jiménez, Felipe, and Milagros Rodríguez Cáceres. Manual de literatura española XIV. Posguerra: Dramaturgos y ensayistas. [Manual of Spanish literature XIV: Postwar period: Dramatists and essayists]. Pamplona: Cénit ediciones, 1995.

Esther Lomas-Sampedro

MILLAY, EDNA ST. VINCENT (1892–1950)

"It was unmistakably a youthful work, and very slight," Edna St. Vincent Millay wrote in her preface to the 1932 publication of The Princess Marries the Page, "but I thought it rather pretty." "Pretty" always counted with Millay. Effectively constructed, and worthy of its four productions, the play beguiled the senses with the exuberance of Millay's early poetry. A princess (portrayed onstage by Millay) conceals a page from her father, who knows him to be a spy, coyly managing the happy ending one would have wished for this flippantly perceptive poet.

Millay, who was born on February 22, 1892, in Rockland, Maine, was the winner of a Pulitzer Prize for her poetry in 1923, as well as a successful dramatist who, as the "beautiful young actress of the Provincetown theatre," enjoyed the free-swinging life of New York City's Greenwich Village during the 1920s. Millay called The Princess Marries the Page, completed while she was a student at Vassar College, class of 1917, "my earliest attempt at play-writing," perhaps forgetting her silly FARCE in rhyming iambic tetrameter titled Two Slatterns and a King (1916).

Before the Civil War in the United States, it was expected that serious drama be in verse, and most significant American playwrights adhered to convention. The rise of REALISM, however, virtually banished poetry from the theater, and only with a revival of poetic drama in Europe after 1900 did American poets find their works appreciated onstage. Millay's plays are a striking illustration of the resurgence of poetic drama following World War I, and before a coarsening of moral fibers among later-20th-century generations spawned indifference to subtlety in language, her singular efforts presaged the works of ARCHIBALD MACLEISH and Robert Lowell.

Millay's major dramatic achievement, Aria da Capo (1920), was "a bitterly ironic little fantasy," according to Alexander Woolcott in the New York Times (Dec 13, 1920), and "the most beautiful and most interesting play . . . in New York." Two simple shepherds interrupt the satirical snipings of Pierrot and Columbine to enact their pastoral scene, which, manipulated by Cothurnus, the Masque of Tragedy, ends with the shepherds killing each other. When the harlequin characters complain of the bodies, Cothurnus advises them to continue their farce: "The audience will forget." Reflecting the emotional atmosphere of Greenwich Village in the 1920s, Aria da Capo foreshadows Millay's later defiant poetry, from the impudence of "The Penitent" to the despair of "Justice Denied in Massachusetts."

The Lamp and the Bell (1921), a medieval TRAGEDY in five acts, presents the fate of two women—"a burning lamp" and "a silver bell." The King's Henchman, Millay's three-act adaptation of the Tristram and Isolde theme, with music by Deems Taylor, debuted at the Metropolitan in 1927. In her last play, Conversations at Midnight (1937), the philosophical ramblings of seven men are underscored by a bitter coda: "O Reason, O ill-starred! / Our single talent."

As Millay evolved from the searching nineteen-year-old who astounded the literary world with "Ressance" to the severe critic of human endeavor, she abandoned the drama. Her dreams were in poetry. Her life was a candle burning brightly—and briefly; she died, already old, on October 19, 1950, in Austerlitz, New York.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

PLAYS: Two Slatterns and a King (1916); The Princess Marries the Page (1917); Aria da Capo (1920); The Lamp and the Bell (1921); The King's Henchman (1927); Conversations at Midnight (1937)

FURTHER READING

Gould, Jean. The Poet and Her Book: A Biography of Millay. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1970.

Millford, Nancy. Savage Beauty: The Life of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: Random House, 2001.

Nierman, Judith. Millay: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977.

Walter J. Meserve

MILLER, ARTHUR (1915–2005)

When Arthur Miller's ALL MY SONS opened on Broadway in 1947, it was obvious that an important new dramatic talent was making his presence felt in the American theater. When DEATH OF A SALESMAN arrived two years later, it was clear that Miller, along with TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, was one of the two major playwrights of post-World War II drama. There have been detractors, of course, but he has remained a force in American letters for more than half a century. In the sixty-six years between 1936, when his undergraduate play No Villain (also known as They Too Arise) won the Hopwood Award at the University of Michigan, and 2002, when Resurrection Blues opened in Minneapolis, Minnesota, he wrote fifteen major plays and a great many one-acts. He also produced film scripts, radio plays, television dramas, libretti, a HENRIK IBSEN adaptation, long and short fiction, an autobiography, a children's book, a great many essays, speeches, and books of reportage (including three with his third wife, the photographer Inge Morath). During that time he lived through—and made dramatic use of—the Depression, World War II and all the wars that followed it, the Red Scare of the 1950s, the turbulence of the 1960s, and the growing and sometimes disturbing international power of the UNITED STATES. He also saw the structure of American theater change from Broadway-centered production to OFF- AND OFF-OFF-BROADWAY and a flourishing regional theater.

EARLY CAREER

Born on October 17, 1915, in New York City, Miller was the second son in an affluent family—his father, a handsome, barely literate, and very successful clothing manufacturer; his mother, a bright, culture-seeking woman, resentful of her arranged marriage but comfortable enough until her husband's business failed in 1929. At that time, the family moved from their fashionable apartment on the south edge of Harlem to Brooklyn into what in Timebends (1987) Miller called “this chicken coop of a house,” a description of a six-room building, presumably miniaturized by memory. His father shriveled into silence; his mother slipped into resentment. So they appear in Timebends, his mosaic of an autobiography. So, too, do they appear at a distance in plays like The American Clock (1979). The plays are full of pairs of brothers, ranging from affectionate to fatally antagonistic in the case of those ur-sibling rivals Cain and Abel, in The Creation of the World and Other Business (1972). Miller's comment on his too-perfect older brother in Timebends (“handsome, clean, and unspeakable in his rectitude”) suggests a family connection, which he both denies and confirms when he says of the quarrel-ing brothers in THE PRICE (1968): “The characters were not based on Kermit and me, we were far different from these two, but the magnetic underlying situation was deep in my bones.” Oddly enough, there are no sisters in the plays, although that may be because Miller's sister—the actress Joan Copeland—was seven years younger than he, not a central figure and relentless observer as he was of the family's struggles during the Depression that mark so many of his works.

On the other hand, all three of his wives find their way into his plays—notably in AFTER THE FALL (1964). There is nothing surprising in such biographical borrowings since most writers cannibalize their own lives and those of their lovers, spouses, family, and friends; but as a healthy corrective to the titillation of roman à clef, consider a New York Times double interview (November 16, 1980), when The American Clock was about to open in Washington, D.C., in which Miller and his sister (who played Rose Baum) quarreled amiably about what their mother was like until he called an end to the badinage with “She's a character in a play. This is not her biography.” Arthur Miller died at home in Roxbury, Connecticut, on February 10, 2005.

The important thing about Miller's use and transformation of his own life is that it gives him an emotional, familial base for the larger ideas about society that characterize his work. In “On Social Plays,” published as a preface to the 1955 edition of A VIEW FROM THE BRIDGE, as in a number of other theoretical essays written in the late 1940s and the 1950s, he indicated both his dissatisfaction with the subjective play so popular on Broadway at that time and his impatience with the traditional political play of the 1930s (“an arraignment of society's evils”). For him, the true social play was one that combined a man's social and subjective selves, the public and the private joining to form the whole man. All My Sons and Death of a Salesman, for instance, are both father-son conflicts, and both THE CRUCIBLE and A View from the Bridge are triangle plays, but the power and the substance of all four plays depends on the context in which these generic types are acted out.

Before Miller could get to these plays, which would come to define him as a playwright, he had to escape that “chicken coop” in Brooklyn and get into the capitalized “Outside World” he conjured in a 1955 essay for Holiday (“A Boy Grew in Brooklyn”). He graduated from high school in 1932 at about the time “[a]n invisible vise seemed to be forever closing tighter and tighter" (Miller, 2000). After two years of odd jobs, one in an auto-parts warehouse, memorialized in the one-act play A Memory of Two Mondays (1955), he was accepted at the University of Michigan, where he planned to study journalism. With the winning of his first Hopwood Award, he transferred to English and began to study playwriting under Kenneth T. Rowe, "teacher, friend, scholar," as the professor is called in the dedication to The Theater Essays of Arthur Miller (1978). In 1937 he won a second Hopwood for Honors at Dawn and just missed a third in 1938 with The Great Disobedience. None of these early plays has been published, but there were productions in Michigan of They Too Arise. With his student work behind him, he graduated in 1938 and returned to New York.

"Shrouding my secret dissociation from their untalented rank," Miller spent six months in the Federal Theatre Project (FTP) among playwrights, whose work, he says in Timebends, was "execrable, totally incompetent." Most of the time between his graduation and the end of World War II (he was rejected for service) was spent doing odd literary and nonliterary jobs. The most interesting and least reported was his writing of radio plays. The years of his involvement (1939–1946) was the end of a period of experimentation in the possibilities of radio drama, but Miller was no Norman Corwin, no Arch Oboler, no ARCHIBALD MACLEISH—men who saw radio drama as an artistic challenge. In Timebends, Miller dismisses the genre ("more like a form of yelling than writing"). "Still, it was an easy dollar," he says, establishing his credentials as a hack. He wrote for a number of shows—the respected Columbia Workshop, for instance, and Theatre Guild on the Air—but most of his scripts were written for DuPont's Cavalcade of America. The mediocrity of his radio plays, most of which have never been printed, few of which exist on tape, lies perhaps in the speed with which he worked and with the fact that, written in the years leading up to and during the war, they were expected to sound a patriotic note. There are three types: those based on historical figures (Benito Juárez, Giuseppe Garibaldi), those derived from magazine articles about service men and women ("I Was Married in Bataan"), and fictional stories of soldiers. He developed a reputation for efficiency but not for art.

The Golden Years, which might be called the last of his radio plays, was written in 1939 and 1940 and was not intended for radio. A ponderous account of Montezuma's failure to meet the invasion of Hernando Cortés—pockmarked with what Miller calls "purplish passages"—the play disappeared into Miller's trunk and remained unknown until it was resurrected almost fifty years later when BBC Radio gave it a premier performance in 1987. In the introduction to the published version of the play (1989), Miller says that it grew out of his "fear that in one form or another Fascism, with its intensely organized energies, might overwhelm the wayward and self-fixated Democracies" that led to the prewar appeasement of Adolf Hitler. In several of his radio plays—The Eagle's Nest (1942), the script about Garibaldi, and The Philippines Never Surrendered (1945)—there are people at first unwilling to face an impending enemy, but the time and the purpose of the plays make a change of heart inevitable. Montezuma's play came a little earlier and was less a call to arms than a warning about the consequences of inaction. It may have been a too elegant metaphor for contemporary "passivity and its risks," but it is obvious that Miller mainly wanted to create two strong men in inevitable conflict. Unfortunately, each rides his identifying trait so relentlessly that there is more repetition than growth in the characters.

In 1944 Miller was hired by Lester Cowan to visit army camps in search of material for a film script based on Ernie Pyle's wartime reporting. The result—his original script for The Story of GI Joe having been passed on to other writers—was his first published book, Situation Normal, a diary-essay that tried to understand what sent the soldiers to war. It is a characteristic Miller mix of careful observation and the kind of high-toned ideating that would give an ordinary soldier the willies: "It is terrible to me that everything is so personal; I mean that never in any of these calculations about the soldier can I honestly bring in the socio-political context of this war."

Also in 1944, in an event that had much more to do with Miller's career as a playwright, he had his first Broadway production—The Man Who Had All the Luck, which lasted for only four days. He would later tell Mel Gussow (2002) that the play was a nonrealistic play in a naturalistic theater climate: "It's a fable. I think that's what sunk it." Almost sixty years later (2002), the play made its way back to Broadway, where it did markedly better than it had in 1944, but it really belongs with his early work. David Beeves, the play's protagonist, accepts the town's view of his success—that it was all a matter of luck—and, assuming that luck must change, he almost brings disaster on himself and his family until his wife convinces him that a man makes his own luck. This is an early instance of a popular Miller theme, that man is in danger when he succumbs to society's image of him. The theme can be seen also in Miller's novel Focus (1945), another, darker fable. When the anti-Semitic Mr. Newman buys a new pair of glasses, his neighbors think that he looks Jewish, and after an increasingly violent series of events, he accepts, even embraces, the identity forced on him.

POSTWAR PLAYS AND POLITICS

Both David Beeves and Mr. Newman reach modified happy endings, the former by rejecting society's definition of his life, the latter by accepting it. In the postwar plays that made Miller's reputation, he returned to the theme with greater sophistication and with fatal consequences to his protagonists. In these plays, whether the characters accepted society's view of what a man should be (Joe Keller in All My Sons and Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman) or rejected it (John Proctor in The Crucible and Eddie Carbone in A View from the Bridge), they died of the consequences. In the introduction to Collected Plays

(1957), Miller wrote, "It is necessary, if one is to reflect reality, not only to depict why a man does what he does, or why he nearly didn't do it, but why he cannot simply walk away and say to hell with it."

All My Sons opened at the beginning of 1947, when a great many veterans—like Chris Keller in the play—were returning home with a modicum of idealism still intact. They assumed that the world they were returning to was something more than business as usual. For Joe, as he mistakenly says of his dead son Larry, the world "had a forty-foot front, it ended at the building line." A good father, a good husband, he wanted only to save his business to pass on to Chris and to do so was willing to ship out cracked cylinder heads to the air force and to let his business partner take the blame. "I'm his father and he's my son," Joe says, "and if there's something bigger than that I'll put a bullet in my head!" When he learns that for Chris (and the dead Larry) the world was not conterminous with the family ("But I think to him they were all my sons"), he commits suicide, destroying the image of the self-made businessman that defined his life.

All My Sons, the right play for the right moment, ran for 328 performances and garnered a handful of prizes. Its success gave Miller a chance to move to Connecticut and build the studio in which he wrote Death of a Salesman, which opened at the beginning of 1949. At the time there was a great deal of argument about whether or not the play was a TRAGEDY—theoretical maundering in which Miller took an active part—but audiences were largely indifferent to the scholarly imbroglio and not at all indifferent to the play itself. It was a remarkable success. It ran for 742 performances, won the Pulitzer Prize, and was performed in countries all over the world. It was even one of the few plays ever chosen by the Book-of-the-Month Club. It became a staple in the curriculum of schools and colleges and has become, with The Crucible, one of the most often produced of Miller's plays. The incredible thing is that a character as self-deluding, as lost, as defeated as Willy Loman should have been so widely embraced by playgoers. Miller does not go for pathos; he expects the audience to be moved by Willy, even to identify with him. He is a victim of the American success ethic, beset by conflicting images that feed his double ambition—to be rich and to be well liked. In the Requiem scene that closes the play, Biff says, "He had the wrong dreams." Joe Keller could see through his image just before he shot himself, but Willy goes to his suicide, his dreams still alive, although now not for himself but instead for his son who he assumes will have his "magnificence" when he gets the insurance money. With Salesman, Miller eschews the neatness and directness of All My Sons, substituting a richness that allows his characters in their comic and painful ways to lie to themselves and to the audience. He replaces the REALISM of the earlier play with a kind of homegrown expressionism that not only permits the viewer to pass through the walls but to see the swirling mixture of past and present, the real and the imagined in the disintegrating mind of Willy. The working title for the play was The Inside of His Head.

In 1974 in an article for New York magazine ("The Year It Came Apart"), Miller looked back at 1949, the year of the triumph of Salesman, and wrote, "An era can be said to end when its basic illusions are exhausted, and my oneness with the Broadway audience was among them." It was true that although his national and international reputation would continue to grow, he would never again have the immediate, electric connection with Broadway that he had when Sons and Salesman opened. The 1950s would prove to be a time of personal, political, and theatrical problems for him; yet it was the decade in which he wrote The Crucible, which, with Salesman, was destined to be one of his two most successful plays.

Miller first met Marilyn Monroe in 1950, when he and Elia Kazan, the director who had been an important part of his initial Broadway successes, were in Hollywood to negotiate the production of The Hook, a film about corruption on the New York waterfront. In 1956 he divorced Mary Slattery, his wife of sixteen years, and married Monroe, for a short, troubled, and heavily publicized marriage that ended in 1961, the year that the film he wrote for her, The Misfits, was released. Plans for The Hook fell through under political pressure; Miller's friendship with Kazan collapsed after the director appeared as a friendly witness before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in a ritual naming of names that the Committee already knew; and Miller had his own troubles with HUAC in 1956, before which he refused to talk about anyone but himself, a response that led to his conviction, later overturned, for contempt of Congress.

From early in the decade he responded to the political situation in prose pieces and in the theater. In 1950, he adapted HENRIK IBSEN'S AN ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE. The story of Dr. Stockmann and his lonely stand for truth had obvious relevance to the climate in which it was produced; and although Miller stuck close to the Ibsen original, the changes he made in some speeches emphasized the contemporary relevance of the piece. More a political gesture than a bid for solid Broadway success, it ran for only thirty-six performances. Three years later in The Crucible he found a much more potent analogy. In a lecture at Harvard in 1999, he said, "It would probably never have occurred to me to write a play about the Salem witch trials of 1692 had I not seen some astonishing correspondences with that calamity in the America of the late forties and early fifties" (Miller, 2000). The play was both praised and condemned for its use of the Salem witch trials to attack the investigations of presumed subversives and to show the mixed motives (greed, envy, righteousness) of those who cried "witch" or "Red." John Proctor almost embraces the prevailing atmosphere of Salem, but in the end—a romantic hero of sorts—he chooses death over a false confession. "How may I live without my name?"

Eddie Carbone runs to his death in A View from the Bridge, crying, "Now gimme my name." Driven by his undeclared passion for his niece, he betrays her boyfriend to the immigration service, thus violating the standards of his community, and—unlike Proctor who dies to save his sense of self—he dies in an impossible attempt to regain his identity. View, originally a one-act play, paired with A Memory of Two Mondays, opened on Broadway in 1955 and was rewritten in two acts for a London production in 1956. The play finally found its audience in 1965 in an off-Broadway production that ran for almost two years.

It was 1964 before Miller returned to the New York stage with two new plays—After the Fall and Incident at Vichy—for the newly formed Repertory Theatre of Lincoln Center. The two very different plays—an excessively long self-analysis full of autobiographical elements and a static work that resembles a roundtable discussion—have similar themes. The protagonists of both search for an understanding of themselves that will allow them to act—Quentin in Fall to commit himself to a third marriage, Von Berg in Vichy to die in place of another character. In the early plays the quest for identity, for name, was a search for integrity. In the new plays the quest has become an attempt to find a workable definition. In Fall, "The action takes place in the mind, thought, and memory of Quentin." The central confrontation is with Maggie, the figure based on Marilyn Monroe, who had died in 1962, but there are scenes (fragments really) with a querulous first wife, with a passive father and an accusatory mother, with old leftist friends whose quarrel over testifying indicates that the situation was more complicated than it seemed in the early 1950s. Fall marked Miller's reconciliation with Elia Kazan, who directed it. Quentin, trying to deal with his guilt in all these relationships, ends by generalizing the guilt, making it a murderous fact of human existence. In "Our Guilt for the World's Evil," an essay published in the New York Times Magazine shortly after Vichy opened, Miller (2000) suggested that Von Berg's martyrdom is gratuitous: "The first problem is not what to do about it, but to discover our own relationship to evil, its reflection of ourselves." The plays are long on argument, short on theatrical action.

One of the most interesting of the Miller plays of the 1960s was The Price, which was at once familiar and a happy surprise. Two brothers, both beset by the usual identity problems, meet to dispose of the family furniture. Victor is a policeman who thinks his life meaningless; Walter is a successful surgeon, who has come to distrust that success. They quarrel over who was or was not responsible for their current situations, and they talk until Victor accepts his life. This would be standard Miller if it were not for the character of Gregory Solomon, a ninety-year-old furniture dealer who not only voices the play's theme but embodies it. A wonderfully garrulous man, Solomon is the most successful comic character that Miller ever created.

In 1972 in The Creation of the World and Other Business, Miller turned with minimal success to the biblical family for his usual weak father, strong mother, and quarreling sons. They, like God and Lucifer, are comic caricatures, and the play is an unconvincing mix of situation-COMEDY routines, anachronistic jokes, and high-toned philosophical points. The play lasted for only twenty performances on Broadway, and Miller revised it two years later as the book for a musical, Up from Paradise, with composer Stanley Silverman. A change of genre did not save one of Miller's weakest plays.

Between 1965 and 1969 Miller served as president of International PEN and continued to work for beleaguered writers after he left office. In 1970 his plays were temporarily banned in the Soviet Union because of his work to free dissidents. It was presumably his activity on the international literary scene that led him to the unusual step of setting a contemporary play outside the United States, The Archbishop's Ceiling, which was first performed in Washington in 1977. Set in an unnamed Eastern European country, it concerns a group of writers in relation both to the constant government surveillance of their work and to a young woman who may be intended as a symbol as well as a person. The protagonist, a banned novelist, elects to stay in the country in the face of a possible charge of treason, while two of his friends, including a visiting American writer, take the risk of attempting to smuggle his newest work out of the country. Once again, the ideas and the arguments are more alive than the characters.

Home again and back once more in the 1930s, he wrote The American Clock, a panorama of the Depression. It consisted of brief scenes adapted from Studs Terkel's Hard Times and two plots involving the Baums, based on Miller's family and his own amorphous relationship to the American Left at the time. After a reading in Seattle in 1979 and a New York production the next year, the play went through many stages, ending finally and happily with Peter Wood's production in 1986 at the National Theatre in ENGLAND, which made fine use of period music. When that production was brought to the United States in 1988, Miller told interviewer Laslie Bennetts of the New York Times (July 14, 1988), "The spirit of the whole thing was far grayer on Broadway, but it was never intended that way; it was intended as a six-ring circus, which is what it is now. . . . On-stage it's a kind of vaudeville."

LATER WORK—1980S AND BEYOND

Beyond the recurrent reworkings of The American Clock, Miller in the 1980s produced his first play written specially for television, Playing for Time (1980), an adaptation of Fania Fenelon's account of a woman's orchestra in a concentration camp that performed to stay alive. He also produced two programs of one-act plays: Two-Way Mirror (originally 2 by A.M., 1982), consisting of Elegy for a Lady and Some Kind of Love Story, and Danger: Memory! (1987), made up of I Can't Remember Anything and Clara. He later reworked Some Kind of Love Story as a screenplay, turning a largely psychological play into a social satire film, Everybody Wins, which was released in 1990 and rapidly disappeared. In 1983, Miller directed Death of a Salesman at the People's Art Theater in Beijing, CHINA, and the next year published Salesman in Beijing, his account of the experience.

Although Miller's early work remained popular in the 1980s on American stages and—particularly The Crucible and Death of a Salesman—in American schools, his later work was not well received. Increasingly, he was performed and published in England. America's most famous playwright seemed almost to have become an English one. Perhaps that is why he chose to have The Ride Down Mount Morgan (1991) first performed in London. A play not destined to bring glory to either its author or the host country, it is the account of Lyman Felt, the most tedious, self-obsessed, guilt-ridden character in the Miller canon. After an accident, which may have been a suicide attempt, brings both his wives to his bedside, he attempts to justify, or at least define, his behavior ("I've lived my life and I refuse to be ashamed of it!"). He gets in and out of the body cast in which the audience first sees him to observe apparently real scenes or to take part in fantasy ones. A staging note in the published play advises, "The play veers from the farcical to the tragic and back again and should be performed all-out in both directions as the situation demands, without attempting to mitigate the extremes." If mildly eccentric behavior were FARCE and whining garrulity tragedy, which they are not, the note might make a sound point.

In 1993, The Last Yankee, expanded from a 1991 version but still a very short play, was performed without an intermission. It concerned two women in a state mental hospital visited by their husbands whose presence exacerbates their condition. Patricia is irritated at Leroy (the titular Yankee) because he will not compromise the quality of his work to increase his income but realizes after watching her fellow patient with her successful but disapproving husband that Leroy is not so bad. It offers a note of hope, but it is not much of a play.

Broken Glass (1994) takes place in 1938, the year of Kristallnacht, that carefully organized, spontaneous outbreak of anti-Semitic violence in Nazi GERMANY. Set in Brooklyn, the play concerns the Gellburgs, he an anti-Semitic Jew uneasy about his tenuous place in the largely gentile banking world, she a woman so upset about the news from abroad that it triggers in her hysterical paralysis and a reexamination of her life. The paralysis is presumably a metaphor for their marriage (he is impotent), and the action of the play harks back to early Miller plays as the two characters try to find their way through their self-delusion and mutual distrust, he to acceptance of his Jewishness just before his death, she—depending on which version of the play one sees—to an attempt to struggle to her feet.

Peter Falk, who played the titular hero of Mr. Peters' Connections (1998), told a New York Times (May 17, 1998) interviewer, "The whole play, and all these people, are in Peters's head." The character enters a derelict building that has been a bank, a restaurant, and a nightclub and may be an anteroom to death. Some of the characters with whom he tries and fails to have conversations are clearly dead; others are more ambiguous. All of them are talkative, but the play is essentially a rumination by Peters on the changes that have come to his life and his world as they have to the building.

Falk correctly said that Mr. Peters' Connections is a "very funny non-comedy" (id.), a remark that may provide an accidental bridge to Resurrection Blues (2002). Resurrection Blues could be called an unfunny comedy. In a publicity release (Wilma Theater, June 19, 2003), Miller said, "It's a satiric comedy—you're supposed to laugh. I have to explain that to people because when it's one of my plays, they forbid themselves to laugh." There are not many laugh-aloud lines or scenes, but the play does have a grandly grotesque conceit—comedy at its darkest. In an unnamed country in South or Central America where a civil war has been going on for thirty-eight years, a young revolutionary, whom the people take as the Messiah, has been captured and is to be crucified. An American advertising agency offers millions of dollars for exclusive rights to the crucifixion. The presence of the rebel—never more than a bright light—changes the lives of everyone involved, even curing the impotence of the chief of state. At the end, all the characters except the advertising executive—the revolutionary's friends, his former enemies, the other Americans who have come to film the event—declare their love for the man, but each for his own reason pleads with the rebel simply to disappear, to remain alive in the minds of the people. It is like the end of Saint Joan without the Shavian superstructure to support the final irony.

Henri, the millionaire pharmaceutical executive turned scholar and philosopher in Resurrection Blues, sees himself as trying to awaken into reality after having slept all his life "in a fog of ideas and a loveless river of words." Such a fog and such a river seem to engulf Miller's plays at their most abstract, but at their finest, the ideas and the words live comfortably with vital characters like Joe Keller, Willy Loman, and Gregory Solomon.

PLAYS: The Golden Years (1940); The Man Who Had All the Luck (1944); All My Sons (1947); Death of a Salesman (1949); An Enemy of the People (1950); The Crucible (1953); A Memory of Two Mondays (1955); A View from the Bridge (1955); After the Fall (1964); Incident at Vichy (1964); The Price (1968); The Creation of the World and Other Business (1972); The Archbishop's Ceiling (1977); The American Clock (1979); Playing for Time (1980); Two-Way Mirror (1982); Danger: Memory! (1987); The Ride Down Mount Morgan (1991); The Last Yankee (1993); Broken Glass (1994); Mr. Peters' Connections (1998); Resurrection Blues (2002)

FURTHER READING

Centola, Steven R., ed. The Achievement of Arthur Miller, New Essays.

Dallas, Tex.: Contemporary Res. Press, 1995.

Gussow, Mel. Conversations with Miller. New York: Applause, 2002.

- Martin, Robert A., ed. Arthur Miller, New Perspectives. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1982.
- Miller, Arthur. The Theater Essays of Arthur Miller. Ed. by Robert A. Martin. New York: Viking, 1978.
- . Timebends, a Life. New York: Grove, 1987.
- . Echoes Down the Corridor, Collected Essays, 1944–2000. Ed. by Steven R. Centola. New York: Viking, 2000.
- Rigsby, Christopher. Arthur Miller: A Critical Study. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2005.
- Siebold, Thomas, ed. Readings on Arthur Miller. San Diego: Greenhaven Press, 1997.
- Weales, Gerald. "Arthur Miller Takes the Air." American Drama 5 (Fall 1995): 1–15.

Gerald Weales

MILLER, JOAQUIN (1837–1913)

Born Cincinnatus Hiner Miller on September 8, 1837, on a farm near Liberty, Indiana, Joaquin Miller emigrated to Oregon in 1852 with his family, but in 1854, he left the family farm in Eugene City and traveled to the gold country of California. In 1856, he lived with Indians near Mount Shasta, and late in 1857, he studied briefly at Columbia College. He became a partner in a pony express service running between Idaho and Florence, Oregon, and in 1862 edited the pro-slavery Democrat-Register and the more literary Eugene City Review. He opened a law practice in Canyon City in 1863, and he served as a judge in Grant County from 1866 to 1869.

Miller published his first volume of poems, Specimens, in 1868. His fourth book, Sons of the Sierras, led to fame and success, and his narrative study Life Amongst the Modocs appeared in 1873. After living on the East Coast for several years, he moved to Oakland, California, and lived there from 1887 until his death on February 17, 1913.

Based on the story "The First Families of the Sierras," The Danites in the Sierras opened in New York on August 22, 1877. Written a full generation after the gold rush, Miller gave mature form to the Edenic myth of California, portraying it as a romantic haven. The hero of the play, goes a-courting:

Say you were waitin' for me, and it will be as if the sun, and the moon, and the stars all together shone out over the Sierras, and made this another Eden, with its one sweet woman in the centre of God's own garden of fruit and flowers.

The honest miners are simple children of the wild, beautiful land that nurtures, sustains, and guides them, while the Danites—avenging religious fanatics from Salt Lake City—are aliens who must be purged from the natural innocence they have invaded.

Forty-Nine (1881) focuses on an old miner who still dreams of striking a vein and filling his baby son's cradle with gold. A young gambler from Illinois heads for California to find a young woman who has inherited an estate in the Santa Clara Valley and who turns out to be a child of nature who hunts chipmunks with a bow and arrow.

Miller's plays recycle the stock characters and situations that BRET HARTE introduced to fiction and the stage: the hopeful old miner, the brash young gambler, the innocent young girl whose wholesome beauty blossoms in the high Sierra, and the villain who schemes to take both the heroine and others' hard-earned wealth. Miller's California is a paradise, an affirmation of hope and dreams where people thrive on honesty, simplicity, and hard work in the clear mountain air, and the repentant shed their sense of burden. They have walked away from the corrupt, complex East, where guile and polished manners prevail, and the long trek to California is the return to the garden, to the prelapsarian utopia of Western myth.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

PLAYS: The Danites in the Sierras (1877, with Alexander Fitzgerald); Forty-Nine: An Idyl Drama of the Sierras (1881); Tally-Ho (1883; unproduced); An Oregon Idyl (1910; unproduced)

FURTHER READING

- Frost, O. W. Joaquin Miller. New York: Twayne, 1967.
- Lawson, Benjamin S. Joaquin Miller. Boise: Boise State Univ. Press, 1980.
- Mayberry, M. Marion. Splendid Poseur: Joaquin Miller—American Poet. New York: Crowell, 1953.

Jeffrey D. Mason

MILNE, ALAN ALEXANDER (1882–1956)

Although Alan Alexander (A. A.) Milne is best known as the British author of the Winnie-the-Pooh stories, he was also a prolific writer in other genres, including drama. Among his works are four novels; four books of nonfiction; four collections of poetry; nine story collections; an autobiography called It's Too Late Now; and over twenty-five plays.

Milne was born in 1882 in SCOTLAND but raised in London, the son of a preparatory schoolmaster and his wife. Among the early influences on him was the author H. G. Wells, who was one of his childhood teachers and mentors. Educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Milne became editor of the literary magazine Granta during his undergraduate years. Several of his contributions were published in the humor magazine Punch, where he later became assistant editor. In 1913 Milne married Dorothy Daphne de Selincourt, and on August 21, 1920, in Chelsea, they had a son they named Christopher Robin. For his first birthday, the boy received an Alpha Farnell teddy bear purchased from Harrod's in London. Both Christopher and his toy would become well known all over the world when Milne's most famous book, Winnie-the-Pooh, was published on October 14, 1926. Milne's wife and son were the inspirations for his Winnie-the-Pooh stories, but he did not intentionally write the stories for children and claimed to have no special interest in young people. Although a pacifist, Milne served in the Warwickshire Regiment in FRANCE in World War I. He enjoyed success in all literary genres, particularly in the years between the world wars. His plays, in particular, have been almost completely overshadowed by the success of the Pooh books.

His play The Fourth Wall (1928) was made into a film called The Perfect Alibi. Before the success of the Pooh books, Milne's plays were performed widely and with great critical acclaim in Great Britain and the UNITED STATES. Today, professional productions of them are rare to nonexistent; however, Milne's plays are still produced in amateur theaters in the English-speaking world.

In 1952 Milne suffered brain damage as the result of surgery and lived the rest of his life as an invalid, reading and enjoying the country. He died in England on January 31, 1956, after a long illness.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

PLAYS: Worzel-Flummery (1917); Belinda (1918); The Boy Comes Home (1918); Make-Believe (1918); The Camberley Triangle (1919); Mr. Pim Passes By (1919); Mr. Red Feathers (1920); The Romantic Age (1920); The Stepmother (1920); The Truth About Blayds (1920); The Dover Road (1921); The Lucky One (1922); The Artist: A Duologue (1923); Give Me Yesterday (1923); The Great Boxopp Success (1923); Ariadne (1924); The Man in the Bowler Hat (1924); To Have the Honour (1924); Portrait of a Gentleman in Slippers (1926); Success: A Play in Three Acts (1926); Miss Marlow at Play (1927); The Fourth Wall or The Perfect Alibi (1928); The Ivory Door (1929); Toad of Toad Hall (1929); Michael and Mary (1930); Four Days Wonder (1933); Other People's Lives (1933); Miss Elizabeth Bennett (1936); Sarah Simple (1937); Gentleman Unknown (1938); The Ugly Duckling (1946); Before the Flood (1951)

FURTHER READING

Thwaite, Ann. A. A. Milne: His Life. London: Faber, 1992.
Wulschlager, Jackie. Inventing Wonderland: The Lives and Fantasies of Lewis Carroll, Edward Lear, J. M. Barrie, Kenneth Grahame and A. A. Milne. Detroit: Free Press, 1996.

Connie Ann Kirk

MILNER, ARTHUR (1950–)

Although many of Arthur Milner's plays have not been published, his dramas have been produced throughout Ontario, CANADA, for two decades. Born on July 3, 1950, and raised in Montreal, but living in Ottawa since 1971, Milner has written children's plays, including 1999's Crusader of the World, about Shelley, a girl who learns through tough experience about the realities of Third World deprivation. Other genres explored by Milner include the radio play (The City, 1991), the collective creation (Sandinista!), and the musical (Joan Henry, 2003).

Most of Milner's plays were produced by the left-wing Great Canadian Theatre Company (GCTC), Ottawa: he was the GCTC's resident playwright (1978–1991) and artistic director (1991–1995). Two of his plays, Masada (1990) and Learning to Live with Personal Growth (1987), both published in important anthologies of Canadian drama, illustrate the variety of Milner's dramatic styles and the seriousness of his plays' politics. Masada necessitates only one actor and sparse staging. The play was first performed by the GCTC in January 1990; directed by Steven Bush, Masada starred Sally Singal. The character delivers a hurriedly prepared lecture on "The Miracle of Zionism," begins by expressing distaste for counterproductive extremism, but eventually asserts hawkish thoughts that reveal an uncompromising desire for a further expansion of Jewish territory: "It's a nice feeling" to be "in charge" of Palestine, one that Jews should perpetuate, the speaker urges. Appropriating the methods of armies and terrorists is merely an extension of the tactics used by ancient Jews like Moses and the Zealots. The play underlines Milner's discomfort with political belligerence and critiques the racism and sectarianism that facilitates end-less killing.

While Masada has one long, continuous scene, 1987's four-character Learning to Live with Personal Growth has sixty-six short scenes, dramatizing the fragmentation of Jeff's social consciousness. Motivated, in part, to compensate for a lukewarm marriage, Jeff, gradually, becomes influenced and indeed corrupted by a shallow property investor, Link. Having spent much of his time seeking to help a tired, impoverished single mother, Ginny, Jeff winds up acquiescing in her eviction from a property that he and other investors sell for a handsome profit. By the end of the play, Jeff has given up his job as a social worker and states that poverty can be alleviated by market forces: society will heal, he insists, when taxes are lowered and private enterprise flourishes. Such attitudes, expressed so glibly by Jeff, are anathema to Milner, the GCTC, and its more politically serious audience members.

A onetime president of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatre, Milner continues to write for the stage prolifically, but he has also been involved in the administration and teaching of the arts. In addition to his work with GCTC, he worked as a DRAMATURG for the Banff Centre for the Arts, the Montreal Playwrights Workshop, and the Manitoba Association of Playwrights; he has also taught playwrighting and modern drama at the Universities of Carleton and Concordia. Presently, Milner is an editor of the journal Inroads, to which he contributes often controversial articles about culture and national and international politics.

PLAYS: Cheap Thrill (1985); Zero Hour (1986); Learning to Live with Personal Growth (1987); Masada (1990); The City (1991, radio play); It's Not a Country, It's Winter (1998, radio play); Crusader of the World (1999); The Forest (2001); Joan Henry (2003)

FURTHER READING

Filewood, Alan. "Introduction to Zero Hour by Arthur Milner." In The CTR Anthology: Fifteen Plays from Canadian Theatre Review, ed. by Alan Filewood. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1993. 435.

Henighan, Tom. Maclean's Companion to Canadian Arts and Culture.

Vancouver: Raincoast Bks., 2000.

Inroads: The Canadian Journal of Opinion. <http://www.inroadsjournal.ca>.

Athabasca University. "Arthur Milner." In Encyclopedia of Canadian Theatre. <http://www.canadiantheatre.com/dict.pl?term=Milner%2C%20Arthur>.

Kevin De Ornellas

MISHIMA YUKIO (1925–1970)

Mishima Yukio was a Japanese novelist and SHINGEKI playwright. Notorious for his ritual suicide in 1970 after failing to foment a military uprising, Mishima was JAPAN's leading dramatist of the 1950s and 1960s. His sixty-one works for stage and screen span a wide range of genres and styles. Although he mostly wrote realist shingeki plays, he also wrote six kabuki plays in classical Japanese; Mishima is also recognized as the finest postwar kabuki playwright.

As a youth, Mishima (born Hiraoka Kimitake) attended kabuki plays every month and the nō and shingeki occasionally, writing precocious critical essays about almost every play he saw. From nō and kabuki Mishima developed a love of formalism and of Japan's native tradition that would infuse much of his later theatrical writing. Mishima also admired classical European drama. His favorite play was Jean Racine's Phèdre, which he adapted to kabuki in 1955. The Oresteia and Heracles inspired two of his finest shingeki plays, The Tropical Tree (Nettaiju, 1959) and The Decline and Fall of the House of Suzaku (Suzaku Ke no Metsubo, 1967).

In 1950 Mishima's first "modern nō" play, Kantan, received critical acclaim at the prestigious Literary Theatre (Bungakuza). Mishima had written nine modern nō plays by 1962; many are regarded as his best one-acts. Thanks to early publication in English, these are the Japanese plays most frequently performed abroad. Mishima's nō plays take their plots from classical nō, but are psychological dramas of love and obsession set in contemporary Japan and intended by Mishima for performance in shingeki style.

In 1956 Mishima's three-act romantic MELODRAMA Roku-meikan, produced by the Literary Theatre, and starring the renowned actress Sugimura Haruko, was a huge success, touring Japan for three years. Mishima joined Bungakuza and wrote many successful plays for Sugimura until their bitter falling out in 1964, when he left the company.

Mishima's political and artistic ideals ran counter to the development of postwar Japanese drama. While other dramatists were moving away from traditional constraints toward freedom of expression and eclectic borrowing from various genres, Mishima remained committed to orthodox kabuki and shingeki plays. Virtually every other dramatist espoused leftist ideals, but Mishima, from the early 1960s, began to champion right-wing nationalist characters and themes. His break with Sugimura and Bungakuza resulted from their refusal to stage his anticommunist The Harp of Joy (Yorokobi no Koto, 1963–1964). After leaving Bungakuza, Mishima founded two new theater companies. Some of his best long plays he wrote for these companies, including MADAME DE SADE (Sado Kōshaku Fujin, 1965), considered his finest play.

In many of his plays Mishima sought to shock, disturb, or even outrage his audiences. His 1955 Primary Colors (Sangenshoku), which depicts bisexual men kissing, was not performed until 1963. In The Black Lizard (Kuro Tokage, 1962) Mishima's heroine kills and stuffs beautiful men and women for her museum; in Madame de Sade Mishima suggested that murder and depravity could be divine acts; in the modern nō play Yuya (1967), he argued that deceit makes life beautiful; in The Decline and Fall of the House of Suzaku he resurrected emperor worship; in My Friend Hitler (Waga Tomo no Hittora, 1969), he presented Adolf Hitler as a moderate, rational politician whose purges were justified. These were nightmarish themes for Japanese audiences, but Mishima gilded the horror and pain with gorgeous words, structural elegance, sumptuous sets and costumes, and acting by shingeki's best performers.

Half of Mishima's plays have been performed since his death, and many are presented regularly in theaters in Japan.

[See also Shin Kabuki]

PLAYS: (titles with asterisks were written for kabuki) The Burning House (Kataku, 1949); The Lighthouse (Todai, 1949); Kantan (1950); Sotoba Komachi (1952); *Hell Screen (Jigoku Hen, 1953); *The Sardine Seller's Net of Love (Iwashiuri Koi no Hikiami, 1954); *A Blush on the White Hibiscus Blossom: Lady Fuyo and the True Account of the Ouchi Clan (Fuyo no Tsuyu Ouchi Jikki, 1955); The Damask Drum (Aya no Tsuzumi, 1955); The Lady Aoi (Aoi no Ue, 1955); Rokumeikan (1956); Hanjo (1957); Steeplechase (Daishōgai, 1957); *Sash Stealing Pond (Musume Gonomi Obitori no Ike, 1958); The Tropical Tree (Nettaiju, 1959); The Black Lizard (Kuro Tokage, 1962); Primary Colors (Sangenshoku, 1963); The Harp of Joy (Yorokobi no Koto, 1963–1964); Yoroboshi: The Blind Young Man (Yoroboshi, 1964); Madame de Sade (Sado Kōshaku Fujin, 1965); The Decline and Fall of the House of Suzaku (Suzaku Ke no Metsubo, 1967); Yuya (1967); My Friend Hitler (Waga Tomo no Hittora, 1969); The Terrace of the Leper King (Raid no Terrasu, 1969); *A Wonder Tale: The Moonbow (Chinzetsu Yumiharizuki, 1969)

FURTHER READING

Domoto Masaaki. Gekijin Mishima Yukio [Yukio Mishima the dramatist]. Tokyo: Geki Shobo, 1994.

Mishima Yukio. Mishima on Stage: The Black Lizard and Other Masterpieces.

Tr. by Laurence Kominz. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 2001.

Wetmore, Kevin J. "Modern Japanese Drama in English." Asian Theatre Journal 23, no. 1 (Spring 2006): 179–205.

Laurence Kominz

MISS JULIE

Miss Julie (Fröken Julie) is "a naturalistic TRAGEDY" by AUGUST STRINDBERG. Written and published in 1888, it was first performed at the Student Society in Copenhagen in 1889 with Strindberg's wife Siri von Essen as Julie. The editor made a number of changes in the text without Strindberg's permission. It was not until 1984 that modern detection methods allowed the editor's changes to be distinguished from the author's, and the original text was restored. The play was written both for Antoine's Théâtre Libre and for the Scandinavian Experimental Theater Strindberg had just started.

Miss Julie deals with twenty-five-year-old Julie, the daughter of a count, who flirts with her father's valet Jean during the Midsummer Night celebration in the kitchen of the manor house. When the celebrating peasants approach, she and Jean escape to his room, where they have intercourse. Ashamed of having offered herself to someone of a lower station and imagining that she is in love with Jean, Julie agrees to his suggestion that they flee together to SWITZERLAND. But Jean, influenced by Kristin, the cook to whom he is engaged, changes his mind. When it is announced that the count, who has been away visiting friends, has returned, Julie feels trapped. She asks Jean to hypnotize her so that she can muster the courage to commit suicide; she exits, razor in hand.

Miss Julie was written at a manor house not far from Copenhagen, where the Strindbergs lived at the time. The estate belonged to Countess Louise de Frankenau, who was an unmarried eccentric. Everyone believed that her steward, Ludvig Hansen, was her lover. Strindberg, whose conjugal relations with his wife were at low ebb, once or twice made love to Hansen's sixteen-year-old sister Martha. As a result, Hansen tried to blackmail Strindberg by spreading rumors that his sister was pregnant. In the play, Strindberg merged some aspects of Ludvig and Martha Hansen into the figure of Jean. Julie's end was inspired by Swedish writer Victoria Benedictsson's suicide: on the night of July 21, 1888, she cut her throat with a razor at the Hotel Leopold in Copenhagen, following a previous suicide attempt that Strindberg had knowledge of. Like Julie, Benedictsson, who wrote under the male pseudonym Ernst Ahlgren, had been dressed as a boy as a child and taught to ride.

To meet the demands of ÉMILE ZOLA, who had found THE FATHER too abstract, Strindberg was anxious to turn Miss Julie into a truly naturalistic drama, which he did: hereditary and environmental circumstances reveal Jean's and Julie's past; the play illustrates the Darwinian survival of the fittest.

Strindberg's naturalistic ambitions did not prevent him from resorting to SYMBOLISM. The setting—a basement kitchen connected with the count's rooms up above via a speaking-tube serving as an intercom—is a telling image of class society. Two highly symbolic dreams—Jean's about rising, Julie's about falling—have social, sexual, and psychological significance. Jean's lust for life versus Julie's longing for death may even make us see the two characters as archetypal incarnations of forces within one and the same person. When Julie's thoroughbred dog Diana mates with the gatekeeper's mutt, this misalliance prepares for Julie's intercourse with Jean. And when Jean slaughters her caged greenfinch, his act anticipates his putting the lethal razor in Julie's hand. More cryptic is the symbolic meaning of Jean's story of how, as a child, he was once caught in the gentry's privy. This story, Evert Sprinchorn (1982) observes, becomes the paradigm for Julie's situation in the play itself. She is trapped in the servant's quarters, and also trapped by her own uncontrollable desires. Jean as a child had been forced to crawl through the excrement; now the trapped Julie begs Jean to "lift me out of this awful filth I'm sinking in."

In the play's original preface Strindberg gives numerous reasons for "Miss Julie's tragic fate":

her mother's "bad" instinct; her father's improper bringing-up of the girl; her own nature and the influence her fiancé's suggestions had on her weak, degenerate brain; also, and more immediately: the festive atmosphere of Midsummer Night; her father's absence; her period; her preoccupation with the animals; the intoxicating effect of the dance; the light summer night; the powerful aphrodisiac influence of the flowers; and finally chance that drives these two people together in a room apart, plus the boldness of the aroused man.

Despite this naturalistic list of hereditary and environmental circumstances, even some of Strindberg's contemporaries found the ending improbable. One of them was the Danish writer and critic Edvard Brandes, who protested: "You do not kill yourself, when there is no danger in sight, and here there is no danger. Perhaps five months from now but not this very night" (Törnqvist, 1988). Brandes refers to a visible pregnancy. The stage history of the play has shown that the more the class difference is accentuated, the more probable is Julie's sense of defiled honor, which in turn justifies the suicide. Yet stressing the class aspect means lessening the rapport with a present-day audience—except in countries where class barriers are still very pronounced. To make the final suicide acceptable from a naturalistic point of view, Strindberg had Jean hypnotize Julie. Yet to save the play as a tragedy, Julie had to choose her death consciously. Thus, by having her walk "resolutely out through the door," Strindberg vaguely suggests that at the end she comes out of her hypnosis.

The famous preface was written shortly after the play was finished. The most important manifesto of NATURALISM in the theater, it is not always trustworthy as a key to the play.

[See also Sweden]

FURTHER READING

- Bergholz, Harry. "Toward an Authentic Text of Strindberg's Fröken Julie." Orbis Litterarum 9 (1954): 167–192.
- Carlson, Harry G. Strindberg and the Poetry of Myth. Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1982.
- Karnick, Manfred. Rollenspiel und Welttheater [Role Play and World Theater]. München: Wilhelm Fink, 1980.
- Sprinchorn, Evert. Strindberg as Dramatist. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1982.

Törnqvist, Egil, and Barry Jacobs. Strindberg's Miss Julie: A Play and Its Transpositions. Norwich: Norvik Press, 1988.

Egil Törnqvist

MISS LULU BETT

ZONA GALE's Miss Lulu Bett began life as a bestselling short novel. Producer Brock Pemberton asked Gale to dramatize her novel, a feat she accomplished in a little more than a week. The play, subtitled "An American Comedy of Manners," opened at the Belmont Theatre in New York on December, 27, 1920, to mixed but generally positive reviews. Some critics considered it dull, while others agreed with New York World Charles Darnton who recognized that the playwright had captured small-town "people, their talk and manners perfectly." Miss Lulu Bett ran some 600 performances on Broadway and on tour, becoming the first play written by a woman to win the Pulitzer Prize. Paramount later turned Gale's COMEDY into a silent film.

Miss Lulu Bett is set in a small midwestern town. The title character is a spinster of thirty-three who does all the work for her sister Ina's querulous family. Lulu's chief nemesis is her brother-in-law Dwight Deacon, a petty tyrant who condescends to all around him. When Dwight's world-traveling brother Ninian arrives for a visit, he recognizes Lulu's plight, and the two are accidentally married in a ceremony that is intended as a joke but turns out to be valid.

Lulu returns to the Deacon home in act 2, announcing that Ninian has a previous wife who may not be dead. At the novel's conclusion, Lulu weds a new suitor, but Gale feared that theater audiences would not accept two marriages in one evening; the original dramatic version has Lulu departing alone with the declaration, "I thought I wanted somebody of my own. Well, maybe it was just myself." Shortly after the play opened, however, Gale capitulated to popular tastes and rewrote the conclusion again, reuniting Lulu with a widowed Ninian. Although Gale defended the new ending, she included both versions of act 3 when she published Miss Lulu Bett.

Gale was an outspoken advocate for women's rights, and Miss Lulu Bett reveals the plight of women in "Middle America." Lulu's mother is the sardonic Mrs. Bett, a widow who grudgingly accepts her dependence on the "jump" her daughter married. Young Diana tries to elope not because she is in love but to escape her father's sadistic teasing. In a adapts to her situation by enjoying her few wifely prerogatives and echoing her husband's platitudes. Like many single women of the period, Lulu works as an unpaid servant in a relative's home. Ninian does not rescue Lulu; rather, he shows her how capable and badly used she is.

Miss Lulu Bett is remarkable not only for its feminist perspective but also for its deviation from traditional dramatic characterization, structure, and dialogue. As writer Robert C. Benchley (1921) observes, Gale has avoided stock comic figures by giving us "an old lady who is not sweet, and a child who is not cute." The repetitive scenes and banal dialogue were unusual for the time but look forward to techniques that became popular onstage decades later. The success of recent productions of Miss Lulu Bett testifies to the enduring importance of its subject as well as Gale's dramatic skill.

[See also Feminist Drama in the United States; United States, 1860–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Barlow, Judith E. Introduction to Plays by American Women, 1900–1930. New York: Applause Bks., 1985 [volume includes Miss Lulu Bett].
- Benchley, Robert C. Foreword to Zona Gale's Miss Lulu Bett: An American Comedy of Manners. New York: Appleton, 1921.
- Derleth, August. Still Small Voice: The Biography of Zona Gale. New York: Appleton-Century, 1940.
- Schroeder, Patricia R. "Realism and Feminism in the Progressive Era." In The Cambridge Companion to American Women Playwrights, ed. by Brenda Murphy. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999. 31–46.
- Shafer, Yvonne. American Women Playwrights, 1900–1950. New York: P. Lang, 1995.
- Simonson, Harold P. Zona Gale. New York: Twayne, 1962.

Judith E. Barlow

MISTERIIA-BUFF See MYSTERY-BOUFFE

MISTERO See COMIC MYSTERY

MITCHELL, LANGDON (1862–1935)

Langdon Elwyn Mitchell was born on February 17, 1862, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He received his early education at St. Paul's School in New Hampshire, studied for three years in Dresden and Paris, and studied law at Columbia and Harvard universities. In 1886 he was admitted to the New York bar and later practiced law with the firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft of Philadelphia.

Despite his legal training, however, Mitchell's primary interest was writing. In 1883, while still at Harvard, Mitchell wrote and published poetry and drama, and in 1885, he published Sylvian and Other Poems under the pseudonym John Philip Varley, a step he took to avoid comparison with his father, S. Wier Mitchell, who was a novelist and a poet. Langdon debuted as a professional playwright in 1892 in London, where his play Deborah was performed five times at matinees. In that same year, Mitchell married actress Marion Lea, who had performed in productions of HENRIK IBSEN's dramas in London and would later play the role of Vida Phillimore in Mitchell's best-known play The New York Idea.

Mitchell came to the public's attention in the UNITED STATES in 1899 when he adapted William Makepeace Thackeray's Vanity Fair for the stage. Renamed Becky Sharp, the play, which was commissioned by the prominent actress Minnie Maddern Fiske, opened at New York's Fifth Avenue Theatre on September 12, 1899, and ran for nearly two seasons thereafter. Succeeding dramatizations—The Adventures of François (1900), an adaptation of his father's novel, and The Kreutzer Sonata (1906), which Mitchell adapted from Jacob Gordin's Yiddish rendition of a LYOV TOLSTOY novel—attracted considerably less attention. However, his next attempt, THE NEW YORK IDEA (1906), was both a critical and commercial success.

A brilliant and witty social satire, The New York Idea was a critique of Americans' frivolous notions about marriage and their belief that the institution existed solely for their comfort and amusement. The play, written expressly for Minnie Maddern Fiske, revolves around two recently divorced couples, their efforts to find new mates, the confusion and shenanigans that follow, and the resultant insights into Americans' lackadaisical attitudes regarding marriage and divorce. The play was first performed in Chicago and subsequently moved to St. Louis; on November 19, 1906, it opened at New York's Lyric Theatre. Since its debut, The New York Idea has been successfully revived a number of times and was mounted in GERMANY by MAX REINHARDT in 1916.

In 1911, Mitchell attempted to repeat the success of The New York Idea with The New Marriage, but the production was not well received by either critics or the public. His final play, Major Pendennis (1916), an adaptation of Thackeray's Pendennis, was also poorly received. Following his playwriting career, Mitchell lectured on poetry at the George Washington University, and in 1928 he was appointed Mask & Wig Professor of Playwriting at the University of Pennsylvania. Mitchell died on October 21, 1935, in Philadelphia.

PLAYS: Deborah (1892); In the Season (1893); Becky Sharp (1899); The Adventures of François (1900); The Kreutzer Sonata (1906); The New York Idea (1906); The New Marriage (1911); Major Pendennis (1916)

FURTHER READING

- Gassner, John, ed. Best Plays of the Early American Theatre: From the Beginning to 1916. New York: Crown, 1967.
- Moody, Richard, ed. Dramas from the American Theatre, 1762–1909. Boston: Houghton, 1966.
- Price, David M. "Langdon Mitchell: The Man and His Plays." Ph.D. diss., City Univ. of New York, 1978.
- Quinn, Arthur Hobson. A History of the American Drama. Vol. 2. New York: Appleton, 1927.

John W. Frick

MIYOSHI JÜRÖ (1902–1958)

Miyoshi Jürō, Japanese SHINGEKI playwright and poet, was born in Saga Prefecture and educated in English literature at Waseda University, where he was first attracted to Marxism. In fact, Miyoshi's work as a dramatist can best be described through his relationship to the proletariat movement in Japanese theater. Early in his career, he founded the magazine Left-Wing Art (Sayoku Geijutsu), co-founded the "left-wing artist circle," and was a member of the Nihon Proleta Artista Federacio (NAPF) and the Japan Proletariat Theatre League (PROT). Further, his plays of this period were produced by such organizations as the Left-Wing Theatre (Sayoku Gekijō), Tsukiji Little Theatre (Tsukiji Shōgekijō), and Inoue's Theatre Gymnasium (Inoue Engeki Dōjō). Plays such as his second work The Much-Maimed Oaki (Kizu Darake no Oaki, 1927) and Who Does the Firing? (Kubi o Kiru no wa Dare da, 1928) define his involvement in the proletariat movement.

However, by the time Miyoshi wrote the Tokugawa-era (1603–1868) tale The Stabbed Senta (Kirare no Senta, 1934), his dissatisfaction with the politics and formality of the movement was clear. As the introductions and afterwords to his plays testify, Miyoshi had grown disillusioned with the overly politicized and black-and-white view of humanity held by most Marxist writers of the time. For example, in The Stabbed Senta, Miyoshi exhibits a career-defining commitment to the fate of the lower classes, particularly rural farmers, which did not necessitate the involvement of the intellectual, Marxist community. Buoy (Bui, 1940), which has been called a "phantom masterpiece" because of its scant production history, dramatizes Miyoshi's break from orthodox left-wing theater. The play is one of Miyoshi's most autobiographical, as it illustrates both the author's ideological shift and the death of his wife. The hero, Kuga Gorō, a Western-style painter, slowly loses the emotional support of his friends sent to fight in the Sino-Japanese War, the support of his ideologies, and ultimately his wife. Yet, in the end, Kuga emerges with a renewed commitment to life and love.

His break with the proletariat party in part allowed Miyoshi to continue writing during the war, when many writers were either silenced or forced to write propaganda. Though some branded him a collaborationist, Miyoshi himself was deeply conflicted over the war. This complex response became the dominant theme of his postwar work. The Ruins (Haikyo, 1947), an extended one-act, is populated with a number of characters each representing a different reaction to the war. The play is essentially a lengthy debate over war responsibility, at the heart of which are the retired professor Shibata and his two sons. Miyoshi also brings in numerous characters that serve as reminders, both physically and in their actions, of the desperate times after the war. No resolution follows, and the play ends in a near-violent tension between family members. Other plays during the postwar stage of Miyoshi's career continue this exploration, most notably I Know Not the Man (Sono Hito o Shirazu, 1948), Inside the Womb (Tainai, 1949), and Those Who Committed Crimes (Okashita Mono, 1952).

[See also Japan]

SELECT PLAYS: The Much-Maimed Oaki (Kizu Darake no Oaki, 1927); Who Does the Firing? (Kubi o Kiru no wa Dare da, 1928); Coal Dust (Tanjin, 1930); The Stabbed Senta (Kirare no Senta, 1934);

Buoy (Bui, 1940); The Lion (Shishi, 1943); The Cliff (Gake, 1946); The Ruins (Haikyo, 1947); I Know Not the Man (Sono Hito o Shirazu, 1948); Inside the Womb (Tainai, 1949); Person of the Flames (Honoo no Hito, 1951); Those Who Committed Crimes (Okashita Mono, 1952)

FURTHER READING

- Abe Itaru. Kindai Bungaku no Kenkyū [Modern literature research]. Tokyo: Ofusha, 1980.
- Harada Hiroko. Aspects of Post-War German and Japanese Drama (1945–1970): Reflections on War, Guilt, and Responsibility. Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000.
- Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama, Criticism. New York: H. Holt, 1984.
- Miyoshi Jūrō. Miyoshi Jūrō no Shigoto [The works of Miyoshi Jūrō]. 4 vols. Tokyo: Gakugei Shorin, 1968.

Michael W. Cassidy

MIZU NO EKI See THE WATER STATION

MNOUCHKINE, ARIANE (1940–)

Ariane Mnouchkine was born on March 3, 1940, in Boulogne-sur-Seine, FRANCE, and is one of the world's preeminent theater directors and a pioneer in transcultural theatrical production. Long associated with the Théâtre du Soleil, which she co-founded in 1964, Mnouchkine is widely recognized for her stylistic eclecticism, innovative staging, and largely egalitarian management style. Since 1970, Théâtre du Soleil has made its home in the Cartoucherie (an abandoned ammunition factory) in the Bois de Vincennes, fifteen minutes outside of central Paris. With its early productions of The Kitchen, The Clowns, and 1789, Théâtre du Soleil won its reputation as “the people's theater.” Since then, the company has deepened its commitment to producing socially challenging work and, by promoting its productions among trade unions, has attracted factory workers by the busload.

Mnouchkine's directorial approach varies from one production to the next, but it consistently involves stylized athleticism and lavish spectacle. Commedia dell'arte, clowning, and Asian theatrical influences have all found their way into Mnouchkine's work, often combining Western texts with theatrical images taken from Bunraku, kabuki, Kathakali, and Sanskrit theatrical traditions. Some of Mnouchkine's strongest influences include JACQUES COPEAU, Jacques Lecoq, Jean Vilar, ANTONIN ARTAUD, Peter Brook, Giorgio Strehler, VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD, and—despite her impatience with psychological REALISM—KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY.

The Théâtre du Soleil has operated as a collective since the start, with each member receiving the same salary. Although performers have come and gone over the years, Mnouchkine values member loyalty and refers to the company in terms of family. While season selections are decided collectively (with ample discussion to work through differences of opinion), Mnouchkine reputedly exercises her authority as necessary to hold the collective together. Actors join the company as young, enthusiastic amateurs, eager to push themselves to meet Mnouchkine's exacting standards. Mnouchkine describes her approach to rehearsal as a journey into the unknown, for which she provides initial ideas and images, not to prescribe an outcome but to stimulate the actors' thinking. She holds off casting roles right away but lets the actors take turns trading parts until the strongest-casting matches emerge. Mnouchkine's directorial approach is exploratory, collaborative, and resistant to the pressures of rushed decisions. She emphasizes the importance of her own, and her actors', efforts at observation, seeing simple watching as the basis for developing the collective's knowledge of the material, mutual trust, informed response, and craft. Rehearsal periods range from six to eighteen months, culminating in a production run of one year.

Selected important productions include The Kitchen (La Cuisine), by ARNOLD WESKER (1967); A Midsummer Night's Dream (Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été), by William Shakespeare (1968); The Clowns (Les Clowns), jointly created by the Théâtre du Soleil (1969); 1789, jointly created by the Théâtre du Soleil (1970); The Age of Gold (L'Âge d'Or), jointly created by the Théâtre du Soleil (1975); Les Shakespeares [Richard II, Twelfth Night, Henry IV, Parts One and Two] (1984); THE TERRIBLE BUT UNFINISHED HISTORY OF NORODOM SIHANOUK, KING OF CAMBODIA (L'Histoire terrible mais inachevée de Norodom Sihanouk, roi du Cambodge), by HÉLÈNE CIXOUS (1985); The Indiade, or the India of Their Dreams (L'Indiade, ou l'Inde de leurs rêves), also by Cixous (1987); Les Atrides [consisting of Euripides's Iphigenia at Aulis and Aeschylus's trilogy, The Oresteia] (1990–1992); and The Forsworn City, or the Awakening of the Furies (La Ville Parjure, ou le réveil des érynyes), by Cixous (1994).

FURTHER READING

- Cohn, Ruby. “Ariane Mnouchkine: Playwright of a Collective.” In Feminine Focus: The New Women Playwrights, ed. by Enoch Brater. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1989.
- Kiernander, Adrian. Ariane Mnouchkine and the Théâtre du Soleil. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1993.
- Théâtre du Soleil. <http://www.theatre-du-soleil.fr/>.
- Williams, David. Collaborative Theatre: The Théâtre du Soleil Sourcebook. London: Routledge, 1999.

Kristin Johnsen-Neshati

THE MOCK PARLIAMENTS

The Mock Parliaments are a form of political agit-prop (AGITATION-PROPAGANDA) that flourished in CANADA between the early 1890s and 1916, amid campaigns for women's enfranchisement. These plays were put on to raise the profile of suffrage, supply its coffers, and expand public support. To this end, productions were coordinated with petitions to the legislature and provided forums for discussion, lobbying, pamphlet distribution, and signature collection. They were advertised in local papers, covered by reviews, attended by illustrious audiences, and staged in some of Canada's grandest theatrical houses.

Similar plays were produced in America and Britain, like Sophie Louise Wepf Clark's Entertainment to Make Votes for Women (1910) and Alison Garland's The Better Half (1913). But these were authored by individual playwrights. The Canadian Mock Parliaments were collective creations. They were written and performed by the suffrage movements' most active organizations and most famous proponents, like Nellie McClung, Amelia Yeomans, Cora Hind, Emily Howard Stowe, August Stowe-Gullen, and Lillian Beynon Thomas. There were at least nine discreet plays and thirteen different performances—four in Manitoba, seven in Ontario, and two in British Columbia. The first of these was staged at the Bijou Theatre in Winnipeg on February 9, 1893, by the Women's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU), which was either directly or indirectly involved in most productions. The February 18, 1896, Toronto Mock Parliament was put on by the WCTU and the Dominion Women's Enfranchisement Association. It took place at the Pavillion in Allen Gardens and almost filled the 1,800-seat theater. Canadian historians often mention the 1914 Mock Parliament, especially as it starred Nellie McClung as Premier Roblin of Manitoba. It was produced by the recently formed Winnipeg Political Equality League, filled the large Walker Theatre, and generated enough money to finance the remainder of the provincial suffrage campaign.

The Mock Parliaments are a parodic canovaccio (a vague plot outline which is filled in by the various different groups and performers who put it on and common in commedia dell'arte). Their stages imitate a real, historical parliament. The structure of the plays is determined by the routine proceedings of parliament through which the action of the play proceeds. Their central parodic feature is the reversal of roles between men and women. In them, the sex roles of electoral politicians are reversed: we are to imagine that women are in power and have been since the beginning of time. Men are disenfranchised and appear before them to plead for the vote. Typically, the plays are divided into two parts: the first part comprises motions, petitions, orders of the day, and question period and satirizes issues that dominate this first period of women's activism, such as dress reform, temperance, Sunday observance, equal access to the professions, the right to own property and the right to homestead. The second half of the play involves a lengthy debate on the most important of these issues, suffrage. In the only extant version of the debate, the reversal of roles that regulates the action in the first half of the play is suspended. Although heavily weighted in favor of the women suffrage supporters, their arguments fail to convince. The vote is lost, and as it was historically, the fight for political equality continued.

FURTHER READING

Bacchi, Carol Lee. Liberation Deferred? The Ideas of the English-Canadian Suffragists, 1877–1918. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1983.

Bird, Kym. "Performing Politics: Propaganda, Parody and a Woman's Parliament." Redressing the Past: The Politics of English-Canadian Women's Drama, 1880–1920. Montreal: McGill-Queen's Univ. Press, 2003.

Cleverdon, Catherine L. The Woman Suffrage Movement in Canada. 2d ed. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1974.

Friedl, Bettina, ed. On to Victory: Propaganda Plays of the Woman Suffrage Movement. Boston: Northeastern Univ. Press, 1987.

Hirshfield, Claire. "The Suffragist as Playwright in Edwardian England." Frontiers 9, no. 2 (1987): 2–6.

McClung, Nellie L. Purple Springs. Toronto: Thomas Allen, 1921.

—. The Stream Runs Fast: My Own Story. Toronto: Thomas Allen, 1945.

Prentice, Alison, et al. Canadian Women: A History. Toronto: Harcourt, 1988.

Kym Bird

MODERNIST DRAMA

When the actors are there they are there and they are there right away.

—Gertrude Stein, "Plays," 1949

Modernist drama should be kept distinct from its cognate, the modern drama or the "New Drama," as it was formerly called, which refers more broadly to drama often associated with the PROBLEM PLAYS OF HENRIK IBSEN and GEORGE BERNARD SHAW. Since the term modern drama has been so widely used, critics and scholars have often shied away from speaking of a modernist drama, even though modernism is a well-established, if contested, category when it comes to other literary genres such as poetry or the novel. Modernist drama is a drama that subscribes to a set of aesthetic and cultural values prevalent in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. These include an insistence on difficult art works, which distinguishes modernist art from popular, folk, or commercial art; an insistence on the autonomy of art, art's separation from useful or utilitarian endeavors; and a search for new artistic forms.

Taking as a point of departure the category of modernism as it has been used in literary history, one might define those dramas as modernist that were written by writers whose work in other literary genres established them firmly within the modernist canon. T. S. ELIOT, for example, who was central to shaping the concept of modernism, wrote a number of plays, such as MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL (1935) or The Cocktail Party (1950), even though they are less formally innovative than his modernist poems The Wasteland and The Four Quartets (1922). Other established modernists writing plays include James Joyce, whose only freestanding play, Exiles (1918), is less experimental than the dramatic "Circe" chapter in his modernist novel Ulysses (1922). Much more genuinely modernist were the plays written by the American poet and novelist GERTRUDE STEIN, who was living near Joyce in Paris. Her dozens of plays, collected in Geography and Plays (1922) and Last Operas and Plays (1949), violated dramatic form in that they did not follow traditional structure, often did not have characters, and were uninterested in scenic organization. Nevertheless, two of her plays, FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS (1934) and Mother of Us All (1947), became the basis for two operas, with music by American composer Virgil Thomson. Many critics have detected sly references to homosexuality in Stein's plays, not unlike the drama of another modernist novelist and fellow Paris expatriate DJUNA BARNES, who is best known for her novel Nightwood (1936).

While these writers are not primarily known for their plays, which nevertheless are important texts for the modernist drama, a number of modernists left more lasting marks on dramatic history. The most significant writer in this category is W. B. YEATS. Even though Yeats is primarily known as a poet, he was one of the founding members of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin, which continues to be IRELAND's most important theater. Yeats's plays range from the symbolist Shadowy Waters (1906) and plays steeped in Irish mythology, such as the Cuchulain cycle, to contemporary FARCE. Yeats was also significant in his support of other, more political writers of the Irish drama movement such as J. M. SYNGE and SEAN O'CASEY.

While it is easier to classify as modernist plays written by writers who established themselves as modernist in other genres, it is more difficult to transpose the categories organizing modernism from poetry and the novel to drama and the theater. One of the most significant features of modernist literature was the determination to create difficult, experimental works that did not adhere to the conventions of realist art and did not cater to the taste of the audience. The first modernist group of playwrights who treated dramatic conventions and regular theater audiences with contempt were the symbolists: Stéphane Mallarmé, MAURICE MAETERLINCK, HUGO VON HOFMANNSTHAL, and ALEXANDER BLOK. The language of these playwrights is deliberately removed from everyday speech, infused with heightened rhetoric, elaborate images, metaphors, and a tendency toward abstraction, earning their plays the label of "metaphysical theater." Maeterlinck's Pelleas and Melisande (1892) takes place in a castle cut off from the rest of the world, and Mallarmé's Afternoon of a Faun (1876) is a difficult poetic text with minimal action. Both plays were set to music by Claude Debussy, for opera and ballet, respectively, and it is in these latter forms that they are still performed today.

In defiance of received conventions of drama is a second group of plays, namely philosophical plays, also known as the "drama of ideas." Shaw's philosophical plays, such as MAJOR BARBARA (1905) and MAN AND SUPERMAN (1903), the latter subtitled "A Comedy and a Philosophy," present a mixture of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, Karl Marx, and Charles Darwin, as well as the brand of British socialism known as Fabianism. LUIGI PIRANDELLO's intellectual plays, by contrast, do not so much import existing theories and philosophies into drama as endlessly speculate about the relation between theater and life and actors and nonactors. They are prime examples of modernist metatheater: theater about theater.

Equally adversarial with respect to the audience was expressionist drama, a movement most fully developed in GERMANY and the UNITED STATES. Expressionist plays are modernist not only because of their themes and their exalted and stylized language but also because they introduced new, episodic structures into the dramatic form. These plays proceeded in loosely connected episodes and scenes without regard for the unities of time, space, and action articulated by Aristotle, considered as ultimate authority for centuries. This disregard was anticipated by AUGUST STRINDBERG, whose A DREAM PLAY (1902) broke with realist and naturalist drama by trying to imitate the structure of dreams. Expressionist forms were continued in surrealist plays, for example, GUILLAUME APOLLINAIRE's THE BREASTS OF TIRESIAS (1918). Indeed, Apollinaire coined the term SURREALISM in his preface to this play. Other playwrights, such as the Polish writer STANISLAW IGNACY WITKIEWITZ, worked along similar lines without officially belonging to any of these movements.

The significance of expressionist theater lies in the way it responded to modern, industrialized society. The plays of ERNST TOLLER, GEORG KAISER, OSKAR KOKOSCHKA, and REINHARD SORGE present the collision between the individual and early-20th-century masses. Solitary protagonists cannot find their proper place; they are caught in Oedipal struggles with their fathers, with religion, and with modern, industrial society more broadly. In EUGENE O'NEILL's THE HAIRY APE (1922), a worker on a steamship finds himself an outsider everywhere and ends up dying in the arms of a gorilla, whom he had mistaken as his only soul mate. SOPHIE TREADWELL's MACHINAL (1928) likewise responds to the alienation brought about by modern, industrial society, as does ELMER RICE's THE ADDING MACHINE (1923), in which a long-term employee is fired when new and more efficient adding machines are introduced.

Repetitive movements performed on assembly belts changed the way in which the early 20th century conceived of human actions and thus also of acting. The Russian VSEVELOD MEYERHOLD invented a training and performance system called "biomechanics," which was considered an aesthetic response to Taylorism, the system of economizing movements instituted by F. W. Taylor. Similarly interested in mechanized movements was the theater of Italian FUTURISM as well as the theater of the Bauhaus, the latter an institute primarily known for its invention of modernist architecture but whose theatrical activities were significant as well.

The modernist assault on the human actor, the search for a nonhuman theater, also led to a resurgence of marionette and puppet theater. The British director and theorist Edward Gordon Craig polemically called for an "Über-Marionette" to take the place of actors, and a significant number of modernist dramatists, including Maeterlinck, ALFRED JARRY, and FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA wrote their most well known plays for marionettes, even though they are now mostly performed by human actors. Others, such as O'Neill and Yeats, recommended that actors should imitate the movements of marionettes.

What fueled these experiments in the theater was the impact of various new media, such as the gramophone and film. Many modernist playwrights and directors, such as JEAN COCTEAU, ANTONIN ARTAUD, SAMUEL BECKETT, and ERWIN PISCATOR, combined film and theater. The most lasting influence on modernist drama, however, was a student of Piscator's, BERTOLT BRECHT, whose work spans from the EXPRESSIONISM of In the Jungle of the Cities (1923) to the politically explicit THE MEASURE TAKEN (1930). Brecht managed to gather the various strands of modernist drama and theater—episodic plots, a new conception of acting, the juxtaposition of music and dialogue—and turn them into an entirely new conception of theater.

Modernist drama continues in the work of Beckett, who took many modernist techniques, particularly the critique of the actor and the impact of the media, and turned them into minimalist plays with little action and plot. They also point toward the Theater of the Absurd, the inheritor of modernist drama around midcentury, which continues to influence contemporary playwrights such as HAROLD PINTER.

FURTHER READING

- McGuinness, Patrick. Maurice Maeterlinck and the Making of Modern Drama. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 2000.
- Puchner, Martin. Stage Fright: Modernism, Anti-theatricality, and Drama. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 2002.
- Szondi, Peter. Theory of the Modern Drama. Tr. by Michael Hayes. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1987.
- Williams, Raymond. Modern Drama from Ibsen to Brecht. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1968.

Martin Puchner

MOLNÁR, FERENC (1878–1952)

Ferenc Molnár was born on January 12, 1878, in Budapest, HUNGARY. The most internationally renowned and widely performed Hungarian playwright of the 20th century, Molnár is best known for his many romantic COMEDIES characterized by sophisticated, witty dialogue and expert dramatic construction. He was a master of artifice and surprise. Between 1908 and 1940, sixteen of his plays were produced on Broadway. Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein's musical Carousel is based on his Liliom (1909), and several Molnár plays were turned into Hollywood films.

Molnár's emergence as a playwright is inseparable from the growth of his native Budapest into a great fin de siècle metropolis, with an exploding population. Its rapidly expanding middle class demanded a native culture reflecting its newfound cosmopolitanism, and no one was better able to satisfy that demand on the stage than Molnár. Foreign audiences were drawn to the local color of his Hungarian settings, characters, and their temperaments. Molnár's rise to world renown was virtually instantaneous. His first two plays, written in 1902 and 1904, were domestic successes; his third, the comedy The Devil (Az ördög, 1907), brought him international celebrity. It contains much of Molnár in a nutshell: the love triangle, the Freudian undertones, and the outlandish idea made to seem perfectly plausible—in this case the appearance onstage of the supernatural title character, whose machinations reveal the sexual impulses lurking behind social decorum. Here, as in general, Molnár subjects his characters to pitfalls that threaten but in the end do not seriously damage their bourgeois morality. Thus he provided his target audiences with just the right amount of titillation.

Variations on his formula can be found in plays such as The Guardsman (A testőr, 1910), in which a jealous actor in disguise attempts to seduce his own wife, and The Play's the Thing (Játék a kastélyban, 1926). These plays also evince a favorite subject of Molnár, the psychological advantage of a woman over a jealous man, and feature a frequent Molnár character type: the actor-actress. As a profession, ACTING necessarily depends on dissembling, a skill that can be carried over into "real life." In The Play's the Thing, an amorous encounter involving an actress is overheard by her fiancé and a famous playwright, who then writes a play that incorporates the offending scene, thus turning the betrayal into an innocent "rehearsal." This facility of Molnár to manipulate illusion and reality has invited comparisons with LUIGI PIRANDELLO, while OSCAR WILDE and Sigmund Freud are also cited as influences. But literary-minded critics have not always been kind to Molnár, accusing him of a superficiality and sentimentality that thwart social criticism or questions of human destiny. Molnár's Liliom comes closest to countering such views. This lower-class love story is an effective blending of REALISM and the supernatural. Its complex hero, a tough with a tender heart, demonstrates the paradoxes of human nature, and his fate is a critique of social injustice.

As Adolf Hitler's clouds were gathering over Europe, Molnár moved to New York City in 1940, where he lived as a celebrated though increasingly isolated and unhappy writer. His life's work includes nearly thirty plays, fiction, essays, memoirs, and reportage. He died on April 2, 1952, in New York City.

SELECT PLAYS: The Devil (Az ördög, 1907); Liliom (1909); The Guardsman (A testőr, 1910); The Wolf, a.k.a. The Phantom Lover (A farkas, 1912); The Swan (A hattyú, 1920); The Violet (Az ibolya, 1921); The Red Mill, a.k.a. Mima (A vörös malom, 1923); The Glass Slipper (Az üvegcipő, 1924); The Play's the Thing (Játék a kastélyban, 1926); Olympia (1928); One, Two, Three (Egy, kettő, három, 1929)

FURTHER READING

- Czigány, Lóránt. The Oxford History of Hungarian Literature. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1984.
- Gergely, Ermo Joseph. Hungarian Drama in New York. Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press 1947.

Györgyey, Clara. Ferenc Molnár. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Sárközi, Mátyás. The Play's the Thing: The Life of Ferenc Molnár. London: White Raven Press, 2004.

Eugene Brogyányi

MONDRAGÓN AGUIRRE, MAGDALENA (1913–1988)

Magdalena Mondragón was part of the first wave of feminist playwrights to emerge in 20th-century MEXICO. She was born on July 14, 1913, shortly after the start of the Mexican Revolution (1910–1920), in Torreón, Coahuila, Mexico. At the time Mondragón began writing, her country was striving to redefine its national identity. Before establishing herself as a novelist, poet, and playwright, Mondragón wrote for periodicals and eventually became the first female editor of a daily newspaper in Mexico.

Mondragón's theatrical debut, When Eve Becomes Adam (Cuando Eva se vuelve Adán, 1938) was a great success and was eventually made into a film. It is a realistic and melodramatic piece about a female doctor whose career ambitions lead to a failed marriage.

Though this first play conforms somewhat to social and theatrical norms, Mondragón's subsequent works break from domestic REALISM and reveal the author's feminist outlook. This is evident in plays like The Siren Who Carried the Sea (La sirena que llevaba el mar, 1945) and The Lost World (El mundo perdido, 1946). The former dramatizes a woman's desire to leave her husband in order to go live among liberated mermaids, and the latter offers a retelling of Genesis. In The Lost World, Adam convinces Eve not eat the apple, only to realize that living forever in Paradise is not all he had hoped. After 2,000 years of boredom, Adam is forced to admit his mistake and apologize to Eve. Both The Siren Who Carried the Sea and The Lost World draw from Aztec and Christian legends, mixing together two of modern Mexico's major cultural influences.

A later piece, Because I Feel Like It (Porque me da la gana, 1953), features an aging female snake charmer who decides to have a facelift against her husband's wishes. Only later does she realize that her newly revamped appearance is physically and emotionally stifling to herself and those around her.

PLAYS: When Eve Becomes Adam (Cuando Eva se vuelve Adán, 1938);

A Boat in the Sea (Un barco en el mar, 1939); Room for Rent (Se alquila cuarto, 1939); We Shouldn't Die (No debemos morir, 1944); The Siren Who Carried the Sea (La sirena que llevaba el mar, 1945); Whirlwind (Torbellino, 1945); The Lost World (El mundo perdido, 1946); Because I Feel Like It (Porque me da la gana, 1953); The Clash of the Just (Choque de los justos, 1964)

FURTHER READING

"Datos biográficos y críticos sobre la obra de Magdalena Mondragón" [Biographical data and criticism of the work of Magdalena Mondragón]. Introduction to Dos obras de teatro [Two theater works], by Magdalena Mondragón. [D.F.]: Grupo América, 1951. 5–9.

Dauster, Frank. "Raising the Curtain: Great Ladies of the Theatre."

In Performance, páthos, política [Sexes—Performance, pathos, policy of the sexes], ed. by Heidrun Adler and Kati Röttger. Madrid: Iberoamericana, 1999. 23–40.

Del Río, Marcela, ed. Introduction to Porque me da la gana [Because I feel like it], by Magdalena Mondragón. New York: Odyssey Press, 1968. vii–xvii.

—. "Especificidad y reconocimiento del discurso dramático femenino en el teatro latinoamericano" [Specificity and recognition of feminine dramatic discourse in Latin American theater]. In Performance, páthos, política [Sexes—Performance, pathos, policy of the sexes], ed. by Heidrun Adler and Kati Röttger. Madrid: Iberoamericana, 1999. 41–53.

May Summer Farnsworth

MONODRAMA

A monodrama is a dramatic work written for one actor; by extension it is a work for the theater in which all the characters can be regarded as projections of a single consciousness. As a modern form, the monodrama was created by Jean-Jacques Rousseau with his one-act Pygmalion (1771), which combined declamation and pantomime with music. Eighteenth-century musical monodramas were chiefly lamentations by heroines of classical mythology, designed for virtuoso solo performance by talented amateurs. Johann Wolfgang Goethe introduced the genre in Weimar, writing the monodrama Proserpina in 1778.

In the 19th century, dramatic monodrama evolved as a psychological form. In GERMANY Richard von Meerheimb published a collection titled Monodramas of New Form (Monodramen neuer Form, 1882), subtitled Psycho-Monodramas (Psycho-Monodramen). Scenery and props, like unseen secondary characters, were imaginary. Belgian author Edmond Picard wrote a monodrama titled Sworn (Le Juré, 1887), accompanied by a theoretical "Lettre sur le monodrame." (letter on the monodrama).

The fin de siècle period invited introspection. William James's stream-of-consciousness, interior monologue in the novel, Henri Bergson's concept of la durée (duration), and Sigmund Freud's theory of the unconscious all testify to the period's fascination with subjectivity, which gave rise to monodrame.

French symbolist poets embraced the monodramatic by abandoning the trappings of surface reality for a deeper penetration into the psyche. Calling William Shakespeare the creator of a "theater of the mind alone" and a "drama of the self," Stéphane Mallarmé treats Hamlet as a monodrama in which all the secondary characters are emanations of the hero's consciousness.

Rachilde (pen name of Marguerite Vallette-Eymery) created the "cerebral drama" Madame Death (Madame la Mort, 1891), the second act of which takes place within the brain of a dying man; and poet Saint-Pol-Roux wrote the monodramatic Epilogue of the Human Seasons (Epilogue des saisons humaines, 1893) in which all the characters are projections of the psyche of the dying Prince (anticipating by sixty years EUGÈNE IONESCO's Exit the King). In Saint-Pol-Roux's Characters of the Individual (Les Personnages de l'individu, 1893), subtitled "Monodrame," an old man and a young man meet on a bridge over a rushing stream and discuss their lives, only to discover they are the same person at different times. GERHART HAUPTMANN's Hannele's Journey to Heaven (1893), AUGUST STRINDBERG's A DREAM PLAY (1902) and TO DAMASCUS (1908), MAURICE MAETERLINCK's Blue Bird (1908), and LEONID ANDREEV's Black Masks (1908) can all be considered monodramas in part or in whole.

Two leading Russian playwrights of the symbolist period—Fyodor Sologub and NIKOLAI EVREINOV—wrote important theoretical statements about the monodramatic mode. Although he does not use the term, in The Theatre of One Will (1908), Sologub proposes a new drama dominated by the personality of the author, arguing, "There are no different people—there is only one single man, only one single Me in the entire universe" (Sologub, 1977). The many speaking roles are parts of a single self.

In his Introduction to Monodrama (1909), Evreinov argues that the future of theater lies in monodrama, which he defines as a dramatic performance that strives to convey to the spectator an inner state of mind. At any given moment the spectator should hear, see, and feel what the central character hears, sees, and feels. The task of the monodramatist is thus to turn the spectator into an "imagined" character within the play. In Evreinov's opinion, because the very appearance of the natural world varies according to the mood of the perceiver, the natural setting in monodrama must seem to change as the emotions of the central character change. To illustrate his theory, Evreinov wrote a number of plays in which setting, character, and action are all reflections of a single consciousness.

After SYMBOLISM, the Russian futurists took up monodrama. Velimir Khlebnikov wrote Mrs. Lenin (1913), in which all the characters are projections of the consciousness of the heroine; and in VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY's first play, Vladimir Mayakovsky, A Tragedy (performed in 1913), the characters of the chorus represent different aspects of the hero. Many German expressionist plays of the 1920s are monodramatic. In the 1950s and 1960s SAMUEL BECKETT, Ionesco, and other absurdist further explored and enlarged the genre.

For experimental playwrights, actors, and directors of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries monodrama continued to be an AVANT-GARDE theatrical concept that can be put to effective use in solo and in multi-media performance.

[See also Expressionism; Futurism; Psychoanalysis]

FURTHER READING

Culler, Dwight A. "Monodrama and the Dramatic Monologue." PMLA 90, no. 3 (May 1975): 365–385.

Dana, Joseph. Le théâtre de la pensée [The theater of thought]. Rouen: Editions medianes, 1995.

Evreinov, Nikolai. Introduction to Monodrama (1909). In Russian Dramatic Theory from Pushkin to the Symbolists: An Anthology, ed. by Lawrence Senelick. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1981.

Holmstrom, Kristen Ann. Monodrama, Attitudes, and Tableaux-Vivants. Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1967.

Senelick, Lawrence. "Moscow and Monodrama: The Meaning of the Craig-Stanislavsky Hamlet." Theatre Research International 6, no. 2 (Spring 1981): 109–123.

Sologub, Fyodor. "The Theater of One Will," tr. by Daniel Gerould. The Drama Review 21: 4 (T-76, Dec. 1977): 85–99.

Törnqvist, Egil. "Monodrama: Term and Reality." In Essays in Drama and Theatre. Liber Amicorum Benjamin Hunnigher. Amsterdam: Standaard, 1973.

Daniel Gerould

MONSTROUS REGIMENT

In 1975 Gillian Hanna brought together a group of eleven female actors and musicians from across ENGLAND who were all frustrated with the lack of sizable roles for women and the poor representation of women and their issues on the British stage; they founded Monstrous Regiment, a socialist-feminist collective touring company, dedicated to the creation of new works. The name comes from a misogynist 1558 pamphlet, The First Blast of the Trumpet Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, written by John Knox, a Scottish preacher, attacking both Elizabeth I and Mary Stuart. The company quickly became Britain's most prominent feminist company, touring the art-studio theater circuit. By company policy, female members must outnumber males, and the works they produce must place focus on and highlight women's experiences. In 1981 the company went exclusively female. Monstrous Regiment's first production was commissioned from Chris Bond and Claire Luckham; Scum: Death, Destruction, and Dirty Washing (1976) looked at the Paris Commune of 1871 through the eyes of its washerwomen. Other notable productions include CARYL CHURCHILL's Vinegar Tom (1976); women's cabarets Floorshow (1977) and Bryony Lavery's Time Gentlemen Please (1978); Shakespeare's Sister (1980), written and performed by Théâtre de l'Aquarium; and FRANCA RAME and DARIO FO's The Fourth Wall (1983). Monstrous Regiment also served as a stimulus to women's writing; workshops with the company led to Churchill's TOP GIRLS. After more than twenty-five productions, Monstrous Regiment ceased touring in 1993.

Monstrous Regiment explored several different theatrical forms including cabaret, collage, epic, musical, and performance pieces. Live music quickly became a standard part of their productions. Without a specific process or creative method, Monstrous Regiment's work style evolved according to who was working in the company at any given time, drawing on the available talents within the group. While the company mostly functioned as a collective, the degree of company collaboration and involvement varied according to the project and sometimes the playwright. One of the reasons the company moved into doing cabaret shows was because they had three talented musicians in the company including a composer.

Believing that the “personal is political,” the members of Monstrous Regiment confronted sexual stereotypes and inequities first in their company and second on the stage. Committed to facilitating women’s ability to be involved in theater, the company ensured that women with family obligations could work according to their availability and provided child care. Seeking to enhance script offerings for women, Monstrous Regiment always made their scripts publicly visible and available to others. In addition to having a feminist leaning, the company also had strong ties to the socialist movement largely because of the personal involvement of its members. When seeking new audiences, Monstrous Regiment made a connection with the trade union movement. At various times during the company’s history, however, both the feminist and socialist agendas took a secondary role in their productions as the company struggled to find work of interest to its members.

[See also Political Theater]

FURTHER READING

Hanna, Gillian, ed. Monstrous Regiment: Four Plays and a Collective Celebration. London: Nick Hern Bks., 1991.

J. Briggs Cormier

MONTHERLANT, HENRY DE (1895–1972)

Henry-Marie-Joseph-Frédéric-Expedite Millon de Montherlant, playwright, novelist, critic, and public intellectual, would give, throughout his life, the false birthdate of April 21, 1896 (it was actually April 20, 1895), thus reducing his age and linking his birth to the supposed anniversary of the founding of Rome. Such biographical control for public purposes would mark all of his career, including its very end: at the age of seventy-seven, Montherlant would choose the autumnal equinox as the date on which to commit suicide.

Having made an initial reputation as a novelist and essayist, he turned to playwriting with historical dramas produced in Paris during the Occupation. His plays treated issues of spiritual renunciation in ways that could offend neither French citizens nor Nazi occupiers. (He himself wrote on both sides of the political fence and would be lightly sanctioned after the war for collaboration with the Nazis.) Eventually he achieved enough success to become the playwright-in-waiting to the Comédie Française. The refinement of his language was always, and still is, highly praised. During the 1950s, however, his costume dramas came to seem hollow next to the absurdist minimalism of EUGÈNE IONESCO, SAMUEL BECKETT, and ARTHUR ADAMOV.

He left two masterpieces in a neo-Racinian mode—both of them scripts he revised over the course of several decades. The first performed professionally in FRANCE was Port-Royal (1954). On a hot August 26 in 1664, the nuns of Port-Royal, the proud Jansenist convent accused of heresy and insubordination, await the verdict of church and court about their survival. The day stretches out in anxious discussion among the nuns—some advocating pragmatic collaboration, others principled martyrdom—until the arrival of the archbishop ends the tension by announcing the dissolution of the convent. The play ends when twelve nuns are selected for removal to another convent, a triage reminiscent of the rounding up of French Jews by Nazi administrators. The position of the convent resembles not only that of France under the Occupation but also Montherlant’s own as an individual trying to lead a private life as a homosexual—a personal fact that he believed was the mark of his singular greatness—while sustaining a conventional public life under the gaze of government and society.

The second masterpiece is more overtly autobiographical. The City Whose Prince Is a Child (La Ville dont le prince est un enfant, published 1951) opens with Serge Souplier, a fourteen-year-old schoolboy in an all-male Catholic school, being reproached by the Abbot de Pradts, prefect of the school, for conducting a romantic liaison with an older schoolmate, André Sevrals. During the course of the Abbot’s reproach to young Souplier, it becomes clear that the Abbot is in love with him—although the Abbot seems blind to his own sexual motivations. Later, after the two schoolmates are caught in a compromising situation, the Abbot decides to expel the older boy for the sake of public morals—but also in order to have young Souplier to himself. In the final act, the Abbot de Pradts and the older boy recreate the opening scene of the play, with the Abbot telling Sevrals that he is being expelled in order to protect young Souplier. But just after Sevrals leaves the Abbot’s office, the College Superior enters and, in a superb theatrical stroke, makes the Abbot take the seat previously held by the expelled boy. The Superior then proceeds to reproach the Abbot for being dominated by the same passions as the two schoolboys. The Superior has decided to expel young Souplier in addition to the older Sevrals in order to save the Abbot from his passions—and the Superior also reveals that he, himself, earlier in his career, struggled to overcome his own love for boys. The play ends with the moral and emotional devastation of de Pradts.

Montherlant is still cited as one of France’s major 20th-century playwrights, but with little dramaturgical legacy. His critical reputation may yet be revived by queer theory. Posthumous publication of letters and journals revealed a lifetime of pederasty and the hollowness of his claims to prowess on the athletic field, the battlefield, and in the bull ring. He is now viewed as a writer who struggled to reconcile a hidden sexual self with a public role as arbiter of taste and who comes closest to greatness in neoclassical works focusing on the moral power inherent in marginalized solitude. Montherlant died in Paris on September 21, 1972.

PLAYS: The Exile (L'Exil, written 1914, published 1929, never performed); Pasiphaé (written 1928, first performed 1938); The Dead Queen (La Reine morte, 1942); Nobody's Son (Fils de personne, 1943); Malatesta (published 1946, first performed 1950); The Master of Santiago (Le Maître de Santiago, 1948); Daybreak Tomorrow (Demain il fera jour, 1949); The Ones in Your Arms (Celles qu'on prend dans ses bras, 1950); The City Whose Prince Is a Child (La Ville dont le prince est un enfant, begun about 1914, published 1951, early amateur performance 1953; first professional performance in English 1953; first professional performance in French in 1967); Port-Royal (begun in the early 1940s, first performed 1954); Brocéliande (1956); Don Juan (1958); The Cardinal of Spain (Le Cardinal d'Espagne, 1960); The Civil War (La Guerre civile, 1965)

FURTHER READING

- Guicharnaud, Jacques, with June Guicharnaud. Modern French Theatre from Giraudoux to Genet. Rev. ed. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1967.
- Johnson, Robert B. Henry de Montherlant. New York: Twayne, 1968.
- Sipriot, Pierre. Montherlant sans masque [Montherlant without mask]. Paris: Robert Laffont, 1990.

David Pelizzari

A MONTH IN THE COUNTRY

A Month in the Country (Mesyats v derevnye) is a COMEDY in five acts by Ivan Turgenev (1818–1883). It was composed in 1854 and published in 1855, but not performed until 1872 because of censorship difficulties. The action is set during the summer of the early 1840s on the country estate owned by Arkady Islayev and his wife, Natalya, who have a ten-year-old son, Kolya. The action revolves around a complex set of relationships involving a family friend and constant visitor to the estate, Rakitin; Kolya's new tutor, Belyayev, who has just taken up his post; and Natalya's seventeen-year-old ward, Verochka. There are subsidiary relationships that echo or mirror the main ones—between a local neighbor Bolshintsov and Verochka, and between the family doctor Shpigelsky and Islayev's mother's companion, Lizaveta Bogdanovna.

The play's running metaphor is of a hothouse for rare plants, where the rarified conditions make the plants susceptible to disease unless carefully protected. Unfortunately, by the time the play opens, a bacillus has entered the hothouse and infected just about everyone, in the shape of the twenty-one-year-old tutor. The door of the hothouse has been opened to admit the "breath of fresh air" that Natalya yearns for, but she did not reckon with the infection of love that the arrival of the energetic young man brings with him, although she is eight years his senior and married (to a man seven years older than herself). Natalya is already the object of the rather wan attentions paid her by the family friend, Rakitin, that pose no threat to the marriage, which is perhaps why Islayev is content to leave them alone together while he attends to the estate. The fact that he is busy building a dam in the background constitutes another ironic metaphor: the blocking of pent-up feeling.

Belyayev, who is a rather naïve and uncomplicated youth, does not realize the effect he has produced in Natalya, nor does he realize that he is inspiring similar feelings in the adolescent Verochka. The more mature and hitherto bored Natalya, realizing that her ward poses a potential threat, unscrupulously engineers an unsuitable marriage for the young girl with their middle-aged landowning neighbor, Bolshintsov. She also contrives an interview with the unsuspecting Belyayev, during which she makes him aware of her feelings, with consequences that produce precisely what she does not want, namely, his decision to give up his post as tutor and leave, much to the relief of Rakitin. Ironically, the only successful union that the play contemplates at the end is the rather cynical one contrived by the doctor with the mother's companion, as life on the estate reverts to its usual overheated, but stable, condition.

Another analogy that may be said to characterize the action of the play derives from chemistry, whereby a chemical agent (Belyayev) is introduced into a substance in a steady state (the estate) and produces a violent reaction before subsiding. In the detached manner of a chemist, Turgenev merely observes and records the process, in the manner of his friend Gustave Flaubert or ÉMILE ZOLA. His career as a playwright was short-lived and, following the ban placed on A Month in the Country, he turned his attention to the novel.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

- Smyrniw, Walter. Turgenev's Early Works: From Character Sketches to a Novel. Oakville, ON: Mosaic Press, 1980.
- Turgenev, Ivan. Three Plays. Tr. by Constance Garnett. London: Cassell & Co., 1934.
- . Plays. Tr. by M. S. Mandell, with an Introduction by William Lyon Phelps. Reissue of 1924 edition. New York: Russell & Russell, 1970.
- . A Month in the Country. Tr. and Introduced by Isaiah Berlin. London: The Hogarth Press, 1981.
- . A Month in the Country. Tr. and ed. by Richard Freeborn. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1991.
- Worrall, Nick. Nikolai Gogol and Ivan Turgenev. London: Macmillan, 1982.

Nick Worrall

MOODY, WILLIAM VAUGHN (1869–1910)

Poet and playwright William Vaughn Moody was born on July 8, 1869, in Spencer, Indiana, the son of a riverboat captain who steamed on the Ohio River. His mother was a great lover of arts and literature, and it was soon after her untimely death that Moody began to write poetry. Valedictorian of his high school class, he delivered a speech titled "The Evolution of History" at graduation. After working as a tutor and proctor while studying at Riverview Academy in Poughkeepsie, New York, Moody won a scholarship to Harvard in 1889.

In college, Moody was elected to the board of several literary magazines and won the attention of prominent intellectuals and writers like faculty member George Santayana. After earning a master's degree, Moody taught at Harvard, Radcliffe, and the University of Chicago. His passion for academic life was short-lived, however, and after spending some time editing classical texts, he began to focus more on creative writing. Buoyed by the success of his early poems, which appeared in periodicals such as the Atlantic Monthly, Moody devoted himself to writing full-time around 1901.

Moody's first published book was the verse drama The Masque of Judgement (1900); in the following year, he published a volume of poems. His next publications included a series of English textbooks, book reviews, verse dramas, and editions of writers such as John Bunyan, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, John Milton, and Homer. Positive reviews encouraged Moody to continue, and he soon began to write dramatic works for the stage.

In 1906, The Sabine Woman was produced at the Garrick Theatre in Chicago, then opening at the Princess Theatre in New York with the new title THE GREAT DIVIDE. Telling the story of a woman torn between the formal traditions of her upbringing and the wild passion engendered by her frontier husband, the piece was immediately hailed as a success and a significant contribution to American drama. His next play, The Faith Healer (1909), was not as popular with audiences but enjoyed critical acclaim. Moody died on October 17, 1910, in Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Moody's work bridges the stylistic gap between the high romantic lyricism popular in the late 19th century and the Darwinian pragmatics of emerging modernism. His lyrical style reveals a keen sensitivity and intelligence, and his adherence to traditional forms of meter, diction, and syntax reflects his classical education. His plays combine mythic SYMBOLISM with realistic detail in the investigation of contemporary problems. The profound moral and metaphysical questions raised by The Great Divide illustrate Moody's engagement in pertinent questions of the day, such as women's rights and the wages of western expansion. Critics speculate that had he not died of a brain tumor in 1910, his work as a dramatist would have rivaled that of EUGENE O'NEILL.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

PLAYS: The Masque of Judgement: A Masque-Drama in Five Acts and a Prelude (1900); The Fire-Bringer (1905); The Faith Healer: A Play in Four Acts (1909); The Great Divide: A Play in Three Acts (1909)

FURTHER READING

- Brown, Maurice F. Estranging Dawn: The Life and Works of William Vaughn Moody. Carbondale: Southern Illinois Univ. Press, 1973.
- Hall, Roger A. Performing the American Frontier, 1870–1906. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2001.
- Halpern, Martin. William Vaughn Moody. New York: Twayne, 1964.
- Henry, David Dodds. William Vaughn Moody, a Study. New York: Folcroft, 1973.
- Mason, Daniel Gregory, ed. Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1913.
- Quinn, Arthur Hobson. A History of the American Drama from the Civil War to the Present Day. New York: F. S. Crofts, 1936.

Leah R. Shafer

A MOON FOR THE MISBEGOTTEN

[A] dawn that won't creep over dirty windowpanes but will wake in the sky like a promise of God's peace in the soul's dark sadness.

—Josie, Act 3

THE THEATRE GUILD production of EUGENE O'NEILL's A Moon for the Misbegotten closed out of town in 1947; the New York premiere opened on May 2, 1957, with Wendy Hiller as Josie, Françoise Tone as Tyrone, and Cyril Cusack as Phil. After directing revivals in Spoleto, ITALY (1958), and Buffalo, New York (1965), José Quintero staged the 1973 New York production, with Colleen Dewhurst and Jason Robards, that established the play as a landmark. The 1984 Broadway revival featured Kate Nelligan as Josie.

O'Neill's final essay on his family draws the character of Tyrone after Jamie, O'Neill's older brother, as well as his fictional version in LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT, and the action explores the pain he endured after the death of his mother and his guilt-ridden return to alcoholism. The play adheres to the classical unities of time, place, and action, and it combines comic mischief with the weary resignation of THE ICEMAN COMETH.

The heart of the play is the long night that Josie Hogan passes with James Tyrone. She is the ultimate O'Neill woman—virgin, whore, and mother—so tall and strong that "she is almost a freak." In spite of her show of cynicism, she loves Tyrone, who is "soft and soggy from dissipation," but still with "the ghost of a former youthful, irresponsible Irish charm." He is haunted, turning to drink and Broadway tarts in hopes of dulling the agony of his past, and he goes to Josie in search of solace and an alternative to the deceit that has dominated his life.

Tyrone owns the Hogan farm, so Phil and Josie have cultivated a mischievous relationship with their unlikely landlord. When Josie first greets Tyrone, she observes that he looks so well that he must have stopped at the inn for a morning drink; he addresses her as "the Virgin Queen of Ireland"; and she replies, "[D]on't be miscalling me a virgin. You'll ruin my reputation." The three of them conspire against Harder, a rich, coddled, perpetual undergraduate whom Josie insults openly. Phil returns late that evening from a drinking spree to tell Josie that Tyrone has agreed to sell Harder their farm for three times its worth. Furious with the betrayal, she plans to seduce and compromise Tyrone, but she later learns that he made the deal as a joke just to annoy Harder.

Tyrone drinks to escape the torment of guilt over his mother's death, especially the long railroad journey back from California, when he spent every night with a "blonde pig" of a whore. Josie realizes that his fondest wish is to find forgiveness and peace in death and that her love cannot save him, so as he sleeps in her arms, she marvels, "[I]t's a fine end to all my scheming, to sit here with the dead hugged to my breast, and the silly mug of the moon grinning down, enjoying the joke!" Act 3 closes with O'Neill's Pietà: Josie as the forgiving mother cradling the body of her suffering son. In the end, Tyrone, absolved, walks away to wait for the release he desires.

John McClain praised O'Neill's ability to find poetry in the situation, but Anthony West argued that Tyrone's drunken train ride "can only anchor him in our minds as a grotesque or caricature" (Houchin, 1993). Richard Watts Jr. described the piece as another of "O'Neill's dark and brooding contemplations of our tormented souls [and] a moving, beautiful and shattering play" (Miller, 1973).

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Ardolino, Frank. "Irish Myth and Legends in Long Day's Journey Into Night and A Moon for the Misbegotten." Eugene O'Neill Review 22 (Spring–Fall 1998): 63–69.
- Garvey, Sheila Hickey. "New Myths for Old: A Production History of the 2000 Broadway Revival of A Moon for the Misbegotten." Eugene O'Neill Review 24 (Spring–Fall 2000): 121–133.
- Hinden, Michael. "O'Neill and Jamie: A Survivor's Tale." Comparative Drama 35 (2001–2002): 435–445.
- Houchin, John H., ed. The Critical Response to Eugene O'Neill. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.
- Manheim, Michael. "O'Neill's Transcendence of Melodrama in A Touch of the Poet and A Moon for the Misbegotten." Comparative Drama 16 (Fall 1982): 238–250.
- Miller, Jorden Y. Eugene O'Neill and American Critic. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1973.

Jeffrey D. Mason

MORETT, MARÍA (1964–)

I believe that theater can transform society by functioning as a mirror that not only reflects a particular problem but also allows each audience member to recognize herself in that reflection, in such a way that she becomes filled with questions and energized by the desire to broaden the horizons of her day-to-day world.

—María Morett

María Morett is a playwright, director, actress, and producer. She was born on June 18, 1964, and has lived all her life in Mexico City. Her plays have been performed throughout Mexico and other Latin American countries, as well as in the United States and Europe. She studied playwriting with Hugo Argüelles, OSVALDO DRAGÚN, JOSÉ SANCHIZ SINISTERRA, MIGDALIA CRUZ, and MARÍA IRENE FORNÉS; acting at the Núcleo de Estudios Teatrales with Julio Castillo, Luis de Tavira, Ludwik Margules, and Juan José Gurrola; scene and lighting design with Alejandro Luna; and theater pedagogy with Luis de Tavira at Mexico City's Casa del Teatro.

In 1992, Morett co-founded, with Alvaro Hegewisch, the group ME XIHC CO TEATRO, a company devoted primarily to the creation of site-specific theater. With Me xihc co, she has written and produced The Weeping Woman (La Llorona, 1991), Mozart and the Elves (Mozart y los duendes, 1994), Death (Muerte, 1995), Alarconando (1998), QUIJOTES: Wandering Visions (QUIJOTES: Visiones itinerantes, 1998, also co-directed), Crossings: Meeting of the Millennium (Cruces: Encuentro de milenio, 1999, also co-directed), Women in Confinement (Mujeres en el encierro, 2001, also directed) and More Labyrinths (Más laberintos, 2003, also directed).

Women in Confinement, the play for which Morett has received the greatest acclaim, both in Mexico and the United States, was inspired by her experience conducting theater workshops from 1993 to 1997 in the women's prisons of Mexico City and Colombia. Set within the physical confines of an actual prison, Women in Confinement explores the notion of female confinement as a labyrinth formed by social, cultural, and archetypal structures of repression. It focuses on the peculiar social contract of supervision that exists in these microcosms, set off from the society at large by prison walls and composed solely of women living "on the edge" who have established among themselves a unique system of behavioral norms and codes of honor. In so doing, they blatantly question the norms of the dominant society—a society that holds itself up as the model to which they must aspire in order to achieve the "miracle" of rehabilitation. The play also addresses, in particular, the condition of the Latin American woman who, in her family and workplace, confronts a complex web of social archetypes that shape her personal, romantic, and professional relationships.

Women in Confinement opened at the 2001 Festival Internacional Cervantino and was then produced at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM) in Mexico City, completing a run of fifty sold-out performances in April 2002. Deborah Saivetz's English translation of this play was given a staged reading at New York's West End Theater in 2002 and is published in the journal TheatreForum. The play has also been translated into German by Cordelia Dvůrák.

Morett has been honored by and awarded grants from Fondo Nacional para la Cultura y las Artes (FONCA) and its "Young Creators" program; the U.S./Mexico Fund for Culture; Residencias Mexico—Colombia; Convocatoria Nacional de Teatro; the New York International Fringe Festival; Voice & Vision; Arts International; and California's Sol Prize. She is founder and director of Proyecto Ariadna, an international network for the development of alternative art; Mexico's playwright delegate to the Generación Ñ Project of Spain's General Society of Authors and Editors; and a member of the Lincoln Center Theater Directors' Lab, New York's National Conference of Latino Artists (NALAC), and the International Theater School of Latin America and the Caribbean (EITALC). She currently serves as theater consultant for Mexico's Centro Nacional de Artes (CENART).

PLAYS: The Weeping Woman (La Llorona, 1991); Mozart and the Elves (Mozart y los duendes, 1994); Death (Muerte, 1995); Alarconeando (1998); QUIJOTES: Wandering Visions (QUIJOTES: Visiones itinerantes, 1998); Crossings: Meeting of the Millennium (Cruces: Encuentro de milenio, 1999); Women in Confinement (Mujeres en el encierro, 2001); More Labyrinths (Más laberintos, 2003)

FURTHER READING

Barrera, Reyna. Reverend of Mujeres en el encierro, by María Morett. Unomásuno (February 16, 2002).
Morett, María. Women in Confinement (Mujeres en el encierro). Tr. by Deborah Saivet. TheatreForum 23 (June 2003): 22–41.
Riveroll, Julieta. "Vuelve metáfora las prisiones" [Prisons become metaphor]. Reforma (October 19, 2001): C4.
Saivet, Deborah. "The Theatrical Labyrinths of María Morett." Introduction to Women in Confinement (Mujeres en el encierro), by María Morett. Tr. by Deborah Saivet. TheatreForum 23 (June 2003): 18–21.

Deborah Saivet

MORIMOTO KAORU (1912–1946)

Morimoto Kaoru, Japanese SHINGEKI playwright, was regarded as the most promising young playwright to emerge during the war years. He began as a contributor to Gekisaku (Playwriting), a journal started by Kishida Kunio (1890–1954) in 1932 as an outlet for what he called "genuine" (meaning not political) Japanese playwrights. Morimoto's first critical success came with the Literary Theatre (Bungakuzai), established in 1938 by Kishida and playwrights KUBOTA MANTARŌ (1889–1963) and Iwata Toyoo (1893–1969). Iwata saw real potential in Morimoto and brought him into the company. Their inaugural evening featured four plays, including Morimoto's A Clever Girl (Migoto na Onna, 1938). The critical reception of this and other Morimoto plays is instructive. Those convinced that theater should take a political approach found Morimoto and his ilk in the Literary Theatre insubstantial and unconnected with real events, while those in agreement with the apolitical approach espoused by Kishida, Kubota, and Iwata found Morimoto to be a truly fresh new talent. He is cited for his clear dialogue, pathos, and portrayal of original attitudes and feelings.

Kishida came to rely increasingly on Morimoto for more than playwriting skills. When, for example, the Literary Theatre attempted to stage Iizawa Tadasu's (1909–1994) Battle of the Birds and Beasts (Chōjū Gassen) in 1944, a COMEDY satirizing the war effort, government censors served notice that the play was unacceptable. So Kishida tapped the energetic Morimoto, rapidly becoming a leader of the company, to visit the Cabinet Information Office (Naikaku Jōhōkyoku) to plead their case. In fact, most observers regard Morimoto, with his quick grasp and total commitment to the company, as the key person who held the Literary Theatre together and allowed it to operate during the difficult war years. His efforts paid off; though he died young in 1946, the Literary Theatre flourished after the war and continues to this day.

Morimoto was perhaps inadvertently involved in the controversy surrounding Kishida and his position vis-à-vis the war. While Kishida was hardly a warmonger, he accepted a position during the war as head of a patriotic organization of writers. Morimoto, with plays that were not clearly antiwar or leftist, may also have been seen by some as tainted by association. In addition, his signature play, A Woman's Life (1945), was in fact commissioned during the war by the Greater East Asia Congress, an arm of the Japanese military that saw benefit in mobilizing writers and sending them to conquered territories.

The play, about a woman who unselfishly serves the family that has adopted her and loyally endeavors to ensure its continued prosperity, resonated with the Japanese people, then in the final throes of a seemingly interminable and tragic war. It went on to become a huge success. Beyond the play's content, Morimoto particularly here and in Angry Waves (Dotō, 1944), his other notable success, achieved what his mentor Kishida had long sought as the ideal modern theater for JAPAN—lyrical, literary, spoken plays, shorn of the prevailing proletarian inclinations and creating illusion through symbols and images.

SELECT PLAYS: A Clever Girl (Migoto na Onna, 1938); The Loyalist Report (Kinnō Todoke, 1943); Angry Waves (Dotō, 1944); Folding Fan (Ōgi, 1944); A Woman's Life (Onna no Isshō, 1945); A Splendid Family (Hanabanasiki Ichizoku, 1950)

FURTHER READING

Ibaraki, Tadashi. Nihon Shingeki Shōshi [A short history of shingeki]. Tokyo: Miraisha, 1980.
Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era—Poetry, Drama, Criticism. New York: Henry Holt, 1984.
Morimoto, Kaoru. Morimoto Kaoru Gikyoku Zenshū [Complete plays of Morimoto Kaoru]. Tokyo: Bokuyōsha, 1968.
Nihon Kindai Engeki-shi Kenkyūkai, ed. Nijusseiki no Gikyoku I: Gendai Gikyoku no Tenkai [Twentieth-century plays I: The world of modern Japanese plays]. Tokyo: Shakai Hyōronsha, 2002.
Powell, Brian. Japan's Modern Theatre: A Century of Continuity and Change. London: Japan Library, 2002.

Rimer, J. Thomas. Toward a Modern Japanese Theatre. Kishida Kunio. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1974.

John K. Gillespie

MORI ŌGAI (1862–1922)

Mori Ōgai, Japanese novelist, playwright, translator, and critic, was one of the beacons for modernization in the arts of late-19th- and early-20th-century JAPAN. Born Mori Rintarō (Ōgai was a pen name) to a long line of medical doctors, Ōgai spent four years in GERMANY, from 1884 to 1888, studying medicine, frequenting the theater, and reading widely in literature and PHILOSOPHY. Besides maintaining a high-profile public career as a military doctor and bureaucrat (he was promoted to surgeon general of Japan in 1907), he also founded several literary magazines, including Subaru (The Pleiades, est. 1909), which published most of his original plays. He was also a frequent contributor to Kabuki, a theater magazine edited by his brother Miki Takeji.

Within months after returning to Japan in 1888, Ōgai took issue with the Society for Theatre Reform (Engeki Kairyōkai) by insisting on the need for “backstage poets” to create works of lasting literary value before any work was carried out to improve theater architecture or acting methods. During the 1890s his theater criticism was instrumental in introducing the best of contemporary Western theater to Japanese readers, long before it was possible to stage the plays. A great stylist, Ōgai’s translations revolutionized Japan’s modern fiction and drama. His translation of HENRIK IBSEN’s JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN, staged by OSANAI KAORU’s Free Theatre (Jiyū Gekijō) in 1909, galvanized contemporary Japanese thought and theater. Playwright MAFUNE YUTAKA considered Ōgai’s translations a “bible” for younger playwrights learning the craft; they spurred a vogue for one-act drama in the Taishō era (1912–1925).

Drama chiefly interested Ōgai as a medium in which to experiment in literary form and express ideas. A writer of mostly one-act plays, he is credited for creating a modern dramatic idiom; his plays trace the historical development of Japanese, from high classical, poetic diction (The Jeweled Comb-Box and the Two Urashimas [Tamakushige Futari Urashima, 1902]), through kyōgen (Nichiren’s Street Sermon [Nichiren Tsuji-seppō, 1904]) and the puppet theater (Purumula, 1909), to modern colloquial dialogue in such plays as the semiautobiographical Masks (Kamen, 1909). Ōgai was also first to use modern Japanese in plays with a historical setting, such as Shizuka (1909) and The River Ikuta (Ikutagawa, 1910). Legend and history, rather than modern events, were the basis for most of his drama, which is often criticized for its lack of dramatic tension and expository tone; MAURICE MAETERLINCK, rather than HENRIK IBSEN, was his guide. As in his fiction, Ōgai’s plays reflect his social concerns. A staunch member of the establishment in his public life, he was nonetheless a progressive on such issues as socialism, feminism, and the naturalist movement. His heroes and heroines are typically stoics who, in a spirit of defiant resignation, confront their fate: tuberculosis in Masks, a merciless ruler in Shizuka, and social convention in The River Ikuta. Though an advocate of Japan’s modernization, he was no slavish imitator of Western ways but sought a middle ground on which Japanese traditions could speak on equal terms with the innovations of European drama.

[See also Naturalism; Nō and Kyōgen; Shingeki]

PLAYS: The Jeweled Comb-Box and the Two Urashimas (Tamakushige Futari Urashima, 1902); Nichiren’s Street Sermon (Nichiren Tsuji-seppō, 1904); Masks (Kamen, 1909); Purumula (1909); Shizuka (1909); The River Ikuta (Ikutagawa, 1910)

FURTHER READING

Bowring, Richard John. Mori Ōgai and the Modernization of Japanese Culture. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1979.

Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama, Criticism. New York: Henry Holt, 1984.

Mori Ōgai. Ōgai Zenshū [Complete works of Ōgai]. 38 vols. Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1971–1975.

———. Masks. Tr. by M. Vardaman Jr. In Mori Ōgai, Youth and Other Stories, ed. by J. Thomas Rimer. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1994. 291–311.

Motofuji, Frank T. “Mori Ōgai: Three Plays and the Problem of Identity.” Modern Drama 9, no. 4 (February 1967): 412–430.

Powell, Brian. Japan’s Modern Theatre: A Century of Continuity and Change. London: Japan Library, 2000.

Rimer, J. Thomas. Mori Ōgai. Boston: Twayne, 1975.

M. Cody Poulton

MORNING’S AT SEVEN

Morning’s at Seven is a story play. I think that no matter how much you want to delve into character, the terribly main thing is the plot. You want to know what’s happening and how it’s going to come out. —Paul Osborn, 1981

Morning’s at Seven is PAUL OSBORN’s most successful original work for the theater. Forty years after its 1939 first appearance on Broadway earned a tepid critical and box-office response, it was given a stellar Broadway revival in 1980. The play earned a Tony Award for Osborn as best revival of the 1979–1980 season. Tony Awards were also bestowed on Vivian Matalon as director and David Rounds as best supporting actor in a play. It has been revived regularly by nonprofit theaters across America. Yet it is not always successful: a 2002 Broadway revival with a strong company drew poor reviews and limited audience response.

Morning’s at Seven is a conventionally structured, three-act, realistic family COMEDY with a sense of unerring dialogue that forcefully establishes the play’s nine characters, reveals their quirky foibles, and can elicit strong laughter from an audience. The characters—a single family of four somewhat batty sisters, their husbands, and progeny—are mostly in their sixties and seventies, plain people who deal with the gentle everyday small problems of life: marriage, fidelity, relationships. Each character has a reversal, that moment when metaphorical lightning strikes, and lives are forever changed.

The action takes place in a small American town late one afternoon in 1939 and continues the following morning. For the 1980 revival the director urged Osborn to let him move the time back to 1922. Matalon says that he felt it “essential for the action to take place during a period of greater innocence in the country’s history, during an era of greater simplicity before we had experienced the profound disappointments we were to run upon later—before the shadow of Hitler and the Depression.”

Morning’s at Seven is set in the adjoining backyards of two houses in an unnamed town. One house belongs to Ted Swanson, his wife Cora, and Cora’s spinster sister Aaronetta (called Arry) Gibbs. The other house is occupied by another of Cora’s sisters, Ida Bolton, her husband Carl (given to “spells” of failure anxiety), and Homer, their forty-year-old bachelor son hopelessly tied to his mother’s apron strings. The fourth Gibbs sister, Esther Crampton, lives in another part of town with her husband David, a retired college professor who snobbishly despises his in-laws. These eight characters are joined by Homer’s girlfriend, the thirty-seven-year-old Myrtle Brown.

The seeming tranquility of this tight-knit family is added by Homer’s decision to marry Myrtle after a twelve-year courtship, move out of his parents’ house, and strike out on his own. This stunning revelation unbalances the family dynamics, especially as it motivates Cora to demand that Arry leave her house so that she might reclaim her life with Ted. It is no secret in this close-knit family that Arry once had a brief affair with Ted many years ago.

Osborn plucked the play’s title from a line of Robert Brownning’s famous long poem of 1841, Pippa Passes: “Morning’s at seven; / The hill-side’s dew-pearled / The lark’s on the wing; / Thesnail’s on the thorn; / God’s in his Heaven— / All’s right with the world!” When Morning’s at Seven concludes, Osborn assures us that despite the comic upheavals, all is indeed right in the world of the various Gibbs sisters.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

Atkinson, Brooks. “Paul Osborn’s ‘Morning’s at Seven,’ a Comedy of American Family Life in a Small Town.” New York Times (December 1, 1939).

Barnes, Clive. “‘Morning’s at Seven’: A Hit at Any Hour.” New York Post (April 11, 1980).

Hinson, Hal. “At Last, Paul Osborn Finds the Rainbow.” Los Angeles Herald Examiner (December 5, 1981).

Kerr, Walter. “Stage: ‘Morning’s at 7,’ Laughter at Twilight.” New York Times (April 11, 1980).

Jim Patterson

MOSCOW ART THEATRE AND STUDIOS

The period of the Moscow Art Theatre’s greatest success coincided with the reign of Nicholas II (1895–1917), which was both an exciting and tragic period in Russian history marked by rapid economic development and by the intensification of liberal and socialist movements. However, RUSSIA’S defeat in the Russo-Japanese war of 1904–1905, followed by the revolutions of 1905 and 1917, meant that the czar survived at the expense of granting Russia a constitution and a parliament. Inevitably, a reactionary period set in where concession and repression alternated. Nevertheless, the period witnessed an amazing cultural flowering during which Russian intellectual life was lively and pluralistic, as well as receptive to Western influences.

KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY (1863–1938) and Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko (1859–1943), critic, playwright, and a teacher in the Philharmonic Drama School, met on June 22, 1897, at the Slavic Bazaar restaurant in Moscow and agreed to found the Moscow Art Theatre (MKhAT; Moskovskii Khudozhestvennyi Teatr). The theater opened in 1898 with Aleksei Tolstoy’s historical TRAGEDY Tsar Fyodor Ioannovich. The combination of historical accuracy and theatrical splendor made the production a success. “The historical line” continued with Tolstoy’s Death of Ivan the Terrible (1899) and Julius Caesar (1903). During the first decades of the 20th century, the reception of ANTON CHEKHOV as a playwright was intimately linked to the interpretation of his plays at the MKhAT. THE SEAGULL had been included in the repertoire at Nemirovich’s insistence. Stanislavsky wrote the production plan and translated the text into stage terms to create the illusion of scenic life. The premiere in December 1898 was a triumph for the author and the true birth of the new theater. The MKhAT had found its own style, the theater of atmosphere and mood, in the poetic REALISM of Chekhov’s plays, which had a tremendous impact on Russian theater and originated a whole new school of ACTING and directing. Foreign directors came to Moscow to learn “the MKhAT manner,” and the theater remained unequalled for decades as the home of psychological drama performed as a musical unit within the framework of realistic scenery.

Within a few years, the MKhAT was able to fulfill what Nemirovich regarded as one of its prime functions—the presentation of outstanding contemporary Russian or unfamiliar foreign plays dealing with important social issues. However, fundamental divisions between the two directors began to emerge. For Nemirovich, the basis of a production lay in a detailed literary analysis that was then “illustrated” by the staging. However, he introduced modernistic devices when he staged his beloved HENRIK IBSEN. For Stanislavsky, a production was created in the actual rehearsal period itself, through the active collaboration of actor, director, and designer. Stanislavsky began to stage symbolist drama and started experiments in the studio on Povarskaya Street with VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD. The studio did not last long, and it was never opened to the public, but it laid the foundation for their future explorations.

Pursuing his notion of a literary theater, Nemirovich emerged as a significant director of "Russian tragedy" in adaptations of Fyodor Dostoevsky's novels. In The Brothers Karamazov (1910) he evolved a new form, using a narrator to link scenes, thus breaking the traditional four-act structure. Nikolai Stavrogin (1913) was based on Dostoevsky's novel The Possessed. After the last symbolist experiment—Hamlet, directed in 1911 by Stanislavsky in Gordon Craig's abstract sets—the theater returned to the realistic drama, and in the process, a whole literary generation was ignored even though Nemirovich introduced plays by Aleksei Naidonov, Aleksei Chirikov, Georgi Yartsev, and Dmitri Merezhkovsky. Stanislavsky was more interested in material for actors' improvisation, and Nemirovich's hope of finding the new psychological drama in LEONID ANDREEV works was not fulfilled. Despite success with audiences, both directors felt the theater to be in decline. In 1912, Stanislavsky established a studio to rejuvenate the true spirit of MKhAT and forge the system of actors' training. In the First Studio, as it was soon called, artistic training owed much to Leopold Sulerzhitsky, a supporter of LYOV TOLSTOY's moral teachings. The studio had talented youth, who would become famous directors. The Studio opened with HERMAN HEIJERMANS's The Wreck of the "Hope." Expressionistic notes sounded for the first time on the Russian stage in GERHART HAUPTMANN's The Festival of Peace and Henning Berger's The Flood, both directed by Evgeny Vakhtangov. Stanislavsky transferred his most innovative work to a series of studios, created as adjuncts to the main stage and often financed by himself. He founded the Second Studio in 1916; the Third, which was a school created by Vakhtangov, in 1920; and the Fourth in 1921. An Opera Studio was started in 1918.

The October Revolution in 1917 was met with indecision and fear by the actors of the MKhAT, most of whom were politically passive. In 1919 all theaters were nationalized. The government conferred the title of academic on the most prominent, including the MKhAT, thus taking these theaters under its protection and giving them special finances. In 1923, censorship appeared, but already, between 1917 and 1922, the theater staged only one production in which Stanislavsky tried to express the spirit of the age—Byron's Cain (1920)—but this was not appreciated by audiences. Stanislavsky worked at the First Studio, revising productions prepared by young directors, such as William Shakespeare's Twelfth Night. Innovations took place in the three studios, which developed as individual collectives. In the First Studio Evgeny Vakhtangov crossbred psychological realism with theatricalism. AUGUST STRINDBERG's Erik XIV was directed by Vakhtangov as a MONODRAMA with stylistic elements of EXPRESSIONISM in which Michael Chekhov acted the tortured monarch. Vakhtangov also directed Chekhov's The Wedding at the Third Studio (1921) and Solomon Ansky's THE DYB-BUG at the Habima Studio (1922), his work culminating with a production of Carlo Gozzi's Princess Turandot (1922). By making the naive fairy tale a celebration of art, Vakhtangov created a contrast to the cold and dark world of contemporary Moscow. In 1926 the Third Studio became the Vakhtangov Theatre.

Leftist critics condemned MKhAT as a bourgeois theater; Chekhov's plays were dismissed as irrelevant. Only Vladimir Lenin's support and that of ANATOLY LUNACHARSKY, commissar for the arts, saved the theater from destruction. Stanislavsky refused to work with the Studios because of aesthetic differences. One solution to the difficulties was to send the theater on a foreign tour to Berlin, Paris, and the UNITED STATES in 1922–1924 with legendary productions such as Tsar Fyodor and Chekhov's plays and with consequences that have influenced Western theater practice to this day. On its return to the Soviet Union, the MKhAT became one of the oases of theatrical culture. Stanislavsky's appeal to the government resulted in being taken under direct government control, and the plenitude of artistic and administrative power was again restored to its directors and founders. In 1923, the First Studio became independent and took the name of the Second Moscow Art Theatre. The Third Studio also became independent, while the Second Studio was merged with the main company. From 1924 to 1928 the Second MKhAT was headed by Michael Chekhov, who created an alternative theater that used symbolic means of expression. The spirituality of his interpretation of Hamlet (1924) shook audiences, as did his performance as Senator Ableukhov in a dramatization of Petersburg by symbolist writer Andrei Bely. However, frustrated by political interference in his work, Michael Chekhov left Soviet Russia in 1928 to create studios in Europe and America.

The movement of the MKhAT toward contemporary subject matter began with adaptations of new Soviet prose, but Nemirovich also directed new Soviet plays such as Konstantin Trenyov's The Pugachyov Rebellion (1925), while Stanislavsky worked on one of the best civil war plays, Vsevolod Ivanov's Armoured Train 14-69 (1927). Nemirovich worked abroad from 1925 to 1928, while Stanislavsky continued to create the new MKhAT. The most significant and successful production was of DAYS OF THE TURBINS by MIKHAIL BULGAKOV (1926).

In 1928, at the beginning of the Stalinist era, Nemirovich and Stanislavsky were responsible for the defense of MKhAT's traditions. In 1931 it was made directly accountable to the government with the title State Moscow Art Theatre of the USSR. Joseph Stalin awarded the MKhAT his equivalent of "most favored" status, and the theater's past was obliterated when renamed the Gorky Academic Art Theatre in 1932. In the 1930s, the MKhAT enjoyed great popularity. Nemirovich directed Vsevolod Ivanov's The Blockade (1929), MAKSIM GORKY's Enemies (1933), and Konstantin Trenyov's Lyubov Yarovaya (1936). The great Russian realist tradition was identified with the new, optimistic SOCIALIST REALISM, and the theater's tour to Paris in 1937 was intended as a showpiece of this policy. As a result, the best modern plays did not reach its stage. Bulgakov's Molière was rehearsed for five years, but Bulgakov and Stanislavsky disagreed over the interpretation and Nemirovich took over. The production opened in 1936 but was soon closed. Bulgakov's Flight and NIKOLAI ERDMAN'S THE SUICIDE, which Stanislavsky rated highly, were banned. After Hamlet, in Boris Pasternak's translation, had been in rehearsal for a long time, it too was banned. Attempts to revive the traditions of psychological drama were made, and in the early 1930s Vladimir Kirshon's Bread and Maxim Afinogenov's Fear appeared on the MKhAT stage. High points were the adaptations of Tolstoy's novels Resurrection (1930) and Anna Karenina (1937), directed by Nemirovich. He also directed THE THREE SISTERS (1940), a significant new production of Chekhov's play after almost forty years.

After the 1941–1945 war, the MKhAT was in deep crisis, having long since lost any notion of quality where repertoire was concerned. After the death of Joseph Stalin in 1953, the revival of Russian theater began with Oleg Yefremov and other graduates from the MKhAT drama school. A new studio, the Sovremennik (Contemporary) tried to revive the artistic and ethical ideals of the old MKhAT. In 1970 Yefremov became artistic director of the theater, and even if he was unable to reform the company of 180 actors, he created another company within it and produced modern plays by Mikhail Roshchin, Aleksandr Gelman, and Aleksandr Vampilov. The best young directors were invited, including Lev Dodin, who directed one of the most important productions of the Brezhnev era, The Golóulyous, an adaptation of the classic novel by Mikhail Saltykov-Shchedrin.

In 1987 the huge company was divided into two. Oleg Yefremov stayed at the helm of MKhAT 1, now renamed after Chekhov, and Tatyana Doronina became head of MKhAT 2, which preserved the name of Gorky. Yefremov found a new author, Lyudmila Petrushevskaya, and staged The Moscow Choir. He also attained tragic simplicity in his final production—Three Sisters (1997). Following Yefremov's death in 1999, he was succeeded as head of MKhAT 1 by Oleg Tabakov.

FURTHER READING

- Amiard-Chevrel, C. Le Théâtre Artistique de Moscou (1898–1917) [The artistic theater of Moscow]. Paris: CNRS, 1979.
- Leach, R., and V. Borovsky, eds. A History of Russian Theatre. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
- Nemirovich-Danchenko, Vladimir. My Life in Russian Theatre. Tr. by John Cournos. London: Geoffrey Bles, 1937.
- Saylor, Oliver M. Inside the Moscow Art Theatre. New York: Brentano's, 1925.
- Slonim, Marc. Russian Theatre from the Empire to the Soviets. London: Methuen, 1963.
- Smeliansky, Anatoly. The Russian Theatre after Stalin. Tr. by Patrick Miles. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
- Stanislavsky, Constantin. My Life in Art. Tr. by J. J. Robbins. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1967.
- Worrall, Nick. Modernism to Realism on the Soviet Stage. Tairou—Vakhtangov—Okhlopov. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1989.
- . The Moscow Art Theatre. New York: Routledge, 1996.

Liisa Byckling

MOSCOW STATE YIDDISH THEATRE

Despite its name, the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre (better known as GOSET, the Russian acronym for Gosudarstvennyi yevreiskii teater—literally, State Jewish Theatre) was born in St. Petersburg. It was there that a group that called itself the Jewish Theatrical Society began meeting in 1917 and, in 1919, where the Yiddish Chamber Theater began performing under the direction of Alexander Granovsky. The company began its career with a performance of MAURICE MAETERLINCK'S Blind Men (Les aveugles). The troupe then staged several works by Sholem Asch, a short symbolist work by actor Solomon Mikhoeles, and Karl Gutzkow's Uriel Acosta. None of these productions was particularly successful; Granovsky had yet to find the directorial voice that would ultimately combine professional discipline, AVANT-GARDE techniques, and the finest talents onstage and backstage that would turn GOSET into one of the most important YIDDISH THEATRE companies in the world.

The company would begin to forge its true identity shortly after moving to a small theater in Moscow. The troupe's new incarnation as GOSET began on January 1, 1921, with An Evening of Sholem Aleichem, consisting of two one-acts and a monologue by the great comic writer. Granovsky's energetic direction bore the mark of VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD and of MAX REINHARDT, with whom Granovsky had trained. Marc Chagall, who had not only designed the sets and makeup but also decorated the auditorium with murals, created a unique visual atmosphere; though he worked with the company for only one production, he exerted an influence on its aesthetics all out of proportion with his short tenure.

Though GOSET initially received lukewarm reviews, it enjoyed popular success and soon began looking for a new performance venue. In 1922 it debuted at the Malaia Bronnaia Theatre in Moscow with a revamped version of Uriel Acosta. Over the next few years, the company would distinguish itself by reinventing masterpieces by the "classic" Yiddish writers. With its 1922 production of AVROM GOLDFADEN'S The Sorceress (Di kisher-fmakherin), GOSET showed that it could put a modernist, Soviet stamp on one of the most familiar warhorses of the old Yiddish repertoire. Granovsky commissioned Yekhezkel Dobrushin and Moyshe Litvakov to rework the text, adding such touches as a symbolic funeral for the old Yiddish theater. Composer Joseph Akhron reorchestrated Goldfaden's music, and designer Isaak Rabinovich built a network of platforms and ladders on which the actors scrambled, giving a sense of constant movement.

Later that season, the company again turned to Sholem Aleichem, this time staging his COMEDY The Big Win (Dos groysge gevins), also known as 200,000. Granovsky transformed the protagonist Shimele Soroker, a simple tailor who in winning a huge lottery becomes a befuddled nouveau riche, into a traitor to the working class. Granovsky's fanciful visual style was once again evident; a split stage emphasized the split between the classes, and a matchmaker dropped in on the proceedings by parachute.

Among the artists who joined the company to work on 200,000 was composer Lev Pulver, who would stay with GOSET for the rest of its existence.

In the mid-1920s, GOSET offered theater and film audiences a feast of reinvented classics. In the 1925 silent film Luck (Yidish: glukn; Russian: Yevreiskoe schastie), Solomon Mikhoels turned Sholem Aleichem's beloved character, the frustrated businessman Menachem Mendl, into a Chaplinesque Little Tramp, and the Sovietized story illustrated the evils of life under the czar. The same period featured stage productions of Granovsky's adaptation of Isaac Leib Peretz's symbolist poetic drama A Night in the Old Marketplace (Baynakht afn altn mark), which continued the company's assault on traditional life and beliefs, and a dramatization of S. Y. Abramovitch's novel of a Jewish Don Quixote, The Travels of Benjamin III (Masoes Binyomin hashlishi). In these productions, actors Solomon Mikhoels and Benjamin Zuskin established themselves as a remarkable team, playing alter egos of the protagonist of Peretz's drama and Benjamin and his sidekick Senderl in Benjamin III. Another famed pairing would occur in the company's internationally renowned production of King Lear in 1935, where Zuskin played the Fool to Mikhoels's Lear.

GOSET made a fateful trip to Western Europe in 1928, during which Granovsky defected to the West. Mikhoels then took the helm of the company, which for the next several years shifted the emphasis in its repertoire from Yiddish classics to new works by Soviet Yiddish writers like Dovid Bergelson, Peretz Markish, and Moyshe Kulbak. Kulbak's play Boytre the Bandit (Boytre gazlen, 1936), a blunt portrayal of the Jewish urban underworld, was condemned by the regime, leading to Kulbak's arrest and disappearance into the gulag. This grim response, along with official censure of the company, put GOSET on notice that its style and content had crossed the line of what was considered politically acceptable. The troupe responded by returning once again to Yiddish theater's roots, this time presenting new versions of Goldfaden's nationalistic operettas Shulamis and Bar Kokhba. Poet Shmuel Halkin's adaptations emphasized the heroism of Jewish characters from the past, the troupe's answer to critiques that regarded Boytre's depiction of gangsters, prostitutes, and cripples as unseemly.

In retrospect, one might argue that such efforts to appease the authorities were only buying time. Though figures like Mikhoels and Zuskin amassed numerous official and unofficial accolades, and Mikhoels served with distinction as a delegate on the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee during World War II, forging links with Jewish communities in the West, Mikhoels was murdered by a Narodnyi Komissariat Vnutrennikh Del (NKVD) agent in 1948, and Zuskin was arrested later that year; in August 1952, he was shot along with twelve other prominent figures. In 1949, the curtain fell for good on GOSET, a troupe that left a remarkable theatrical legacy. GOSET was among a handful of Yiddish companies, including the Vilna Troupe, the Warsaw Yiddish Art Theatre, and Yung Teater (Warsaw) that used avant-garde theater techniques and rigorous training to create innovative productions that spoke to the concerns of Jewish audiences while attracting a following outside of Yiddish-speaking circles.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

Berkowitz, Joel, ed. Yiddish Theatre: New Approaches. London: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2003.

Picon-Vallin, Béatrice. Le théâtre juif soviétique pendant les années vingt [The Soviet Jewish theater during the Twenties]. Lausanne: La Cité-L'Âge d'Homme, 1973.

Sandrow, Nahma. Vagabond Stars: A World History of Yiddish Theater. 1977. Reprint, Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse Univ. Press, 1999.

Veidlinger, Jeffrey. The Moscow State Yiddish Theatre. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 2000.

Joel Berkowitz

MOSES, DANIEL DAVID (1952–)

Daniel David Moses, a Canadian playwright and Delaware from the Six Nations lands on the Grand River, commits himself to expanding native drama beyond an unhealthy triad of white guilt, ROMANTICISM, and TRAGEDY. Born in Ohsweken, Ontario, CANADA, in 1952, he has produced nearly a dozen dramas since 1988. As playwright, poet, and essayist, Moses acts as an advocate for Canadian Aboriginal writing. He co-edited a widely read anthology of native literature and serves as the artistic directorate of Canada's Native Earth Performing Arts.

Moses objects vigorously to three confines that, he feels, have trapped most native drama. According to Moses, white guilt perpetuates the very wounds drama should work to heal; romanticizing the past prevents meaningful investigation of those wounds; and the climactic structure of conventional Western tragedy dooms all idealistic hopes for the future, purging the very desires that it articulates.

Moses has attempted to transcend each of these in his nearly two decades of theatrical works. Big Buck City (1991) portrayed untragic characters, The Dreaming Beauty (1990) used the storytelling methods of "youth drama" and the oratory of First Nations theater to reflect on 500 years of history, and his Indian Medicine Shows (Angel of the Medicine Show [1996] and Moon and Dead Indians [1996]) explored the phenomenon of the "vanishing Indian" in binary one-act dramas.

Most critical attention has centered on ALMIGHTY VOICE AND HIS WIFE, which shattered the Aristotelian model of tragedy. The first act depicted the ill-fated marriage of the 19th-century Cree, Kisse-Manitou-Wayou (Almighty Voice), and the daughter of Old Dust (White Girl). It trailed the incidents that lead Almighty Voice to murder and his own ultimate execution. In the second act, White Girl reconciles with her husband's ghost in a variation on the minstrel show. The play ends with a melancholy dance of healing. Almighty Voice disrupts commoditization of race, represents natives of thorny character, and provides an experimental landscape to heal the wounds of historical tragedy.

His proactive stance on native drama has sometimes led to controversy. While lecturing on Coyote City, he was accused of exploiting native stereotypes (specifically the “drunken Indian”). Moses dismissed the objection as ignorant of his unique theatrical style, but he elsewhere acknowledged that qualities of The Moon and Dead Indians, which portrayed white conceit and paranoia regarding “wild Indians,” disturbed even him.

Moses never shies from the more unsettling aspects of race hatred and racial self-hatred. He outright rejects the notion of an authentic Indian voice in drama, refusing countless offers to dramatize the stories of other Native Americans. Believing that anecdotal material can never be useful, Moses creates performance canvases that use his own knowledge of history to respond to present social problems. In the words of Robert Appleford, Moses’s plays “hold funhouse mirrors up to our desire for ‘real Indians’ in Canadian theatre” (Appleford, 1993). As winner of the James Buller Memorial Award for Excellence in Aboriginal Theatre (1996), as well as one-act awards from The New Play Centre and Theatre Canada, Moses has sought to craft a theatrical context that is shocking, bitterly aware of burdens of racism, sometimes outrageous, and ever his own.

PLAYS: Coyote City (1988); The Dreaming Beauty (1990); Almighty Voice and His Wife (1991); Big Buck City (1991); Kyotopolis (1992); Brebeuf’s Ghost (1996); Angel of the Medicine Show (1996); Moon and Dead Indians (1996); City of Shadows (1998); Red River (with Jim Millan, 1998); The Witch of Niagara (1998)

FURTHER READING

- Appleford, Robert. “The Desire to Crunch Bone: Daniel David Moses and the ‘True Real Indian.’” Canadian Theatre Review 77 (1993): 21–26.
- Knowles, Richard. “‘Look. Look Again.’ Daniel David Moses’ Decolonizing Optics.” In Crucible of Cultures: Anglophone Drama at the End of the New Millennium, ed. by Marc Maufort and Franca Bellarsi. New York: P. Lang, 2002.
- Knowles, Richard, and Monique Mojica, eds. Staging Coyote’s Dream: An Anthology of First Nations Drama in English. Toronto: Playwrights Canada Press, 2003.
- Moses, Daniel David. “How My Ghosts Got Pale Faces.” In Speaking for the Generations: Native Writers on Writing, ed. by Simon J. Ortiz. Tucson: Univ. of Arizona Press, 1998.
- Moses, Daniel David, and Terry Goldie. An Anthology of Canadian Native Literature in English. 2d ed. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1998.

Ben Fislér

THE MOTHER

BERTOLT BRECHT (1898–1956) started work on The Mother (Die Mutter) in 1931; it was first performed on January 17, 1932, and would have fourteen performances before Brecht died. Because Brecht kept revising the text, there are three main versions (1933, 1938, 1957). The music for the songs was composed by Hanns Eisler (1898–1962).

Die Mutter is loosely adapted from the Russian novel Mat (1906, Mother) by MAKSIM GORKY (1868–1936). The novel tells the story of Pavel Vlasova and his mother, Pelagea, during the 1905 revolution in Russia. Brecht retained only the barest plot from Gorky’s sentimental and overwritten book, namely, the evolution of Pavel’s mother into an ardent supporter of revolution. He also extended the time frame past 1905 up until 1917; the play ends on the eve of the revolution of 1917.

The Mother, however, is not a historical drama. It grew out of what Brecht called the Lehrstück (LEARNING PLAY) in which the audience is challenged to find its own solutions to the problems enacted on the stage. Three aspects of learning are presented in The Mother. One is the education of the central character, Pelagea Vlasova, who initially wants to have nothing to do with political action but is compelled by circumstances to the insight that only a revolution—violent if need be—can bring economic and social reform. A second theme is the education of others by Pelagea. Using common sense and native wit, she seizes every opportunity to teach others to see through the surface appearances of society and become independent, critical thinkers. Finally, there is the interaction between the play and the members of the audience, who are addressed directly in the songs: “Whose fault is it, if oppression remains? Ours.”

The form of the play is derived from the “station drama” often preferred by expressionist playwrights. It consists of fourteen episodes, each of which is structured as a minidrama with events leading to a climax within the act. Continuity for the play is provided by the character of Pelagea and her story and also by the intensification of the revolutionary struggle that becomes evident. At the beginning, only scattered individuals act, but by the end they have become a large, powerful group marching through the streets.

As always with Brecht, the language appears simple but is carefully crafted, as in the chiasmus “What you don’t know yourself / You don’t know.” Because Pelagea’s diction is generally so restrained, her one outburst against the Russian men who send their sons into a senseless war stands out for its imagery and intensity: “No animal would offer up its young the way you do yours, without sense or reason, for a bad cause. Your wombs should be ripped out.”

The Mother may be taken as a counterpoint to Brecht’s more famous MOTHER COURAGE AND HER CHILDREN (Mutter Courage und ihre Kinder, 1939–1940). Whereas in The Mother the title character learns from her experiences and takes action to end oppression, Mother Courage, who believes she can make a deal with war, learns nothing from her sufferings. Pelagea Vlasova marches at the end with a company of others, but Mother Courage is finally left all alone.

FURTHER READING

- Bawey, Petermichael von. "Dramatic Structure of Revolutionary Language: Tragicomedy in Brecht's The Mother." CLIO: A Journal of Literature, History, and the Philosophy of History 10 (1980): 21–33. Also in Critical Essays on Bertolt Brecht. Ed. by Siegfried Mews. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989. 96–106.
- Kepa, Ania. "The Relationship of Brecht's Die Mutter to Its Sources: A Reassessment." German Life and Letters 38, no. 3 (1985): 233–248.
- Ritterhoff, Teresa. "Ver/Ratlosigkeit: Benjamin, Brecht, and Die Mutter." Brecht Yearbook / Das Brecht-Jahrbuch 24 (1999): 246–262.
- Salehi, Eric. "No Brecht-fest in America: Revisiting the Theatre Union's 1935 Production of Mother." On-Stage Studies 21 (1998): 75–97.

Arnd Bohm

MOTHER COURAGE AND HER CHILDREN

BERTOLT BRECHT wrote Mother Courage and Her Children (Mutter Courage und ihre Kinder) in SWEDEN in 1939 during his years as a refugee from Nazi GERMANY. The play premiered in Zurich in 1941 and was first produced in Germany in 1949 at the Deutsches Theater in East Berlin under the direction of the author.

Written just as Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin were invading POLAND, the play was intended by Brecht as a cautionary tale warning "the little person" against "participation . . . in the catastrophe that everyone then saw on the horizon" (Fuegi, 1972).

The action of the play begins in 1624 during a Protestant recruiting campaign. Mother Courage, who sells supplies to the armies of the Thirty Years' War, enters aboard her wagon, drawn by her sons, Eilif and Swiss Cheese. Next to her sits her mute daughter, Katrin. Accosted by two recruiting officers, Mother Courage tries to keep her sons from joining up, but while she is behind the wagon selling a belt buckle, Eilif, the brave one, enlists. Thus Brecht illustrates two of the play's major ideas. First, those who feed the war—like Mother Courage—will themselves be devoured by it. Second, in the world of total warfare that exists apart from socialism, human virtue, such as Eilif's bravery, must always be a liability.

Next, Swiss Cheese is undone by his own honesty. He becomes the paymaster for a Protestant regiment, to which he tries to return the cash box during a Catholic attack. He is caught, arrested, and sentenced to death. Mother Courage is offered the opportunity of buying his freedom, but to raise the money she would have to sell the wagon. Torn between economic necessity and maternal instinct, she hesitates too long, and honest Swiss Cheese is executed.

As the years pass, Mother Courage and Katrin cross and recross war-torn Central Europe. Katrin is raped, and the wagon is looted. Peace breaks out, threatening business, but brave Eilif continues his wartime behavior and kills a peasant. Now, however, such an act is criminal, and he is condemned to death for it. When he comes to say good-bye to his mother, she is off buying and selling. Thus, without knowing it, she loses another son to the insatiable war.

Reduced to rags and hunger, hauling the wagon like beasts, Mother Courage and Katrin continue to follow the armies. As Catholics prepare to attack the sleeping town of Halle, Courage goes off to hunt bargains while kindhearted Katrin learns how the city's children will be slaughtered. She climbs to the top of a shed and begins to beat a drum to warn the victims. Shot dead when she refuses to stop, she nonetheless manages to alert the town. Once again a virtuous child dies as Mother Courage is doing business.

In the last scene Courage arranges her daughter's burial and then, oblivious to the meaning of her losses, harnesses herself to the wagon to resume supplying the war. As another regiment passes by, she calls out her final line, "Hey! Take me with you!"

A great success onstage, Mother Courage provoked a level of emotional response that distressed the playwright. Its Swiss premiere elicited press commentary comparing Courage to Niobe, praising her as an exemplar of heartrending maternal vitality. This response contradicted the fundamental premise of Brecht's epic theory: that spectators should regard events onstage with rational detachment. Determined to repel such empathy in future productions, Brecht revised four scenes in the play, increasing the emphasis in each on Courage's mercenary nature and her lack of charity. Thus he would underline her role as the "hyena of the battle field," a ruthless proto-capitalist whose economic self-interest makes war possible. The changes apparently failed to work in the Berlin production eight years later. Staged amid the ruins of an occupied city, this antiwar fable drew full houses and left its audiences in tears. Said a disappointed Brecht, "I do not believe . . . that Berlin . . . understood the play" (Fuegi, 1972). This emotion-laden production was the vehicle that restored Brecht's faded reputation as a playwright and director following his years in exile. The contradiction between theory and practice evident in this paradoxical episode has been an ongoing theme in critical discussions of Brecht's work.

Mother Courage has furnished several of the hallmark images of 20th-century drama: Courage's silent scream as she denies knowing her dead son (a kind of anti-piety); Katrin's drumming herself to death in mute heroism; and Courage yoked to the wagon, which is both her livelihood and her cross.

[See also Epic Theater]

FURTHER READING

- Fuegi, John. The Essential Brecht. Los Angeles: Hennessey & Ingalls, 1972.
- . Bertolt Brecht: Chaos, According to Plan. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1987.
- White, Alfred D. Bertolt Brecht's Great Plays. London: Macmillan, 1978.

Martin Andrucki

MOTHS

ARIFIN C. NOER's Moths (Kapai-Kapai, 1970) provides an excellent example of how this Indonesian playwright and director used traditional themes and theatrical structures to speak to contemporaries. In this surrealist play, the main character, Abu, appears in different stages of his life from boyhood to death. His story is framed by a donggeng (fairy tale) his mother tells him about a prince who has a magic mirror that protects him from evil, allowing him to marry the princess, living happily ever after. As a child, Abu is transfixed by his mother's tale and wishes to find the mirror to bring some happiness to his own life.

As an adult, Abu is a dehumanized menial worker, at one point identified only by the sound of a bell that rings "... (dot dot dash)." His real life becomes confused with his dreams, in which he is the prince; his dream world and his real world constantly interrupt each other. Abu marries Ijem and has several children, all of whom die. Abu and Ijem are destitute and starving despite years of hard work. They set off to find the edge of the world where Abu believes the magic mirror to be. The Moon, Darkness, and the Bell all conspire with Mother for Abu to meet with his death at the predestined moment in 1980 when he goes through a final door and finds the trick mirror. The play ends with a replaying of the first scene of the play when Abu is a young child being put to sleep by his mother as she tells the fairy tale.

This rather vague fatalistic plot summary does an injustice to the poetic, dreamlike juxtapositions between Abu's grim day-to-day life and his elaborate fantasy world. Arifin's language is rich with metaphors and melodious words and phrases, not unlike traditional Javanese pantun (poetry) in which the sound or meaning of the first couplet of a verse influences the second couplet. In contrast to the richness and beauty of its language, a major theme in Moths is poverty—not just the poverty of bodies but also a philosophical, theological, and metaphysical poverty of souls. Abu is a messenger who illustrates a spiritual emptiness Arifin perceived in INDONESIA in the late 1960s, an Indonesia that had lost sight of its roots. According to the playwright, this simple story about the prince and his magic mirror is a speculation into an Indonesian conception of happiness, which he found was not clearly formulated etymologically. The play, too, is not clearly formulated but is hazy like a dream, a nightmare, swirling around with reality (fluttering or flailing like a moth attracted to the light), leading inexorably down a path to Abu's death and his rebirth into the cycle again. Abu—which means dust or ash—is from the start, as Mother explains to Darkness in act 1, scene 5, "Like those before, like the others, he too is dead already but doesn't know it yet."

[See also Surrealism]

FURTHER READING

Aveling, Harry. Introduction to Moths, by Arifin C. Noer. Kuala Lumpur: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, Kementerian Pelajaran, 1974.

Gillitt, Cobina. "Challenging Conventions and Crossing Boundaries: A New Tradition of Indonesian Theatre from 1968–1978." Ph.D. diss., New York Univ., 2001.

Gillitt Asmara, Cobina. "Tradisi Baru: A New Tradition of Indonesian Theatre." Asian Theatre Journal 12, no. 1 (1995): 164–174.

Cobina Gillitt

MOUAWAD, WAJDI (1968–)

Wajdi Mouawad was born on October 16, 1968, in a small Lebanese village. His family moved to Paris, FRANCE, when he was eight, and he spent his formative years here. As a young teenager, Mouawad moved with his family again to Quebec, CANADA, and it is here that his interest in theater evolved into a major focus of his life. At age seventeen, Mouawad entered the National School of Theatre of Canada, where he was heavily influenced by theatrical intellectuals like François Ismert. Mouawad graduated from the National School of Theatre of Canada in 1991 and began a successful career as writer, director, and author of more than a dozen works.

Throughout his works, Mouawad's main interest seems to be the duality of humankind's nature and environments. Because of his travels at a young age from war-torn Lebanon to France, Mouawad recognized the paradoxical nature of man: man can be loving and at the same time cruelly self-destructive in warfare. These postmodern duality informs much of Mouawad's works, especially his most famous 1996 play WEDDING DAY AT THE CRO-MAGNONS (Journée de nocés chez les Cromagnons).

Mouawad's career took off in 1998, when he was involved in four major productions in Quebec's Festival of Theatre. He received the Quebec's Critics' Circle Award for his plays Willy Protogoras Locked Up in the Toilets (Willy Protogoras enfermé dans les toilettes, 1993) and Hands of Edwige at the Time of Birth (Les mains d'Edwige au moment de la naissance, 1994). His plays Littoral (1999), Fires (Incendies, 1999), and Dreams (Rêves, 1999) all won rich acclaim and praise for Mouawad, and in 1999 his production of Don Quixote won best Montreal adaptation. In May 1999 Mouawad was named artistic director of Montreal's Theatre of Quat', where he remained through 2004. Mouawad won the Price of the General Governor of Canada award in 2000 for Littoral, and most recently he earned the "Price of Francophone" award in June 2004 by the Company of Authors and Dramatic Type-Setters in Paris, France.

Mouawad's first novel, Visage Retrouve (Found Face, 2003), explores how an individual builds alternative or parallel universes to escape the painful realities of his/her own world. This concept is mirrored in Mouawad's play Fires, in which the psychological pain of warfare results in characters figuratively "burning up." In both, the pain warfare inflicts on individuals becomes too much to bear.

After gaining fame on the Canadian theater scene, Mouawad plans to be more involved in French theater in the future. His new project titled Forests (Forêts) premiered in March 2006 in Chambéry, France. This work touches on World War I and World War II, just as his previous works are informed by the wars in Lebanon and the Middle East. Not surprisingly, warfare is a major theme in Mouawad's works. Mouawad's close, and often painful, examination of the nature of man defines many of his plays; he confesses that his role as a playwright is to "seek what is not known yet." This perspective allows Mouawad to insightfully explore and expose the darker side of human beings. Undoubtedly, Mouawad will continue his exploration of the human psyche in his future works.

PLAYS: Part of Hide-and-Seek Between 2 Czechoslovakians at the Beginning of the Century (1992); Willy Protagoras Locked Up in the Toilets (Willy Protagoras enfermé dans les toilettes, 1993); Hands of Edwige at the Time of the Birth (Les mains d'Edwige au moment de la naissance, 1994); Alphonse (1996); Wedding Day at the Cro-Magnons' (Journée de nocés chez les Cromagnons, 1996); Procession of the National Festival (1997); Dreams (Rêves, 1999); Littoral (1999); Pacamambo (2000); Fires (Incendies, 2003); A Shell in ON (2003); Forests (Forêts, 2006)

FURTHER READING

- "The Arts: A Songstress, a Video Artist, a Filmmaker, a Playwright, a Photographer-Director." Time International 154, no. 13 (September 27, 1999): 76.
- Clarkdon, Adrienne. "Celebrating Literature and Our Collective Life as a Nation." Canadian Speeches 14, no. 5 (November–December 2000): 10–12.
- Knapp, Bettina L. "Playwrights of Exile: An International Anthology" (book review). World Literature Today 72, no. 2 (Spring 1998): 467.

Thaddeus Wakefield

LES MOUCHES See THE FLIES

MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

I'll live along with the dead, and keep their secrets, and let them hound me, until the curse is paid out and the last Mannon is let die!

—Lavinia, Act 4, The Haunted

The THEATRE GUILD first produced EUGENE O'NEILL's Mourning Becomes Electra on October 26, 1931, with Alla Nazimova as Christine and designs by ROBERT EDMOND JONES.

This trilogy reinterprets Greek TRAGEDY in terms of the aftermath of the American Civil War and explores the themes of community (through a "chorus" of neighbors), family, betrayal, and revenge. Besides following Aeschylus's three-part structure and casting pattern in the Oresteia, O'Neill works from the Greek precedent by giving strong presence to the sea, the power of the dishonored father, the pervading curse, and the sense of living in a world where ghosts and the furies drive the mortals to a reckoning. From Euripides's Orestes, O'Neill took the motif of incest and the compulsion for the individual to justify acts of violence. At the same time, O'Neill's own experience with a psychoanalyst apparently led to his staging of the Electra complex in Lavinia's painful relationship with her mother and father; the family suffers due to the intensity of the father/daughter and mother/son relationships. The action as purgation therefore develops from both Greek tragedy and Freudian theory.

In the first part, Homecoming, General Ezra Mannon returns from the war as Agamemnon returned to Argos from Troy. Waiting at his New England home are his wife Christine (modeled after Clytemnestra) and his daughter Lavinia (Electra). Christine's lover is Adam Brant (roughly corresponding with Aegisthus), a sea captain and Ezra's illegitimate cousin, and they plot to murder Ezra. The general has yearned to return to Christine, but their old resentments keep them apart, while Lavinia assures her father that he is the only man she will ever love. Ezra and Christine quarrel, and when she reveals that she loves Adam, he has an attack of angina. She pretends to provide his medicine but gives him poison from a small box, and Lavinia rushes in to hear her father's last words as he points towards her mother: "She's guilty—not medicine!" When Lavinia finds the little box where it fell on the rug, she realizes the truth.

In the second part, The Hunted, Lavinia's brother Orin (Orestes) returns from the war to see the house as a tomb. Christine cannot appease Lavinia, but she has better luck with Orin, who hated his father. Obsessed with death, he tells Lavinia that fighting the war meant "murdering the same man over and over" and realizing that he was killing himself. The women struggle over him, each insisting that Adam is the other's lover. Christine goes to Boston to find Adam on his clipper ship and warn him against Lavinia. Orin shoots Adam dead but cannot help noticing how he resembles his father and himself. He returns to the Mannon home and reveals the murder to Christine, but remorse consumes him when she shoots herself.

In the final part, The Haunted, Orin and Lavinia return from a journey to the South Pacific islands, and she coaxes him to stop seeing ghosts; she wants to live openly, and she hopes to marry Peter, one of the local men. Orin broods like his father, working in his study and studying the law of crime and punishment; Lavinia cannot convince him to stop talking of guilt and confession. Orin shoots himself, and Peter rejects Lavinia when she finally confesses that she had sexual relations with a native man in the islands because "I wanted to learn love from him—love that wasn't a sin!" She condemns herself not to die but to live in the Mannon household with the shutters nailed closed, sequestered with her dead, where there can be no rest.

Brooks Atkinson wrote in the New York Times (Nov. 1, 1931) that the play brings the cold splendors of Greek tragedy off the sky-blue limbo of Olympus down to the gusty forum of contemporary life. For the divine omniscience of the gods he substitutes the discovery of modern science, since knowledge is what this civilization pits against the solemn councils of the gods. . . . What makes Mourning Becomes Electra his only masterpiece, to my mind, is the cool deliberation with which he has dominated it. The fret and fever of his early work, the truncated thinking, the turgid writing, the elaborate symbolism of masks, the subterfuge of asides, the inarticulation and the collapse into grandiose generalities—have disappeared.

In The Nation (Nov. 18, 1931), Joseph Wood Krutch wrote, It is on the other hand—and like all supremely great pieces of literature—primarily about the passions and primarily addressed to our interest in them. . . . [W]hen one does compare it with Hamlet or Macbeth one realizes that it does lack just one thing and that that thing is language—words as thrilling as the action which accompanies them.

Robert Benchley acclaimed the trilogy as “filled with good, old-fashioned, spine-curling MELODRAMA” (New Yorker, Nov. 7, 1931). James A. Robinson (1978) has compared the play’s exploration of sin with the work of Nathaniel Hawthorne and its more gothic features with Edgar Allan Poe.

[See also Dramatic Cycles; United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

Chirico, Miriam M. “Moving Fate Into the Family: Tragedy Redefined in O’Neill’s Mourning Becomes Electra.” Eugene O’Neill Review 24 (Spring–Fall 2000): 81–100.

Frank, Glenda. “The Tiger as Daddy’s Girl.” Eugene O’Neill Review 19 (Spring–Fall 1995): 55–65.

Houchin, John H. The Critical Response to Eugene O’Neill. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.

Miller, Lisa. “Iphigenia: An Overlooked Influence in Mourning Becomes Electra.” Eugene O’Neill Review 24 (Spring–Fall 2000): 101–112.

Robinson, James A. “The Middle Plays.” In The Cambridge Companion to Eugene O’Neill, ed. by Michael Manheim. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1998.

Smith, Susan Harris. “Inscribing the Body: Lavinia Mannon as the Site of the Struggle.” Eugene O’Neill Review 19 (Spring–Fall 1995): 45–54.

Jeffrey D. Mason

MROŻEK, SŁAWOMIR (1932–)

Cartoonist, short-story writer, essayist, filmmaker, actor, and playwright Sławomir Mrożek has been a dominating presence in modern Eastern European theater. He was born on June 29, 1932, in Borzęcin, POLAND. In 1933 his father, a postal employee, moved the family from a nearby village to Cracow, where Sławomir received his schooling and worked as journalist, theater critic, and cartoonist for local newspapers in the mid-1950s (briefly as an ardent believer in Joseph Stalin) before leaving for Warsaw to make his name as a satirist of the absurdities of ideology.

From 1963 he lived in ITALY, FRANCE (as a French citizen since 1968), GERMANY, and MEXICO before returning to Poland in the 1990s. In short, satirical sketches in cabaret style—Out at Sea (Na pełnym morzu, 1961), Striptease (1961) and Charlie (Karol, 1961)—Mrożek developed a parable form of drama using model situations, pushed to logical extremes, to explore the operations of power. In the guise of family drama, Tango (1964) charts the descent of liberal Europe into totalitarianism; its absurd humor, grotesque characterization, and precise slapstick made it the most widely performed Polish play of the decade.

After Mrożek publicly denounced the invasion of CZECHOSLOVAKIA, his work was banned in Poland from 1968 to 1973. His plays remained extremely popular in the Polish theater throughout the 1970s and 1980s.

A master parodist, Mrożek subverts Polish national myths and plays with theatrical genres and conventions, without ever committing himself to any single style. Juxtaposing nature and nurture, barbarism and civilization, The Slaughterhouse (Rzeźnia, 1973) and The Tailor (Krawiec, 1963; 1977) explore the interdependence of art and violence. Foxhunt (Polowanie na lisa, 1977) and Philosopher Fox (Lis filozof, 1977) are witty animal fables, in the manner of Jean de La Fontaine, and concern the seductions of power.

Vatzlav (1970) moves beyond the closed circle of political repression to examine the paradoxes of freedom, and Emigrés (Emigranci, 1974) deals with the ironies of exile through the symbiotic relationship of an intellectual and a peasant sharing. A fin de siècle COMEDY of manners, The Hunchback (Garbus, 1975) predicts social unrest and loss of identity in times of conspiracy and paranoid fear of terrorism. On Foot (Pieszko, 1980) offers a panoramic view of dislocated lives during World War II, including an apocalyptic artist patterned after STANISŁAW IGNACY WITKIEWICZ. A Summer’s Day (Letni dzień, 1984) portrays a competition between two would-be suicides. Contract (Kontrakt, 1986) pits a dying representative of old European values against a young Eastern European terrorist. Portrait (Portret, 1987) settles accounts with the fatal legacy of Stalinism; Widows (Wdowy, 1990) reinstates parable as an existential dance of death; and Love in the Crimea (Miłość na Krymie, 1993) traces the collapse of Russia through a pastiche of Chekhovian themes.

Mrożek’s entire oeuvre gives the portrait of an age scarred by war, communism, and ideological fanaticism. With a cartoonist’s bold hand, Mrożek has dissected the power game, showing how human beings terrorize one another and themselves. His sardonic analyses of totalitarianism have had great resonance—political and moral—for audiences in Eastern Europe when public discussion of those issues was possible only in the theater.

Even though the communist regimes have been dismantled, Mrożek’s studies of tyranny seem contemporary in their obsession with conspiracy and terrorism and the complex interrelations among art, culture, and power.

PLAYS: The Professor (Profesor, 1956); The Police (Policja, 1958); The Martyrdom of Peter Ohey (Męczeństwo Piotra Oheya, 1959); The Turkey (Indyk, 1960); Charlie (Karol, 1961); Out at Sea (Na pełnym morzu, 1961); Striptease (1961); Kynologist in a Dilemma (Kynolog w rozterce, 1962); The Party (Zabawa, 1962); Death of a Lieutenant (Śmierć porucznika, 1963); The Enchanted Night (Czarowna noc, 1963); Tango (1964); The Foursome (Poczwórka, 1967); Home on the Border (Dom na granicy, 1967); The Prophets (Testarium, 1967); Repeat Performance (Drugie danie, 1968); Vatzlav (1970); Blessed Event (Szczęśliwe wydarzenie, 1971); The Slaughterhouse (Rzeźnia, 1973); The Emigrés (Emigranci, 1974); The Hunchback (Garbus, 1975); Serenade, Foxhunt, Philosopher Fox (Serenada, Polowanie na lisa, Lis filozof, 1977); The Tailor (Krawiec, 1977); Aspiring Fox (Lis aspirant, 1978); On Foot (Pieszko, 1980); The Ambassador (Ambasador, 1981); Alpha (Alfa, 1984); A Summer's Day (Letni dzień, 1984); The Contract (Kontrakt, 1986); The Portrait (Portret, 1987); Widows (Wdowy, 1990); Love in the Crimea (Miłość na Krymie, 1993); The Reverends (Wielebni, 1996); A Beautiful View (Piękny Widok, 1998)

FURTHER READING

- Drama at Calgary 3, no. 3 (1969) [special Mrożek issue].
- Esslin, Martin. "An Eastern Absurdist: Sławomir Mrożek, Poland." In Brief Chronicles. London: Temple Smith, 1970. 150–161.
- Gerould, Daniel. "Contexts for Vatzlav." Modern Drama 27, no. 1 (March 1984): 21–40.
- Goetz-Stankiewicz, Marketa. "Sławomir Mrożek: The Moulding of a Polish Playwright." In The Tradition of Polish Ideals: Essays in History and Literature, ed. by W. J. Stankiewicz. London: Orbis Bks., 1981. 204–225.
- Grol-Prokopczyk, Regina. "Sławomir Mrożek's Theatre of the Absurd." The Polish Review 24, no. 3 (1979): 45–57.
- Klossowicz, Jan. Mrożek. Warsaw: Author's Agency, 1980.
- Kott, Jan. "Mrożek's Family." In Theatre Notebook, 1947–1967, tr. by Bolesław Taborski. New York: Doubleday, 1968. 135–140.
- Mrożek, Sławomir. The Mrożek Reader. Ed. and intro. by Daniel Gerould. New York: Grove Atlantic, 2004.
- Stephan, Halina. Transcending the Absurd: The Drama and Prose of Sławomir Mrożek. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1997.

Daniel Gerould

MRS. WARREN'S PROFESSION

Mrs. Warren's Profession is a play by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW written in 1893 but not licensed for public performance in ENGLAND until 1924. Plans for a performance of the play at J. T. Grein's Independent Theatre in 1894 were not proceeded with, since the play's provocative thematic mix of prostitution and incest guaranteed that an application for a license for public performance would not be granted. Shaw was obliged to make extensive cuts in order to obtain a license for the play to be published in the collection Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant (1898). The play was first presented privately by the Stage Society at the New Lyric Club on January 5–6, 1902. At the first performance of the play in the UNITED STATES on October 27, 1905, at the Hyperion Theatre in New Haven, the mayor ordered police to close the theater because of the play's "indecentry." The first licensed public production in England was in 1925, when it was presented at the Prince of Wales Theatre, Birmingham, on October 27. The play has been very frequently revived since.

Mrs. Warren's Profession is an unconventional contribution by Shaw to a tradition of 19th-century works initiated by Alexandre Dumas (DUMAS FILS) with his 1848 novel The Lady of the Camellias (La Dame aux camélias) about the figure of the Woman with a Past, or the Fallen Woman. In 1893, as Shaw was composing Mrs. Warren's Profession, OSCAR WILDE and ARTHUR PINERO had presented variations on the theme with their plays A Woman of No Importance and THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY. In Mrs. Warren's Profession, Shaw not only made explicit the subject of prostitution, which is glossed over and glamorized in most works in the tradition to which the play bears a critical relation, but also followed Percy Bysshe Shelley's example in The Cenci (1819) of linking incest with corrupt patriarchal systems of wealth and power. In place of the typical beautiful and "tragic" courtesan of works in the tradition, Shaw created in Mrs. Warren a brassy, unrepentant, vital woman with a lively sense of humor who defiantly justifies her "profession" as being the only economically sensible thing to do, given the choices open to her in a society dominated by exploitative capitalist bosses. The wealth she has created from her European chain of high-class brothels has enabled her to live respectably and to send her daughter, Vivie, to Cambridge University, where she has excelled in the mathematics tripos. Both mother and daughter are among the finest portraits of women in Shaw's early plays. The forthright and intelligent Vivie shows many characteristics of the Victorian New Woman, as well as some traces of Shaw's own character and outlook.

The central action of the play revolves around Mrs. Warren's revelations about her past to her daughter. While Vivie at first accepts and admires her mother's account of her profession, she comes to be repelled by it, especially when she discovers that the business is still being carried on and when her mother's disagreeable associate, Sir George Crofts, makes a cynical offer of marriage to her. Crofts is one of two men in the play who are revealed as possibly being the father of Vivie, the other being the Reverend Samuel Gardner, who is the father of Vivie's fiancé Frank. In a powerful final act of the play, Vivie severs her relationship with her mother, after a passionate quarrel between the two, and also breaks off her engagement to Frank. She is last seen throwing a note from Frank into the wastebasket and resolutely getting on with her work in the chambers of her friend Honoria Fraser's actuarial firm in Chancery Lane, London.

[See also Ireland]

FURTHER READING

- Bullough, Geoffrey. "Literary Relations of Shaw's Mrs. Warren." Philological Quarterly 41 (1962): 339–358.
- Gibbs, A. M. "The Economics of Love." In The Art and Mind of Shaw: Essays in Criticism. London: Macmillan, 1983.

Meisel, Martin. "Courtesans and Magdalens." In Shaw and the Nineteenth-Century Theater. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1963.

Peters, Margot. Introduction to Mrs. Warren's Profession: A Facsimile of the Holograph Manuscript. New York: Garland, 1981.

A. M. Gibbs

MULATTO

Written in 1930, Mulatto was LANGSTON HUGHES's most successful play of the 1930s. It opened in New York at the Vanderbilt Theatre on October 24, 1935. A controversial drama about paternity and race relations in the South, it was, at that time, the longest-running Broadway play by an African American, having played for 373 performances. To Hughes's dismay, Martin Jones, who produced the play for Broadway, altered the original plot. After the New York run, the play was scheduled in 1937 for Philadelphia but was banned for two years by Mayor S. Davis Wilson; it was also banned in Baltimore. In addition to productions in the UNITED STATES, there were performances in such cities as Rome, Paris, Madrid, Tokyo, Rio de Janeiro, and Buenos Aires.

The two-act play set in Georgia centers on Robert Lewis, the son of Colonel Thomas Norwood and Cora Lewis—played by Rose McClendon and later Mercedes Gilbert—who is also the mother of Robert's brother William and sister Sallie. (In Hughes's original version, Sallie goes off to school, but Martin Jones's altered script portrays Sallie as a rape victim.) In act 1, Robert, who has returned from Atlanta, uses his father's car without his permission. Robert is defiant and Norwood domineering, whereas Cora, Sallie, and William are submissive. Norwood learns from the "county politician" Fred Higgins that Robert has defied southern racial codes by speaking up to a white woman clerk in the post office, which could result in a lynching. When Robert returns from taking Sallie to the station, he enters through the front door, initiating a disagreement with his mother and Norwood. Robert claims his status as Norwood's son, calling himself "half-white" and a "Norwood." Robert's defiance comes to a head at the end of act 1 when he refuses to leave by the back door. In act 2, Norwood, angered at Robert's identifying himself as his son, eventually brandishes a gun to warn Robert against using the front door. Robert then strangles him. Shocked and grief stricken, Cora, in a long monologue addressed to the dead Norwood, reiterates, "He was always yo' chile." In the end, she is unable to save Robert, who, followed by the lynch mob, returns to the house.

The controversial play was reviewed by Brooks Atkinson of the New York Times (Oct. 25, 1935), who questioned Hughes's skills as dramatist but recognized Hughes's honesty and the play's substance in contrast to other 1935 productions. There were also responses in the New York Herald Tribune, the New York Sun, the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, and the Newark News, some of which identified the play's melodramatic elements. However, Winifred Snell, writing for the Newark Evening News (Oct. 25, 1935), faulted producer Martin Jones. African American cultural observer Alain Locke (1983) recognized that Hughes had gone beyond the usual Broadway "formulas." A later reevaluation by Darwin Turner criticized the plot but lauded its departure from the stereotypical tragic mulatto theme. In the 1960s, Webster Smalley (1963) suggested that the play be viewed within the context of melodramatic stage productions of the 1930s.

[See also Melodrama]

FURTHER READING

Locke, Alain. "Broadway and the Negro Drama." In The Critical Temper of Alain Locke: A Selection of His Essays on Art and Culture, ed. by Jeffrey C. Stewart. New York: Garland, 1983. 240–41.

McLaren, Joseph. Langston Hughes: Folk Dramatist in the Protest Tradition, 1921–1943. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Nichols, Charles H., ed. Arna Bontemps–Langston Hughes Letters, 1925–1967. New York: Dodd, 1980.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes. 2 vols. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1986–1988.

Sanders, Leslie Catherine, ed., with Nancy Johnston. The Plays to 1942: Mulatto to The Sun Do Move. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Vol. 5. Columbia: Univ. of Missouri Press, 2002.

Smalley, Webster, ed. Five Plays by Langston Hughes. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1963.

Joseph McLaren

MÜLLER, HEINER (1929–1995)

The main impulse is to stir things to their skeleton, to rid them of their flesh and surface.

—Heiner Müller, 1982

Heiner Müller, an outspoken social critic, is considered a close successor of BERTOLT BRECHT in light of his deliberate use of montage techniques and epic narration in the theater. With its multiple visual and auditory effects, Müller's DRAMATURGY presents a dynamic discourse of viewpoints and bodies. Müller is a dialectician, and his synthetic fragments and dramatic collages constitute the main components of a "Dialectic Theater," a theater of oppositional views that aims to sharpen the sensibility and critical engagement of the spectator or reader.

The relationship between the past and the present is essential to Müller and his theater. He espoused the view that older plays must be presented to contemporary audiences in new and innovative productions so as to activate the viewers' thinking. The dramatic work, then, should build a bridge between the past and the present, revising current facts for future knowledge. Accordingly, Müller adapted many plays from various dramatists, including Brecht, in which he reevaluated history to represent contemporary sociopolitical conditions. The new, according to Müller, begins with the destruction of the extant, by renaming things and looking at them in previously unknown ways. In other words, Müller's plays alienate social facts to render them more relevant and interesting to the contemporary spectator. His approach is thus suggestive of the ALIENATION EFFECTS frequently used by Brecht in his theater productions.

Müller's dramas present provocative statements and questions about politics, history, PHILOSOPHY, and the human psyche. They depict multiple power struggles between ideologies, policies, identities, and genders. Though his writing continues to be a challenge to most of his readers, and his provocative and violent images—of such phenomena as nonconformity, lust for rebellion, attacks, and restlessness—often prove too strong for his audiences, his plays have been successfully and repeatedly staged not only in GERMANY but also in different parts of the globe, including FRANCE, SPAIN, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS, the UNITED STATES, Latin America, JAPAN, Korea, GREECE, TURKEY, and the Middle East.

Born January 9, 1929, in Eppendorf, Germany, into a communist household, Müller not only made himself thoroughly familiar with the writings of Karl Marx and Walter Benjamin, but while still a young man, he also read the entire works of Friedrich Schiller and William Shakespeare. When the Nazis came to power in 1933, they arrested and imprisoned Müller's father. The son reflects on this traumatic event in a short autobiographical narrative titled "Der Vater" (1958; The Father), a work that relates Müller's first shocking encounter with national socialism and its horrors.

Following the end of World War II, Müller finished his studies and passed his high school examinations in 1949, after which he tried miscellaneous jobs. He first worked as a clerk in a district administration office and then as an employee in a bookstore. As a result of the latter job, he enjoyed complete access to the works of important German and international writers. Müller began writing professionally in 1956. He worked as a journalist for various newspapers and journals, including Neue Deutsche Literatur (New German Literature), became the editor of Junge Kunst (Young Art) and the literary adviser for many prominent theaters in East Berlin. After having been turned down twice by Brecht, Müller ironically became dramaturg of the Berliner Ensemble—Brecht's former theater—from 1970 to 1976 and 1992 to 1995. In 1975 Müller traveled for nine months to the United States, during which time he taught as a guest lecturer at the University of Texas in Austin. From 1976 to 1988 he worked as the literary adviser to the Berliner Volksbühne.

Müller received numerous recognitions and major literary awards during his lifetime, including the Heinrich Mann Prize (together with his wife Inge Müller) for The Scab (Der Lohndrucker, 1956) in 1959; the Lessing Prize in 1975; the Mülheimer Dramatist Award in 1979; the prestigious Georg Büchner Prize in 1985; the German Democratic Republic's National Prize in 1986; and the European Theater Award in 1991.

Müller's material comes from Germany; in many respects, in fact, it is Germany itself. Even though he defended the ideals of socialism until his death, Müller was critical of the political realities in East Germany. In every piece of his writing, he opposed the views of the East German government and the former national socialist regime, which, through its state-directed cultural policies and its systematic censorship and bans, worked to oppress the artist. Müller's plays always constituted responses to the dysfunctional and violent German socialist state.

Müller's first plays were Lehrstücke, "LEARNING PLAYS" or "didactic plays," a form of theater Brecht had created for his working-class actors in the 1930s. These plays were often considered "works in progress" and sought to show the difficulties in establishing a communist society while making use of a dialectic process essential to the plays' productions. Müller's Lehrstücke include The Scab (Der Lohndrucker, 1956), The Correction (Die Korrektur, 1957), The Resettled Woman or Life in the Country (Die Umsiedlerin oder Das Leben auf dem Lande, 1961), and The Construction (Der Bau, 1963–1964). Through their various proletarian protagonists—for example, the worker Balke, who is supposed to repair a furnace while it is in operation; and Bremer, an old communist who has to fight neglect and mess in his brigade—these texts criticize the extent to which life and labor in "everyday socialism" were based purely on hardship with no recognition for the hard worker, indicating the estrangement, isolation, and destruction of the human being under socialism.

Müller's adaptations constitute the second phase of his writing. To a certain extent, reworking existing plays instead of creating entirely new ones arose out of necessity for Müller, as his plays had started to be banned from the stages of local theaters. In reworking the classics, Müller was able to implant a hidden message into the script by recasting mythical themes into a contemporary setting. Using ancient Greek and Roman cultures as a mask, Müller was able to use dramas such as Philoctetes (Philoctet, 1965), Heracles 5 (Herakles 5, 1966), Oedipus Rex (Ödipus Tyrann, 1966), Prometheus (1968) and The Horatian (Der Horatier, 1968) as political vehicles for hidden but bold and critical renderings. He also adapted many other plays from Shakespeare (Macbeth, 1971), Molière (The Doctor in Spite of Himself [Der Arzt wider Willen], 1970), and Brecht (Mausier, 1970). Mausier, considered by many critics to be a particularly significant play in the history of socialist drama, is based on Brecht's THE MEASURES TAKEN (Die Maßnahme, 1931) and criticizes the state's unhesitating use of violence against its own people for the sake of a successful revolution. Müller's favorite play, Philoctetes, largely considered to be an antiwar drama, bears thematic similarities to Mausier. Philoctetes is an extended metaphor for both the prehistory of the human race and the failure of the socialist revolution.

Germania Death in Berlin (Germania Tod in Berlin, 1971), The Slaughter (Die Schlacht, 1974), Tractor (Traktor, 1974), Gundling's Life Frederick of Prussia Lessing's Sleep Dream Scream (Leben Gundlings Prinz Friedrich von Preussen Lessings Schlaf Traum Schrei, 1976), and also his very last play, Germania 3: Ghosts at Dead Man (Germania 3. Gespenster am toten Mann, 1995), display both thematic and formal similarities.

They are all based on different phases of German history and draw subtle comparisons between German Democratic Republic (GDR) socialism, national socialism, and Stalinism. They all pose the question whether the "German misery" (a term frequently used by Brecht) continued to exist long after the national socialists were gone. In all five of these plays, Müller experimented with new methods of performance, making frequent use of the surreal and the grotesque. He introduced elements of horror and cruelty echoing ANTONIN ARTAUD combined with undertones of RICHARD WAGNER and SAMUEL BECKETT. The plays constitute a fragmented body consisting of a montage of scenes, of short, independent episodes that form a larger thematic context. The Slaughter emphasizes the horrors of fascism, and its disparate, violent scenes of murder, betrayal, terror, and survival recall the dehumanization during the Third Reich that is also the subject of Brecht's FEAR AND MISERY IN THE THIRD REICH (Furcht und Elend des Dritten Reiches, 1935–1939).

In HAMLETMACHINE (Die Hamletmaschine, 1977) and The Task (Der Auftrag, 1979) as well as in the previously mentioned Gundling's Life Frederick of Prussia Lessing's Sleep Dream Scream, Müller represents power relationships between the aggressor and the oppressed, turning the intellectual's failure into his preeminent theme. In plays such as Quartet (1980; Quartett, based on Choderlos de Laclos's Dangerous Liaisons [1782]) and Despoiled Shore Medeamaterial Landscape with Argonauts (Verkommenes Ufer Medeamaterial Landschaft mit Argonauten, 1982), the focus of the power relationship between the state and its subordinated individuals shifts toward the relentless battle of genders. With this new focus, Müller was able to subject colonialism and its aftermath to new perspectives and to question European civilization from yet another vantage point.

Müller, who usually appeared dressed in black and holding a thick cigar between his fingers, was an internationally acclaimed playwright when he died of cancer in 1995. While he saw himself as Brecht's successor ("I started there, where Brecht had left"), Müller has certainly influenced many other GDR and contemporary German dramatists. While continuously working toward changing cultural policy in the GDR, he was also directly involved in improving the conditions for writers in general. Besides writing and directing plays like a "theater-machine" (a term he himself used), he made numerous appearances on talk shows, gave frequent interviews, wrote and published essays, and never regretted the politically radical viewpoints he espoused. When asked about his thoughts on the unification of the two Germanies, he responded dryly and honestly: "I am not interested in the unification." The GDR, with all its contradictions, was an endless source of material for his works, for example, War Without Slaughter: Life in Two Dictatorships (Krieg ohne Schlacht. Leben in zwei Diktaturen, 1992). Müller saw history as the recurrence of human violence and horror. He was also convinced that the historical and contemporary material offered to him in his own country could be used to show people elsewhere how to avoid repeating similar mistakes. Having grasped the universal quality of his material, Müller wrote in order to tell others the story of his nation. Therein lies the reason why people today are curiously interested in listening to what he has to say—be it in the bold statement of a single verse or in the performance of an entire play—even after both the GDR and its most significant playwright are gone. He died on December 30, 1995, in Berlin, Germany.

[See also Postmodernism]

SELECT PLAYS: The Scab (Der Lohndrucker, 1956; co-authored with Inge Müller); The Correction (Die Korrektur, 1957; co-authored with Inge Müller); The Resettled Woman or Life in the Country (Die Umsiedlerin oder Das Leben auf dem Lande, 1961); The Construction (Der Bau, 1963–1964; an adaptation of Erik Neutsch); Philoketes (Philoktetes, 1965; an adaptation of Sophocles); Heracles 5 (Herakles 5, 1966); Oedipus Rex (Ödipus Tyrann, 1966; an adaptation of Sophocles and Friedrich Hölderlin); The Horatian (Der Horatier, 1968); Prometheus (1968; an adaptation of Aeschylus); The Doctor in Spite of Himself (Der Arzt wider Willen, 1970; an adaptation of Molière); Mauser (1970; an adaptation of Brecht); Germania Death in Berlin (Germania Tod in Berlin, 1971); Macbeth (1971; an adaptation of Shakespeare); The Slaughter (Die Schlacht, 1974); Tractor (Traktor, 1974); Gundling's Life Frederick of Prussia Lessing's Sleep Dream Scream (Leben Gundlings Prinz Friedrich von Preussen Lessings Schlaf Traum Schrei, 1976); Hamletmachine (Die Hamletmaschine, 1977; an adaptation of Shakespeare); Fatzer (1978; an adaptation of Brecht); The Task (Der Auftrag, 1979); Quartet (Quartett, 1980; an adaptation of de Laclos); Despoiled Shore Medeamaterial Landscape with Argonauts (Verkommenes Ufer Medeamaterial Landschaft mit Argonauten, 1982); War Without Slaughter: Life in Two Dictatorships (Krieg ohne Schlacht. Leben in zwei Diktaturen, 1992); Germania 3: Ghosts at Dead Man (Germania 3: Gespenster am toten Mann, 1995)

FURTHER READING

- Domdey, Horst. Produktivkraft Tod. Das Drama Heiner Müllers [The productive power of death: Heiner Müller's dramas]. Weimar: Böhlau Verlag, 1998.
- Eke, Norbert Otto. Heiner Müller. Stuttgart: Reclam, 1999.
- Hauschild, Jan-Christoph. Heiner Müller oder Das Prinzip Zweifel. Eine Biographie [Heiner Müller or the principle of doubt: A biography]. Berlin: Aufbau-Verlag, 2001.
- Kalb, Jonathan. The Theater of Heiner Müller. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1998.
- Schulz, Genia. Heiner Müller. Stuttgart: Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1980.
- Teraoka, Arlene Akiko. The Silence of Entropy or Universal Discourse. The Postmodernist Poetics of Heiner Müller. New York: P. Lang, 1985.

Natasa Masanovic

MUNK, KAJ (1898–1944)

Would the day come when the roar of wild swans and the screams of birds of prey in the night are heard again in our sweet country.

—Kaj Munk, 1928

As a dramatist and passionate debater, Kaj Munk was a controversial figure during the interwar years. Born on January 13, 1898, in Maribo, he was early orphaned and grew up in a strongly religious small landowning family in the southern part of DENMARK. Already as a boy he was convinced of having a mission in life, and he was early deeply impressed by Søren Kierkegaard's Christian existentialism. In 1924 he assumed a pastorage in the West Jutland parish Vedersø whose people he depicted with sympathetic insight in the modern miracle play The Word (Ordet, 1932). To Munk to be a Christian meant "to be in a condition of eternal conflict, conflict with God, with oneself, with the world"—not a bad point of departure for a dramatist.

Munk was quite unique in contemporary Danish theater. His aim was to revive the classical drama of William Shakespeare and Friedrich Schiller and to let loose the great passions on the domestic Danish stage. The hero, the biblical Herod, of his first staged play An Idealist (En Idealist, 1928) was modeled after William Shakespeare's Richard III—a monumental character who did not shrink away from any means to reach his end but at the height of his power was defeated by looking into the clear blue eyes of the infant Christ on his mother's arm.

As a sort of clue to the play, Munk provided the published edition of An Idealist with an ironic quotation from Kierkegaard—"Purity of Heart is to will one Thing"—ironic because the quotation is cut off. To Kierkegaard the truly pure of heart will only the good. Herod wills only one thing—power for power's sake—and was crushed by God, the invisible antagonist of most of Munk's plays.

Munk's dramatic heroes are great norm-breaking individuals such as Professor Krater, modeled after famous Danish critic Georg Brandes (In the Breakers [I brændingen, 1929]); Henry VIII (Cant, 1931); and Sigbrit, the manipulating mother of Dyveke, the Danish king Christian II's mistress (The Dictatress [Diktatorinden, 1938]). His contempt for democracy made him put his trust in the modern dictators Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler as potential saviors of the world from chaos and disruption. Munk was, however, not a blind hero worshipper. In his fictive Mussolini play The Victory (Sejren, 1936), the chancellor is defeated at the moment he breaks away from peace and attacks a defenseless country. In He Sits at the Melting Pot (Han sidder ved Smeltediglen, 1938), he had the courage to stand up against the German persecutions of the Jews but is naive enough to believe that anti-Semitism was a passing phenomenon and not the very core of Nazi ideology. He even thought that Hitler might have enjoyed the play.

He Sits at the Melting Pot laid the blame mainly on Hitler's surroundings and did not seriously affect the Godlike status of Der Führer. That did not happen until Hitler's troops invaded Denmark. From then on Munk indefatigably fought against Nazism and all it stood for. He had finally found his mission in real life and went open eyed toward his martyrdom (he was murdered by the Gestapo on January 4, 1944, in Hørbylunde, near Silkeborg). After the liberation, in 1945 the Royal Theatre commemorated Munk by staging his resistance play Niels Ebbesen (1942), banned during the occupation but known from Munk's readings and from underground circulation.

PLAYS: Love (Kærlighed 1926, perfect 1935); An Idealist (En Idealist, 1928); In the Breakers (I brændingen, 1929); Cant (1931); The Word (Ordet, 1932); The Elect (De Udvalgte, 1933); The Victory (Sejren, 1936); Pilatus (1937, written 1917); The Dictatress (Diktatorinden, 1938); He Sits at the Melting Pot (Han sidder ved Smeltediglen, 1938); Niels Ebbesen (1942, perfect 1945); Before Cannae (Før Cannae, 1943)

FURTHER READING

Mitchell, P. M. A History of Danish Literature. New York: American Scandinavian Foundation, 1958.

Møller, Per Stig. Munk. Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 2000.

Munk, Kaj. Five Plays by Kaj Munk. Ed. and tr. by R. P. Keigwin. London: Allen & Unwin, 1953.

Kela Kuam

MUNRO, RONA (1959–)

Audiences out there are very hungry for reflections of women's stories which haven't been told.

—Rona Munro, interview in Feminist Stages, 1996

A prolific playwright, Rona Munro has written extensively for film and television as well as for theater. Her television work includes scripts for the cult series Dr. Who, while her film scripts include Ken Loach's Ladybird, Ladybird (1994) and the Golden Globe-nominated Aimee and Jaguar (1999).

Munro was born in Aberdeen, SCOTLAND, in 1959. She began writing plays at school in Aberdeen, and on graduation from Edinburgh University, she worked as a cleaner to support herself as a writer. Her first full-length commission, for the Traverse Theatre, Edinburgh, was Fugue (1983), in which a young woman, haunted by a ghost, is played by two actresses, each portraying different aspects of her personality. A residency with Paines Plough Theatre Company followed in 1985 (Piper's Cave), but Munro took on a longer-term commitment that same year to the feminist company MsFits, which she formed with fellow Aberdonian Fiona Knowles. Strongly committed to voicing women's stories, MsFits took COMEDY sketches, examining women's lives in a range of small-scale and alternative venues. Munro retired from performing in 1991 but still writes a one-woman show each year for Knowles and values her experience as a performer in shaping her dealings with actors. Rehab (2003), her film for the BBC, was workshopped with the actors after research in a drug rehabilitation clinic.

Munro's breakthrough play was the award-winning Bold Girls (1991), the story of four women living in Belfast, which quickly established itself and is revived regularly and studied as an important example of feminist playwriting. Munro explores the pressures on the women, from the political situation, from poverty, and from the expectations of a patriarchal society. The play opens in Marie's kitchen, where, throughout the action, she endeavors to fulfill the role of a "good" woman by feeding her children; her neighbors, the mother and daughter Nora and Cassie; the strange girl Deirdre, who invades her home; and even the local sparrows. (Critic Jan Macdonald [2000] has examined the part that food plays in Munro's works.) Deirdre's intrusion into the lives of the "bold girls" on a search for her personal history shakes Marie's existence.

In Bold Girls and later plays, notably Your Turn to Clean the Stair (1992), Snake (1999), and Iron (2002), Munro pursues her dissection of a contemporary society crippled by self-delusion. In contrast to her comedic works for MsFits, these are serious, often painful examinations of blighted lives, whether in Belfast, a London housing estate (Snake), or in prison (Iron). In Iron two women rediscover each other in a search for "truth" after fifteen years apart. Josie comes to visit her mother, Fay, in prison, where she is serving life for the murder of Josie's father. Josie wants Fay to help her remember her life before the age of eleven, and Fay wants Josie to enable her to "see" outside the confines of the prison. Neither woman is prepared for the impact Fay's "truth" will have on them.

Munro's work, notably Piper's Cave and the award-winning THE MAIDEN STONE (1995), is underpinned by images of nature, myth, and legend that arise unbidden or reveal characters' deepest desires. She creates forms that often challenge conventional linear narrative, sliding between time frames or offering alternative stories within the same piece. Above all, it is Munro's mastery of the spoken word that distinguishes her work, whether the dialect of Maiden Stone or the jagged REALISM of Snake.

SELECT PLAYS: Fugue (1983); Ghost Story (1985); Piper's Cave (1985); Saturday at the Commodore (1989); Bold Girls (1991); Your Turn to Clean the Stair (1992); The Maiden Stone (1995); Snake (1999); Iron (2002)

FURTHER READING

- Bain, Audrey. "Loose Canons: Identifying a Women's Tradition in Playwriting." In Scottish Theatre since the Seventies, ed. by Randall Stevenson and Gavin Wallace. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 1996.
- Goodman, Lizbeth. Feminist Stages: Interviews with Women in Contemporary British Theatre. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Pubs., 1996.
- Horvat, Ksenija, and Barbara Bell. "Sue Glover, Rona Munro and Lara Jane Bunting: Echoes and Open Spaces." In Contemporary Scottish Women Writers, ed. by Aileen Christianson and Alison Lumsden. Edinburgh: Edinburgh Univ. Press, 2000.
- Macdonald, Jan. "Food as Signifier and Symbol in the Work of Contemporary Scottish Women Dramatists." In A Theatre That Matters: Twentieth-Century Scottish Drama and Theatre, ed. by Valentina Poggi and Margaret Rose. Milan: Edizioni Unicopli, 2000.
- Scullion, Adrienne. "Contemporary Scottish Women Playwrights." In Modern British Women Playwrights, ed. by Elaine Aston and Janelle Reinelt. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000.

Triesman, Susan. "Transformations and Transgressions: Women's Discourse on the Scottish Stage." In British and Irish Women Dramatists since 1958, ed. by Trevor R. Griffiths and Margaret Llewellyn-Jones. Buckingham: Open Univ. Press, 1993.

Barbara A. E. Bell

MURAYAMA TOMOYOSHI (1901–1977)

Murayama Tomoyoshi was a Japanese artist, playwright, director, scene designer, drama theorist, novelist, and children's author. After extensive reading in Western PHILOSOPHY at university, Murayama decided that Marxism offered him the most ideological satisfaction, and he was a leader of left-wing theater in JAPAN throughout his active life. In the 1920s such drama was referred to as the "proletarian drama movement."

Drawing had been a passion of Murayama's from a young age, and on a trip to GERMANY in 1922–1924 he was overwhelmed by theater and contemporary Western art, particularly that of Wassily Kandinsky.

On his return to Japan, Murayama formed an AVANT-GARDE art group that attracted much attention by taking over the recently built Tsukiji Little Theatre (Tsukiji Shōgekijō) for a highly successful evening of experimental theater and dance. At the end of 1924 Murayama was commissioned to design for a mainstream SHINGEKI production of GEORG KAISER'S FROM MORNING TO MIDNIGHT; this was his first contact with the shingeki movement, and his set became famous as Japan's first constructivist theater design.

Murayama began writing shingeki plays in early 1926; his early works are primarily expressionist with compressed, staccato dialogue and sudden changes of plot direction. Although Murayama was already involved in proletarian theater, it took some time for his plays to reflect current demands from leading theorists that plays should embody a sociopolitical objective. By 1927 Murayama had moved closer to what was required ideologically with Nero in a Skirt (Suka-to o Haita Nero). This is a study of Catherine II of Russia, indicating, through her callousness toward her soldiers and her cruelty toward her lover trying to intercede on their behalf, that imperial institutions (such as Japan had) are undesirable. The censor banned the play. Other plays set abroad and with implied political messages followed.

Record of a Gang of Thugs (Boryokudanki, 1929) was described by leading arts theorists as the best proletarian play yet. It portrays a railway strike in CHINA in 1923 and the process by which the strike was broken by a combination of hired gangsters and the military. The play ends in darkness as the soldiers open fire on the strikers, and from the darkness come defiant cries condemning imperialism and militarism and rejoicing in the formation of a national union of railway workers. KUBO SAKAE (1962), later to write the landmark left-wing drama LAND OF VOLCANIC ASH, commented favorably on the balance between the individual and the group, something of great concern to left-wing writers at the time. Murayama's subsequent plays became even more overtly political. In 1932 he was imprisoned, and in 1933 he recanted his Marxism. Although he could no longer be openly active politically, Murayama worked hard in the 1930s to unify the left-wing theater movement and after the war to reestablish it. His main practical theater activity from then on was directing, both for shingeki and for SHINPA; in 1974 the theater magazine Teatō awarded him a prize to commemorate his 400th production. Murayama's talent as a director never dimmed, but as a leader he tried to recreate a heroic theatrical past that was increasingly out of touch with postwar Japan.

PLAYS: Punish My Brother (Ani o Basseyo, 1926); Nero in a Skirt (Suka-to o Haita Nero, 1927); Robin Hood (Robin Fuddo, 1927); Record of a Gang of Thugs (Boryokudanki, 1929); Oriental Rolling Stock Factory (Toyo Sharyo Kōjō, 1931)

FURTHER READING

Kubo Sakae. Kubo Sakae Zenshu [Collected Works of Kubo Sakae].

Tokyo: San'ichi Shobo, 1962. 5: 237–240.

Murayama Tomoyoshi. Engekiteki Jijoden [Theatrical autobiography]. 3 vols. Tokyo: Tohoshu, 1973.

Nihon Kinclai Engekishi Kenkyūkai, ed. Nijisseiki no Gikyoku, Nihon Kindai Gikyoku no Sekai [Plays of the twentieth century: The world of modern Japanese drama]. Tokyo: Shakai Hyōronsha, 1998.

Ōyama Isao. Kindai Nihon Gikyoku-shi [History of modern Japanese drama]. Vols. 2–4. Yamagata: Kindai Nihon Gikyoku-shi Kankōkai, 1969–1972.

Shea, George T. Leftwing Literature in Japan. Tokyo: Hosei Univ. Press, 1964.

Brian Powell

MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL

Destiny waits in the hand of God, not in the hands of statesmen.

—The Chorus, Part 1

In 1935, T. S. ELIOT, a convert to the Anglican Church, was commissioned to write a play for the Canterbury Festival of Music and Drama; the verse play, Murder in the Cathedral, was the result, and it was first performed in the cathedral's Chapter House, using its pulpit, its great wooden door, and the reverberating acoustics as a profoundly realistic set to celebrate the martyring of Saint Thomas, which happened in 1170 in that very place. The first actor to essay Thomas was Robert Speaight, at the invitation of E. Martin Browne (who would subsequently direct all the premieres of Eliot's plays); all three men were ardent Anglicans.

The play is static, a ritualized pageant rather than a drama, sometimes likened to early Aeschylus, and its strength lies primarily in the splendid poetry of the Chorus—the peasant women of Canterbury who are the greatest problem in production. The play's mystical subject matter creates much of its power: an exploration of the relation of perfect faith to the human will. The play begins too close to the end to create anything like character development; whatever Thomas was—the wild, profligate friend of the king, who rose from “Cheapside brat” to chancellor and then, in Henry II's drastic miscalculation, archbishop—we have to construct the backstory for ourselves.

Arriving back in ENGLAND after an exile of seven years, Thomas knows the inevitability of his martyrdom; when the Priests welcome him back to Canterbury, Thomas tells them, “All things prepare the event. Watch.” And, as though he has conjured them up, the Four Tempters appear; each tempts, and each is rejected without struggle. The Fourth Temptation is the most interesting: the vanity of martyrdom. “What earthly pride, that is not poverty / Compared with richness of heavenly grandeur? . . . I offer what you desire.” Act 1 ends as Thomas tells us, “The last temptation is the greatest treason: / To do the right deed for the wrong reason.” We have to take it on faith rather than by dramatic discovery that he acquiesces to his death for the right reason.

Following a sermon that forms an interval, act 2 is swift: the Knights arrive and murder Thomas brutally, and the Chorus laments the desecration with “Clear the air! clean the sky! wash the wind!” Instead of ending the play with this high moment, Eliot, modernist that he is, brings the Knights back as spin doctors, making urbane after-dinner speeches in which they justify themselves and implicate the public. The Priests are left to give thanks for a new saint, and the Chorus brings the play to resolution with contrition and prayer to the martyred Thomas. Just as martyrdom is paradoxically both a cause for mourning and rejoicing, so the play sustains typically Eliotic paradoxes: action/passivity, knowing / not knowing, and the Cathedral as deathtrap/haven.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

Browne, E. Martin. The Making of T. S. Eliot's Plays. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1969.

Donoghue, Denis. The Third Voice, Modern British and American Verse Drama. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1959.

Eliot, T. S. Poetry and Drama. London: Faber, 1951.

Jones, David E. The Plays of T. S. Eliot. London: Routledge, 1960.

Tate, Allen, ed. T. S. Eliot: The Man and His Work. New York: Delacorte, 1966.

Tydemann, William. “Murder in the Cathedral” and “The Cocktail Party.”

Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan, 1988.

Weales, Gerald. Religion in Modern English Drama. Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1960.

Toby Zinman

MURPHY, TOM (1935–)

You came in that door with the audacity of despair, wild with the idea of wanting to soar, and I was the most pitiful of spiritless things.

—JPN King, Scene 7, The Gigli Concert

In 2002, the Abbey Theatre in Dublin staged a major retrospective of the career of Tom Murphy. Doing so was an attempt to celebrate the work of one of IRELAND's greatest living playwrights. But it was also an attempt to stimulate international awareness of that work: to the consternation and confusion of Murphy's admirers, his plays have yet to find a significant audience outside of Ireland.

Murphy was born in Tuam, a town in County Galway on Ireland's west coast, in 1935. Throughout the 1950s he worked as a teacher of metalwork and participated actively in Ireland's thriving amateur drama sector, where his interest in theater developed. As he began to attempt writing, he rejected the influence of the canonical Irish works of J. M. SYNGE and SEAN O'CASEY, instead seeking out drama by TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA, and other international writers. This rejection of traditional Irish writing (which Murphy has since reversed) probably explains why he could not find an Irish theater willing to produce A WHISTLE IN THE DARK, his first professional play. Instead, it became a huge hit in ENGLAND, where it premiered in 1961. A shocking treatment of a violent Irish family living in Coventry, the play laid the ground for much of the English drama of the 1960s, notably HAROLD PINTER's THE HOMECOMING.

The success of A Whistle in the Dark encouraged Murphy to quit his job teaching and to move to London. Yet although his work was occasionally produced during the following decade, he struggled to recapture the success of his debut. His only major achievement was Famine (1968), a challenging treatment of the Irish Famine of 1845–1848, which utilized many of the techniques of BERTOLT BRECHT.

Murphy returned to Ireland in 1970 and began to write regularly for the Abbey Theatre, which staged many of his best plays, such as the surreal The Morning After Optimism (1971). In 1976 The Sanctuary Lamp was accused of anticlericalism and became the most controversial Abbey Theatre production since Sean O'Casey's PLOUGH AND THE STARS debuted in 1926. The hostility that greeted this play caused Murphy to cease writing for a number of years.

Murphy returned to playwriting in the 1980s with a trio of quite remarkable works. The Gigli Concert (1983), Conversations on a Homecoming (1985), and Bailegangaire (1985) are among the finest dramas in the Irish repertoire—but even more remarkable is that they were all produced within only two years. In The Gigli Concert, an Irishman suffering from depression seeks assistance from an English therapist. Conversations is set in a Tuam pub, where a group of friends have met to celebrate the homecoming from America of a successful friend. And in Bailegangaire (an Irish placename, which, translated literally, means “the town without laughter”), an old woman's granddaughters listen to her story about a laughing contest that ends in death. The three plays vary widely in setting, theme, and form, but all place at their center the power of speech, particularly of storytelling.

Murphy continued to write for the Abbey in the 1990s, producing The Wake (1997; adapted from his 1994 novel The Seduction of Morality) and The House (2001), both of which focused on the return of Irish emigrants to Tuam.

One of the most unique aspects of Murphy's work is its musicality, with his dialogue carefully modulated so that character is revealed not only by words but also by sound—meaning that a conversation in a Murphy play can often recreate the harmonies and discordance of a piece of music, without ever appearing unnatural. The level of technical accomplishment in Murphy's plays is for this reason often astonishing.

His subject matter can, however, make for uncomfortable viewing. His plays are uncompromisingly honest in their treatment of depression—from which Murphy has suffered throughout his life—and other forms of human suffering. Yet the beauty of Murphy's plays is that his characters do not defeat adversity, but, through suffering, they transcend it. This transcendence is frequently achieved through artistry, in moments of glorious theatrical transformation—a religious sermon in The Sanctuary Lamp, an operatic aria in The Gigli Concert, through storytelling in Bailegangaire, and song in The Wake.

Whether Murphy's work will acquire international attention is difficult to predict, but it is indisputably deserving of it. His reputation in Ireland is nevertheless secure, and he remains one of the country's most highly esteemed artists.

PLAYS: A Whistle in the Dark (1961); On the Outside (with Noel O'Donoghue, 1962); Famine (1968); A Crucial Week in the Life of a Grocer's Assistant (1969); The Morning After Optimism (1971); The White House (1972); On the Inside (1974); The Vicar of Wakefield (after Oliver Goldsmith, 1975); The J Arthur Maginnis Story (1976); The Sanctuary Lamp (1976); Epitaph Under Ether (after J. M. Synge, 1979); The Blue Macushla (1980); The Informer (after V. C. O'Flaherty, 1981); She Stoops to Conquer (after Goldsmith, 1982); The Gigli Concert (1983); Bailegangaire (1985); Conversations on a Homecoming (1985); A Thief of a Christmas (1985); Too Late for Logic (1989); The Patriot Game (1991); She Stoops to Folly (1995); The Wake (1997); The House (2001); The Drunkard (2003); Alice Trilogy (2005)

FURTHER READING

Greene, Nicholas. The Politics of Irish Drama: Plays in Context from Boucicault to Friel. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
—, ed. Talking About Tom Murphy. Dublin: Carysfort Press, 2002.
Murray, Christopher, ed. Special issue on Tom Murphy, Irish University Review (1987).
O'Toole, Fintan. The Politics of Magic. Dublin: New Island, 1995.

Patrick Lonergan

MURRELL, JOHN (1945–)

Born in Lubbock, Texas, in 1945, John Murrell completed a bachelor of arts degree in drama at the University of Calgary, CANADA, and has subsequently lived for the most part in Alberta. While he was writing his first plays, he worked as a public school teacher. His first significant successes in the theater came out of his association with the Alberta Theater Projects. Murrell has recently served as the artistic director and executive producer of the Theatre Arts program at the Martha Cohen Theatre of the Epcor Centre for the Performing Arts at the Banff Centre.

In 1998 Murrell's contributions to arts education in Canada were recognized with the Gascon-Thomas Award. In 2002, his lifetime achievements as a dramatist were honored with the Canada Council's Walter Carsen Price for Excellence in the Performing Arts. For three of his plays, he has received the Chalmers Award for the best Canadian play of the year: Waiting for the Parade (1977), Farther West (1982), and The Faraway Nearby (1994).

Murrell's best-known and most highly regarded play may be Waiting for the Parade. Set in Calgary during World War II, the play focuses on five women who come together to do volunteer work in support of the war effort. These women have suddenly become defined very much by the ways in which the men in their lives have been categorized because of the war. Catherine's husband is a prisoner of war; Eve's husband is too old to serve; Janet's husband has a job that will keep him out of combat; one of Margaret's sons is serving in the navy, but the other has been put in prison for seeking to undermine the war effort; and Marta's father has been placed in a camp for suspected Nazi sympathizers. The women respond internally and externally to their increasingly conflicted senses of themselves.

In a number of his plays, Murrell has explored the psyches of well-known artists. Power in the Blood (1975) is based on the life of the controversial evangelist Amy Semple McPherson. Restaged as Sarah in 2002, at the Theater Edouard VII in Paris, MEMOIR (1977) focuses on the efforts of an aging Sarah Bernhardt to complete her autobiography. She relies a great deal on Pitou, her male secretary, who imaginatively acts out the scenes that she is struggling to describe. October, which premiered in Toronto in 1988, explores the relationships between three characters—an actress, her Italian lover, and the dancer Isadora Duncan. The Faraway Nearby is a treatment of the later life and the aesthetic obsessions of American artist Georgia O'Keefe. Farther West depicts the adventures of one of the most colorfully infamous figures of the settlement of western Canadian, the whorehouse madame May Buchanan.

PLAYS: Metamorphosis (1970); Haydn's Head (1973); Arena (1975); Power in the Blood (1975); Teaser (1975); A Great Noise, a Great Light (1976); Memoir (1977, published 1978); Waiting for the Parade: Faces of Women in War (1977, published 1980); Bajazet (1979); Farther West (1982, published 1985); New World (1984, published 1985); October (1988); Democracy (1991); The Faraway Nearby (1994); Filumena (an opera, 2003)

FURTHER READING

Hall, Lynda. "Remembrance of Things Past and Present." Canadian Theatre Review 79–80 (Fall 1994): 120–123.

Manthorne, Katherine E. "The Faraway Nearby." American Art 13, no. 1 (Spring 1999): 2–9.

Salter, Denis. "Ancestral Voices: The (European) Plays of John Murrell." In On-Stage and Off-Stage, ed. by Albert-Reiner Glaap and Rolf Althof. St. Johns, Newfoundland: Breakwater, 1996. 201–211.

Martin Kich

DIE MUTTER See THE MOTHER

MUTTER COURAGE UND IHRE KINDER

See MOTHER COURAGE AND HER CHILDREN

MXTEATRO See ME XIHC CO TEATRO

MYANMAR See BURMA

MY HEART'S IN THE HIGHLANDS

Reviewing the opening on April 13, 1939, of My Heart's in the Highlands for the New York Journal American, John Anderson had trouble focusing his thoughts: "If you squint your eyes and try to understand it, it doesn't make any sense at all, but if you let it alone and let it pry around in your gizzard, it will very likely tug at your heart strings. People seemed to find themselves weeping without knowing what the hell was the matter with them." To this response WILLIAM SAROYAN began his forty years' experience in the theater. Although the play in its initial production ran for only forty-four performances, Saroyan had made his point, as he expressed it in a preface to the published play: "It is better to be a good human being than to be a bad one. It is just naturally better."

Plot is never a dominant feature of Saroyan's art, but neither is character analysis, dramatic conflict, or elaborate crisis. He presents a few people, evokes moods, and manipulates the audience's emotions, and he does this with believable optimism and surprising innocence. In an old house in Fresno, California, a nine-year-old boy named Johnny lives in poverty with his father, an unsuccessful poet, and his grandmother. One day old Jasper MacGregor, an actor, who has run away from an old folks' home, appears at Johnny's house and plays his bugle to the music of Robert Burns's poetry with such plaintive beauty that the neighbors all bring them food. When the people from the old folks' home take MacGregor away, Johnny tries again to con Mr. Kosach, the grocer, for food, but things are bad. Johnny's father tries to pay for groceries with his poems; the real estate man tells them they are being evicted because they are behind in their rent. MacGregor appears after escaping again and dies while playing a scene from King Lear. The new tenants arrive, and Johnny, his father, and grandmother leave. "My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here. My heart's in the Highlands a'chasing the deer" (Robert Burns).

In the spring of 1939 the world was in turmoil. Serious men had tried in vain to warn America of the dangers of Adolf Hitler, who in March, in defiance of the Munich agreement of the previous September, completely obliterated CZECHOSLOVAKIA from the map. President Franklin Roosevelt sensed a loss of momentum for his New Deal programs, but there was no doubt that the long recession was ending. People, however, had mixed feelings about their future. Broadway, as always, was catering to a broad scope of audiences. Hellzapoppin', from the previous fall, was going strong. In January GEORGE S. KAUFMAN and MOSS HART replaced The Fabulous Invalid with a spectacle suggesting the future—The American Way. There were plenty of COMEDIES, but on April 17, 1939, S. N. BEHRMAN would point a finger with NO TIME FOR COMEDY. The public sensed the need for more serious thinking. THORNTON WILDER's OUR TOWN had just closed in New York, and ROBERT SHERWOOD's ABE LINCOLN IN ILLINOIS was still playing at the Plymouth Theatre. In February a new voice of concern appeared in LILLIAN HELLMANN's THE LITTLE FOXES; in March PHILIP BARRY launched his high comedy of Main Line life in THE PHILADELPHIA STORY. Both would run a year on Broadway.

Into this melange of frivolous, serious, demanding, comic, thoughtful, and even irritating drama, Saroyan dropped his whimsical aberration on the impulsive love of beauty among people.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Brown, John Mason. Broadway in Review. New York: Norton, 1940.
 McCarthy, Mary. Sights and Spectacles, 1937–1956. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1956.
 Saroyan, William. "How to See." Theatre Arts (May 1941): 203–216.
 Vernon, Granville. "My Heart's in the Highlands." Commonweal 30 (April 28, 1939): 22.

Walter J. Meserve

MY PARTNER

My Partner by BARTLEY CAMPBELL opened on September 16, 1879, at the Union Square Theatre in New York City. The play ran through October 18 before going on tour; there were productions in Berlin (1883) and London (1884).

The play begins with a love triangle between Mary Brandon and two mining partners named Joe Saunders and Ned Singleton. Mary loves both men, but Ned promises to marry her, and she has sexual relations with him. Joe, not suspecting that he and his partner are interested in the same woman, is about to declare his love and propose marriage when he learns the nature of Mary's involvement with Ned; he demands that his recreant partner marry the girl within three days (a nicely arbitrary deadline that invites mishap!) and subsequently dissolves their partnership. Before Ned can keep his promise, he receives a visit from Josiah Scraggs, an old acquaintance and secret enemy of Matthew Brandon, Mary's father. Scraggs suggests that Mary has been Joe's mistress, and in the ensuing scuffle he picks up a knife and kills Ned. The miners arrest Joe for Ned's murder; months pass, and Mary returns from a mysterious prolonged absence to attest to his character; and Joe suddenly proclaims that they were secretly married in order to ensure the restoration of her father's affections and protect her from Scraggs's slanders. Before the jury can hang Joe, Wing Lee, the stock comic "Chinee" character, produces a torn shirt that incriminates Scraggs, and the lovers look forward to a happy future.

Campbell locates his action in the California landscape; the mountain country is a virtual paradise that confers an Edenic innocence on its inhabitants, where poetic justice flows not from religion or moral abstraction, as in most midcentury MELODRAMA, but from the land itself. Joe refers to "California, where the trees are larger, and men's hearts bigger than anywhere else in all creation," and when young Grace Brandon asks whether there is any place like California, Sam Bowler, her suitor, answers, "Except heaven, and California up here in the mountains is so close to it that none of us want to leave it." The community is upset when circumstances subject Joe, an upright man, to a charge of murder, but when the last-minute discovery saves the victim, it also restores and vindicates the people's faith. Nothing can remain wrong in this Eden; error and transgression settle effortlessly into resolution as the innocent and well-intentioned find ultimate reward. California is the land of kept promises, a garden where dreams grow and hopes flourish.

The New York Times (1879) critic described My Partner as "a drama of unquestionable power," a combination of COMEDY and melodrama that was "exceedingly fresh and unconventional." The journalist acclaimed the character of Major Britt—orator, politician, stump lawyer, hard drinker—as "original, amusing, and frequently witty . . . Campbell's most valuable contribution to our stage," and he asserted that the play proved "that a woman's shame is excusable as long as a woman is young and innocent."

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

- Bank, Rosemarie. "Frontier Melodrama." In Theatre West: Image and Impact, ed. by Dunbar H. Ogden with Douglas McDermott and Robert K. Sarlós. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1990. 151–160.
 Mason, Jeffrey D. "My Partner (1879) and the West." In Melodrama and the Myth of America. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1993.
 Meserve, Walter J. "The American West of the 1870s and 1880s as Viewed from the Stage." Journal of American Drama and Theatre 3 (Winter 1991): 48–63.
 Review of My Partner. New York Times (September 17, 1879): 5.
 Wattenberg, Richard. "Americanizing Frontier Melodrama: From Davy Crockett (1872) to My Partner (1879)." Journal of American Culture 12 (Spring 1989): 7–16.

Jeffrey D. Mason

MYSTERY-BOUFFE

VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY wrote his second major dramatic work, Mystery-Bouffe (Misteriia-buff, 1918; revised 1921), to celebrate the first anniversary of the October Revolution in Russia. Always experimental in his choice of form and genre, Mayakovsky exploited the potential of the mystery play in this work. Mystery-Bouffe exhibits a rather grotesque admixture of mystery play and low, sometimes crude and blasphemous, COMEDY.

As in the original mystery plays, the basic plot is simple and straightforward and allows for no confusion between the good and the bad, the right and the wrong. A cataclysmic flood has wiped out humankind, except for seven pairs of the "Clean," who belong to the bourgeoisie, and seven pairs of the "Unclean," who belong to the proletariat. The Clean include politicians like Lloyd George and Georges Clemenceau, while the Unclean tend to be identified by profession and include a miner and a Red Army soldier (the latter introduced in the 1921 version). The play portrays the triumph of the Unclean, who eventually deposit the Clean in hell. The Unclean reject heaven as their reward and return to the paradise on earth of communism.

Reception of the play was often troubled. When Mayakovsky read Mystery-Bouffe to the actors of the former Aleksandrinsky Theater, reaction was so negative that the management was forced to reject the play. Mystery-Bouffe did find powerful admirers, however. The play's inclusion in the festivities for the first anniversary of the Revolution owes in no small measure to the advocacy of the People's Commissar of Education ANATOLY LUNACHARSKY. Despite such political support, Mayakovsky was reduced to placing a general casting call in a newspaper to drum up voluntary participation. VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD collaborated with Mayakovsky on this production, and the painter Kasimir Malevich contributed the set designs. Mystery-Bouffe had a short run in no small part because it did not appeal to the conservative aesthetic tastes of the Bolsheviks. The play did draw praise, however, for its "democratic" forms. One measure of the problems that plagued the play is to be found in the fact that for the premiere Mayakovsky had to play no fewer than three roles because some of the other actors failed to show up.

When Meyerhold offered to include Mystery-Bouffe in the repertoire of his theater, Mayakovsky revised the play extensively, and the second version had its premiere at the Third Congress of the Communist Internationale. Meyerhold placed the main action in the middle of the auditorium to great effect.

If Mystery-Bouffe was seen by many of Mayakovsky's contemporaries as a work that best encompassed the strivings of the new Soviet society, its reputation has been largely eclipsed since the poet's death. The strength of Mystery-Bouffe lies primarily in Mayakovsky's verbal fireworks, while its many weaknesses include its crude ideological slant and its poor characterization. (The latter problem, incidentally, helps to explain the reluctance of actors to participate in the first production.) Moreover, much of Mayakovsky's topical satire has lost all but historic value. Despite these problems, Mystery-Bouffe remains an important example of revolutionary drama, from its contempt for the bourgeoisie to its predilection for blasphemy to its absolute faith in the perfect society to come.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

- Brown, Edward J. Mayakovsky: A Poet in the Revolution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1973.
- Markov, Vladimir. Russian Futurism: A History. Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1968.
- Mayakovsky, Vladimir. Plays. Tr. by Guy Daniels. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern Univ. Press, 1995.
- Terras, Victor. Vladimir Mayakovsky. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Timothy C. Westphalen

NADEEM, SHAHID (1947–)

Born in PAKISTAN in 1947, the year of the partitioning of British INDIA into the new states of India and Pakistan, Shahid Nadeem is the founder and longtime director of Ajoka, a not-for-profit theater in Pakistan that is devoted to the promotion of human rights, political and cultural secularism, and international peace. Imprisoned for his political activism in 1969, 1970, and 1979, Nadeem has been critical of the suppression of civil rights by Pakistan's military regimes and has been a proponent of reconciliation with India. His most recent imprisonment came in 1998, when the Pakistani government pointedly denounced his production of a BERTOLT BRECHT play about Adolf Hitler, THE RESISTIBLE RISE OF ARTURO UI, as a scurrilous attack on its leadership. For much of the last two and a half decades, Nadeem has been forced to live abroad. He has worked for Amnesty International while living in London from 1980 to 1988, in Hong Kong from 1991 to 1993, and later Los Angeles. He has been a Feuchtwanger Fellow and a Getty Scholar, and he has spoken on theatrical topics and political issues in a broad range of venues: for instance, one of his presentations has been titled "Theatre for Social Change in Pakistan: Crossing Frontiers & Breaking Barriers." While he has been abroad, his plays have continued to be staged in Pakistan, but in "guerrilla" productions in underground theaters.

Nadeem has written more than three dozen produced plays. Some were written originally in Urdu or Punjabi, while others were written originally in English. Two collections of the plays in Urdu and Punjabi have been published. Some of his plays have treated historical figures and events, while others have addressed contemporary topics. Bulha (2003) provides a dramatic portrait of the legendary 17th-century Sufi mystic and poet. On the other hand, in Bala King (1998), he delineates the process by which successive Pakistani governments have criminalized free political expression. In Trapped (2001), he depicts the last hours of two men, one Middle Eastern, who are trapped in one of the World Trade Center towers after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001.

Perhaps his most frequently and widely produced play, Dukhini (1998) is a bilingual play about the human traffic in women and children across South Asia. It presents the case study of the mistreatment of a Bangladeshi woman illegally transported into Pakistan. Nadeem clearly views the theater as a vehicle for social change. With funding provided by several international arts and cultural foundations, Dukhini has been staged in a large number of Bangladeshi towns and villages as a warning against the empty promises made by those who are conducting the traffic of human beings.

Nadeem has also written eight serial dramas for Pakistani television—though, since 1998, a ban on broadcasting his work has been enforced in Pakistan. In the feature film Mujahid—The Holy Warrior (2004), which he wrote and produced, he focuses on the adjustments facing young Pakistanis whose experiences fighting with the Mujahadeen against the Soviets in Afghanistan has radicalized them politically and culturally and who must now resume their everyday lives in Pakistan. He has also produced two documentaries on human rights efforts in South Asia. His articles on political and cultural topics have appeared in The Far Eastern Economic Review, Index on Censorship, BBC Urdu Service, Zee News, The Leveler (London), The Frontline (Madras), The Daily Times (Lahore), and other Pakistani newspapers including The Herald, The Muslim, and The Newline.

SELECT PLAYS: A Granny for All Seasons (Aik Thee Nani, 1993); Bala King (1998); Bulha (2003); The Acquittal (Barri, 2001); Border-Border (2001); Dukhini (1998); Sixth River (1992); Third Knock (Teesri Dastak, 2001); Toba Tek Singh; Trapped (2001)

FURTHER READING

Rahman, Maseeh. "Mystic's Life Highlights Fool's World of Fundamentalism." South China Morning Post (January 28, 2004): 12.

Martin Kich

NA DNE See THE LOWER DEPTHS

NAGHIU, IOSIF (1932–2003)

The most outspoken and uncompromising playwright of his generation, Iosif Naghiu published several volumes of plays, most of them banned during the Nicolae Ceaușescu regime in ROMANIA. Only a few of them saw the limelight and enjoyed, as in the case of The Absence (Absenta, 1969) and In One Single Evening (Intr-o Singura Vara, 1974), general acclaim and awards at national theater festivals. In 1982 the unyielding author withdrew his play The Agamemnon Mystery (Misterul Agamemnon) a few days after its opening because of too much meddling with the text. He was ignored for many years, until the opening in 1994 of one of his most interesting plays, The Cell of the Disappeared Poet (Celula poetului disparut). The same year his play The Special Hospital (Spitalul special) received the Best Play of the Year award. Naghiu served until his death as secretary of the Romanian Writers Union. He has remained one of the most respected playwrights who had survived the postcommunist transition.

In The Special Hospital, the author compares the world to a hospital where the injured reformers and the infamous informants who shot them are put in the same room to recover. The hospital director lusts after the shining imported chairs meant for the patients, while the attending physician, Deseara, is investigated as to why she hung two socks of different colors, one red and one orange, on her balcony to dry. She is tortured in the hospital's basement and raped by her superior.

The disappointment with the state of affairs after the 1989 revolution finds its expression in The Cell of the Disappeared Poet. Daniel Pana, a former dissident poet, returns to visit the cell where he was tortured and humiliated. The motivation for his return is unclear. In a dialogue with his former jailer, he confesses that now that he is free to write, his pen has run dry, and he has nothing to say. He suffers from a total loss of identity and complete disorientation in a world that appears to him no different from the one before the change. He finds it natural to return to his former prison to "recharge his batteries" by searching for his confiscated poems. Perhaps Naghiu's most disturbing play is The Window (Fereastra, 1981) in which a crippled old woman spies on the entire town from her chair by the window and sees a tightrope walker falling to his death. She declares the "accident" as a setup. The townspeople are up in arms, and the authorities, through their representative, the Doctor, forbid her to look outside and install a blind man in her armchair. Miraculously, however, the fall occurs over and over in front of the window.

Naghiu's dramatic output, spanning over four decades, encompasses various dramatic modes of expression from SURREALISM to realistic discourse. His characters pursue a tireless quest for absolute justice in a world of shadows where even the strong lose their identity. Like their author, they are uncompromising and are ready to suffer the consequences of taking the high moral road.

SELECT PLAYS: The Absence (Absenta, 1969); The Hood Over The Eyes (Gluga pe ochi, 1970); In One Single Evening (Intr-o singura seara, 1974); The Window (Fereastra, 1981); The Agamemnon Mystery (Misterul Agamemnon, 1982); The Boat Is Full (Barca e plina, 1984); The Suitcase with Butterflies (Valiza cu fluturi, 1986); The Execution Will Be Postponed (Executia va fi amanata, 1993); The Cell of the Disappeared Poet (Celula poetului disparut, 1994); The Special Hospital (Spitalul special, 1994)

FURTHER READING

Cocora, Ion. Privitor Ca La Teatru II. Cluj-Napoca, Romania: Editura Dacia, 1977.

Iosif, Mira. Teatrul Nostru Cel De Toate Serile. Bucuresti, Romania: Editura Eminescu, 1979.

Mincu, Dumitru. Scurta Istorie a Literaturii Romane, IV Perioada Contemporana Dramaturgia Critica. Bucuresti, Romania: Editura Iriana, 1997.

Naghiu, Iosif. Celula poetului disparut. Teatru. Colectia Dramaturgia Originala Romaneasca. Bucuresti, Romania: Editura Expansion, 1994.

NAGY, PHYLLIS (1962–)

Born in New York City in 1962, Phyllis Nagy never intended to become a playwright. She studied music theory and composition at New York University. She had planned to be a poet. Her first play, Plaza Delores, was written for a workshop run by a friend and producer in a small theater in Vermont. An early version of BUTTERFLY KISS (1990 revised 1994) was begun while she was studying in the dramatic writing program at New York University; a further draft was written in 1989. Two years later, quitting the work she was doing in real estate and at the New York Times, Nagy took part in a two-week residency with the Royal Court in 1991, after which she settled in London permanently.

At the end of the 1980s Nagy's play Girl Bar was produced, but its reception was mixed among lesbians who, discomfited, struggled with the way it addressed previously unexplored topics such as obsession with a straight girl and racism within a lesbian community. In ENGLAND, Nagy's career as a playwright immediately became high profile as the Royal Court, backed by the incoming Court director, Stephen Daldry, launched a production of Weldon Rising (1992). As co-director of Gay Sweatshop, Lois Weaver (of SPLIT BRITCHES) commissioned Nagy's Entering Queens (1993), a piece that confounded expectations for a gay play. Moving out of recognizable structures of identity politics, Entering Queens marked a departure from then-current identity politics, radically contesting, rather than celebrating, gay identity. Butterfly Kiss, a provocative drama, represents the maternal as a site of violence, daring audiences to consider murder as a loving act. Disappeared (1992) examines personal loneliness and the anonymity that accompanies urban life. Next came The Strip (1995), a complex dramatization of gender trouble that premiered at the Royal Court Theatre. In Never Land (1998), a haunting and poetic play, Nagy returns to the landscape of family emotions, the longing for home, and the sedimentation of prejudice. The Talented Mr. Ripley (1998) is an adaptation based on the cult novel by Patricia Highsmith. She first feature film, Mrs. Harris, opened in September 2005 in Toronto.

Nagy's experiments with the language of theater widen the scope of theatrical possibility through innovative structures, explosive themes, and transgressive interlacings of cultural, social, and sexual identities. Like Judith Butler, Nagy rehearses and stages acts of gender trouble. Nagy creates characters that rupture the sexual, social, cultural, and national systems that seek to contain the range of their desires. Working with the complex structures of musical composition rather than linear narrative, Nagy's dramaturgical frame politicizes through formal experimentation. Her AVANT-GARDE techniques have tended to create impatience in some audiences who have found the challenges the material presents difficult to comprehend. Not content with mirroring fixed identities, Nagy invents highly imaginative, innovative, and ironic dramas in which characters pass through numerous dis-identifications that challenge fixed notions of identity, exploring the tensions of the performative nature of queer identity without erasing the material and historical reality of our lives. Nagy's plays explore positions of marginality and otherness, provoking us to think outside the fictions that work to regulate and maintain our desires.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama; United States, 1940–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: Butterfly Kiss (1990 revised 1994); Awake (1991); Disappeared (1992); Weldon Rising (1992); Entering Queens (1993); Trip's Cinch (1994); The Scarlet Letter (1995); The Strip (1995); Never Land (1998); The Talented Mr. Ripley (1998); The Seagull (2003)

FURTHER READING

Aston, Elaine. Feminist Views on the English Stage: Women Playwrights 1990–2000. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2003.
Edgar, David, ed. State of Play: Playwrights on Playwriting. London: Faber, 1999.

Kerry Moore

THE NAME

You don't care. You never listen when I talk to you.

—The Girl, Act 1

JON FOSSE's drama The Name (Namnet) was written in 1994 and first performed at Den Nationale Scene in Bergen, Norway on May 27, 1995. It has been shown on Norwegian Public Television and performed in theaters all over Europe. In 1996 the play won the Ibsen Prize, which is awarded to works that promote new Norwegian drama.

As a representative example of Fosse's work, The Name has a simple story and one-dimensional characters. A young couple arrives at the girl's parents' house. The girl is pregnant and clearly uncomfortable with the situation, while the boy, who has never met her parents before, is left more or less alone with his things: a coat, a suitcase, and a book. The girl's mother is occupied by her bodily pain and the daily trip to the convenience store, and her father is tired because of his work. Only the sister tries to address the stranger, but her communication is childish and helpless. During the play, the girl and the boy try to discuss a name for the child but cannot agree. The girl's old boyfriend turns up, and she flirts with him, while the boy puts on his coat and walks out of the door.

The Name exposes alienation and homelessness. The characters are not able to communicate; their talk is absorbed in an unresponsive void, and they keep uttering the same phrases over and over again or are unable to finish thoughts and sentences. The girl accuses the boy of being uninterested in her and the child and for not listening. In a self-confirming ritual, she repeats the words, "You never listen", "You don't care," while the boy clings to his book. The notion of a home is destroyed by the asocial and unfriendly atmosphere in the parents' house and literally by the couple's lack of a place to live.

As he is not allowed to introduce himself, the boy has no name throughout the play. This namelessness may point to a more fundamental situation, where he hovers between existence and nonexistence. If not directly a persona non grata, he is at least a kind of absent person, a circumstance that is marked by the missing name. This fundamentally philosophical theme is typical of Fosse's work, which persistently raises questions regarding basic human conditions. In this case, also the discussion between the young couple about a name for their child points to an existential dimension of the play.

In order to be adopted into a social, cultural, and linguistic community, each person requires the verbal sign of a name. Thus, the name is a signature, distinguishing an individual from the others, which gives her or him a historical, cultural, or familial context of significance and an opportunity to "fill in," to give meaning to a word. But when the boy suggests "Bjarne" as an "appropriate" name, this implies the complexity of the whole name problematic. Bjarne is the girl's former boyfriend, and the boy's suggestion discloses his jealousy and projects it onto the unborn child. There is a similar irony involving the suggested girl name "Beate," which means "happy."

The Name portrays family life in late modernity and presents an unpleasant state lacking empathy, communication, or any deeper meaning. In the middle of this setting, Fosse situates a linguistic and existential topic connected to a person's name and the irony embedded in our ways of searching and expressing identity and reason in our use of language.

[See also Alienation Effect; Norway]

FURTHER READING

Gran, Anne-Britt. "What Is New in the Norwegian Theatre?" ODIN (2001). <http://www.dep.no/odin/english/p30008168/history/032091-991297/dok-bn.html>.
Sætre, Lars. "Modernitet og heimløyse. Form og tematikk i Namnet av Jon Fosse." In Norsk litterær årbok Oslo: Samlaget, 2001. 149–178.

Unni Langås

NAMNET See THE NAME

NÅR VI DØDE VÅGNER See WHEN WE DEAD AWAKEN

NATHANSEN, HENRI (1868–1944)

I sometimes think I am a little too much a Jew. I feel too much at home here—inside the walls. But there is something else outside after all—a hole has been cut in the wall—

—Hugo, Act 4, Inside the Walls

Henri Nathansen was born into a Jewish family on July 17, 1868, in Hjørring, DENMARK. His literary work is characterized by a permanent conflict between his firm affiliations to his Jewish milieu and a longing to cut his roots. He admired the cosmopolitan Danish critic Georg Brandes, the leader of the modern breakthrough in Scandinavia, but at the same time he thought that Brandes betrayed his Jewish origin and lacked the mental solidarity lying behind the spiritual homelessness of the Jews. As for Brandes, he felt Nathansen more delicate than a soft-boiled egg without a shell.

Nathansen started his literary career as a prose writer but had originally dreamed of becoming an actor. In 1904 he made his debut as a dramatist, and in the following years, he wrote almost exclusively plays. In 1909 he became a stage director at the Royal Theatre, succeeding William Bloch by whose poetic REALISM he was deeply impressed. Nathansen directed most of his plays himself.

Nathansen's by far most famous play is Inside the Walls (Indenfor Murene), first staged in 1912 and still regularly performed. With great warmth Nathansen introduces us to the Levin family, gathered around the Sabbath table with Old Levin, a wealthy stockbroker, presiding at the head as a lovable but conservative and stubborn patriarch, conscious of his race and happy and secure inside the four walls of his home surrounded by his family. The atmosphere is cheerful, but something is not quite as usual. The daughter Esther is belated. She arrives in the middle of the meal from the university, where she, without her father's knowledge but with the tacit accept of her mother, follows the lectures of a young Dr. Herming to whom she is secretly engaged. Esther is an emancipated young lady who compares her secluded home—to her elder brothers "an oasis in the middle of the desert"—with "The Dead Sea." The engagement shocks the old Levins but forces the two pair of parents together. The dinner party in Herming's home leads to a clash of cultures. Prejudices reign on both sides, but the sympathy goes to Old Levin and not to the arrogant and in his heart anti-semitic Herming. Old Levin leaves the party in anger. Esther is split between her love for her fiancé and her loyalty toward her roots, but in the end a happy ending for the two young people seems possible.

By his empathetic description of an old-fashioned Jewish family in Copenhagen, Nathansen has created a Danish classic. In 1988 Inside the Walls was transformed into the musical Esther, with text by Paul Hammerich and music by Bent Fabricius Bjerre, but there is no doubt that the play, representing Danish realism at its best, will outlive the musical on the Danish stage.

When he wrote Inside the Walls, Nathansen could not imagine the horrors that lay ahead. During the occupation he had to flee to Sweden, where, on February 16, 1944, in Lund, he took his own life.

PLAYS: Mother Is Right (Mor har Ret, 1904); The Good Citizen (Den gode Borger, 1907); Daniel Hertz (1908); The Garden of Dana (Danas Have, 1908); The Dream (Drømmen, 1911); Inside the Walls (Indenfor Murene, 1912); The Affair (Affæren, 1913); Dr. Wahl (modeled after Georg Brandes, 1915)

FURTHER READING

Rossel, Sven H., ed. A History of Danish Literature. Lincoln: Univ. of Nebraska Press, 1992.
Wamberg, Niels Birger. "København-forfattere." In Danske digtere i det 20. århundre 3rd ed. vol. 1. Copenhagen: Gad, 1980.

Kela Kuam

NATTEN ÄR DAGENS MOR See THE NIGHT IS MOTHER TO THE DAY

NATURALISM

In theater and drama, naturalism has two principal meanings. In the broader sense, it is almost synonymous with REALISM. When a distinction is made, naturalism is seen as extreme or intensified realism, a greater fidelity to the minutiae of life, and a deeper descent into the more sordid aspects of life. For instance, one might say that TENNESSEE WILLIAMS'S A STREET-CAR NAMED DESIRE with its vulgar language and its onstage rape is more naturalistic than ARTHUR MILLER'S DEATH OF A SALESMAN. Similarly, HENRIK IBSEN'S GHOSTS, in which sexual disease is a prominent motif, is more naturalistic than A DOLL'S HOUSE. Naturalism in this sense claims to encompass more of life than realism.

The other, narrower sense of the word concerns a specific movement in literature, a movement associated with the theories of the French novelist ÉMILE ZOLA. In an age when scientific discoveries were rapidly changing the world, Zola sought to give a scientific basis to the artist's depiction of reality. A naturalist was a scientist, someone who studied the physical world; hence he called his movement naturalism. The main impulse behind it was the growing conviction that everything could be explained in terms of physical laws.

The French critic and philosopher Hippolyte Taine published a lengthy history of English literature (1863) in which he sought to show that creative genius was not some god-given gift but was the result of three factors—heredity, social environment, and the particular moment in history. This approach was in harmony with scientific thinking. He reduced the examination of artistic development to material factors, turning it into a kind of chemistry of genius. In his view, everything had a physical cause, a point he drove home by asserting, in the most quoted phase from his book, that "vice and virtue are products like vitriol and sugar" (Weber, 1960).

Similarly, Claude Bernard in his Introduction à l'étude de la médecine expérimentale (Introduction to the Study of Experimental Medicine, 1865) denied that there was any mysterious force, any so-called vital force, operating in living beings. To Bernard, medicine was both an art and a science, advancing through a series of experiments.

Influenced by Bernard, Zola wanted to make art as scientific as medicine and chose to regard the creative artist as akin to a doctor. In advocating the experimental approach in creative writing, Zola said that all he had to do was replace the word "doctor" by the word "novelist" in order to make his thoughts clear and endow it with the precision of scientific truth. Zola believed that a modern artist would proceed the same way. He called his novel THÉRÈSE RAQUIN (1868) a "surgical autopsy."

Zola described naturalist writers as "those whose method of study is to bring physical nature and human nature as close together as possible, all the while, of course, leaving free the particular temperament of the observer to manifest itself" (Le Naturalisme au théâtre [Naturalism in the Theater, 1881]). Art was "a corner of the universe viewed through a temperament". ("Mon Salon" ["My Salon," 1866]).

Many found the naturalist approach profoundly disagreeable, too sordid and unpleasant for artistic expression because it was too physical. Reviewing DUMAS FILS' The Foreigner (L'Étrangère) in 1876, HENRY JAMES (1948) said that the long speeches explaining "love is physics and marriage is chemistry" displayed a "want of perception of certain rudimentary differences between the possible, for decent people, and the impossible" (Saras, 1948).

While the realist claimed objectivity in depicting the world, the naturalist claimed deeper insight into the nature of things. It is in this regard that naturalism becomes more than a artistic movement in the middle of the 19th century. The insistence on seeing heredity and environment as fundamental causes of what we do and of what we are is the basis for nearly all the serious drama of the 20th century.

The triumph of this materialist view of human beings and social life was due mainly to the epoch-making work of Charles Darwin—The Origin of Species. Published in 1859, this work shook the foundations of RELIGION and opened new vistas in PHILOSOPHY. The philosopher Immanuel Kant, in the late 18th century, separated what could be explained by the human mind (phenomena) from what the human mind could never hope to explain (noumena) and gave as an example of the latter the origin of a blade of grass. Yet within 100 years, Darwin offered an explanation.

The consequences were profound and felt everywhere. Some reeled in horror from the world pictured by Darwin, in which the ruling principle was the survival of the fittest. It seemed to give the world over to the brutes, to what the Victorian poet Alfred Tennyson described as "nature red in tooth and claw" ("In Memoriam"). What appalled many, both devout Christians and religious skeptics alike, was the image of a world without a moral system, without some center of meaning and purpose. For the educator Matthew Arnold the world became a place where "ignorant armies clash by night" ("Dover Beach"). For the philosopher FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, all discussions of morality and justice became moot. He could write the obituary of God because Darwin had already noticed his passing.

But the defenders of the old faith regrouped their forces and assailed Darwinism at a salient point: in the struggle for survival there seemed to be no way of explaining conscience, which was assumed to be inscribed in man by God. How else could one account for it in a Darwinian world?

Zola attacked this shibboleth of religion in his novel Thérèse Raquin, later adapted into a play, to which he placed as epigraph Taine's words about vice and virtue. If it was possible to explain the origin of life itself in materialistic terms without recourse to a supernatural deity, it should be possible to explain genius (as Taine claimed) and conscience in the same materialistic way. Zola demonstrated without bringing in conscience how a murderous couple could not escape punishment for what seems like a perfect crime. The physical embodiment of retribution is the completely paralyzed mother of the man they killed. She knows their crime but is physically incapable of accusing them. Yet her presence haunts the criminals and feeds their fear that they will betray one another. She is the physical embodiment of their "conscience," which when analyzed "scientifically" turns out to be other people, not something implanted by God.

For Zola, Thérèse Raquin (1867) was an affirmation of determinism as "the supreme law of the universe," in which the connections of physical phenomena "prevent any supernatural agent from interfering to modify the result" (Le Roman Experimental [The Experimental Novel, 1893]).

However, if naturalism was to encompass life fully, it would have to explain the fact that many people were religious and turned to God as a consequence of a physical deed. LYOV TOLSTOY'S THE POWER OF DARKNESS (1886), for example, is a brutally naturalistic play, with murder and infanticide featuring in the plot. But Tolstoy directs the naturalistic action toward a religious conversion, quite the opposite of Zola's TRAGEDY.

HENRIK IBSEN'S GHOSTS (1881) is a naturalistic drama written by a man who was not comfortable with naturalism. The play embodies his conflicted view of scientific determinism. He wanted room for free will, and his heroine Mrs. Alving fights against deterministic forces and tries to free her son Oswald from them. He has cast aside all the old beliefs and is a devotee of life for life's sake, of joie de vivre. But the consequences of it are grave. God does not punish him; implacable physical nature in the form of syphilis does.

AUGUST STRINDBERG considered his play THE FATHER (1887) to be naturalistic, in that his presentation of the battle of the sexes was inspired in part by new revelations in psychology and by recent research in prehistory. So he had reason to hope that Zola would be pleased with it. Zola, however, objected to the abstract nature of the presentation; the characters were closer to being types rather than individualized characters. It was "scientific" in content but not in form.

All the essential elements of naturalism are present in August Strindberg's MISS JULIE (1888). In the preface he enthusiastically embraced what many others thought was the worst aspect of naturalism. "I find the joy of living," he wrote, "in the fierce and ruthless battles of life"—a deliberate echo of the sentiment expressed in the stirring peroration of Darwin's Origin of Species: "From the war of nature . . . the production of the higher animals directly follows. There is grandeur in this view of life."

The aristocratic Miss Julie is neurotic and unstable, an unhealthy specimen for the evolution of the species, whereas the lower-class servant Jean is physically strong, rather brutal, and without much of a conscience. In the evolutionary struggle, one of them must give way to the other. Christine, the cook, represents the religious element, here reduced to a minor role. At the end Jean has to yield to another force—not God but his employer, the count, Miss Julie's father. Strindberg recognized the class struggle as one form of the struggle for existence, thus combining Darwin's theory of evolution with Karl Marx's class conflict.

By calling his Miss Julie "a naturalistic tragedy," Strindberg challenged conventional esthetic theory, in which naturalism and tragedy were thought to be incompatible with each other. In this view, which was more Christian than Greek, man had free will but was confined by a divine moral order that inevitably made itself felt. The tragic hero was fated to come to an end decided by God (or gods). Strindberg and the naturalists turned that argument on its head, proclaiming that it was only through Darwinism and determinism that tragedy would be possible in the modern age. The gods of ancient tragedy, which nobody any longer believed in, were to be replaced by the forces and laws of nature.

However, those opposed to naturalism countered that the essence of tragedy was not the existence of God but of free will, and if physical life could be reduced to scientific principles, the human being would be entirely deprived of it. And if the human being was seen as the pawn of material forces, a mere specimen in nature's laboratory and not Hamlet's angelic creature, true tragedy was impossible. Darwin's descent of man was a descent into a crude, brutish world with a concomitant loss of beauty and high ideals.

The naturalist's reply to this guided the course of serious drama for the next century. As Strindberg pointed out in a letter of November 12, 1887, determinism in the physical sphere led to indeterminism with regard to moral concepts and ideals (Strindberg, 1996). With man cut loose from the old religious beliefs, he was able to reexamine the basis of morality. He was truly free, and therein lay the basis of modern tragedy.

[See also Expressionism; Symbolism]

FURTHER READING

- Bernard, Claude. Introduction à l'étude de la médecine expérimentale. Paris: J. B. Ballière et fils, 1865.
- Innes, Christopher, ed. A Sourcebook on Naturalist Theatre. London: Routledge, 2000.
- James, Henry. The Scenic Art: Notes on Acting & the Drama, 1872–1901. Ed. by Allan Wade. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers Univ., 1948.
- "Mon Salon" (1866). Tr. by F. W. J. Hemming, in From the classicists to the impressionists: Art and Architecture in the Nineteenth Century, vol. 3 of A Documentary History of Art, ed. by Elizabeth Gilmore Holt. N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1966.

- Strindberg, August. "On Modern Drama and Modern Theatre." In Selected Essays, tr. by Michael Robinson. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1996. 73–86.
- Stromberg, Roland N., ed. Realism, Naturalism, and Symbolism. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.
- Weber, Eugen, ed. Paths to the Present: Aspects of European Thought from Romanticism to Existentialism. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1960. Quoting Hod Taine, History of English Literature, tr. by H. Van Laun. New York, 1895.
- Zola, Émile. Le Naturalisme au théâtre; les théories et les exemples. Paris: G. Charpentier, 1881.
- . Le Roman Experimental. Paris: G. Charpentier, 1890.

Evert Sprinchorn

NA VSYAKOGO MUDRESTA DOVOL 'NO PROSTOTY See THE SCOUNDREL

NEEDLES AND OPIUM

First performed by Quebecer author Robert Lepage in 1991 under the name Les Aiguilles et l'Opium in Montreal, Needles and Opium was an instant success, despite (or perhaps because of) Lepage's insistence there be absolutely no promotion. This premiere was followed by a highly acclaimed world tour before Lepage then directed actor Marc Labrèche in performances of the one-man show in 1994 and won the Chalmers Award for Best Canadian Play in 1995.

The play is a series of poignant vignettes creating a funeral song to lost love that stirs a mesmerizing examination of the artist's creative processes as revealed through the reconstructed lives of Parisian poet and filmmaker JEAN COCTEAU and jazz trumpeter Miles Davis. Images are more important than text, thus begging the question, Is Needles and Opium drama, pure drama, or something more akin to performance art or perhaps even circus? Without a published play script, it remains a germane question, although Lepage is known, as with his other works, for placing the act of writing the script, in terms of sequence, last. He reverses the usual dramatic process, workshoping with collaborators first, and asks: "Doesn't a work's raison d'être appear more clearly after it's done?" (Lepage, 1997).

Needles and Opium consists of a scintillating spectacle of live and recorded music; explosions of color and juxtapositions of shadow; montages of documentary footage and text on a Lycra screen; and most notably, a flying harness in which the actor swings and floats in midair between two hypnotically rotating propellers.

Lepage explores the loneliness he suggests prompted not only Cocteau's opium addiction and Davis's heroin habit but his own obsession with an ex-lover—a kind of a biographical amalgam between himself, Cocteau, and Davis with the point of conjunction being Paris, FRANCE. There Davis stayed and suffered in 1949, while Cocteau—miserable after the death of lover Raymond Radiguet—almost simultaneously left Paris for America and Lepage himself suffered a near emotional breakdown after a failed relationship, alone in JEAN-PAUL SARTRE's old Paris hotel room, forty years later. One of the most impressive moments of this grand image maker's work involves a projection of a giant hypodermic syringe finding a vein in Davis's silhouetted arm.

The overall result is an examination of personal loss and how and why an artist must survive the almost unbearable pain and subsequent detoxification from the opioids or whatever balm the artist chooses to assuage the pain. Both Davis and Cocteau found inspiration the moment they stopped taking drugs. Such hurting and recovery enables growth and results in the artist becoming more individualistic. Lepage has opioid use as an ongoing theme in several of his theater works and explains: "If I keep coming back to these drugs, it's because of an experience I had when I was a teenager that left me in a state of depression for almost two years" (Lepage, 1997). His withdrawal from society was eventually dealt with through his dedication to overcoming his own debilitating stagefright on the stage.

As with much of Lepage's work, Needles and Opium is difficult to pigeonhole into a single genre. This contemporary theater artist enjoys pushing the boundaries of what many theatergoers would describe as drama and encroaching upon other arenas of artistic endeavor, but always collaboratively. Even with a one-man show such as this, Lepage draws on the genius of numerous backstage and preproduction art technicians and creative minds to shape a piece that, if it is not pure drama, is certainly theater that combines numerous different styles and disciplines to provide an unforgettable dramatic experience.

[See also Canada]

FURTHER READING

- Dundjerovic, Aleksander. The Cinema of Robert Lepage: The Poetics of Memory. New York: Wallflower Press, 2003.
- Lepage, Robert. Connecting Flights: In Conversation with Rmy Charest. Tr. by Wanda Romer Taylor. London: Methuen, 1997.
- Lepage, Robert, and Ex Machina. The Seven Streams of the River Ota. London: Methuen Drama, 1996.

D. Bruno Starrs

LES NÈGRES See THE BLACKS

NEILSON, ANTHONY (1967–)

Anthony Neilson, born in Edinburgh, SCOTLAND, in 1967, is usually grouped with the In-Yer-Face playwrights (SARAH KANE, MARK RAVENHILL) who fostered a revival in British playwriting in the mid-1990s. Although the label aptly describes much of Neilson's work, it has not always served him well because critics often charge that he relies on shock tactics to attract attention and engage his audience. Furthermore, his plays are a catalog of controversial subjects and contemporary iniquities: an encounter with the notorious Düsseldorf Ripper (NORMAL, 1991), a portrait of hypermasculinity that involves the threat of anal rape (Penetrator, 1993), and an ethical debate about pornographic images and the need for censorship (The Censor, 1997). The latter contains one of Neilson's most notorious scenes: a female director of erotic films defecates onstage to seduce her nemesis—the impotent and repressed censor who is attempting to ban her film. Neilson's willingness to address taboo subjects—and stage them for the full view of the audience—constantly tests the boundaries of what is permitted on the British stage in the era of postcensorship.

Born to a theatrical family in Edinburgh, Neilson was inspired by his parent's participation in the vibrant Scottish theater scene of the 1970s (his father is director Sandy Neilson and his mother is actress Beth Robens). Neilson's first full-length play, Normal, debuted in 1991 at the Edinburgh Festival, and his work has remained popular with fringe companies and alternative theaters ever since; his work is also frequently performed abroad (POLAND, SWEDEN, FRANCE, AUSTRALIA, IRELAND, ITALY, and the UNITED STATES).

Neilson often directs his own plays, and much of his work is devised with his actors in the rehearsal period. Neilson's use of improvisation and "group dreaming" in the writing process gives his productions immediacy, unpredictability, and a distinct rawness of tone that has become his theatrical signature. While not denying a desire to épater le bourgeois (impress the middle-class man), Neilson has argued that his theatrical aesthetic is rooted in the notion that drama is an experiential mode that must be viscerally felt by the audience. Neilson writes in his introduction to Plays: 1 (1998): "I'd implore you [theatre artists] not to be reverent. Change them [his plays] as you see fit in whatever time and place you are. Make them better—God knows there's opportunity for that—or better yet, replace my flaws with your own. Above all, make them live and breathe." Neilson's flippant disregard for the sanctity of the written word alludes to his quasi-Artaudian faith in theater as a "lived experience" and his disdain for cerebral theater that offers a detached and rational analysis of social ills.

Though Neilson's subject matter has varied over the last decade, some familiar leitmotifs can be found in his recent works: a fascination with freaks and outsiders (Edward Gant's Amazing Feats of Loneliness, 2002), dysfunctional sexual politics à la AUGUST STRINDBERG (Stitching, 2002), and the experience of mental illness (The Wonderful World of Dissocia, 2004). Neilson has also attempted to show greater range in his oeuvre by experimenting with an Ortonesque FARCE (The Lying Kind, 2002), a Victorian freakshow/MELODRAMA (Edward Gant's), and an adult pantomime (The Wonderful World of Dissocia).

[See also England, 1960–Present]

PLAYS: Normal (1991); Penetrator (1993); The Year of the Family (1994); The Censor (1997); Edward Gant's Amazing Feats of Loneliness (2002); The Lying Kind (2002); Stitching (2002); The Wonderful World of Dissocia (2004)

FURTHER READING

Droomgoole, Dominic. The Full Room: An A–Z of Contemporary Playwrighting. London: Methuen, 2000.

Neilson, Anthony. Plays. 1. London: Methuen, 1998.

Sierz, Aleks. In-Yer-Face Theatre: British Drama Today. London: Faber, 2000.

James L. Penner

NELSON, RICHARD (1950–)

American dramatist Richard Nelson was born in Chicago in 1950 and educated at Hamilton College in New York, where he had fourteen plays produced. The recipient of both Rockefeller and National Endowment for the Arts grants for playwriting, his prolific and sustained career benefited from three occurrences. Appointments as literary manager of the Brooklyn Academy of Music (BAM), associate director of the Goodman Theatre in Chicago, and DRAMATURG of the Guthrie Theatre, Minneapolis, meant sustained work as a writer within ongoing stage companies. Adaptations from Molière, BERTOLT BRECHT, NIKOLAI ERDMANN, Carlo Goldoni, and Pierre-Augustin Beaumarchais saw the writer developing his craft within the context of past masters while producing his own new work. At BAM he met the English stage director David Jones, which led to an ongoing relationship with the Royal Shakespeare Company (RSC) as a commissioned playwright. The long-term work with the RSC was paralleled by Nelson's relationship with Faber & Faber publishers, which meant that, unlike most established American playwrights, Nelson's stage work appeared consistently in published form soon after production.

The early plays centered around two interests: reportage and formal experimentation. The Killing of Yablonski (1975), Conjuring an Event (1976), and Jungle Coup (1978) each had a reporter as protagonist. Contemporary political events figured in his work, in a series of early radio plays: political assassination, Watergate, and so forth. The interaction of dramaturg and playwright resulted in a diversity of DRAMATIC STRUCTURES. Bal (1980) was a contemporary transformation of early Brechtian EXPRESSIONISM; Rip Van Winkle or The Works (1981) was an exercise in EPIC THEATER; a turn in cartoon AGITATION-PROPAGANDA, The Return of Pinocchio (1982), followed; and An American Comedy (1983) incorporated elements of 1930s screwball. A further two plays continued the interest in historical events, Between East and West (1983) and Principia Scriptoriae (1986). These plays, receiving London productions and consolidating his achievements to that point, initiated work with the RSC.

Working with a mélange of directors (David Jones, Roger Mitchell, John Caird, Howard Davies, among others), Nelson was able to begin a series of remarkable, large-cast plays on a variety of topics that allowed for exploration of what he has called "normal, small behavior on a very broad canvas." Some Americans Abroad (1989) depicts a group of American academics leading students through an English, cultural-tourist background while fighting out the backbiting problems of status, tenure, and power. A next effort was Two Shakespearean Actors (1990), a study of Anglo-American themes and the business of theater itself—its subject being the Astor Place riots in New York City when rival audiences of British actor William Charles Macready and American actor Edwin Forrest (performing Macbeth in separate productions) spilled out into the streets. Two further plays demonstrated the growing range: Columbus and the Discovery of Japan (1992) and the peculiar Misha's Party (1993), written in collaboration with Russian Alexander Gelman, with the 1991 attempted Soviet coup as background. In The General from America (1996) Nelson presented events from the American Revolution and Benedict Arnold's transformation from war hero to villainous traitor.

Further work of merit includes smaller-cast plays such as Life Sentences (1993) and New England (1994), as well as a series of excellent, pensive plays for radio on the BBC. These include Languages Spoken Here (1987), Eating Words (1989), and Advice to Eastern Europe (1990).

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: The Killing of Yablonski (1975); Conjuring an Event (1976); Scooping (1976); Jungle Coup (1978); The Vienna Notes (1979); Bal (1980); Rip Van Winkle or The Works (1981); The Return of Pinocchio (1982); An American Comedy (1983); Between East and West (1983); Principia Scriptoriae (1986); Languages Spoken Here (1987); Roots in the Water (1988); Eating Words (1989); Some Americans Abroad (1989); Advice to Eastern Europe (1990); Two Shakespearean Actors (1990); Columbus and the Discovery of Japan (1992); Life Sentences (1993); Misha's Party (with Alexander Gelman, 1993); The American Wife (1994); New England (1994); The General from America (1996); Goodnight Children Everywhere (1997); Franny's Way (2001)

FURTHER READING

DiGaetani, John Louis. A Search for a Postmodern Theater: Interviews with Contemporary Playwrights. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Nelson, Richard, and David Jones. Making Plays: The Writer-Director Relationship in the Theatre Today. London: Faber, 1995.

Savran, David. In Their Own Words: Contemporary American Playwrights. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1988.

Stanley R. Richardson

NETHERLANDS

Dutch drama in the 1860s was heavily influenced by the internationally popular French MELODRAMA. In the 18th century it had followed rules of French neoclassicism, meter and rhyme were used, and declamation was the key ACTING skill. French playwrights remained the role model for Dutch dramatists throughout most of the 19th century. The historical romantic drama of Victor Hugo, the melodramatic works of French dramatists like René Charles Guilbert de Pixérécourt, and well-made plays from both romantic and realist playwrights like Eugène Scribe, VICTORIEN SARDOU, and Alexandre DUMAS FILS were translated for the Dutch stage, providing examples for Dutch dramatists like H. J. Schimmel (1823–1906), Rosier Faassen (1833–1907), and Hendrik Boelen (1825–1900). Schimmel started by writing dramas in verse based on classicist principles but moved gradually through romantic works to more realistic plays. Faassen, who was half French, started as an actor and came to Holland in 1876. He translated several plays and wrote twenty-two of his own. His plays, like The Black Captain (De zwarte kapitein, 1877) or Black Griet (Zwarte Griet, 1882), dealt with the lives of ordinary people. He used archetypal characters (for instance, the Stingy Farmer and his Good Wife) set in short, funny, and touching scenes.

But apart from such original Dutch dramatic writing, the imitation and glorification of French drama throughout the bulk of the 19th century appears to have prevented the development of a more mature, indigenous Dutch drama and theater tradition in that period. While Dutch company directors favored translations of French plays, the audience was able to compare the results with the original French interpretations, since French companies came regularly to Amsterdam, The Hague, and Rotterdam. For example, between 1880 and 1890 Sarah Bernhardt's performances of The Tosca (La Tosca, Sardou), The Lady of the Camellias (La Dame aux Camélias, Dumas fils), and Adrienne Lecouvreur (Scribe) became the standard by which Dutch actresses like Theo Bouwmeester were judged.

As elsewhere in Europe, Dutch 19th-century theater had become an art form for the bourgeoisie. Apart from small subsidies from the royal court, and equally small irregular contributions from the larger cities, the theater was dependent on the box office. As a result, the lower-middle-class melodrama had grown in popularity and importance, influencing the production of plays. "Everything had come to a standstill, except the legs" is an often-quoted expression of Dutch writer Everhardus Potgieter, referring to a popular form of musical entertainment that attracted large audiences. The director's choice of repertoire was made to attract as many spectators as possible.

Around 1865 a group of literary and socially elite bourgeois felt the urge to improve the theater. "In the battle for a National Theater, only joint forces can overcome the problems of distaste, incapacity and routine," claimed J. N. van Hall, a lawyer and writer (1840–1918) (Erenstein, 1996). At the yearly Dutch Language and Literary Congress, he laid the foundation for the Nederlandsch Tooneelverbond (Dutch Theatre Association), by proposing several ways of elevating theater as art form. One of its aims was to encourage the writing of original Dutch drama. Owing to the support of banker and dramatist H. J. Schimmel, this initiative was followed in 1871 by the founding of the theatre journal Het (Nederlandsch) Tooneel and the creation in 1874 of the first Acting Academy. Schimmel was also one of the initiators of the Vereeniging Het Nederlandsch Tooneel, a theater company that received the title of "Koninklijke" in 1881, due to the support it received from King William III.

Dutch dramatic writing did not, however, live up to these expectations. Critic Leo Simons (1932) described the repertoire of the 1890 season. The four main companies performed approximately 132 different plays in a mix of dramas and COMEDIES, but salon plays and melodramas were the most popular genres, and of the 132, only four original Dutch plays were performed that season.

By 1890, as elsewhere in Europe, realist and naturalist drama had reached the Dutch stages. Translations of HENRIK IBSEN, AUGUST STRINDBERG, and ANTON CHEKOV were available. Performances were presented by the duke of Meiningen and by ANDRÉ ANTOINE. Ibsen's PILLARS OF SOCIETY was first performed in 1880, and the Dutch audience reacted positively. Some years later, however, in 1889, there was some commotion over A DOLL'S HOUSE, owing to the content, the psychological description of the characters that replaced action, the new acting style, and the realistic scenery. But Ibsen's work became popular. His DRAMATURGY had an immediate influence on directors such as Antoine Jean le Gras. Dramatist HERMAN HEIJERMANS (1864–1924) became the most famous Dutch proponent of NATURALISM.

1900–1945

In the first part of the 20th century, socialist ideology took shape. Workers' unions had their successes in claiming better working conditions through major strikes, for instance, that of the Rotterdam harbor in 1903. Women finally got the right to vote in 1922, after decades of struggle. And in 1920 actors united successfully to achieve a better pension arrangement. In this general atmosphere of changing power, a new generation of writers wished to portray the struggle of life more realistically. Heijermans, a socialist, was one of the few naturalistic Dutch playwrights whose work was performed with success. He depicted the life of the working classes, concentrating on characterization of individuals in a hostile society. There were more Dutch dramatists working in this naturalistic and realistic mode. Josine Simons-Mees (1863–1946) wrote several successful plays like The Conqueror (De veroveraar, 1906); Atie's Marriage (Atie's huwelijk, 1907), and Faith (Geloof, 1924). She was considered to be more subtle in her psychological description of characters than Heijermans. Jan Fabricius (1871–1964) had an enormous oeuvre, among which were Married by Proxy (Met de handschoen getrouwd, 1907) and Een ridder kwam voorbij (1932), which he first wrote in English as A Knight Passed By and which was performed in London. Heijermans painted the somber faith of his characters, but Fabricius did the opposite. Although influenced by Heijermans's realistic approach to setting and dialogue, the world of his characters included a way out of their misery.

The rise of REALISM did not banish the melodrama from Dutch stages. And despite the production of a goodly number of local dramatists, Dutch theater managers often preferred plays that were already successful abroad. The system prevented real ensemble work, by providing theaters with too little financial means. Most managers did not look for subtlety or psychological refinement. Therefore, the contribution of the better Dutch dramatists remained limited, to their own frustration.

In the 1920s, actor and director Albert van Dalsum (1889–1979) complained loudly about the level of theater and lack of good drama. He claimed that even the innovations in realistic dramas had disappeared. Under the influence of German EXPRESSIONISM, he pleaded for innovation in theater, with sketchy, explosive use of language, a clear central character, and one-dimensional “types” of characters. He also propounded engaged, political testimony. Plays such as OSKAR KOKOSCHKA's Murder, Hope of the Women (Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen, 1907) and REINHARD SORGE's The Panhandler (Der Bettler, 1912) were his prototypes. The plays caused discussion but were not performed. After World War I, the political in expressionist drama became more prominent. During the few years that such forms of expressionism were tried out on the Dutch stages, the emphasis lay, however, on the specific form of self-expression. Van Dalsum tried to emphasize the political mode, but the Dutch theater companies were not ready for it. When in 1921 the production Friday (Vrijdag) by German dramatist Herbert Kranz was shown, and expressionism was introduced onto the Dutch stage, German expressionism was itself already in decline in GERMANY. August Defresne (1893–1961) is seen as the main Dutch dramatist of that time who, in his work with van Dalsum, developed an expressionistic, contemporary style. The Barge (De woonschuit, 1924) is the first work that demonstrates his conviction that the function of theater is as a testimony of truth. In 1929 van Dalsum and Defresne together founded the Oost-Nederland Toneel in Arnhem, meant to work from expressionistic ideas. Their intentions were mainly sociopolitically oriented, but their plays also focused on the individual. The company existed only for one season. From 1931 van Dalsum became director of the Amsterdamsch Tooneel, where he developed his ideas further.

In the 1930s not much changed for Dutch dramatists. Economic problems made the theater directors even more dependent on box-office revenue and therefore reluctant to experiment. They chose either plays in which audiences could recognize themselves or plays in which great actors could shine. The members of the Bond van Nederlandsche Tooneelschrijvers (Organization for Dutch Dramatists) admitted openly at the celebration of their tenth anniversary in 1933 that the situation of Dutch and Flemish dramatists remained in a deplorable state. “In North and South foreign plays supplanted plays from our own soil. Official measures should be taken to protect our art” (Erenstein, 1996). These measures were only taken after World War II.

During the war, theater in the Netherlands functioned in two ways: in the form of official amusement for those who kept performing under the German occupation and in the form of critical protest by theater makers who went underground. In 1940, soon after the occupation started, the department of education, arts, and sciences was replaced by a Departement voor Volksvoorlichting en Kunsten (Department for Education of the People and Arts). Before establishing the Kulturkamer in 1942, the dramaturgy section of this department started censoring plays and performances. Jewish plays, songs, and sketches, as well as English, American, and Russian repertoire were forbidden. Companies had to have their repertoire checked. The aim of the Nazi occupation was to expand German repertoire and to stimulate specific genres of original Dutch drama. By the end of 1944, when it became clear that forces had changed, the interest of the Nazis in infiltrating and influencing Dutch culture had diminished. Liberation was celebrated on May 5, 1945, with the play Free People (Vrij Volk). It was written for the occasion by Anton Coolen (1897–1961), August Defresne, Jeanne van Schaik (1895–1984), and other directors and dramatists who had stayed in hiding during the war. In 1944 some of these same directors, such as Defresne, had surreptitiously published a booklet called Ontwerp voor een regeling van het toneel na de oorlog (Design for a Regulation of Theatre After the War, 1944). They made suggestions for a national policy aimed at preventing the theater from falling back into the commercial situation prior to World War II.

1945–1970

In the years directly following World War II, audiences were eager for entertainment. In 1947 a subsidy system to assist theater makers to develop their artistic ideas without too much dependency on box office was realized. Five companies received national subsidies. In 1969 the number grew to eleven. These companies were to provide society with quality theater, and they had an obligation to tour throughout the country. Companies were also required to produce two productions per season based on Dutch drama. This system was based on the ideological premise that art has an educational function and should be made available for every citizen. The discussion concentrated around how to tackle the issues of geographical (or horizontal) and social (or vertical) spreading of art.

Despite good intentions of stimulating local writing, Dutch theater companies in the 1950s were mainly choosing the international canon. William Shakespeare, Greek TRAGEDIES, Anton Chekov, and Henrik Ibsen were popular, together with new American dramatists including ARTHUR MILLER and TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, as well as the comedies of writers such as ALAN AYCKBORN and GEORGES FEYDEAU. Between 1951 and 1966, about 1,000 premieres took place, but only sixty-one were based on the work of Dutch contemporary dramatists: only six percent. In this period of meager Dutch drama writing, it is striking that a large number of the Dutch plays in the 1950s and 1960s came from writers of literature. Some of them succeeded very well with their experiments. Cees Nooteboom (1933–), later famous for his travel novels, was successful with The Swans of the Thames (De zwanen van de Theems). It was performed by the premier Dutch company, the Nederlandse Comedie, in 1959. Plays of Harry Mulisch (1927–) (Tanchelijn, 1960), Gerard Reve (1923–) (Commissaris Fennedy, 1962), and Jan Wolkers (1925–) (Babel, 1963) were instantly performed by major Dutch companies. This created a renewed interest in writing drama and a reestimation of the language. But with the exception of HUGO CLAUS, none of these writers remained faithful to drama. The first plays of the Flemish Claus caused a bit of social upheaval. He attacked the hypocrisy in Flemish society and the use of imposed moral systems (for instance, that of the Catholic Church) to suppress human desires and physicality.

In the 1960s some changes occurred. Experimental groups such as Test and Studio, both under the leadership of Kees van Iersel, initiated readings of new drama. In the 1950s van Iersel had introduced absurdist writers (SAMUEL BECKETT and EUGÈNE IONESCO, for example) and had directed several of their plays for television. He organized workshops in order to stimulate young Dutch playwrights to experiment with language. By the second half of the 1960s, the world seemed in turmoil. The political arena, the Vietnam protests, and the student demonstrations in the UNITED STATES, Paris, and Amsterdam influenced a new generation. In 1968 young theater makers rebelled, in what was called Action Tomato after the tomatoes that were thrown in protest. The young theater makers criticized the state of the Dutch theater. Existing production processes were too hierarchical. Engagement with contemporary life was missing, especially in the repertoire of such leading companies as de Nederlandse Comedie and de Haagsche Comedie. They demanded relief from the dominance of the Western canon, wishing to incorporate more experiment and improvisations, utilizing themes arising from the society of their time.

Action Tomato resulted in new production forms. The more collectively run companies that came out of this battle, for instance, the Werkteater, Baal, or Onafhankelijk Toneel, did not necessarily work with written drama. The actor and his or her relation to a theme, a space, or the spectator became as important a signifying element as the text.

1970–PRESENT

Between 1970 and 1990 several attempts were made to improve and inspire Dutch drama writing. Theater critic Ben Stroman wrote his famous book The Art of Dutch Playwriting: An Attempt To Explain An Absence (De Nederlandse toneelschrijfkunst. Poging tot verklaring van een gemis, 1973). He explained the lack of a Dutch dramatic tradition by describing the centuries of mutual distrust present between the literary and theatrical “scenes.” Except for those dramatists who directed their own plays, such as Heijermans, Stroman’s analysis was that the literary author dislikes theater and that the theater director mistrusts writers.

But in the 1960s theater was no longer necessarily based on dramatic or literary texts. After Action Tomato, many new, small-scale theater companies arose, and the theater landscape changed. A critical attitude toward society was combined with formal experimentation. Musician Lodewijk de Boer (1937–2004) became a writer and director and emphasized the musicality and rhythm in spoken words. His four-play series The Family (1972) became the most famous illustration of the Dutch anti-authoritarian society of the 1970s. Judith Herzberg (1934–) wrote harrowing plays about people coping with life and identity, especially Jewish identity, in plays such as It Is No Dog (Het is geen hond, 1972), Malicious Delight (Leedvermaak, 1982), and Scratch (Kras, 1988). In 1971 Herzberg, as a well-known literary writer, was one of the first to work at the Institute for Research for Dutch Theatre. Then Minister of Culture Marga Klompé had given permission and the finances to create this institute, where writers were invited to develop their drama writing skills, without any pressure to produce.

Collective companies, like Werkteater, created their texts postperformance, as the performances were based on improvisation. Productions like Happenings (Toestanden, 1972) and Evening-red (Avondrood, 1974) appealed to new audiences. The company performed at places where they connected to problems of the local people: in a hospital, a prison, or a home for the elderly. The drama was the result of this collective process and not the writing of one specific playwright. A number of groups used similar working methods. Sater and Proloog focused on political and educational subjects; De Salon, Persona, Theater ’80, and Spiegeltheater chose feminist themes. Dramatists like Marin van Veldhuizen (1948–) and Frouke Fokkema, who worked with these companies, also developed into directors.

In the midst of these different experiments, the companies Puck and (later) Centrum focused specifically on encouraging Dutch drama writing. In 1974, Peter Oosthoek (1934–) received the Anne Frank Prize for having written and directed six Dutch plays in one season. As artistic director of Centrum, he created space for well-known writers like Hella Haasse (1918–), Dimitri Frenkel Frank (1928–1988), and Mies Bouhuys (1927–) to experiment with the genre. Oosthoek attracted new young talent, among them Ton Vorstenbosch (1949–), who wrote many plays beginning in 1975.

The collective mode of production and the explicit political stances exhausted themselves to some extent by the beginning of the 1980s. Most of these companies dissolved, except for the Werkteater, Maatschappij Discordia, and Onafhankelijk Toneel. By that time, more directors started to write their own plays, for instance: Ger Thijs (1948–), Gerardjan Rijnders (1949–), and Frans Strijards (1952–). They also directed the plays with their own companies. Individual experience is often stressed in these plays. The fact that the director dealt with his own text(s) created possibilities. Many of these plays do not follow traditional Aristotelian dramaturgy or employ textual coherence. Nor are they unambiguous in meaning. Where Thijs writes in the classical tradition (e.g., Fixtures [Winkeldochters] or Small Aim [Kleine zielen]), Rijnders creates room for multiple layers of interpretation in the COLLAGE-like performances of his own dramas, for example, Ballet (1990) or Count Your Blessings (1993). In a postmodern world, he forces the spectator to make individual choices. And in Hensbergen (1985) or Hitchcocks Pitchfork (Hitchcocks Driesprong, 1985), Frans Strijards plays with the paradox of the illusion of fiction and the fiction of illusion. In the last ten or twenty years, a growing number of dramatist-directors have followed in their footsteps. Koos Terpstra (1955–), Don Duyns (1967–), Peer Wittenbols (1965–), Faul Feld (1958–), and Jeroen van den Berg (1966–) all have their own companies where they can experiment with their own drama. A similar development took place in youth theater. Playwrights like Pauline Mol (1953–), Suzanne van Lohuizen (1955–), Heleen Verburg (1964–), and Esther Gerritsen (1972–) directed their own plays.

In the last ten years a new generation of theater makers chose once again to work in collectives, following the example of companies like Maatschappij Discordia: the Barreland, Dood Paard, Stan, De Roovers. These actors' companies combine high interest in the canon, using and reworking the plays of (for instance) Shakespeare, Chekov, and Beckett according to the respective company's interpretation. Within those groups new dramatists arose, like Oscar van Woensel (1970–) (from Dood Paard). His plays Who . . . (Wie . . . , 1996), Between Ourselves (Tussen ons gezegd en gezwegen, 1997), and Bleat (Blaat, 1998) demonstrate the search for the individual, as is illustrated in this quotation from Who . . .: "wie ben ik wie ben jij wie zijn wij wie zijn wie ik ben ben ik ik wie jij bent wie wie ik ben ik wij zijn wie wij zijn wie ik" ("who am I are you who are we who who is who am I am I I who are you who who I am I who are who are we am I).

FURTHER READING

- Bork, G. J., and P. J. Verkruijsse, eds. De Nederlandse en Vlaamse auteurs [The Dutch and Flemish Author]. Leiden: Stichting Digitale Bibliotheek voor de Nederlandse Letteren (dbnl), 2001.
- De Leeuwe, Hans, in collab. with Hans Mulder Westerbeek and Hans van Maanen. International Bibliography of the Dutch and Flemish Theatre. London: Headley, 1972. Reprinted from Theatre Research, vol. XII, no. 2, 1972.
- Dubois, Pierre H. Dutch Art Today, Literature. Amsterdam: Uitgeverij Contact, 1956.
- Erenstein, Robbert, et al., eds. Een theatergeschiedenis der Nederlanden. Tien eeuwen drama en theater in Nederland en Vlaanderen [A theater-history of the Netherlands. Ten centuries of drama and theater in the Netherlands and Flanders]. Amsterdam: Amsterdam Univ. Press, 1996.
- Kemperink, Mary. Neederlands toneel in het fin de siècle, 1890–1900 [Dutch theater at the Fin de Siècle, 1890–1900]. Amsterdam: Amsterdam Univ. Press, 1995.

Ockhuijzen, Ronald. Een roepende in de polder [A Voice Crying in the Polder]. Amsterdam: Amsterdam Univ. Press, 1992.

Simons, Leo. Het drama en het tooneel in hun ontwikkeling, deel V 1875–1930 [The drama and the stage in development, part 5 1875–1930]. Amsterdam: Nederlandse bibliotheek, 1932.

Snijders, Corine Snijders. Een gebrekkige dialoog? Een onderzoek naar de Nederlandse toneelschrijfkunst in Nederland en Vlaanderen [An inadequate dialogue? An analysis of the art of Dutch playwriting in the Netherlands and Flanders]. Groningen: Rijksuniversiteit Groningen, 1992.

Stroman, Ben. De Nederlandsche toneelschrijfkunst: Poging tot verklaring van een gemis [The art of Dutch playwriting: An attempt to explain an absence]. Amsterdam: Moussault, 1973.

Winkel, J. te. De ontwikkelingsgang der Nederlandsche letterkunde. Deel 7: Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde in de eerste eeuw der Europeesche Staatsomwentelingen [The Evolution of Dutch Literature. Part 7: History of Dutch Literature in the age of European Revolutions]. Tweede druk. Haarlem: Erven F. Bohn, 1927.

Worp, J. A. van. Geschiedenis van het drama en van het tooneel in Nederland. Deel 1 en 2 [History of Drama and Stage in the Netherlands. Parts 1 and 2]. Rotterdam: Fa Langerveld, 1903.

Lucia van Heteren

NEW DRAMATISTS

We were an innocent but heady group of new dramatists that thirty-five years ago climbed to the top of Lindsay and Crouse's Hudson Theatre on West 44th Street week after week to listen to the likes of Maxwell Anderson, Elisa Kazan, Robert Sherwood, Elmer Rice, S. N. Behrman, and Joshua Logan talk about playwriting and theatre.

—Robert Anderson, from the foreword to Short Pieces from the New Dramatists, 1985

New Dramatists was established in 1949. It was the UNITED STATES' first development program for playwrights and thus is the oldest, as others have since followed its example throughout the years. Originally an idea of the young dramatist Michaela O'Harra, she produced an initial proposal, the essentials of which have continued in use to century's end. As Robert Anderson noted in an introduction to Short Pieces from the New Dramatists, "Young poets are eighteen, young novelists, twenty-five, and young playwrights, thirty-six. I believe it is granted that playwriting is the most difficult form of writing because it is not just writing. It is learning that what is written on the page is only a blueprint" (Chervin, 1985). O'Harra felt that an institutional approach to the development of new writers for the stage was needed.

In her initial proposal, submitted to Dramatist Guild member HOWARD LINDSAY, she suggested a member service organization that would draw on already existing resources (producers, theater companies, agents, etc.) and provide the following opportunities: (1) free tickets for as much attendance in playhouses as possible; (2) informal roundtable discussion of craft with established dramatists, producers, designers, and actors; (3) chances for observation of plays from first read through to opening in New York or closing out of town; and finally (4) script-in-hand workshops in which plays could be discussed, revised or not, and then directed, rehearsed, and performed for a small audience.

Skeptical at first, Lindsay, upon meeting an initial group of potential writers, signed on enthusiastically, and a board was formed with the above cited writers, as well as John Wharton, Richard Rodgers, Oscar Hammerstein, with MOSS HART as president. Describing itself as producing playwrights rather than plays, the organization has continued into the 21st century and has worked with well over 500 playwrights and resulted in productions earning eleven Pulitzer Prizes, twenty-two Tony Awards, fifty Obie Awards, seventeen Drama Desk Awards, and ten Susan Smith Blackburn Awards. Distinguished alumnae over several generations include WILLIAM INGE, William Gibson, JAMES BALDWIN, HORTON FOOTE, JOHN GUARE, ROCHELLE OWENS, MEGAN TERRY, AUGUST WILSON, MAC WELLMAN, ERIC OVERMYER, MARIA IRENE FORNES, JOHN PATRICK SHANLEY, EMILY MANN, Donald Margulies, PAULA VOGEL, and SUZAN-LORI PARKS.

This success resulted in various development programs throughout the country, some independent and some in association with regional theaters, and remains an essential element of theater production in America, allowing fledgling dramatists to learn the business of collaboration and experience the responses of audiences. A negative aspect of the "developmental process" is that some playwrights have felt their plays were "workshopped to death," and others have pointed out the development programs are a way for theaters to throw a little money at "new work," yet rarely do these plays reach the main stage; many never see any full productions at all. Still, some writers have thrived on such a process. TONY KUSHNER'S ANGELS IN AMERICA benefited from extensive development before opening in London and finally on Broadway. New Dramatists thus can be described as an essential institution in the history of postwar American drama.

Other developmental programs include Baltimore Playwrights' Festival; Bay Area Playwrights' Festival; New Voices: A Writers' Theatre; O'Neill Playwright Conference; The Playwrights' Center; Playwrights' Platform; Sundance Theatre Laboratory; Theatre West Writers' Workshop; and Women's Work Project.

FURTHER READING

- Chervin, Stan, ed. Short Pieces from the New Dramatists. New York: Broadway Play Pub., 1985.
- London, Todd, ed. New Dramatists 2000: The Best Plays by the Graduating Class. New York: Smith & Kraus, 2002.
- New Dramatists Alumnae Publications Committee, eds. Broadway's Fabulous Fifties: How the Playmakers Made It Happen. Portsmouth, N.H.: Heinemann, 2002.

Stanley R. Richardson

NEW OBJECTIVITY

New Objectivity (Neue Sachlichkeit) is one of those slippery aesthetic labels that is almost impossible to grasp firmly and hence manage to fuel considerable theoretical discussion. To be sure, on some points there is consensus. The phrase Neue Sachlichkeit itself was put into circulation, if not actually coined, by G. F. Hartlaub (1884–1963), director of an art gallery in Mannheim, when he invited participation in an exhibit on current trends in painting. Hartlaub defined the phrase in contrast to impressionism and EXPRESSIONISM as the work of those artists who were loyal to "positive, tangible reality." The term caught on quickly, spreading from the visual arts to literature and intellectual life. The core meaning articulated a widespread feeling or mood, and by 1925 a reaction had set in against the excesses of expressionism, particularly against the shift toward mythological and fantastic works (as in BERTOLT BRECHT'S BAAL [1918]). It also encompassed a new pragmatic attitude toward rebuilding society. The revolutionaries of 1918–1920 had suggested unlimited possibilities for radical change in all spheres of life, but by the early 1920s people wanted calmer, more practical solutions to urgent problems. Hence, some critics have stressed the literal meaning of "Sachlich" as "Sober" and suggested "New Sobriety" as a more accurate translation. (Sokel, 1959).

In the context of literature, the trend led to a renewed investigation of the environment in which people actually lived and worked. The overriding aim was to present "just the facts." For some critics at the time, especially those on the Left, this appeared to be an escapist retreat to 19th-century REALISM, where writers did not operate with political allegiances. The observation could be valid, as in the case of CARL ZUCKMAYER (1896–1977 and his highly successful play The Merry Vineyard [Der fröhliche Weinberg, 1925]). Others were overtly political, such as FRIEDRICH WOLF (1888–1953) in the hit Cyanide (Cyankali, 1930), which dealt with abortion. Even those who did not follow a party line produced works that were brutally frank about social conditions, as in MARIELOUISE FLEIBER'S (1901–1974) exposition of male chauvinism in Purgatory in Ingolstadt (Fegefeuer in Ingolstadt, 1924) and Soldiers in Ingolstadt (Pioniere in Ingolstadt, 1928–1929).

The effort to convey objectivity was supported by a style that avoided flowery language and transcribed oral speech. Increasing use was made of direct quotation from documents such as newspapers, so that the audience would be able to check the facts themselves. One playwright whose career and work was not confined to New Objectivity but who learned much from its practitioners was Brecht, especially in terms of integrating DOCUMENTARY material (Brecht clipped newspapers for source material) and in stricter accuracy in the use of historical evidence.

The understanding of New Objectivity has been hampered by a neglect of authors who participated in the rejection of expressionism for an alternative view, including ÖDÖN VON HORVÁTH (1901–1938), Peter Martin Lampel (1894–1965), Günther Weisenborn (1878–1934), Erich Mühsam (1878–1934), and Ilse Langner (1899–1987). While it seems logical that the new media such as radio and film would have meshed well with the demands for objective representation, research into that conjunction is just beginning.

FURTHER READING

- Guenther, Irene. "Magic Realism, New Objectivity, and the Arts During the Weimar Republic." In Magical Realism: Theory, History, Community, ed. by Lois Parkinson Zamora and Wendy B. Faris. Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 1995. 33–73.
- Hermant, Jost. "Unity Within Diversity? The History of the Concept 'Neue Sachlichkeit.'" Tr. by Peter Lincoln and Margaret Lincoln. In Culture and Society in the Weimar Republic, ed. by Keith Bullivant. Manchester: Manchester Univ. Press, 1977. 162–182.
- McCormick, Richard W. Gender and Sexuality in Weimar Modernity: Film, Literature, and "New Objectivity." New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Sokel, Walter H. The Writer in Extremis: Expressionism in Twentieth-Century German Literature. Stanford: Stanford Univ. Press, 1959.
- Subiotto, A. V. "Neue Sachlichkeit: A Reassessment." In Deutung und Bedeutung: Studies in German and Comparative Literature Presented to Karl-Werner Maurer, ed. by Brigitte Schludermann, Victor G. Doerksen, Robert J. Glendinning, and Evelyn S. Firchow. The Hague: Mouton, 1973. 248–274.

Arnd Bohm

THE NEW YORK IDEA

The New York Idea (1906) is a witty, sophisticated satire of the revolving door nature of modern marriage and the relative ease of divorce. Playwright LANGDON MITCHELL had already enjoyed a degree of success with an earlier play, Becky Sharp, an adaptation of William Makepeace Thackeray's Vanity Fair. The New York Idea centers around two divorced couples—John and Cynthia Karslake and Philip and Vida Phillimore—and the impending marriage of Philip to Cynthia. At the opening of the play, Phillimore's snobish, proper, aristocratic family is lamenting the fact that the head of their family is marrying a high-spirited, sporty, "unconventional" young woman with a love of horses and racing who is sure to bring disgrace upon their family. Early in the play, the audience also discovers that Cynthia has doubts about being "trapped" in such a family and that John is uncertain about whether he loves or hates his ex-wife.

Mitchell further complicates the action by introducing into the plot a dapper English gentleman, Sir Wilfred Cates-Darby, who is on a quest for an American mate and has no qualms about courting two women (one of them betrothed) simultaneously, proposing to one in front of the other and then, having been discouraged by his first choice, promptly and publicly switching his attentions to the other. When Cynthia decides to go to the race track instead of to her wedding, it is with the intrepid Cates-Darby. Although when compared to the two couples, Cates-Darby is a relatively minor character, he admirably illustrates Mitchell's intimate knowledge of ENGLAND and English manners and is hardly the caricature of the British aristocrat common on American stages at the time The New York Idea premiered.

When Cynthia returns from her race track outing hours late for her wedding, the cultural chasm that divides her from her future husband and in-laws is brought into clear relief by the contrast between her cavalier attitude about the delay of her nuptials and the outrage of the Phillimores. Realizing that marriage to Philip would be a dreadful mistake and spurred by jealousy aroused by Vida Phillimore's flirtation with John, Cynthia, on the verge of exchanging vows, runs away to save her ex-husband from marrying Vida. The Karslakes' subsequent act 4 meeting results in their realization that they still love each other and John's revelation that their divorce was not valid in the first place. With Cynthia no longer available, Cates-Darby turns his full attention toward the vamp, Vida, who had targeted him from the outset.

Because of its vibrant characters, scintillating dialogue, and farcical situations, Mitchell's COMEDY has been compared favorably with the wittiest writing of GEORGE BERNARD SHAW and NOËL COWARD. With Minnie Maddern Fiske as Cynthia, John Mason as Karslake, and Mitchell's wife Marion Lea as Vida Phillimore, The New York Idea ran for sixty-six performances at the Lyric Theatre in New York in 1906. It was subsequently produced by MAX REINHARDT at Berlin's Kammerspiel in 1916 and has been revived successfully a number of times.

[See also United States, 1860–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Atkinson, Brooks. Broadway. New York: Macmillan, 1970.
- Moody, Richard, ed. Dramas from the American Theatre, 1762–1909. Boston: Houghton, 1966.
- Murphy, Brenda. American Realism and American Drama, 1880–1940. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1987.
- Price, David M. "Langdon Mitchell: The Man and His Plays." Ph.D. diss., City Univ. of New York, 1978.
- Wainscott, Ronald. "Plays and Playwrights: 1896–1915." In The Cambridge History of American Theatre, ed. by Don B. Wilmet and Christopher Bigsby. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999. 278–281.

John W. Frick

NEW ZEALAND

Drama in New Zealand reflects diverse cultural influences and includes both European roots as well as the strong presence of the Maori.

1870–1960

Although Maori performance forms are often emphatically theatrical, there was no Indigenous drama per se in Aotearoa (New Zealand) before Western models were introduced in the 19th century. Before 1920 the most common dramatic forms were FARCE, satire, and MELODRAMA. Writers often drew on the colonial experience—the gold rushes and encounters with the “natives”—and found in the exotic environment the excuse for spectacle, including volcanic eruptions! The most popular of these plays was George Leitch's The Land of the Moa (produced 1895, published 1990), in the style of DIONYSIUS BOUCICAULT. The scenario is commonplace but interesting for the racial casting: a wily American captain ensnares a Maori chief's beautiful daughter. This was actually typical of local melodrama: the villains are usually European or American stereotypes, and Maori are portrayed as noble savages sympathetic to British imperialism.

In the 1920s and 1930s playwriting was stimulated by the growth of university and left-wing amateur dramatic societies and by the establishment, in 1922, of a local branch of the British Drama League. The influence of GEORGE BERNARD SHAW and JOHN GALSWORTHY is evident in a series of well-made, domestic plays that examine, variously, the experience of British immigrants, cultural isolation, and rural monotony and the economic troubles of the Depression. Merton Hodge, who traveled to Britain in 1931, had four plays staged in London in the 1930s; the ostensibly Chekhovian The Wind and the Rain (1934) played in the West End for three years. There were isolated attempts at EXPRESSIONISM in the 1930s, and Ian Hamilton's antiwar Falls the Shadow (1939) was a rare socialist play.

In the postwar years Claude Evans wrote nine light domestic COMEDIES, largely imitative of British models and all staged by Christchurch's Canterbury Repertory Theatre (1946–1961). Established poets Charles Brasch, D'Arcy Cresswell, and Allen Curnow wrote some portentous verse plays, and short-story writer Frank Sargeson also dabbled in drama in the 1930s and again in the 1960s.

Other notable plays during this lean period were spawned by Wellington's progressive Unity Theatre: Kathleen Ross's The Trap (1952), a study of three generations of women coping with male exploitation, and the early works of BRUCE MASON. Symptomatic of the indifference towards local plays, unless they were endorsed abroad, Stella Jones's The Tree (1960), a family homecoming drama in the tradition of EUGENE O'NEILL and ARTHUR MILLER, was toured by the New Zealand Players only after being produced in Bristol in 1957. The Players (1952–1960) was a semiprofessional touring company whose repertoire largely comprised popular British comedies, although it did stage expatriate Douglas Stewart's Ned Kelly (1943).

In the late 1950s James K. Baxter, New Zealand's leading poet, turned to drama. His first play, Jack Winter's Dream (produced 1958, published 1979), was written for radio, which, along with the British Drama League's one-act play festivals, was the principal sponsor of local drama until the 1970s. Baxter's first stage play, The Wide Open Cage (produced 1959, published 1982), produced OFF-BROADWAY in 1962, features alcoholism and prostitution and is characteristically metaphysical. In the late 1960s Baxter wrote several plays based on biblical and Greek material, for Patricia Carey's Globe Theatre in Dunedin.

FURTHER READING

- Downes, Peter. Shadows on the Stage: Theatre in New Zealand—the First 70 Years. Dunedin: John McIndoe, 1975.
- Leitch, George. The Land of the Moa. Ed. by Adrian Kiernander. Wellington: Victoria Univ. Press, 1990.
- McNaughton, Howard. “Baxter as Dramatist.” Islands 2 (1973): 184–192.
- . New Zealand Drama: A Bibliographical Guide. Christchurch: Univ. of Canterbury Library, 1974.
- . New Zealand Drama. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
- Mason, Bruce, and John Pocock. Theatre in Danger: A Correspondence Between Bruce Mason and John Pocock. Hamilton: Paul's Bk. Arcade, 1957.
- Nelson, Erle. “Towards a New Zealand Drama.” Landfall 17 (1963): 122–134.

Stuart Young

1960–1980

From the late 1960s there was a steady blossoming of New Zealand drama and theater. An important source of this was Wellington's Downstage, founded in 1964. It was the first of a network of professional community theaters established in the main cities, especially in the early to mid-1970s. In its early years, Downstage produced Peter Bland's Father's Day (produced 1966) and George the Mad Ad-Man (produced 1967); “Lord, Dismiss Us . . .” (1967) and Lines to M (produced 1969) by Warren Dibble, a radio dramatist; Edward Bowman's Salve Regina (produced 1969), which, in a version for television, won the London Observer playwriting competition; and Alistair Campbell's When the Bough Breaks (1970). Downstage also launched the career of ROBERT LORD.

In 1973 the script advisory service Playmarket was established. It has also become the chief agent for local playwrights. After an initial workshop in 1974, Playmarket ran a series of biennial workshops, based on the Connecticut and Australian models, from 1980 to 1994; these resumed in 2002. Playmarket also arranges individual workshops.

The collectively devised work of a number of “group” theaters in the early 1970s exemplified a growing nationalism and interest in local stories. Theatre Action (1971–1977), led by Francis Batten, used the creational methods of French mime teacher Jacques Lecoq for such works as The Best of All Possible Worlds (produced 1973), an epic survey of New Zealand's colonial history and search for identity. Amamus (1971–1978), founded by Paul Maunder, devised a series of DOCUMENTARY and confrontational pieces, including The Wall Street Banks in London Have Closed (produced 1971), about the 1930s Depression; ‘51 (produced 1972), about a major waterfront dispute; and Pictures (produced 1973), about New Zealand's involvement in the Vietnam War. In 1975 Amamus toured to POLAND (Maunder was an admirer of Jerzy Grotowski) and London with Gallipoli (produced 1974), based on an ill-fated Australasian battle in TURKEY in World War I that features prominently in the national psyche. Red Mole (1974–), led by Sally Rodwell and the poet Alan Brunton, created shows, such as Capital Cabaret Strut (produced 1977) and Ghost Rite (produced 1978), that were a mix of satirical cabaret and phantasmagoric drama. Described by Erika Munk, in The Village Voice (1979), as “punk Bread and Puppet,” Red Mole spent most of the 1978–1988 period abroad, mainly in New York.

Politically committed playwrights to appear in the 1970s included MERVYN THOMPSON, Craig Harrison, and the particularly polemical Dean Parker. Harrison wrote several satirical COMEDIES dealing with race relations, most notably Tomorrow Will Be a Lovely Day (1975). Parker's Smack (produced 1974) draws a parallel between drug pushing and capitalism.

More commercially successful were the situation comedies of Gordon Dryland, Joseph Musaphia, and especially Roger Hall. Dryland's light, witty comedies, such as Fat Little Indians (produced 1976) and Unlikely Places (produced 1979), often feature homosexuality and bisexuality. Musaphia's plays, generally FARCES, deal more thoroughly with sexual unease and maladjustment. They include Victims (produced 1973), Mothers and Fathers (1977), Hunting (produced 1979), and Shotgun Wedding (1981). The New Zealand work that has enjoyed the greatest international prominence is Richard O'Brien's “provincial gothic” musical The Rocky Horror Show (1974).

FURTHER READING

- Black, Sebastian. “‘What Kind of a Society Can Develop Under Corrugated Iron?’: Glimpses of New Zealand History in New Zealand Plays.” Australasian Drama Studies 3, no. 1. (1984): 31–52.
- Brunton, Alan. A Red Mole Sketchbook. Wellington: Victoria Univ. Press, 1989.
- Mason, Bruce. Every Kind of Weather: Selected Writings on the Arts, Theatre, Literature and Current Events in New Zealand, 1953–81. Ed. by David Dowlin. Auckland: Reed Methuen, 1986.
- McNaughton, Howard, ed. Contemporary New Zealand Plays. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1974.
- . “Drama.” In The Oxford History of New Zealand Literature in English, ed. by Terry Sturm. 2d ed. Auckland: Oxford Univ. Press, 1998. 321–393.
- Munk, Erika. “Burrowing from Without.” The Village Voice (September 24, 1979): 89.
- Rees, Nonnita. “‘Getting New Zealand Writing Into Theatres’: The Story of Playmarket.” Australasian Drama Studies 3, no. 1. (1984): 23–30.
- Thompson, Mervyn. “Promise and Frustration: New Zealand Playwriting Since 1975.” Australasian Drama Studies 3, no. 1. (1984): 122–128.

1980–PRESENT

The growing confidence of New Zealand drama was evident initially in raw, naturalistic, slice-of-life works, such as GREG MCGEE's “state-of-the-nation” Foreskin's Lament (1981), Rore Hapi's television drama The Protestors (produced 1982), and Hilary Beaton's Outside In (1984). One of the first feminist plays, Outside In documents the tedium and brutality of prison life, portraying the female inmates' entrapment as symptomatic of larger social structures.

The poet Vincent O'Sullivan also turned to the stage with a prison play, Shuriken (1985). Examining race and xenophobia, Shuriken is based on an incident in 1943, when forty-nine Japanese prisoners were shot by their New Zealand guards. O'Sullivan's other plays include Billy (1990) and Jones and Jones (1989), which explores the relationship between Katherine Mansfield and Ida Baker and their private alter egos as a music hall duo.

Economic rationalism, which in many respects New Zealand pioneered in the 1980s, took its toll on theater. Funding shifted increasingly from subsidy to sponsorship, and the ethos of a “company” in the community theaters largely disappeared. This resulted in smaller-cast plays and the proliferation of solo shows. Two COMEDIES encapsulated the spirit of the late 1980s, combining a sophisticated, self-conscious use of theatrical forms with savvy commercialism: Stephen Sinclair and Anthony McCarten's Ladies Night (produced 1987), about a group of destitute men who become strippers, and Sinclair and Danny Mulheron's The Sex Fiend (produced 1989).

Meanwhile, Stuart Hoar's comedy Squatter (1988) critiques monetarist economics through a story about the overtaxing of Canterbury farmland in the 1890s. Hoar's plays deal unabashedly with ideas, and their DRAMATURGY is complex, featuring anachronisms and estranging devices. Hoar has written more than twenty plays, including Yo Banfa (produced 1993), about Mao Zedong and émigré New Zealander Rewi Alley in China in 1939; Rutherford (produced 2000); and The Face Maker (produced 2001).

The most important development in the 1990s was the triumphal progress of Maori drama, but other significant playwrights who emerged in this period are Fiona Samuel, Michelleanne Forster, and Gary Henderson. Samuel's plays include The Wedding Party (produced 1988) and Lashings of Whipped Cream: A Session with a Teenage Dominatrix (1995). Like Peter Jackson's film Heavenly Creatures, Forster's Daughters of Heaven (1992) is based on the notorious 1954 murder by two teenage girls of one of their mothers. Henderson's plays include Skintight (produced 1994) and An Unseasonable Fall of Snow (produced 1998).

More recently, Toa Fraser and Jacob Rajan have exemplified New Zealand's growing ethnic diversity. Fraser's work, which coincides with the emergence of Pacific Island drama, includes Bare (produced 1998), a funky, demotic comedy in which two actors play a range of urban characters; and No. 2 (produced 1999), in which one actor plays nine roles, mostly members of a south Auckland, Fijian family. Indian Ink, formed in 1996 by actor Jacob Rajan and director Justin Lewis, has produced a trilogy by Rajan that features masks and multiple role-playing: Krishnan's Dairy (produced 1997), a solo piece juxtaposing the story of Indian immigrant shopkeepers with the legend of the Taj Mahal; The Candlestickmaker (produced 2000), about the physicist Subramanyan Chandrasekhar; and The Pickle King (produced 2002). Rajan's and Fraser's work has toured extensively and won awards at the Edinburgh Fringe.

FURTHER READING

- Black, Sebastian. "Aggressive Laments: New Zealand Theatre in the 1980s." New Literature Review 13 (1984): 5–16.
- Carnegie, David. "Recent New Zealand Drama." Journal of New Zealand Literature 3 (1985): 7–15.
- Edmond, Murray. "Lighting Out for Paradise: New Zealand Theatre and the 'Other Tradition.'" Australasian Drama Studies 18 (April 1991): 183–206.
- Leek, Robert. "Homegrown Drama of the Mid-Eighties." Journal of New Zealand Literature 5 (1987): 1–13.
- . "New Drama '86–'87: Various Shades of Laughter." Journal of New Zealand Literature 6 (1988): 3–29.
- Mann, Philip. "Tragic Power in Vincent O'Sullivan's Shuriken." Australasian Drama Studies 18 (April 1991): 91–94, 147–158.
- O'Donnell, David, and Bronwyn Tweddle. "Toa Fraser: Shifting Boundaries in Pacific Island Comedy." Australasian Drama Studies 42 (April 2003): 123–137.
- . "Naked Samoans: Pacific Island Voices in the Theatre of Aotearoa/New Zealand." Performance Research 8, no. 1. (2003): 65–73.

Stuart Young

MAORI DRAMA

The burgeoning of Maori drama is one of the most conspicuous and important developments in New Zealand theater since 1990. It is informed by a history of Indigenous people's projects such as assertion of tino rangatiratanga (self-determination), reclamation of misappropriated lands, and reconstitution of social and cultural identity. It integrates European dramatic conventions and Maori performance aspects such as waiata (song) and haka (war-chant). Marae (an outdoor meeting area at the heart of a Maori settlement) protocols such as welcome calls, greetings, prayers, and formal farewells are often used.

The development of Maori theater can be traced to the Maori Theatre Trust (1966), none of whose plays were by Maori dramatists. However, actor-directors Don Selwyn and Jim Moriarty, actor and writer Apirana Taylor, and actor George Henare became important figures in Maori drama in the 1980s and 1990s.

The 1975 Land March, when Maori throughout the country protested against the government's land sale policies, is referenced in several plays. Between 1975 and 1990 (the sesquicentennial of the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi—the founding document that established the relationship between Maori and the British Crown), Maori plays—such as Death of the Land (produced 1976, published 1991), by Rore Hapihi and Te-Ika-a-Maui Players (1975–1987); Rise Up! Awaken (Maranga Mai, produced 1979), by the Maranga Mai collective (1979–1980); The Gospel According to Tane (produced 1983), by Selwyn Muru and performed by Te Ohu Whakaari (1983–1990); and Lost, Disappearing Eyes (Whatungarongaro, produced 1990, published 1999), by Roma Potiki and He Ara Hou (1989–1994, 1996)—commented on race relations, social inequality, and cultural ALIENATION. They were created in a context based on Maori social structures and combined Maori oral traditions and ritual, and modern song forms such as rap.

Accompanied by a national acknowledgment of the unique qualities of Maori culture, the late 1980s and 1990s was a period of catalytic activity. Increasingly this activity became associated with Taki Rua-Depot Theatre, a small, cooperatively run professional theater in Wellington, which declared its commitment to the continued growth and development of Maori theater. By 1998 it had ceased to operate as a venue, becoming instead a production company, Taki Rua Productions.

In 1991 He Reo Hou, a collection of Maori plays, was published (the first since the publication of Harry Dansey's Te Raukura [The Feathers of the Albatross] in 1974). Its publication followed a significant Maori theatrical presence at the 1990 International Festival of the Arts in Wellington. John Broughton's solo play Michael James Manaia (1990) further raised the profile of Maori theater: it toured to Edinburgh in 1991, performed by Jim Moriarty.

The mid-1990s saw an expansion in the theatrical adventurousness of Maori dramatists. Apirana Taylor revised BERTOLT BRECHT'S MOTHER COURAGE as Whaea Kairau (1999, produced 1995) in the context of the 19th-century New Zealand Wars. By the late 1990s, Taki Rua was touring nationally, performing plays in Maori, and internationally, performing new plays such as novelist Witi Ihimaera's Woman Far Walking (2000). Among new playwrights to emerge are Albert Belz and Mitch Tawhi Thomas. In the last few years Taki Rua has also developed Pacific Island plays.

FURTHER READING

- Balme, Christopher. "Between Separation and Integration: Contemporary Maori Theatre." CRNLE Reviews Journal 1 (1993): 41–48.
- Greenwood, Janinka. History of Bicultural Theatre: Mapping the Terrain. Research Monograph Series. Christchurch: Christchurch College of Education, 2002.
- He Reo Hou: 5 Plays by Maori Playwrights*. Wellington: Playmarket, 1991.
- Huria, John. "Maa Te Reehia e Kawee." Playmarket News 16 (1997): 2–7.
- Maufort, Marc. Transgressive Itineraries: Post-colonial Hybridizations of Dramatic Realism. Brussels: Peter Lang, 2003.

Mei-Lin Te-Puea Hansen

FEMINIST DRAMA

An explosion of New Zealand women's drama occurred in 1982: RENÉE's Secrets was staged; Fiona Farrell's In Confidence: Dialogues with Amy Bock was presented at the Women's Studies Association Conference; and at the New Zealand Playwrights' Workshop, Renée's Breaking Out received a reading, and Hilary Beaton's realist Outside In and Carolyn Burns's Objection Overruled were workshopped.

Objection Overruled (1984) is a highly theatrical, mock courtroom drama. An ostensibly unsuspecting, white, middle-class male member of the audience is put on trial for the crime of living, which, it turns out, includes sexual molestation, rape, and incest. The cast plays various roles in improvisations around the accused's life. The audience becomes the jury, and Burns offers two endings, depending on the verdict. Norelle Scott's Promise Not to Tell (produced 1984) deals with rape and incest in a much harsher manner, emphasizing the denial and repression of men's violence against women.

New Zealand feminist theater's origins in satirical revues of the mid-1970s, evident in Objection Overruled and some of Renée's plays, continues in the work of Jean Betts and Lorae Parry, who have produced significant explorations of gender and sexual desire. Betts and Parry, who also act and direct, were part of the women's cabaret Hen's Teeth at Wellington's Circa theater in 1988. This successful enterprise spawned Digger and Nudger (produced 1989) and Digger and Nudger Try Harder (produced 1990), written by Betts, Parry, and actor Carmel McGlone. It featured a male COMEDY duo, played by Parry and McGlone, searching for the "woman within." The construction of male characters by female performers is also used to unsettle in Stephanie Johnson's Accidental Phantasies (produced 1985), a clever, fantastical play about pornography.

Parry's most accomplished play, Eugenia (1996), develops this cross-gender theme further. Based on a historical story, it tells of an Italian woman who lived, even married, as a man in Wellington in 1916. This scenario is juxtaposed with a contemporary story of a schoolteacher and her students devising a play about Eugenia. The double plot, with doubled roles, serves to complicate issues of gender construction. Eugenia recalls Farrell's In Confidence, which celebrates the story of a transvestite confidence trickster who lived in Dunedin in the 1890s.

Parry's Vagabonds (2001) also deals with cross-dressing and draws on historical events. A female convict escapes on a boat from AUSTRALIA in the 1850s. Rebuffing the captain's sexual advances, she whips his naked posterior and dons his clothes. Then, in New Zealand, she joins a troupe of traveling players. Parry, whose plays include Strip (produced 1988) and Cracks (1994), is also credited with writing New Zealand's first notable lesbian play, Frontwomen (1993).

Betts's other plays are Revenge of the Amazons (1998, produced 1984), a rewriting of A Midsummer Night's Dream that reverses the gender of the courtiers, recasts the mechanicals as a female theater troupe, and has Oberon falling for a hard-line feminist Easter bunny; Ophelia Thinks Harder (1994), a reworking of Hamlet, familiar to feminist theaters elsewhere; and The Misandrist (2000), which explores the roles of women in fairy tales.

FURTHER READING

- Dale, Judith. "Digger & Nudger Try Harder, and Related Endeavours." Illusions 13 (March 1990): 32–33.
- . "Women's Theatre and Why?" Australasian Drama Studies 18 (April 1991): 159–182.
- . "Theatre Women's Franchise: Suffrage Year Theatre." Illusions 23 (Winter 1994): 36–45.
- . "Performing Identity: Engendering Post-coloniality on Stage." Illusions 25 (Winter 1996): 36–43.
- White, Helen. "Paths for a Flightless Bird: Roles for Women on the New Zealand Stage Since 1950." Australasian Drama Studies 3, no. 2. (1985): 105–143.

Stuart Young

NGEMA, MBONGENI (1955–)

Mbongeni Ngema, born in 1955 in Verulam, South Africa, is a recognized playwright, musician, director, actor, and choreographer.

Ngema made a name in the theater in a career that started with him as a theater-backing guitarist, working with such renowned theater directors in South Africa as Gibson Kente and Barney Simon. In 1979 he started a collaboration with Percy Mtwa, workshopping the play Woza Albert (1981)—a highly successful play that employs deep satire to imagine the coming back of Jesus Christ into apartheid South Africa. Offering a critique of political and religious figures in South Africa against a black theological perspective, the play's success is registered as much in its satire as it is in its humor and powerful rendition by two actors full of energy in the songs and dances and the movements that they make use of. Ngema and Mtwa's rendition of Woza Albert is captivating not only for the simplicity of the set and its creative use but also in the dexterity of their physical performance mimicking several characters changing from one to the next with the ease and smoothness of seasoned performers.

Indeed, the duo's performance in the play was akin to the powerful performance of the Island earlier rendered by the compelling duo of John Kani and Winston Ntshona. Woza Albert toured many countries in Europe and the UNITED STATES, winning several awards. Another award-winning play by Ngema was Asinamali (1984)—which saw Ngema nominated as Best Director for the Tony Award. The play whose title means "We have no money" is a musical exploration of the rent strikes in the townships of apartheid South Africa in the early 1980s.

Ngema, having made a name in producing successful award-winning musicals, hit the Hollywood big screen when his yet another successful musical play Sarafina—which was performed on Broadway between 1988 and 1989 and was nominated for five Tony Awards—was adapted and produced as a film attracting such Hollywood stars as Whoopi Goldberg.

As a musician, Ngema has also recorded music—partly as a score for his plays and movies, working with such renowned musicians as Miriam Makeba and Hugh Masekela. Ngema has been as successful as he has been controversial, in both his artistic productions and his personal life. Accused of being an unapologetic polygamist, his expensively produced Sarafina 2, aimed as a musical to combat HIV/AIDS, was criticized as ineffectual and exorbitant. His song “Amandiya”—Zulu for the Indians—recorded in 2002, was also criticized for its lyrics, which were largely seen as racist toward the Indian population in South Africa.

[See also South Africa]

SELECT PLAYS: Asinamali (1984); Sarafina (1988); Magic at 4 AM (1993); Mama (1996); Sarafina 2 (1997); Nikeziwe (2005)

FURTHER READING

Barber, Karin. Readings in African Popular Culture. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1997.

Brown, Roxanne. “Sarafina! Young South African Voices Spread Music of Liberation.” Ebony (February 1990).

Whitaker, Charles F. “The Cultural Explosion—South African Arts.” Special issue, Nelson Mandela and the New South Africa. Ebony (August 1994).

Bantu Ndung'u

NGUGI WA THIONG'O (1938–)

By the 1980s Ngugi wa Thiong'o's name had become significant as a prominent writer in the literary world, publishing several novels, short stories, and plays, some of which were noted for pricking the consciousness of the political elite, particularly in his country Kenya. He is credited with starting what now is famously referred to as the Literary Revolution that saw the discipline of literature removed from its traditional department of English at the University of Nairobi and established as a department by itself by the beginning of the 1970s.

While it was his writing that saw him sent to detention without trial, after publishing such works as Petals of Blood, it was his work at the Kamirithu Cultural and Educational Centre, where he collaborated with other educationists and villagers to produce plays such as I Will Marry When I Want (Ngaahika Ndeenda), that saw him forced into exile in 1982. The work at the Kamirithu Centre, educational yet using theater as the medium, focused on reexamining colonial history in a postcolonial state that worked to erase rather than uphold the role of the citizenry in the fight against the colonial powers.

Born in 1938, Ngugi's publishing goes back to the 1950s when he was a student at the prestigious Alliance High School in Nairobi, Kenya, where he published his first short story—“Try Witchcraft”—in the school magazine. He has since published several novels, plays, collections of short stories, and critical writings and edited a groundbreaking journal on Gikuyu culture and literature published in Gikuyu. His works have been translated into about thirty languages around the world.

His early works written in English, like Weep Not Child (1964), The River Between (1965), and A Grain of Wheat (1968), depict the conflict of cultures imposed by colonialism engaging with issues such as the role of Christianity, English education, and the oppressive treatment of the colonial and postcolonial state in denying Indigenous people the very land that the colonial settlers had forcefully taken from them. Known mostly as a novelist, Ngugi has written one play, The Black Hermit (1972), and co-authored two, The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (with Micere Mugo, 1977) and I'll Marry When I Want (with Ngugi wa Mirii, 1980). Central to the three plays are conflicts between anticolonial and neocolonial nationalisms in Kenya's history. In all of these plays, Ngugi and his collaborators not only drew attention to the emergence of neocolonialism and its attendant ALIENATION and despair but also theatricalized the protagonist roles the masses of people could play in enhancing their full participation in national politics. Under-scoring “decolonization” as a perpetual theme and process, the last two plays particularly highlight modes of historical agency that must be formed to enable Kenya to move forward into a more democratic history. It is indeed Ngugi's participation in writing, co-directing, and organizing communities of disenfranchised Kenyans that led to his subsequent imprisonment and exile.

Ngugi was a leading proponent for calls to reconfigure literature in African languages as well as to reinvigorate their performance cadences. The premise of such a call was to further the thesis of decolonizing African cultures whose political developments were arrested by European colonization and neocolonial dominant cultures. Leading by example, he began to write novels in his native Gikuyu and called for a performance of reading in African languages. His involvement in community-based theater was itself part of immersing himself in reconfiguring Indigenous cultures to stem neocolonial politics as well as to realign Kenya's history on the path to permanent decolonization. His activism also led to his removal as a professor at the University of Nairobi.

While he was never reinstated at the University of Nairobi, where he was chair of the Literature Department, after his detention in 1978, he has, since held several university positions: between 1989 and 1992, he was visiting professor of English and comparative literature at Yale University; from 1992 to 2002 he was the Erich Maria Remarque Professor of Languages at New York University; and he is currently a Distinguished Professor of English and Comparative Literature at the University of California, Irvine, where he is also the director of the International Centre for Writing and Translation.

As a novelist, playwright, and essayist, Ngugi is the recipient of several honors, among which are the Zora Neale Hurston–Paul Robeson Award for artistic and scholarly achievement, 1992; the Gwendolyn Brooks Centre Contributors Award for significant contribution to black literary art, 1994; Fonlon-Nichols Prize, 1996; Distinguished Africanist Award, New York Africa Studies Association, 1996; and the Medal of the Presidency of the Italian Cabinet by the International Scientific Committee of the Pio Manzu International Research Centre, 2002.

[See also Africa]

PLAYS: The Black Hermit (1972); The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (with Micere Mugo, 1977); I Will Marry When I Want (Ngaahika Ndeenda: Ithaako Ria Ngerekano, with Ngugi wa Mirii, 1977)

FURTHER READING

Cook, D., and M. Okenimpe. Ngugi wa Thiong'o: An Introduction to His Writings. London: Heineman, 1982.

Lovesey, O. Ngugi wa Thiong'o. New York: Twayne, 2000.

Robson, C. B. Ngugi wa Thiong'o. London: Macmillan, 1979.

Bantu Ndung'u

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH (1844–1900)

Among philosophers, probably no one exerted a broader influence on the modern drama than Friedrich Nietzsche, who was born in Röcken, Prussia, on October 15, 1844, and died in Weimar, GERMANY, on August 25, 1900. His examination of the essence of TRAGEDY was a major influence on EUGENE O'NEILL; his reevaluation of moral standards impressed HENRIK IBSEN and AUGUST STRINDBERG; his concept of the superman inspired GEORGE BERNARD SHAW; and his picture of the human being suffering the anguish of freedom anticipated the existentialism of JEAN-PAUL SARTRE and ALBERT CAMUS.

In The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music, published in 1872, Nietzsche argued that drama arose not so much out of efforts to tell a story as out of a desire by humans to make contact with their essential inner being. Ancient Greek tragedy combined instrumental music and song (the chorus) with the word (the actor). The choral song was the primary element, and drama as we know it developed when the actor separated himself from the group. As plot and dialogue became increasingly important, the rational element took over the intuitive element. Thus tragedy lost contact with its roots, a decline represented in Nietzsche's view by the clever skepticism of Euripides, the last of the three great ancient tragedians.

As an explanation of the origins of tragedy, Nietzsche's youthful work was immediately challenged by classical scholars. But its influence was immense because, at a time of shifting values, it set up a dualism that carried one beyond conventional and time-bound ideas of good and evil and schismatic religious doctrines into a realm of something that did seem eternal and all-inclusive. He set Dionysus, the Greek god of intoxication and the god presiding in ancient Athens over tragedy, against Apollo, the god of light and reason. Only through Dionysus can the human being understand what lies beyond the fleeting phenomenon of ordinary existence. This insight leads one to an awareness of the absurdity of existence, producing a nausea, a key term in 20th-century existentialism. The wisdom of Dionysus reveals a truth that one cannot live with for long; Apollo's function is to provide the illusion, through art and science, that life does have meaning.

The theory expressed in the essay owes perhaps more to the composer RICHARD WAGNER and the philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer than to Greek tragedy. Wagner's music drama Tristan and Isolde overwhelmed the young Nietzsche, and he became, for a while, the composer's ardent disciple. Just as Wagner endeavored to recreate the majesty and spirit of ancient tragedy, so Nietzsche used Tristan, in which he saw the union of Dionysus and Apollo as a concrete example of how tragedy can be reborn in the modern age.

The philosophical basis for a reclamation of tragedy lay in Schopenhauer's replacement of a universe that had a direction and a purpose, such as Christian redemption, by a universe without direction or meaning. Schopenhauer put a new spin on the conventional dualism of body and soul, arguing that the true dichotomy was that of the individual and the thing-in-itself, the swirling energy of the universe. The life of the human being consists in a vain effort to impose a meaning on this energy. For Schopenhauer, music was the highest form of art because it did not impose a meaning on human existence; instead, it turned the meaningless energy of the universe against itself and made something beautiful out of it. This pessimistic philosophy with its promotion of the artist and musician above the scientist and the empire builder found a warm response in Wagner and provided a starting point for Nietzsche's own philosophy. In 1870 he wrote, "For me, all that is best and most beautiful is associated with the names Schopenhauer and Wagner."

The belief that the irrational played as great a part in man's life as his reasoning powers was a key element in the romantic imagination. Johann Wolfgang Goethe called it "the demonic" and defined it as that which reason and understanding cannot explain. Nietzsche expanded on this, saying, "Perhaps there is a realm of wisdom . . . from which the logician is excluded. Perhaps art must be seen as the necessary complement of rational discourse?" Here Nietzsche is echoing Schopenhauer: "The musician reveals to us the hidden spirit of the world; he makes himself the interpreter of the profoundest wisdom, while speaking a language that reason does not understand." Nietzsche saw in Tristan an example of how the musician revealed the hidden world of the irrational.

Since then there have been attempts by dramatists to penetrate this hidden realm without using music. Probably no dramatist was so much under the spell of Nietzsche as O'Neill in his middle period in such plays as LAZARUS LAUGHED and THE GREAT GOD BROWN.

Nietzsche's other works also influenced dramatists, none more so than Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883–1892). In it Nietzsche develops the concept of the superman, the greatly superior individual, who rises above other mortals by forging his own code of morality, his own principles. Bernard Shaw popularized and domesticated this kind of hero in his MAN AND SUPERMAN (1903). But Sartre, the most vocal of the existentialist philosophers, presented the superman in a truly Nietzschean guise, by drawing heavily on Zarathustra in his play THE FLIES (1943), a retelling of Aeschylus's Oresteia.

[See also Philosophy and Drama; Symbolism]

FURTHER READING

Lea, F. A. The Tragic Philosopher: Friedrich Nietzsche. New York: Athlone Press, 1993.

Silk, M. S., and J. P. Stern. Nietzsche on Tragedy. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1981.

Evert Sprinchorn

THE NIGHT IS MOTHER TO THE DAY

The Night Is Mother to the Day (Natten är dagens mor), a four-act display and epilogue by LARS NORÉN, was first performed at the Malmö City Theater in SWEDEN in 1982, then published in 1983. The Night Is Mother to the Day, which signified Norén's breakthrough as a dramatist, forms the first part of a family trilogy. The second part is called Chaos Is God's Neighbor (Kaos är granne med Gud). (The original titles of the two plays are quotations from a poem by the romantic Swedish poet Erik Johan Stagnelius.) The concluding third part is called The Stillness (Stillheten). Closely related to these three plays and actually preceding them is The Courage to Kill (Modet att döda), about a traumatic father-son relationship.

Norén's family trilogy is highly autobiographical. In The Night Is Mother to the Day, set in the kitchen of a hotel in southern Sweden 1956, we meet four characters: a father (manager of the hotel) and mother, both around fifty, an older son of twenty-six, and a younger one of sixteen. In Chaos Is God's Neighbor, set in a hotel lobby in 1961, we virtually meet the same family, although they have other names and are about ten years older. In addition, there is a hotel guest. In The Stillness, again set in a hotel lobby, this time in 1968, we meet the same family members, again a little older and with different names. In addition, there is a housekeeper.

While closely patterned on his own family (the age difference between the brothers corresponds, for example, to that between Norén and his elder brother), the family in The Night also closely resembles of the family in EUGENE O'NEILL's LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT, a play highly admired by Norén. Thus in The Night, the father is an alcoholic, and the elder son is oedipally attached to his mother while seeking the company of prostitutes. The mother is suffering from incurable cancer. The younger son, David, Norén's alter ego, has spent some time in a mental hospital and fears that he will be sent back to it. Like O'Neill's four-act drama, Norén's play, also in four acts, begins in the morning and ends after midnight that same day in the same room. For Norén, as for O'Neill, the unity of time and place has thematic value, stressing the ambivalent feelings of the family members. To stay in the room they share is painful; to leave it is menacing.

Highly praised in Europe, wherever it has been performed, The Night Is Mother to the Day was coolly received when it premiered in the UNITED STATES at the Yale Repertory Theater in New Haven, Connecticut. Mel Gussow (1984), reviewer for the New York Times, was outright negative, citing "the play's oppressiveness."

FURTHER READING

Gussow, Mel. "Night Is Mother, New Haven Repertory." New York Times (March 14, 1984).

Törnqvist, Egil. "Lars Norén and Eugene O'Neill." In Small Is Beautiful: Small Countries Theatre Conference, ed. by Claude Schumacher and Derek Fogg. Glasgow: Theatre Studies Publications, 1990. 63–68.

Van Reis, Mikael. Det slutna rummet: Sex kapitel om Lars Norén's författarskap 1963–1983 [The Closed Room: Six Chapters on Lars Norén's Authorship 1963–1983]. Stockholm/Stehag: Symposium, 1997. 362–423.

Egil Törnqvist

'NIGHT MOTHER

Written in 1981, MARSHA NORMAN's widely celebrated drama 'Night Mother explores the subject of suicide. The characters include Jessie Cates, a quiet but determined woman in her late thirties to early forties, and her sturdily assertive mother, Thelma Cates, who is in her late fifties to early sixties. The one-act play takes place during the course of an evening spent in the women's home; the action is in real time, with clocks onstage running throughout the performance. Toward the beginning of the play, Jessie calmly reveals to her mother her intention to shoot herself later that evening. She says that she wishes to prepare Thelma, and it is clear that she is also preparing herself for what she plans to do.

Jessie is deeply unhappy, suffering from a life of personal disappointments and struggles with epilepsy. She feels isolated, trapped in the life she leads with her mother, but has finally found the strength to make her own choice. Jessie's rationale for taking her own life is straightforward: "I'm not having a very good time and I don't have any reason to think it'll get anything but worse," she explains. "I'm tired. I'm hurt. I'm sad. I feel used." Thelma at first dismisses Jessie's announcement as ridiculous but increasingly becomes concerned. What follows is an argument between the two in which truths are revealed, bringing the pair closer than ever together. Thelma attempts to reason with Jessie, growing more and more frantic as Jessie's determination, and her own inability to save her daughter, becomes clear to her. When Jessie finally shuts the bedroom door behind her, and we hear the gun go off, ending her life, Thelma cries, "Forgive me! I thought you were mine!"

In November 1981, Night Mother received its first reading at the Circle Repertory Company in New York, and it was first performed in December 1982 by the American Repertory Theatre in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in a production directed by Tom Moore. That production was brought to the John Golden Theatre on Broadway the following year. Reviews broadly praised the work, citing its combination of humor and pathos and powerful impact on its audience, and Norman was heralded as a promising new voice in American playwriting. Night Mother ran for just over a year and received four Tony nominations as well as the 1983 Pulitzer Prize for Drama, the Susan Smith Blackburn Prize, the Dramatists Guild's Hull-Warriner Award, and a Drama Desk Award. Norman wrote the screenplay for a 1986 film version of the play, which starred Anne Bancroft and Sissy Spacek

Norman said that she wrote Night Mother entirely for herself, during a period of professional frustration, when she decided, "I'm going to write it the way I see it; nobody's going to have anything to say about it. I'm going to do it just for me" (Brown, 1996). Theater scholar Jill Dolan (1991) considered Night Mother "one of the first plays written by a woman and addressing women's concerns to gain widespread attention, critical acclaim, and economic success."

[See also Feminist Drama in the United States; United States]

FURTHER READING

- Browder, Sally. "I Thought You Were Mine: Marsha Norman's Night Mother." In Mother Puzzles: Daughters and Mothers in Contemporary American Literature, ed. by Mickey Pearlman. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1989.
- Brown, Linda Ginter, ed. Marsha Norman: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Demastes, William W. "New Voices Using New Realism: Fuller, Henley, and Norman." In Beyond Naturalism: A New Realism in American Theatre. New York: Greenwood Press, 1988.
- Dolan, Jill. "Feminism and the Canon: The Question of Universality." In The Feminist Spectator as Critic. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1991.
- Harriott, Esther. "Marsha Norman: Getting Out." In American Voices: Five Contemporary Playwrights in Essays and Interviews. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1988.

Emma Dassori

THE NIGHT OF THE IGUANA

I know people torture each other many times like devils, but sometimes they do see and know each other, you know, and then, if they're decent, they do want to help each other all that they can.

—Hannah Jelkes, Act 2

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS's compelling 1961 drama The Night of the Iguana features a trio of his most memorable characters and a deepening exploration of many of the recurrent themes of his work, particularly the struggle of the spirit over the desires and frailties of the flesh. Williams places emphasis on three principal characters in a lyrical meditation on the nature of God and the struggle of His creatures to find redemption for real or imagined sins.

Set in 1940 on the west coast of MEXICO, The Night of the Iguana finds two groups of travelers in residence at a rundown hotel cradled in a rainforest overlooking the sea. In this steamy Eden, a group of German tourists enthuse about the blitz of London, which, they are certain, will succeed in subjugating the British people to Nazi rule. The other group is a tour of women teachers from Texas escorted by a distracted guide, Lawrence Shannon, an alcoholic ex-priest subsisting under the casual protection of the hotel's owner, Maxine Faulk, a blowsy widow lusting for Shannon. Shannon's libidinous interest, however, has tragically directed itself toward underage women. When he becomes involved with a girl in his parish, a scandal ensues. Shannon renounces his God who, he believes, is a malign deity aggressively pursuing his soul. The revelation of Shannon's renouncement of God has so shocked his congregation that they removed him from his post. He has drifted to Mexico and Maxine, but the lost, tormented Shannon finds momentary redemption when he encounters the deeply spiritual Hannah Jelkes, a wandering artist traveling aimlessly with her ninety-seven-year-old grandfather, Nonno, a "minor" poet grasping to create one last poem. Shannon and Hannah find a momentary respite at the hotel where Hannah, unmarried and touchingly devoted to her grandfather, reaches out to Shannon. Their encounter is briefly liberating for both, a release from their individual constraints symbolized by the sudden escape of a tethered iguana captured by some Mexican boys planning to eat it. The iguana's flight to freedom comes as Nonno completes the poem he has grappled with for twenty years—his most beautiful one, his deeply moved granddaughter exclaims—and he dies, thus achieving the ultimate freedom. Shannon returns to Maxine, while Hannah, now alone and directionless, faces the lonely, barren future stretching before her.

The Night of the Iguana, which was inspired by a 1946 Williams short story, opened at New York's Royale Theatre on December 28, 1961. Under the direction of Frank Corsaro, Iguana won mostly laudatory reviews and a long run. The play's critical and commercial success led to a screen version directed by John Huston.

Critics applauded what several described as a deepening of his themes in The Night of the Iguana, while many later critics consider it his last great drama. Lawrence Shannon is, with the possible exception of Big Daddy in CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF and Tom Wingfield of THE GLASS MENAGERIE, his most complex male character. In the Williams canon, The Night of the Iguana marks a transition from his earlier, larger-scale works. Following Iguana, Williams spent the final two decades of his life experimenting with form and language while continuing to explore the terrain between ROMANTICISM and reality.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Adler, Jacob H. "Night of the Iguana: A New Tennessee Williams?" Ramparts 1, no. 3 (1962): 59–68.
- Adler, Thomas P. "Before the Fall—and After: Summer and Smoke and The Night of the Iguana." In The Cambridge Companion to Tennessee Williams, ed. by Matthew C. Roudané. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1997. 114–127.
- Leon, Ferdinand. "Time, Fantasy, and Reality in Night of the Iguana." Modern Drama 11 (1968): 87–96.
- Matthews, Kevin. "The Evolution of The Night of the Iguana: Three Symbols in the Manuscript Record." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas 25, no. 2 (1994): 66–89.
- Moritz, Helen E. "Apparent Sophoclean Echoes in Tennessee Williams's Night of the Iguana." Classical and Modern Literature 5 (1985): 305–314.
- Phillips, Rod. "'Collecting Evidence': The Natural World in Tennessee Williams's The Night of the Iguana." Southern Literary Journal 32, no. 2 (Spring 2000): 59–69.

James Fisher

THE NIGHT OF THE TRIBADES

The Night of the Tribades (Tribadernas natt), "a play from 1889" in two acts by PER OLOV ENQUIST, was published in 1975 and first performed at the Royal Dramatic Theater in Stockholm the same year. When teaching an AUGUST STRINDBERG course at the University of California, Enquist came to the conclusion that Strindberg's MONODRAMA THE STRONGER is a highly autobiographical play, where the absent husband, Bob, corresponds to Strindberg himself; his wife, Mrs. X, to Strindberg's wife Siri von Essen; and Miss Y, who either is or has been Bob's mistress, to Siri's Danish friend Marie David. As appears from his autobiographical novel A Madman's Defence (En dâres försvarstal), written shortly before The Stronger, Strindberg believed that Siri and Marie had a lesbian relationship. In The Stronger, this situation is turned into its opposite, two women rivaling for the same man. Strindberg's monodrama, Enquist concluded, is a piece of wishful thinking on the part of the author.

In The Night of the Tribades—tribade meaning "lesbian"—written in eleven days, Enquist unmasks this highly representative wishful thinking and describes the true situation camouflaged behind it:

two women excluding the man. It is his first and hitherto most successful play; in fact, internationally it was the most acclaimed Swedish play after Strindberg.

Four people have gathered at the Dagmar Theater in Copenhagen on an evening in March 1889 to rehearse Strindberg's new play The Stronger. Apart from the author, the individuals are Dane Viggo Schiwe, who is to direct the monodrama; Strindberg's wife Siri von Essen, who is to play Mrs. X, the speaking part; and her Danish friend Marie David, who is to play Miss Y, the silent part. The plot develops from Strindberg's discovery that the hated tribade Marie is to do the part of the mute woman in the world premiere of his play (in reality, the part was played by Anna Pio). His irritation at Marie overrides his jealousy of Schiwe who, he believes, has a liaison with his wife Siri. Most effective and meaningful are the constant switches back and forth between rehearsed lines from The Stronger and lines by the characters themselves in this highly metatheatrical drama. At the end, waiting for the man who is to photograph them in connection with the opening of the play, Siri is seen in the middle, flanked by Strindberg and Marie. But when the photographer enters, his and the play's last line is: "The gentleman should stand in the middle." The final photograph becomes a falsified version of the true situation, a version to be passed on to posterity.

"The play explicitly focuses," Shideler (1984) summarizes, "on the male need to dominate women, to be the center of their lives, and on men's sexual insecurity."

[See also Sweden]

FURTHER READING

- Anderman, Gunilla. "The Night of the Tribades: Fact and Fiction in Grez-sur-Loing." In Documentarism in Scandinavian Literature, ed. by Poul Houe and Sven Rossel. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1997. 148–154.
- Blackwell, Marilyn Johns. "Ideology and Specularity in Per Olov Enquist's Tribadernas natt." Scandinavian Studies 67 (1995): 196–215.
- Shideler, Ross. Per Olov Enquist: A Critical Study. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.
- Törnqvist, Egil. "Playwright on Playwright: Per Olov Enquist's Strindberg and Lars Norén's O'Neill." In Documentarism in Scandinavian Literature, ed. by Poul Houe and Sven Rossel. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1997. 155–164.

Egil Törnqvist

NIHONGDENG XIA DE SHAOBING, HUAJU

See ON GUARD BENEATH THE NEON LIGHTS

NŌ AND KYŌGEN

JAPAN's nō theater is often portrayed as virtually unchanged from the time of its establishment six centuries ago. Yet the modern era has seen a vast transformation in repertoire and influence, both at home and abroad. Nō's founding genius Motokiyo Zeami (1363?–1443?) attempted to preserve his discoveries through secret treatises. When published in 1909, these had a profound influence in reinvigorating this ancient theater.

After World War II, plays that had been considered morally ambiguous, critical of the shogunate, priesthood, or emperor, or too complex were restored in a “revival boom” that continues today. Successful restorations such as The Burial Mound (Motomezuka, 1951) and The Burden of Love (Koi no Omoni, 1963) have been assimilated into the official repertoire. Kyōgen, the classical COMEDY genre, similarly expanded its repertoire by each of the two existing schools importing works once exclusive to the other and restoring lost works: Shigeyama Sennojō revived the large-cast fantasy Battle of the Nuts and Fruit (Konomi Arasoi, 1966), a solo kyōgen Mushroom Hunting (Hitori Matsutake, 1971), and the so-called porno kyōgen Sleep Reversal (Negawari, 1983), in which two lecherous priests fondle each other instead of the intended young widow.

Modern writers have attempted new works in nō style. Plays have been based on classic literature, such as Takahama Kyōshi's Road to the North (1944) or Jakuchō Setouchi's Bridge of Dreams (Yume no Ukihashi, 2001), based on The Tale of Genji; legends, such as the marriage of the water-princess and the Chinese Emperor's son in Masaaki Dōmoto's Drought Dragon-Princess (Kasui Ryūnyō, 1995); historical characters, such as Yōjirō Takita's Abe no Seimei (2002); Western religious figures, such as Kichida Rōchi's The Resurrection of Christ (Fukkatsu no Kuraisuto, 1957); and contemporary issues, such as Tada Toshio's Well of Darkness (Mumyō no Ii, 1991), about the ethics of brain-death transplants, or Ishimure Michiko's Shiranui (2002), concerning Minamata disease.

Kyōgen adaptations and newly written plays draw on fairy tales, legends, horror stories, and literary classics. Tadasu Iizawa's The Washing River (Susugigawa, 1953), based on the medieval French FARCE The Washtub, delineates a henpecked husband's revenge; KINOSHITA JUNJI's folktale play Tale of Hikoichi (Hikoichi Banashi, 1955) sketches a mischievous goblin; and Hōashi Masami's The Death-God (Shinigami, 1983) conflates two Grimm tales about a quack doctor. William Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, Twelfth Night, and Comedy of Errors have all been staged successfully as kyōgen, among other innovative works. Philosopher and “super-kabuki” (SHIN KABUKI) playwright Umehara Takeshi's “super-kyōgen” gives an Aristophanic satiric spin on such contemporary issues as ecological disasters caused by reclaimed land, human cloning, and nuclear war.

Many Westerners have created nō-influenced pieces, while nō actors, in turn, have adapted Western texts for nō. Examples are Kimura Taro's Woman and Shadow (Kage to Onna 1968), based on PAUL CLAUDEL's play of that name (1923), and Yokomichi Mario's Hawk Princess (Takahime, 1967), an adaptation of W. B. YEATS's AT THE HAWK'S WELL. There also have been English-language plays written in nō style by Richard Emmert, Arthur Little, Janine Beichman, Kenneth Yasuda, and others.

Nō and kyōgen experimentation continues annually, although few plays enter the permanent repertory. Moreover, the actors and directors gain immeasurably from their mutually enriching interaction with contemporary artists in other genres.

FURTHER READING

Brandon, James R., ed. Nō and Kyōgen in the Contemporary World.

Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1997.

Masuda, Shōzō. Nō to Kindai Bungaku [Nō and modern literature].

Tokyo: Heibonsha, 1990.

Shigeyama Sennojō. Kyōgen Yakusha: Hinekure Handaiki [A Kyōgen actor:

A perverse half-life]. Tokyo: Iwanami Shinsho, 1987.

Tada, Tomio. Nō no Naka no Nō Butai [The Nō stage inside the brain].

Tokyo: Shinchosha, 2001.

Umehara, Takeshi. Ōsama to Kyōryū [King and the dinosaur]. Tokyo:

Shinchosha, 2003.

Yokomichi Mario and Seki Kobayashi. Nō-Kyōgen. Tokyo: Iwanami

Seminar Bks., 1996.

Jonah Salz

NODA HIDEKI (1955–)

Noda Hideki is a Japanese playwright, director, and actor. His career can be divided into two periods, the first leading his troupe, the Dream Wanderers (Yume no Yūminsha), founded in 1976, and the second running his production company, NODA MAP, after his return from ENGLAND in 1993. With the Dream Wanderers, Noda established a distinctive style, influenced by KARA JÜRŌ, that pushed the physicality of 1960s ANGURA theater and the lightly humorous wordplay of the 1970s to higher levels. Noda's style of performance was first viewed with suspicion, but it eventually became the benchmark for theater in the 1980s. Extremely demanding of the actor, Noda's style physicalizes every aspect of the text and has been called “the body that won't stand still.”

Noda's first successes were in small theaters (shogekijo). One of his early successes, The Prisoner of Zenda Castle (Zenda Jō no Toride, 1981) was first performed in a little theater on the University of Tokyo campus. After that, he began to produce plays in mid-sized halls. Other “little theater” companies again followed suit. Noda moved away from the limited production facilities of small theaters to venues that allowed more spectacle. In 1986, he used an indoor arena to produce a trilogy called Seven Variations on Stonehenge (Sutōn Henji Nanahenge, 1986). Over 26,000 people saw the production in one day. Spectacle still marks his work even though most productions are done in mid-sized halls.

Noda disbanded the Dream Wanderers in 1992, then spent a year training in England. Instead of a permanent troupe of actors, his production company, NODA MAP, gathers a new group for every play. That has allowed him to work with the best available talent and to use non-Japanese actors and do joint productions abroad. In 2003 he was planning a new production in England based on a Japanese short story.

Another of his early productions was Young Boy Hunting: Groping in the Pitch Dark (Shōnen-gari: Sue wa Ayame mo Shirenu Yami, 1979). In 1989 he did a production called The Third Richard that was an adaptation combining several of William Shakespeare's plays.

Social themes were given more importance after his return from England. His first production was titled Kiru (1994) and dealt with cultural imperialism. The sweeping spectacle of the production matched its epic narrative.

The Red Demon Akaoni (Akaoni, 1996) deals with xenophobia and the difficulties of intercultural communication. The central character, called Akaoni (red demon) by the locals, is washed ashore in a small village. Akaoni and the villagers cannot communicate, and they view him as a monster. The Red Demon Akaoni has been produced in JAPAN, England, and THAILAND with different casts using their native languages.

TABOO (1996) is a critique of Japan's emperor system and theater. A prince is raised thinking he is an idiot. He becomes a nō performer, but when he is called to be emperor, the country is plunged into war.

Noda continues to build on a loyal fan base through his use of spectacle, language, and a directing style suited to the shorter attention spans of contemporary audiences.

SELECT PLAYS: Young Boy Hunting: Groping in the Pitch Dark (Shōnen-gari: Sue wa Ayame mo Shirenu Yami, 1979); The Prisoner of Zenda Castle (Zenda jō no Toride, 1981); Memories of My Little Finger (Koyubi no Omoide, 1983); Napoleon Preserve (Binzume no Napoleon, 1984); Revolving Mermaid: What's That You Call Yourself? (Kaiten Ningyō: Anata no Namae Nante—no?, 1984); Composed of Seven Variations on Stonehenge (Sutōn Henji Nanahenge, 1986); White Night Valkyrie (Bakuya no Warukyūre); Comet Siegfried (Suisai Jijūritto); Valhalla up in Smoke (Waruhara Jōhatsu); Beneath a Cloud of Plastic Cherry Blossoms (Kansaku: Sakura no Mori no Mankai no Shita, 1989); Kiru (1994); The Red Demon Akaoni (Akaoni, 1996); TABOO (1996); Pandora's Bell (Pandora no Kane, 1999); Oil (Oiru, 2003)

FURTHER READING

- Japan Playwrights Association, ed. Half a Century of Japanese Theatre: IV, 1980s, Part 2. Tokyo: Kinokuniya, 2002.
- Kazama Ken. Shōgekijō no Fūkei [The little theater landscape]. Tokyo: Chūō Kōronsha, 1992.
- Ortolani, Benito. The Japanese Theatre: From Shamanistic Ritual to Contemporary Pluralism. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1995.
- Powell, Brian. Japan's Modern Theatre: A Century of Change and Continuity. London: Japan Library, 2002.
- Senda Akihiko. The Voyage of Contemporary Japanese Theatre. Tr. by J. Thomas Rimer. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1997.

John D. Swain

NOER, ARIFIN C. (1941–1995)

Indonesian playwright, director, and actor Arifin C. Noer created plays that combined elements of Western ABSURDISM's text-driven drama and INDONESIA's improvised folk drama. Noer forged a new direction for Indonesian playwriting, drawing significantly from performative structures of his birthplace, Cirebon, West Java. He reshaped traditional idioms to fit into a contemporary audience—an approach that informed all aspects of his plays, from script development to staging. Noer's highly poetic and evocative plays are composed as performances rather than just dramatic literature. He did not merely transpose traditional music and theater; he extracted something closer to its essence.

Noer began his theatrical career as an actor in a study group with W. S. RENDRA in the early 1960s in central Java while studying for his B.A. in state administration. In 1967, after completing his degree, Noer moved to Jakarta, where he founded Teater Ketjil (literally, Little Theatre). He conceived of the group as a laboratory where he and fellow actors could experiment with the workshop model introduced by Rendra, emphasizing process over product. However, unlike Rendra who concentrated on enriching the whole person—intellectually, ethically, and physically—Noer's focus was on cultivating ACTING skills. His breakthrough play was The Clouds (Mega-Mega, 1969), a surrealistic, dreamlike piece that pushed actors toward alternative acting techniques to the institutionally supported Western ones based on psychological REALISM. The key for Noer and his actors was not in a single acting style but in using whatever was most appropriate to create what he called teater tanpa batas (theater without limits). From his eclectic and unconventional approach to acting came productions that were timely and meaningful for the audience on both moral and, covertly, political levels.

Noer was a prolific playwright and director from the 1970s until his death in 1995. He directed all of his original plays including his best-known work MOTHS (Kapai-Kapai, 1970) with Teater Ketjil. The Bottomless Well (Sumur Tanpa Dasar), originally produced in 1964, was revived in 1991 to tour the UNITED STATES as part of the Festival Of Indonesia. Madun Orchestra (Orkes Madun) (1974, 1976, 1979, 1989) and Interrogation (Interogasi) (1984, 1990) are other important works. He was also celebrated for his politically relevant stagings of Western plays in translation. These performances were artfully designed to expose social injustices perpetrated by President's Haji Mohammad Suharto's New Order government without being perceived by authorities as critical, which would have led to certain censure. Such adaptations included, among others, CALIGULA by ALBERT CAMUS in 1970, THE FLIES by JEAN-PAUL SARTRE in 1972, and Macbeth by EUGÈNE IONESCO in 1975.

Noer was also a leading figure in the Indonesian film industry, first as a scriptwriter and later as an award-winning director. He created both art films and, ironically, government-sponsored propaganda films extolling Suharto's rise to power. His wife Jajang C. Noer played major roles in many of his films as well as producing them.

PLAYS: The Bottomless Well (Sumur Tanpa Dasar, 1964); The Clouds (Mega-Mega, 1969); Moths (Kapai-Kapai, 1970); Tengul (1973); Madekur and Tarkeni or The Madun Orchestra Part I (Madekur dan Tarkeni atawa Orkes Madun Bagian Satu, 1974); Hilarious (Kocak Kecil, 1975); Madun Orchestra II: The Hermit Crab (Umang-Umang atawa Orkes Madun II, 1976); Madun Orchestra Iib: Sandek, the Youth Worker (Orkes Madun Iib atawa Sandek Pemuda Pekerja, 1979); Interrogation I: In the Shadow of God (Interogasi I: Dalam Bayangan Tuhan, 1984); Ozone (Ozone atawa Orkes Madun IV, 1989); Afterbirth (Ari-Ari atawa Interogasi II, 1990)

FURTHER READING

- Gillitt, Cobina. "Challenging Conventions and Crossing Boundaries: A New Tradition of Indonesian Theatre from 1968–1978." Ph.D. diss., N.Y. Univ., 2001.
- Jit, Krishan. "Indonesia, Modern Spoken Drama." In Cambridge Guide to Asian Theatre, ed. by James Brandon. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1992.

Cobina Gillitt

NO EXIT

Generally considered JEAN-PAUL SARTRE's dramatic masterpiece, No Exit (Huis Clos) was written during the Nazi occupation of FRANCE and has the distinction of being the first play to be produced in liberated Paris in September 1944. It premiered at the Vieux Colombier and ran for more than a year to much acclaim. Sartre and the principal actors had been active in the resistance movement, which, according to Philip Thody in Jean Paul Sartre—A Literary and Political Study (1960), "provided additional political reason for the great success which the play enjoyed." While it may not be Sartre's most ambitious stage piece, it is without question his most structurally elegant; its frequent revivals around the world attest to its enduring merit.

Garcin, a South American pacifist journalist, enters his new living quarters, which are decorated in an antiquated Second Empire style. As it turns out, he has been led into his personal room in hell by a valet who finds the usual questions about devils and hot poker eye-rollingly droll. Garcin is soon introduced to his chamber mates for eternity—Inez, a lesbian with a chip on her shoulder, and Estelle, a pampered bourgeois wife accustomed to male admirers. While Inez knows quite well the reason for her being damned to hell (she drove her lover to murder and suicide), Estelle cannot imagine how she has wound up in such a place—that is, until she reveals that she threw her baby, fathered not by her husband but by her less wealthy lover, out the window. A vicious love triangle soon develops, with Inez angling to gain power over Estelle, who craves only the attention of the sole man in the room.

Sensing the possibility that each roommate has been appointed the unwitting torturer of the others, Garcin requests that they refrain from speaking. The trouble is that he cannot help reviewing his own past with his companions, hoping against hope that fresh perspectives on his actions will render his cruel treatment of his wife and his desertion during wartime as less cowardly acts than they stubbornly appear. Not a chance: death renders all motives inconsequential. "You are—your life, and nothing else" is Inez's pointed formulation, and Garcin will be forced to bear the weight of his shameful mortal choices without extenuation. It is this realization that provokes from him the famous line, "Hell is—other people!" Sartre intends this not so much as a universal condemnation as the inevitable sentiment of a life lived in bad faith.

THE DRAMATURGY of No Exit has a simple—and savagely ironic—economy. Unlike the bulk of Sartre's literary work, the play resists straining after philosophical import. Its ideas about identity and the complex philosophical distinction between self-honesty and self-dramatization are not imposed but instead fully embodied in a compelling theatrical form. The analysis, in other words, does not arrive in clunky explanatory passages but unfolds dramatically. Though the play fits ERIC BENTLEY's description of Sartre's work as "philosophical MELODRAMA" (Bentley, 1946) it does so not through sensational theatrics but through a natural suspense born out of a chillingly novel situation.

FURTHER READING

- Bentley, Eric. The Playwright as Thinker: A Study of Drama in Modern Times. New York: Meridian Bks., 1946.
- Howells, Christina. Sartre: The Necessity of Freedom. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1988.
- Kern, Edith, ed. Sartre: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1965.
- McCall, Dorothy. The Theatre of Jean-Paul Sartre. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1969.
- Murdoch, Iris. Sartre: Romantic Rationalist. London: Vintage, 1999.
- Sartre, Jean-Paul. Sartre on Theater. Tr. by Frank Jellinek. New York: Pantheon Bks., 1976.
- Thody, Philip. Jean-Paul Sartre: A Literary and Political Study. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1960.
- Wood, Philip R. Understanding Jean-Paul Sartre. Columbia: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1990.

Charles McNulty

NORÉN, LARS (1944–)

A theater performance should be like a wound that heals.

—Lars Norén, 1983

One of SWEDEN's leading poets since his debut in 1963, also dramatist, director, and artistic leader of the National Touring Company (Riksteatern) since 1998, Lars Norén has devoted himself almost exclusively to drama since 1980. Astoundingly prolific, he has published some thirty plays and had a number of unpublished ones performed on stage, radio, and television. Although widely translated and staged in northern Europe, Norén has had little response in the Anglo-Saxon world. So far only the short Munich—Athens (München-Athen, 1983) has been published in English.

After a negative reception of the renaissance drama The Prince's Bootlicker (Fursteslickaren, 1973), Norén achieved his first success with The Courage to Kill (Modet att döda, 1980), depicting a traumatic Oedipal parent-child relationship, a recurring theme in Norén's dramatic work. Norén's breakthrough came in 1982 with THE NIGHT IS MOTHER TO THE DAY (Natten är dagens mor), where the author's black humor helped to lighten the play's claustrophobic impact. Together with Chaos Is God's Neighbor (Kaos är granne med Gud, 1983) and The Stillness (Stillheten, 1986), it forms a family trilogy. Like EUGENE O'NEILL'S LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT, a drama that has had a tremendous impact on Norén, it is highly autobiographical. In the six-hour The Communion (Nattvarden, 1985), two brothers demonstrate their contrasting attitudes toward their recently dead mother, present on the stage in the form of an urn, while in Autumn and Winter (Höst och vinter, 1992), which opened in Copenhagen, the family interaction concerns two daughters and their parents. Hebriana (Hebriana, 1987), first presented in The Hague, and One-Day Creatures (Endagsvarelser, 1989), which premiered in Kassel, both deal with representatives of a middle-aged "lost generation," caught between their own hopeful past, the spring of 1968, and the darkening future. And Grant Us the Shadows (Och ge oss skuggorna, 1991) which opened in Oslo, is a play about Eugene O'Neill, his third wife, and his two sons. Set in the living room of the O'Neills on a grim October day in 1949 (O'Neill's sixty-first birthday) from morning to dusk, the play intentionally mirrors Long Day's Journey Into Night, demonstrating how the family interaction described in that play (set in 1912) is ironically and fatefully repeated thirty-seven years later. As a semidocumentary "sequel play" to O'Neill's autobiographical masterpiece, And Grant Us the Shadows is probably unique in world drama.

While Norén's earlier plays are family oriented, his later ones demonstrate a growing concern for society at large. In The Leaves in Vallombrosa (Löven i Vallombrosa, 1995), Bonn (1991), and Time Is Our Home (Tiden är vårt hem, 1991), the spiritual discomfort of those living in a welfare state is voiced in Chekhovian polyphony. In the "Dantean" A Kind of Hades (En sorts Hades, 1994), set in a mental hospital representing Sweden, and in Personal Circle 3:1 (Personkrets 3:1, 1998), a six-hour play and the first part of the trilogy Death of the Classes (Morire di classe), Norén has attracted large audiences with his shocking descriptions of the outcasts of Swedish society.

Norén has also written a number of radio plays, one of which, Revenge Aria (Hämndaria), earned him the Prix Italia in 1987. In recent years he has directed some of his own plays as well as plays by others.

In Norén's dramatic universe, the unity of time and place—the closed room—has a fundamental thematic value, stressing the characters' ambivalent feelings about being simultaneously close to each other and yet imprisoned with one another. Confrontation is inevitable; separation—a key concept with Norén—necessary. As with O'Neill, the audience is asked to witness the often strenuous interaction between the characters for a considerable period of time. Writing in a therapeutic era, Norén depicts the hidden workings behind what is pretended. Role-playing, projections, and double-bind mechanisms abound in his psychoanalytically inspired dramatic oeuvre, which demonstrates an acute ear for natural dialogue and subtextual innuendo.

SELECT PLAYS: The Courage to Kill (Modet att döda, 1980); Orestes (1980); A Terrible Happiness (En fruktansvärd lycka, 1981); The Night Is Mother to the Day (Natten är dagens mor, 1982); Chaos Is God's Neighbor (Kaos är granne med Gud, 1983); Munich-Athens (München-Athen, 1983); The Communion (Nattvarden, 1985); The Stillness (Stillheten, 1986); Revenge Aria (Hämndaria, 1987); One-Day Creatures (Endagsvarelser, 1989); Bobby Fischer Lives in Pasadena (Bobby Fischer bor i Pasadena, 1990); And Grant Us the Shadows (Och ge oss skuggorna, 1991); Autumn and Winter (Höst och vinter, 1992); A Kind of Hades (En sorts Hades, 1994); The Leaves in Vallombrosa (Löven i Vallombrosa, 1995); Personal Circle 3:1 (Personkrets 3:1, 1998); Terminal (nine short plays, 2004)

FURTHER READING

- Neuhaus, Lotta. "The Intoxication of Insight: Notes on Lars Norén." Theater 22 (1990–1991): 89–92.
- Osten, Suzanne. "Theatre with Lars Norén: A Working Process for a Director." In Niet alleen Strindberg: Zueden op de planken [Not only Strindberg: Sweden on stage], ed. by Egil Törnqvist and Arthur Sonnen. Amsterdam: Holland Festival, 1985. 42–46.
- Van Reis, Mikael. Det slutna rummet: Sex kapitel om Lars Noréns författarskap 1963–1983 [The Closed Room: Six Chapters on Lars Norén's Authorship 1963–1983]. Stockholm/Stehag: Symposion, 1997 [English summary, 503–507].

Egil Törnqvist

NORMAL

The few plays that attract attention at the Edinburgh Fringe Festival tend to contain sensationalist subject matter: ANTHONY NEILSON enhanced the sensationalist subject matter of his 1991 Fringe play Normal: The Düsseldorf Ripper (abbreviated to Normal when published) with sensationalism of writing, theatricality, and visceral provocation. Normal dramatizes the evil of the notorious Weimar Republic serial killer Peter Kurten. An inexperienced lawyer, Justus Wehner, represents the killer, desperately hoping that he can convince the authorities of his client's insanity. If Kurten is shown to be not in control of his actions, then Wehner can believe that his brutality is not motivated by the evil that Wehner cannot come to terms with. Many theatrical effects are used, including flashback, spectacular lighting, singing, oversized props, and mannequins.

The Fringe production took place at the Pleasance Theatre (subsequently, the play moved to the Finborough Theatre, London), a compact dramatic space. The tininess of the auditorium complemented the performance's claustrophobic milieu, fostering a sense of enclosure that was reminiscent of Fritz Lang's shadowy 1931 film about Kurten, M. Neilson himself directed the three actors. Numerous controversies are raised during the play's thirty-one scenes, including audience voyeurism, prostitution, and the connection between slaughtering animals and slaughtering humans. Three particular issues resonate: the role of society in engendering psychopathic tendencies, the shocking similarities between the outlaw killer and the regular man, and the possible connections between Kurten's killings and Nazism.

Although Neilson makes no claim to explain Kurten's depravity, it is clear that childhood disadvantages contribute to his character. Kurten shocks us with explicit descriptions of sexual climaxes achieved through murderous actions against animals, adults, and children. But his childhood circumstances appear equally shocking: he remembers beatings from an alcoholic father and unavoidable sexual engagements with his mother and sisters. Society is, in part, to blame because the family's abnormality is predicated upon their impoverished confinement in a packed, privacy-free room.

The actors playing Kurten and Wehner are dressed similarly. Wehner, gradually, realizes that he shares some of Kurten's sordid excitements, disgusting himself by becoming excited during Kurten's reminiscences. After seducing Kurten's wife, Frau Kurten—which he is encouraged to do by Kurten, who seeks to demonstrate the ease of temptation—he fantasizes about killing her. This fantasy “killing” is acted out in a six-minute sequence. Wehner's realization that he harbors such beastly desires compromises his claim that Kurten is “not normal.”

A connection is drawn between Kurten's murders and those of the Nazis. Kurten's actions, compared to Nazi murders, appear even more “normal.” Kurten asserts, “There is no such thing as society.” This phrase is often used as a derogatory, shorthand account of the ideology of Margaret Thatcher's right-wing Conservative government of the 1980s. Capitalism can be caricatured as a Darwinian system in which each person fights for himself or herself, disregarding everyone else. Kurten pursues selfish, sick pleasures, careless of all others—that Neilson can draw a connection between him and “normal” capitalists is indeed shocking for any audience.

[See also England, 1960–Present; Scotland]

FURTHER READING

- Gilbert, Alexander. “Peter Kürten.” <http://www.crimelibrary.com/serialz/kurten>.
- Marmion, Patrick. “What I Do Is a Bit Odd” (interview with Anthony Neilson). The Guardian (May 13, 2002). <http://www.guardian.co.uk/features/story/0,766010,00.html>.

McMillan, Joyce. “No Man's Land of Class” (interview with Anthony Neilson). The Scotsman (July 31, 2002).

<http://thescoatsman.scotsman.com/s2.cfm?id=822822002>.

Reviews of Normal: The Düsseldorf Ripper. Theatre Record 11, no. 20 (1991): 1222.

Sierz, Aleks. In-Yer-Face Theatre: British Drama Today. London: Faber, 2001.

Wagner, Margaret Seaton. The Monster of Düsseldorf: The Life and Trial of Peter Kürten. London: Faber, 1932.

Kevin De Ornellas

NORMAN, MARSHA (1947–)

I feel that we are all working toward one goal, which is the documenting of what it has felt like to be alive in our time. And that we all write the parts of it that we see. You can't possibly do the whole thing so you just do your little part and trust that the assortment of you is great enough to pretty much cover it.

—Marsha Norman, 2000

Born on September 21, 1947, in Louisville, Kentucky, playwright Marsha Norman studied PHILOSOPHY at Agnes Scott College in Decatur, Georgia, and then earned a master's degree at the University of Louisville. Norman's first play, Getting Out (1978), was an immediate success. It dramatizes the initial twenty-four hours following a woman's release from prison, as she looks back on her life and ponders a new beginning. Staged by the Actors Theatre of Louisville in 1977, Getting Out was produced the following year at the Mark Taper Forum in Los Angeles and OFF-BROADWAY at the Lucille Lortel Theatre and was awarded the John Gassner Medallion, Newsday's Oppenheimer Award, and an American Theater Critics Association Citation. Upon receiving an artist-in-residence playwriting grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, Norman wrote several more plays for the Actors Theatre.

In 1981 Norman moved to New York, where she wrote her most critically acclaimed play, NIGHT MOTHER (1982). An exploration of suicide, the play depicts a young woman's last evening spent with her mother, to whom she confesses her intention to take her own life; despite her mother's desperate efforts to dissuade her, the daughter prepares them both for her death. Night Mother premiered in December 1982 at the American Repertory Theatre in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and headed to Broadway's John Golden Theatre that March. It won the 1983 Pulitzer Prize for Drama, the Susan Smith Blackburn Prize, and the Hull-Warriner and Drama Desk Awards. The film versions appeared in 1986.

Norman returned to Broadway in 1991 with the musical The Secret Garden, for which she wrote both book and lyrics and which won a Tony Award and Drama Desk Award in 1992. The Red Shoes, whose book and lyrics she also wrote, followed in 1993. In addition to a substantial body of plays, Norman also wrote a novel, The Fortune Teller, as well as scripts for film and television, notably Face of a Stranger. She has been a professor of drama at the Julliard School in New York since 1994 and currently serves on the council of the Dramatists Guild.

The influence of the women's liberation movement is evident in Norman's work, which deals chiefly with problems stemming from the political and social oppression of her realistic female characters. Norman's writing is intentionally political: she once stated, "I want to write for a very specific purpose which happens to coincide with what really interests me. It isn't just a political act. It's a political act through and through" (Brown, 1996). Norman's plays are notable for bringing women's issues, and the stories of everyday women in particular, to the stage, something she views as vital: "Clearly women in our culture feel invisible. I feel invisible. I felt invisible as a girl. . . . I write about people you would never see, like me. This has got to change! We have got to get our stories told!" Though women are the primary focus of her writing, Norman's plays have been acknowledged for their ability to reach men and women alike. Speaking of the universality of Norman's work, Robert Brustein praised Norman as "one who speaks to the concerns and experiences of all humankind" (Brustein, 1983).

[See also Feminist Drama in the United States; Political Theater in the United States; United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Getting Out (1978); Third and Oak; The Laundromat (1978); Third and Oak; The Pool Hall (1978); Circus Valentine (1979); Merry Christmas (1979); Night Mother (1982); The Holdup (1983); Traveler in the Dark (1984); Winter Shakers (1987); Sarah and Abraham (1988); The Secret Garden (1991); Loving Daniel Boone (1993); The Red Shoes (1993); Trudy Blue (1995)

FURTHER READING

- Bigsby, C. W. E. "Marsha Norman." In Contemporary American Playwrights. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
- Brown, Linda Ginter, ed. Marsha Norman: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Brustein, Robert. "Don't Read This Review" [review of Night Mother]. The New Republic 188 (May 2, 1983): 25–27.
- DiGaetani, John L. "Marsha Norman." In A Search for a Postmodern Theater: Interviews with Contemporary Playwrights. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Harriott, Esther. "Marsha Norman: Getting Out." In American Voices: Five Contemporary Playwrights in Essays and Interviews. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Co., 1988.
- Kane, Leslie. "The Way Out, the Way In: Paths to Self in the Plays of Marsha Norman." In Feminine Focus: The New Women Playwrights, ed. by Enoch Brater. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1989.
- Kintz, Linda. The Subject's Tragedy: Political Poetics, Feminist Theory, and Drama. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1992.

Emma Dassori

NORWAY

19TH-CENTURY DRAMA

Modern Norwegian drama grew out of a national romantic movement that received most of its energy from opposition against continuing Danish hegemony. In 1814 Norway had withdrawn from the union with DENMARK, which had then lasted for more than 400 years. Danish influence in terms of written language and cultural traditions remained strong in mid-19th-century Norway. The theaters had for sometime been dominated by Danish management and Danish actors. Out of the national endeavor in the 1850s came two young theater instructors and dramatic authors, HENRIK IBSEN (1828–1906) and BJØRNSTJERNE BJØRNSON (1832–1910), and at the same time a number of talented Norwegian actors and actresses entered the stage in Bergen and Kristiania (now Oslo). Around 1860 the main source for playwriting was the Old Norse sagas, in particular about the kings of medieval Norway. The heroes of the past were not presented as bloodthirsty vikings but as statesmen and psychologically interesting individuals. Historical plays by William Shakespeare and Friedrich Schiller were important sources of inspiration, as well as the Dane Adam Oehlenschläger's dramatizations of saga material. Representative works in this tradition are Bjørnson's Sigurd Slembe, a trilogy (1862), and Ibsen's THE PRETENDERS (1863).

A unique outburst of creativity resulted in two major dramatic poems by Ibsen: BRAND (1866), a forceful criticism of a morally relaxed population, and PEER GYNT (1867), a fabulous romantic version of the medieval morality genre. Both poems reveal Kierkegaardian ideas. The individual is responsible for whatever choice he makes, and the criterion of choice is not common sense or reason but the intensity of feeling; the truth is subjective.

Historical drama faded away due partly to the dwindling of the Danish influence and to a boom period of newspaper distribution. Readers and audiences were drawn to presentations of contemporary issues, and this cleared the ground for the modern domestic drama in prose. Bjørnson led the way, with The Newly Married Couple (1865), showing the young wife torn between parents and husband, and in 1875, with The Editor, about the power of the press, and A BANKRUPTCY, demonstrating the need for sound ethics in business affairs.

After his "world historical play," EMPEROR AND GALILEAN, spread over ten acts (1873), Ibsen turned to contemporary family life. From 1877 to 1899 he at regular intervals published twelve plays, referred to as the prose cycle, dealing with the moral and psychological problems of modern bourgeois society and exploring the spiritual development of individual characters in a morally problematic family situation. In this series of plays one may perceive a certain similarity with conventions in the well-made play and pièce à thèse in the French tradition of Eugène Scribe.

What distinguishes Ibsen's prose plays is the stringency of composition, the inventiveness of plot, the carefully calculated effect of the dialogue, and the metaphorical emphasis suggested by the scenographic expression. In most of them there is a developing sense of unease or longing to become free, often triggered by the appearance of a character from the past or some mysterious stranger, exposing a feeling of guilt or encouraging the idea of a new life, devoid of social conventions. In several of these instances the critical moment of self-realization is a family disaster, a TRAGEDY that could not be avoided. In other cases the central characters are able to get through the crisis and reach an understanding.

Bjørnson also continued to write a number of modern prose plays, and most of them were performed with considerable success. The tragedy BEYOND HUMAN POWER (1883) and the COMEDY Geography and Love (1885) are the ones that have survived longest. Bjørnson was given the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1903. Ibsen never got it; he was not considered sufficiently positive and edifying. Most of his modern prose plays were controversial in Norway, although he was highly respected because of his growing international fame.

The modern prose plays by Ibsen, Bjørnson, and others have been categorized by critics and editors as REALISM, a literature intended to depict the real lives and problems of people. This view, however, is highly debatable. It conceals the fact that even these plays are artful presentations of romantic themes such as heroic individualism, the urge to be free, the resistance to compromise, and the emphasis on subjective truth. The influence of Søren Kierkegaard as well as that of another Dane, the critic Georg Brandes, was considerable.

A number of highly qualified novelists also tried their luck at writing plays but without the same kind of success as Ibsen and Bjørnson. Amalie Skram (1846–1905), whose fiction concentrates on the problems of married women, published Agnete in 1893, a play about a divorced young woman in a bohemian milieu. The man she is attracted to cannot forgive her for a minor offense that her poverty has forced her to commit, and she leaves.

Arne Garborg (1851–1924), critic, poet, and novelist, central in the New Norse language movement, wrote a couple of plays; the most important one is The Teacher (1896). The main character is a farmer and evangelist who wants to practice Christianity the way Jesus did; but he encounters opposition both in his congregation and in his family, mainly because he is blind to the power he exerts over young women who want to be his disciples. In his essays, Garborg introduced contemporary European intellectual movements, most important the vitalist PHILOSOPHY of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, also promoted by the Danish critic Georg Brandes, who deeply influenced Scandinavian intellectuals in the 1880s and 1890s. Following a period of firm belief in science, the age toward the end of the century became more attracted to irrationalist attitudes and cultural pessimism.

The best of KNUT HAMSUM's (1859–1952) six plays reveal the same basically romantic atmosphere as in his early novels, focusing on the dreaming mind of an infatuated outsider, longing for an involvement, and with problematic relations to society. Most important is the dramatic trilogy about the development of Ivar Kareno (1895–1898), who is caught between the will to control his destiny and the insurmountable instincts of life itself.

Hamsun shared much of Nietzsche's vitalism, as did GUNNAR HEIBERG (1857–1929) in some of his early plays. He is considered the most important playwright of his generation. Like Ibsen and Bjørnson, he had some experience as a theater director. His most original plays are The Balcony (1894) and Love's Tragedy (1904). In these plays erotic love is depicted as a force of nature, which human consciousness is unable or unwilling to withstand. In The Balcony the passionate Julie demands adoration and is a ruthless consumer of men. Heiberg started as a disciple of Ibsen, and in one of his plays, King Midas (1890), he turned against Bjørnson's moralist attitude. This made Heiberg the target of antibohemian critics.

20TH-CENTURY DRAMA

Also influenced by the vitalist ROMANTICISM of the 1890s was Hans E. Kinck (1865–1926). His most remarkable dramatic work is the poem The Drover (1908), in the tradition of Ibsen's Peer Gynt, but devoid of allegory.

The most successful comedy of these years, The Fortunate Election (1913), was written by Nils Kjær (1870–1924) in the same year that Norwegian women acquired the right to vote and to be elected to the National Assembly. Kjær's talent for ridiculing political and social phenomena was considerable, and he had limited sympathy for popular traditions and democratic institutions. Seemingly more in line with Ibsen's prose plays were some of the plays by Helge Krog (1889–1962). His first play, The Great We (1919), is a socialist comedy attacking the press for its loyalty to capital owners. In several later plays Krog presented an idealized picture of the modern independent woman in her difficult relations to patriarchal society. Like Heiberg, Krog belonged to the movement of cultural radicalism, which had its intellectual roots in the ideas of Georg Brandes. Highly praised in his time for wit and optimism, Krog's plays are rarely performed today.

Less respectful of Ibsen's poetic heritage and more directly engaged in the ideological use of the theater was NORDAHL GRIEG (1902–1943). He had become a communist during a stay in Moscow, where he studied Soviet film and theater. In OUR POWER AND OUR GLORY (1935)—a political branding of cynical ship owners in times of war—his juxtaposition of scenes influenced by the filmic technique of crosscutting has a striking effect. The Defeat (1937) is a sympathetic presentation of the last days of the Parisian uprising in 1871.

A play that might have been called absurd had it been written in the 1950s is While We Are Waiting (1938) by Johan Borgen (1902–1979). The stage is the waiting room of a railway station, where some actors waiting for a train rehearse a play and make other passengers join them. Elements in the play under rehearsal mix with events at the station, creating a Pirandellian effect.

Under the Nazi regime the Germans occupied Norway from 1940 to 1945, making free cultural exchange impossible. Accordingly, conditions for the writing and production of new drama were not favorable. Before the war there had been a strong movement of amateur theater in the country. After the war theatrical activities tended to seek other outlets besides the traditional institutions. Experimental stages, free groups of actors, and regional theaters were established, and the new electronic media became channels for performances. Plays were written and produced locally to commemorate characters and events of local history, and radio and television were effective means of disseminating drama to a mass audience. This did not lead to an immediate increase in dramatic creativity, however.

Postwar attempts to renew the art of drama in various directions include Odd Eidem's (1913–1988) God's Own Clowns (1960), a historical play dismantling the dramatic illusion; Johan Borgen's Day of Liberation (1963), using music, dance, and pantomime; and Finn Carling's (1925–) The Bars (1966), where the characters are caged animals and the human criterion is the capacity for love.

The impulse from BERTOLT BRECHT, who had sought refuge in the UNITED STATES from the Nazi regime in GERMANY, was noticeable in the work of some younger playwrights of the 1960s, most explicitly in the essays and plays of JENS INGVALD BJØRNEBOE (1920–1976). Often using song and pantomime, Bjørneboe sought dramatic effects in extreme confrontations, exploring the ideological roots of evil. In THE BIRD LOVERS (1966), Italian partisans from the war have the chance to take revenge on former Nazi officers, now German tourists in post-war ITALY.

In the 1970s the political use of drama continued, with new social targets. The feminist movement influenced many plays; best known is Two Acts for Five Women (1974) by Bjørg Vik (1935–). A reunion of old classmates brings out conflicting views on gender relations, career possibilities, and family problems. Performed in a number of countries, Vik's play may be the most successful from the 1970s. Roles for women have been relatively scarce in Norwegian drama, a fact that made this play and others focusing on gender and power relations extremely welcome.

Like most 20th-century authors in Norway, Vik has been mainly a writer of fiction. Concentrating on drama, film, and television theater was Sverre Udnæs (1939–1982), who worked as a director both on television and for the stage and wrote several plays, mostly for television. The typical setting for his plays is the living room of the middle-class family, where the characters are unable to communicate with each other. In Visit Hours (1976) a young girl is expected to arrive home after a stay at a mental hospital; her family is apprehensive and uncomfortable, and the dramatic tension builds out of unpredictable events.

DOCUMENTARY DRAMA has been less productive in Norway than in many other countries. CECILIE LØVEID'S (1951–) best-known play, SEAGULL EATERS, written for radio in 1983, comes close to a documentary radio montage. A number of authentic texts and sound recordings suggest the life of a poor family in Bergen during the war. In Løveid's plays the plot tends to disintegrate, leaving room for poetic elements such as nursery rhymes or allegorical references to animals.

The most successful among the younger generation of playwrights in terms of performances in Norway and abroad is JON FOSSE (1959–). He wrote in other genres before he turned to drama in the 1990s. With their minimalist plot and abrupt, repetitious and dysfunctional dialogue, his plays present partly trivial and partly absurd scenes. The characters seem unable to act or speak coherently. The action is unconventional, though not unrecognizable, suggesting SAMUEL BECKETT's influence. A hundred years after Ibsen's dramatic exposure of malaise in the bourgeois family institution, an important trend in Norwegian drama seems to be the theme of dysfunctional families.

FURTHER READING

- Dalgard, Olav. "Norsk etterkrigsdrama" [Norwegian postwar drama]. Norsk teaterårbok [Norwegian theater yearbook]. 1975. 25–33.
- Garton, Janet, and Henning Sehmsdorf. "Contemporary Norwegian Theatre: An Introduction." In New Norwegian Plays, ed. by Janet Garton and Henning Sehmsdorf. Norwich: Norvik Press, 1989. 9–34.
- Longum, Leif. "In the Shadow of Ibsen: His Influence on Norwegian Drama and on Literary Attitudes." In Review of National Literature. Vol. 12, Norway. New York: Griffon House Pubs., 1983. 78–100.
- Marker, Frederick J., and Lise-Lone Marker. The Scandinavian Theatre. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1975.

Asbjørn Aarseth

NO TIME FOR COMEDY

No Time for Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN opened on April 17, 1939, and ran for 185 performances. The play dramatizes the struggle of a dramatist, on the brink of World War II, to write TRAGEDY rather than his usual sophisticated COMEDY. Sensing he fails at profundity, Gaylord Easterbrook (Laurence Olivier) vows to go to Spain where war is in progress. This time, however, his wife Linda (Katharine Cornell) talks him out of it. The romantic solution, as it is here characterized, is discarded. Instead, she makes the argument that to be an American is to fight to preserve real human values that those at war have lost: "You should stay here, live here where and while it is still possible to live. The more inhuman the rest of the world, the more human we."

Upholding the thematic conflict is a love quartet. In act 1, Philo Smith comes to Linda and informs her that his wife is leading Linda's husband, Gaylord, astray. Amanda Smith does this, he says, by inspiring a man to greatness—in this case, making a tragic playwright out of a comic one. Linda tries to laugh this off, but in act 2 she confronts Amanda, who is sequestering Gay in her library to write on “immortality.” The conflict seems to be between Mandy the idealist, who wants men to aspire to great profundity, and Linda the realist, who thinks that they should do what they are good at doing. Linda slowly discovers that Mandy is completely sincere in her desire; Amanda cries when accused of using it as a seductive strategy. Linda realizes that someone who cries real tears and thinks her feelings are noble will be quite difficult to overcome, especially by a realist like herself who sees such things as ACTING.

The third act brings Gay back home to discover Linda's reaction to his new play—which he fears is a failure. He knows she will give him an honest assessment. Gay insists, however, that he will marry Mandy and take her to Spain because he cannot endure Linda's (truthful) criticism any longer. Philo, however, has fallen in love with Linda, but she rejects his cynical vision of the world. Instead, she wins Gay back by proposing that he embark on a new play, one that so inspires him that he drops Amanda and Spain so that he can work on it: “Why don't you write a play about Mandy and me? Two opposite types of women in the life of a man, an artist, a writer—the builder-upper and the breaker-downer—the critical faculty versus the clinging vine—What Every Woman Knows in reverse.” Again Behrman struggles for balance between the comic and the tragic, at extremes the cynical and the idealist. In this case, however, he dramatizes that very conflict within the dramatist. The argument is that the comic is the civilized and that America must stand for civilization as the rest of the world is engulfed in chaos.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Hoy, Cyrus. “Clearings in the Jungles of Life: The Comedies of S. N. Behrman.” New York Literary Forum 1 (1978): 199–227.
- Miller, Jordan Y., and Winifred L. Frazer. American Drama Between the Wars: A Critical History. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

David Sauer

NOTTAGE, LYNN (1965–)

Lynn Nottage, an African American playwright born in 1965 and raised in Brooklyn, New York, is a prolific dramatist. Her plays explore longing and desire in relation to the universal search for intimacy. Nottage investigates the fumbling, stumbling, and discoveries that accompany reaching for intimate connections.

Nottage wrote her first play at eight years old and her first musical while attending New York's School of Music and Art, also known as the “Fame” high school. Nottage graduated from Brown University in 1986 and earned her master of fine arts degree from the Yale School of Drama in 1989. While at Brown, she took a class with playwright PAULA VOGEL, whose How I Learned to Drive (1997) launched the Meet the Playwright series. The experience of Vogel's class ignited Nottage's interest in the journey of playwriting.

Before becoming a full-time playwright, Nottage worked for the human rights organization Amnesty International in New York City. In 1993 she reached a crossroads and chose to pursue her art full-time. Nottage self-produced her shows in tiny theaters, often running the soundboard herself. She made critics take note with her ten-minute play Poof! (1993), which won the Heideman Award. The play is a meditation on the condition of violence in the home and was produced as a movie for television. Nottage followed that success with her dynamic and complex work Crumbs from the Table of Joy (nominated for a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People award) in 1995.

Nottage gave birth to a daughter and lost her mother to Lou Gering's disease in 1997. Mud, River, Stone (finalist, Susan Smith Blackburn Prize) was produced in 1998, after which Nottage slowed down her writing for three years in order to raise and care for her young daughter. Nottage wrote her way into OFF-BROADWAY by consistently constructing stories of interruptions, dares, dissonance, and resonance. In 2004, her two latest plays, Fabulation and Intimate Apparel, were produced. Nottage garnered nominations for both, Intimate Apparel winning such prestigious prizes as the Francesca Primus Prize and the Steinberg New Play Award, both granted by the American Theatre Critics Association (ATCA); the New York Drama Critics Circle and Outer Critics Circle for Best Play in 2004; and a Rockefeller grant.

Nottage's plays have been produced off-Broadway and regionally by the Acting Company, Center Stage, Intiman, Playwrights Horizons, Second Stage, Steppenwolf Theatre, Yale Repertory Theatre, and many others. Nottage was awarded playwriting fellowships from Manhattan Theatre Club, New Dramatists, and the New York Foundation for the Arts, where she is a member of their Artists Advisory Board. She received an NEA/TCG (National Endowment for the Arts/Theatre Communications Group, 1999–2000) grant for a residency at Freedom Theatre in Philadelphia. The TCG published an anthology of her plays, Crumbs from the Table of Joy and Other Plays, in summer 2004. She is a member of New Dramatists and a visiting lecturer in playwriting at Yale School of Drama.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Poof! (1993); Por'Knockers (1994); Crumbs from the Table of Joy (1995); Mud, River, Stone (1998); A Walk Through Time (2000);

Las Meninas (2001); Becoming American (2002); Snapshot (2002); Fabulation (2004); Intimate Apparel (2004)

FURTHER READING

Brown, Lenora Inez. "Dismantling the Box" (Lynn Nottage interview). American Theatre (July 2001).
 "POOF!: A Talk with the Playwright: Lynn Nottage." Kentucky Educational Television. <http://www.ket.org/content/americanshorts/poof/nottage.htm>.

Shanté T. Smalls

NOWRA, LOUIS (1950–)

Louis Nowra was born in Melbourne, Victoria, on December 9, 1950, and began his career as a playwright in 1973 with works including the one-act play Albert Names Edward (1977). It was Inner Voices (1977) that identified Nowra as a dramatist of promise and as part of a national theater revival, although he was not always critically embraced because of his preference for international and historical settings. Inner Voices is characteristic of much of his subsequent work. Nowra refers to it, in the preface to the first edition, as "a play which shows a mind under such intense pressure that knowledge and a vision of the world are warped into personal hell. It may be set in Russia; however, a more correct description would set it in the country of the mind."

Visions (1979) is located in Paraguay in the 1860s, and The Precious Woman (1981) is set in CHINA in the 1920s. They are both nonrealistic and epic in style, exploring, as his titles suggest, dream and interior worlds as well as the ethical and emotional conflicts of those in positions of power. Nowra's use of history, like BERTOLT BRECHT's, is never simply literal. "Just as history plays with us, I have played with history," he notes in the introduction to Visions.

With Inside the Island (1981) Nowra turned his attention to specifically Australian themes and settings but even here dislocates time through the use of arcane history and antiheroic perspectives. In the play, a matriarchal farming community in western New South Wales in 1912 is struck by an outbreak of "holy fire"—ergot poisoning from wheat. Nowra is skeptical of Australian mythologies of self-reliance and imperturbability. The Golden Age (1985) also confronts the conflicted, potentially catastrophic implications of the postcolonial legacy.

Nowra returned to the stage with Capricornia (1988), adapted from the novel by Xavier Herbert. The ambling picaresque form gave Nowra a looser style and marks a shift from a mannered, sometimes esoteric magic REALISM to a more vernacular voice. He moves to autobiographical themes for the first time with Summer of the Aliens (1992), set in his Melbourne childhood. Così (1992), also staged in the same year, reminisces on Nowra's university student days and sympathetically recounts a production of Così Fan Tutti performed by inmates of a mental institution.

Nowra's works offer strong roles for Indigenous actors; Crow (1994), set in wartime Darwin in 1942, describes an Aboriginal woman's fight to regain her title to a tin mine, and Radiance (1993) features three Aboriginal sisters reuniting for their mother's funeral. Like Così in 1992, Radiance enjoyed recognition and success as a film adaptation in 1996. Nowra's continuing interest in political dynasties and populist figures is evident in The Incorruptible (1995), based on recent Queensland politics, and The Temple (1993), a broad satire on a self-made entrepreneur.

Nowra has written prolifically for the stage, film, television, radio, and opera and more recently published memoir and non-fiction. His tenacity and originality place him at the forefront of Australian drama even if his unorthodoxy has sometimes muted his recognition.

[See also Australia]

PLAYS: Albert Names Edward (1977); Inner Voices (1977); Visions (1979); Inside the Island (1981); The Precious Woman (1981); The Golden Age (1985); Capricornia (1988); Così (1992); Summer of the Aliens (1992); Radiance (1993); The Temple (1993); Crow (1994); The Incorruptible (1995)

FURTHER READING

Gilbert, Helen. "Post-colonial Grotesques: Re-membering the Body in Louis Nowra's Visions and The Golden Age." SPAN 2, no. 36 (1993): 618–634.
 Kelly, Veronica, ed. Louis Nowra. Australian Playwrights Monograph Series. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1987.
 ———. The Theatre of Louis Nowra. Sydney: Currency, 1998.
 Nowra, Louis. "The Shrinking Vision." Island 39 (Winter 1989): 11–20.

Murray Bramwell

OBSERVE THE SONS OF ULSTER MARCHING TOWARDS THE SOMME

The Irish dramatist FRANK MCGUINNESS's plays are characterized by his imaginative engagement with different cultures and ideas. This trait is particularly evident in his third play, Observe the Sons of Ulster Marching Towards the Somme, which premiered at the Abbey Theatre in Dublin in 1985.

The play opens with a monologue from a bed-bound old man called Pyper, who asks why, years before, he and his comrades had sacrificed themselves in World War I. The audience is then brought back to 1915, to witness the younger Pyper's initiation into a battalion of eight Ulstermen, who are preparing to fight in France as part of the British army. They do so for many reasons. As Protestants loyal to the United Kingdom, they believe that by fighting in the war they will discourage the English government from awarding IRELAND its independence. It quickly becomes clear, however, that each man is also motivated by other, more private needs and desires.

The action then moves forward several months, to a period in which the eight men are on leave after action, all of them severely traumatized by their experience of war. The stage is divided into four playing areas, each occupied by a pair of the soldiers. This allows McGuinness to explore and celebrate different forms of relationships between men—including a homosexual relationship that has developed between Pyper and one of the other battalion members.

In the play's fourth and final act, the audience is brought to the trenches, to witness the men preparing for the Battle of the Somme—which only Pyper will survive. The play concludes just before the battle begins, which means that this is a war play in which no violence is ever represented onstage. In keeping with the title, the audience observes the eight soldiers marching toward the Somme as the curtain falls.

As a sympathetic portrayal of a group of protestant Ulstermen written by a Catholic playwright, Observe the Sons of Ulster is a remarkable exercise in empathy that crosses—and perhaps transcends—the traditional fault lines between Catholic and Protestant, and Nationalist and Unionist, in Ireland. The Battle of the Somme, at which thousands of Ulstermen died, is one of the foundational moments of the Northern Irish state. Representing that battle on the stage of the Abbey Theatre—the beginnings of which were one of the foundational moments of the Republic of Ireland—is a remarkably brave and generous gesture. The play was therefore understood during its 1985 premiere as a commentary on the Northern Irish Troubles. A 1994 Abbey revival, which coincided with the beginnings of the Northern Irish Peace Process, made that commentary even more explicit.

But the play's impact is universal. Its representation of the perseverance of relationships between the eight men is a powerful statement of humanity's ability to find love in a situation of catastrophic violence. This has led to the play being seen as one of the most powerful antiwar dramas in the modern tradition.

FURTHER READING

Jordan, Eamonn. The Feast of Famine: The Plays of Frank McGuinness.

Berne: P. Lang, 1997.

Lojek, Helen, ed. Stages of Mutabilitie. Dublin: Carysfort Press, 2002.

Patrick Lonergan

OCAMPO, MARÍA LUISA (1899–1972)

While María Luisa Ocampo was a talented journalist, novelist, poet, and short-story writer, she is most remembered for her prominent place in the history of Mexican theater. Born on November 24, 1899, to middle-class parents in Chilpancingo, Guerrero, MEXICO, Ocampo grew up during the Mexican Revolution (1910–1920). At age twenty-three she launched her dramatic career with the support of the prominent actress María Teresa Montoya with her successful debut of The Facts of Life (Cosas de la vida, 1923). However, Ocampo's role in the development of Mexican theater is not limited to playwriting. With money she made winning the lottery, she helped form the group La Comedia Mexicana, which operated from 1929 to 1936 with the express purpose of promoting plays by Mexican authors.

The Facts of Life delves into the construction of “woman” within a postrevolutionary Mexican culture that, despite some changes, is still very machista. The protagonist, Luisa, is denied access to socially acceptable womanhood and motherhood because of her poverty. Her boyfriend, Rafael, abandons her when she becomes pregnant because his elitist circle disapproves of Luisa. However, the protagonist courageously provides for herself and her child without a man's help. Instead of playing the conventional role of “dishonored woman,” Ocampo's heroine becomes a self-assured single mother. The later play The Corrido of Juan Saavedra (El Corrido de Juan Saavedra, 1929) mixed together folk songs, local legend, and the history of the Mexican Revolution and featured scenery painted by Diego Rivera. Toward the end of her life, Ocampo dedicated herself to library work. She died at the age of seventy-four on August 15, 1974.

SELECT PLAYS: The Facts of Life (Cosas de la vida, 1923); The Illusion (La quimera, 1923); The Bonfire (La hoguera, 1924); Life Is Crazy After All (Al cabo la vida está loca, 1925); Wingless (Sin alas, 1925); The Masks (Las máscaras, 1926); You May Leave (Puedes irte, 1926); Thirst in the Desert (Sed en el desierto, 1927); Beyond Men (Más allá de los hombres, 1929); The Corrido of Juan Saavedra (El corrido de Juan Saavedra, 1929); Castles in the Air (Castillos en el aire, 1931); The House in Ruins (La casa en ruinas, 1936); A Woman's Life (Una vida de una mujer, 1938); The Strong Virgin (La Virgen fuerte, 1950); Toward Another Day (Al otro día, 1955)

FURTHER READING

- Merlín, Socorro. María Luisa Ocampo: Mujer de teatro [María Luisa Campo: Theater woman]. Mexico, [D.F.]: Grupo Editorial Loma, 2000.
- Nigro, Kristen. "Theatre, Women, and Mexican Society: A Few Exemplary Cases." In Perspectives on Contemporary Spanish American Theatre, ed. by Frank Dauster. London: Associated Univ. Presses, 1996. 53–66.
- Schmidhuber, Guillermo. El teatro mexicano en ciernes: 1922–1938 [The Mexican theater in blossom: 1928–1938]. New York: P. Lang, 1992.

May Summer Farnsworth

O'CASEY, SEAN (1880–1964)

That's the Irish People all over—they treat a joke as a serious thing and a serious thing as a joke.

—Seumas Shields, Act 1, The Shadow of a Gunman

D'ye know, comrade, that more die o'consumption than are killed in th' wars? An' it's all because of th' system we're livin' undher?

—The Covey, Act 4, The Plough and the Stars

We can't give sight to the blind or make the lame walk. We would if we could. It is the misfortune of war. As long as wars are waged, we shall be vexed by woe; strong legs shall be made useless and bright eyes made dark.

—Susie Monican, Act 4, The Silver Tassie

Sean O'Casey was born John Casey at 85 Upper Dorset Street, Dublin, IRELAND, on March 30, 1880, the youngest of the five surviving children of Michael and Susan Casey, loyal Protestants and Unionists, that is, supporters of the union between Great Britain and Ireland. When Sean's father, a clerk with the Irish Church Mission, died prematurely in 1886, the family slowly descended into poverty, though always within a lower-middle-class environment. As Martin Margulies has shown in The Early Life of Sean O'Casey (1970), O'Casey was later to exaggerate the nature of his family's poverty. More immediately restricting was his eye condition, trachoma, which kept him out of school and limited his formal education to no more than three or four years. However, his sister Bella's being a grade school teacher, as well as the scholarly nature of his father, encouraged O'Casey toward self-education, and he became a wide reader of William Shakespeare, the Bible, and 19th-century drama. He also learned the Bible by heart at Sunday school, and the King James Bible was to be a lifelong influence on his writing style. When his brother Isaac pursued an interest in amateur theatricals, the young O'Casey was drawn toward drama at about age fifteen. Chief among his literary influences were Shakespeare's plays, which he read voraciously and could quote from liberally, and Victorian MELODRAMA, available in cheap editions, in particular the Irish plays of DIONYSIUS BOUCICAULT (1820–1890). He saw little professional theater and was almost forty before first attending the Abbey Theatre. He was always more attracted to popular forms of entertainment, including vaudeville and music hall.

Failing to hold down a job as junior clerk and probably unfit to join the army like two of his brothers (Mick and Tom), O'Casey became a manual worker on the Great Northern Railway in Dublin. He never rose higher than bricklayer's assistant, and in 1911 he lost his job on the railway for alleged incompetence. By this time he was a member of the Gaelic League and was known to fellow workers as "Irish Jack" for his fanatical love of the Irish language and Irish culture. The Gaelic League provided the college education O'Casey never had. He quickly brought himself to such proficiency in grammar that he taught classes in the league and wrote short, satirical pieces in Irish for the Gaelic League journal. He changed his name to the Irish version, Seán Ó Cathasaigh, and in 1910 joined and became secretary of the St. Laurence O'Toole's Pipe Band, where he learned to play the bagpipes and paraded in traditional costume. He was also a member of the Irish Republican Brotherhood (IRB), a secret organization dedicated to breaking the colonial domination of Ireland by ENGLAND. But offsetting this development into ardent nationalism came his interest in socialism. Under the influence of the charismatic trade union leader Jim Larkin (1876–1947), who led the Dublin workers into conflict with the employers in 1913, O'Casey's thinking began to change. He threw himself into various committees during the 1913 Dublin Lock-out, which lasted six months, and at the same time wrote articles for Larkin's Irish Worker. Reading GEORGE BERNARD SHAW's preface to JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND (1904) helped shift his commitment from nationalism to socialism, and he was later to say he was a communist all his life. Although he did, indeed, welcome the October Revolution in RUSSIA in 1917, O'Casey was never a member of the Communist Party, and his left-wing politics were always idiosyncratic and tinged with ROMANTICISM. Yet he retained some of his republican nationalism lifelong and never really resolved the conflict between his commitment to workers' rights and his love of Ireland.

His early writing, anthologized by Robert Hogan in Feathers from the Green Crow (1962), was mainly nationalist and polemical in theme and tone. Written for radical newspapers and journals, it called for a militant republican solution to the Ireland-England problem. In view of O'Casey's subsequent condemnation of war and violence, this early writing seems surprising but makes clear how from the outset his imagination was politicized. Around 1913, however, the tone of his writing shifted toward criticism of the bourgeois Volunteers and their narrow aims. In 1914 he became secretary of the Irish Citizen's Army, established by Larkin to protect workers, and although he resigned early on over a dispute with Countess Markiewicz, O'Casey wrote The Story of the Irish Citizen Army (1919) as a contribution to the history of events leading up to the 1916 Rising. He disagreed sharply with the aims of James Connolly, the socialist ideologue who assumed leadership of the Irish Citizen Army after Larkin immigrated to the UNITED STATES in October 1914. Connolly joined forces with Patrick Pearse, leader of the Irish Volunteers, to form the insurgents declaring an Irish Republic at the General Post Office in 1916. O'Casey saw this alliance as a betrayal of the working-class movement and believed the Rising was a tragic mistake. It was on this theme that THE PLOUGH AND THE STARS (1925) was to be based.

EARLY PLAYS

After 1916 O'Casey retreated into writing plays. From about 1912 he had been involved with Delia Larkin (1878–1949), Jim's sister, in the Liberty Hall Players, an amateur company dedicated to raising the morale of Dublin workers. He did not write for these Players but formed part of the audience and assisted backstage. He would have seen the work by A. P. Wilson written for the group, AGITATION-PROPAGANDA plays such as Victims, Poached, and The Slough, although the latter was staged at the Abbey Theatre, which O'Casey did not yet frequent. He submitted a one-act play to the Abbey in 1916, Profit and Loss, which was rejected, like the four plays that followed, including The Harvest Festival (1919). This three-act play, first published in 1980, and included in the Complete Plays (1984), gives a clear idea not only of O'Casey's early commitment to working-class drama but also of the distance he had to travel in order to achieve the status of accomplished Abbey playwright on which his fame largely rests. Recently, the one-act play, The Cooing of Doves (1923), which was never staged, has come to light. This rejected piece shows how O'Casey never wasted anything he wrote: it was recycled as act 2 of The Plough and the Stars.

His rapid progress in DRAMATURGY was aided by the advice offered by the Abbey directorate who were his readers, WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS, LENNOX ROBINSON, and above all, LADY AUGUSTA GREGORY. It was she who urged him to subordinate politics to characterization. O'Casey, as he now officially called himself, complied and had his first play accepted by the Abbey, THE SHADOW OF A GUNMAN (1922–1923). Its immediate success was followed by that of JUNO AND THE PAYCOCK (1924) and then by the last of the so-called Dublin Trilogy, The Plough and the Stars. The availability of a strong Abbey company, which included Sara Allgood, F. J. McCormick, and Barry Fitzgerald, had much to do with the phenomenal popularity of O'Casey's plays, which he tailored to the specific talents of the Abbey players. Because The Plough and the Stars inspected the 1916 rising in a subversive, demythologizing style, there was strong opposition from relatives and supporters (mainly women) of the republican "martyrs" who had died in the rising. On the fourth night, organized republicans rioted, and Yeats, as over J. M. SYNGE's PLAYBOY OF

THE WESTERN WORLD (1907), summoned the police into the theater to restore order. In a speech from the stage, Yeats rebuked the Dublin audience and assured them that, as with Synge, they had spread the fame of O'Casey worldwide through their attempts to suppress his art and had thereby rocked the "cradle of genius." O'Casey, shocked by the extent of the opposition, agreed to speak at a public lecture given by Hanna Sheehy-Skeffington, a feminist and widow of a pacifist killed during the 1916 rising. In this debate O'Casey came off second-best and soon after left Dublin for London. Although he later asserted that his exile from Ireland stemmed from the hostile reception of The Plough, it is clear that his reason for leaving was an invitation to oversee the transfer of the London production of Juno from one theater to another. Once in London, although he retained lease of his room in Dublin where all three of his plays had been written (at 422 North Circular Road), having fallen in love with actress Eileen Carey Reynolds, he married in 1927 and settled there.

The story of O'Casey's life and work really divides here. When his next play, the antiwar THE SILVER TASSIE (1927–1928) was rejected by the Abbey Theatre, the ensuing controversy he fomented opened up such a rift that it became impossible for him ever to contemplate returning to live in Ireland. The root of this controversy lay in Yeats's dislike of war poetry and drama about passive suffering, as he called it, and in Yeats's lack of sympathy with the new, experimental drama ushered in by EUGENE O'NEILL and the German expressionists. Act 2 of The Tassie was in the expressionist style and was therefore a major departure from the NATURALISM endemic at the Abbey. To Yeats, O'Casey had lost his way and had written about a subject, the 1914–1918 war, of which he had no experience. To O'Casey this was merely an attempt to curtail the freedom of the artist's imagination. Shaw sided with O'Casey, whom he had befriended, but the bitterness of the dispute badly soured the insecure O'Casey and created enmity not only between him and Yeats but also and more painfully with Lady Gregory, who made unavailing attempts at a reconciliation before her death in 1932.

TURN TO LITERARY PLAYS

O'Casey was now without a living theater for which to write. From this point on his plays became literary in style rather than primarily theatrical. Indeed, they were usually published (by his lifelong publishers Macmillan) before production, a factor that inhibited the kind of alterations usual in the collaborative process of theater production. O'Casey became obsessively protective of his texts, usually refusing directors permission to make changes even where cuts and improvements were sensibly suggested. This stubbornness, while principled, tended to maintain O'Casey in the realm of lonely experimenter. He now had a strong dislike for REALISM, dominant in London's West End, and in his public comments and theater criticism, notably in his The Flying Wasp (1937), singled out as his two main targets the playwright NOËL COWARD and the drama critic James Agate. These he blamed for creating a public taste hostile to the more experimental work he himself approved. But by such personal attacks O'Casey alienated himself from the theater of his time.

After the production in London of The Silver Tassie in 1929, which was a critical but not a financial success, O'Casey spent several difficult years. In 1934 he published Windfalls, a collection of poetry, short stories, and two short plays, The End of the Beginning (1931–1932) and A Pound on Demand (1932). These plays were light FARCES, which he hoped might make a little money on actor-managers' tours. They were favorably reviewed in 1934 by SAMUEL BECKETT, who saw in them the nucleus of O'Casey's tragicomic art, the representation onstage of "chassis" or disorder, through knockabout farce. It can be said that Beckett's own tragicomic WAITING FOR GODOT (1948–1949) showed the influence of O'Casey in this regard, a point David Krause makes in Sean O'Casey: The Man and His Work (1975). In 1934 Within the Gates (1931–1933), an expressionist play in four acts set in London's Hyde Park, proved too ambitious at the Everyman Theatre and did little better in a new production in New York later that year. Invited out to attend rehearsals, O'Casey made many friends in New York, including the drama critic George Jean Nathan, whose work he greatly admired and who became an important mentor, and Eugene O'Neill, whose MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA (1928–1930) O'Casey particularly admired. This was to be O'Casey's only visit to America, but its effects were lasting. He loved New York and its people and would have been content, had circumstances allowed, to move there. But his trip was somewhat soured when Within the Gates was banned in Boston as a result of Roman Catholic opposition, and its tour had to be canceled.

Toward the end of 1938 the O'Casey family, comprising Eileen and two sons, Breon and Niall, moved from London to Devon, where Shivaun, the last addition to the family, was born in 1939. The motive for this move, partly financial, was mainly so that the children could attend the progressive private school at Dartington Hall. At first, it was thought O'Casey might have a role as playwright-in-association with the Theatre Studio operated at Dartington by Michael Chekhov, nephew of the famous Russian writer, but this plan came to nothing.

As World War II broke out, O'Casey's fortunes were precarious, and he turned to writing his autobiography in a colorful, popular style. Like most of his work, the autobiography, which eventually grew to six volumes, was closely tied to Irish history, for O'Casey saw himself always against the background of those movements that shaped the new Irish State in its genesis. I Knock at the Door (published in 1939) and the three volumes that followed took O'Casey's story up to the time he left Ireland, lately arrived at independence. Two more volumes, dealing with his life and career in England, though less interesting, brought the story up to 1954. The autobiographies proved to be bestsellers in the United States and no doubt saved the O'Caseys from penury. Their dramatic qualities, as the hero moves through the streets of Dublin encountering the great personalities of the day and participating in the cultural movements inaugurated by many of them, became obvious to reviewers, and in due course the early books began to be adapted for the stage.

This development took place mainly in New York, where the themes of the autobiographies appealed to a population for whom O'Casey's overcoming of social and physical handicaps and his realization of his talents in defiance of class restrictions were peculiarly meaningful. These adaptations, by Paul Shyre, followed the two-volume edition of the autobiographies titled Mirror in My House (1956). They were more palatable to Cold War audiences than several of the politically informed plays O'Casey wrote in Devon, such as The Star Turns Red (1938), an extolling of communism in a text refused publication by Macmillan Ltd., New York (which usually accepted the O'Casey title published by Macmillan London). There is observable in the reception of O'Casey in America in the 1940s and 1950s (a topic yet to be fully explored) a stark contrast between the admiration showered on the democratically informed autobiographies, with their humanistic basis in individual growth, and the hostility shown toward the communist-inspired plays, with their fearless opposition towards Roman Catholicism. This is not to say that the later plays were communist tracts; rather, it is to emphasize how O'Casey's later work divides into the combative, subversive plays, on the one hand, and the genial, if sharply satirical, autobiographies on the other. This division points to a similar split in O'Casey himself between the left-wing intellectual and the popular entertainer.

In England from 1939, this division was less in evidence. For one thing, the autobiographies, although critically admired for the most part (always with some reservations over the style and its Joycean qualities), meant less to a society so secure in its class structures than they did in America. For another, there was in England a persistent interest in poetic drama, aggravated by a sense of guilt over continuing failure to restore it to the popular stage. O'Casey was perceived as a poetic dramatist within the framework of the attempt made by T. S. ELIOT, W. H. AUDEN, and CHRISTOPHER FRY. Thus the fate of Within the Gates was lamented, while reviews of the COMEDY Purple Dust (1939–1940) and the autobiographical Red Roses for Me (1942) usually paid fulsome tribute to the increasing lyricism of O'Casey's dialogue. The London production of Red Roses in 1946 proved a rare exception, winning much acclaim, as it did also in New York in 1955–1956. In New York Purple Dust had a yearlong run at the Cherry Lane in 1956–1957, though Cock-a-doodle Dandy (1948), O'Casey's own favorite, in which fantasy and satire are equally mixed, failed in 1958. When his play about World War II Oak Leaves and Lavender (1944) was staged in London in 1947, there was a clear indication that somehow he had missed the historical moment, and this production was a major flop. It seemed that O'Casey, the estranged Irishman living in England's puritanical society, had little to say to English audiences. George Orwell, a hostile witness, reviewing the third volume of the autobiographies, Drums Under the Windows (1945), accused O'Casey of living in England under false colors, but the reviewer of the Collected Plays in the Times Literary Supplement in 1951 got nearer the mark by accusing O'Casey of poor "judgment." By this he probably meant O'Casey's tactless indifference to the expectations of English audiences, although O'Casey took the criticism as a rebuke to his left-wing politics. Either way, from today's perspective, this kind of criticism suggests the AVANT-GARDE nature of O'Casey's later work. In its SYMBOLISM, use of fantasy, and use of absurdity, he was ahead of his time and closer to Beckett than to any British playwright, including JOHN OSBORNE, with whom he began to be compared after 1956. It is no surprise, perhaps, that Cock-a-doodle Dandy finally had its English professional premiere at London's Royal Court Theatre, where Osborne had inaugurated a revolution in modern drama. At last, in 1959, it appeared, O'Casey could be seen as part of a general theater of revolt.

RETURN TO IRISH THEATER

In Ireland, meantime, O'Casey was mainly seen as a bête noire. Windfalls and the early volumes of the autobiography were banned by the Irish Censorship Board. Reviews in Dublin of subsequent volumes and of the later plays in publications were usually carping, shocked, and ungenerous. The consensus seemed to be that O'Casey had gone sadly astray since leaving the precincts of Dublin, where his art had its roots. The call, none too enthusiastic, was for him to return and renew the wellsprings of lost inspiration. His communism, so flagrantly on parade in the later volumes of autobiography, was much deplored. In 1935 O'Casey was reconciled with Yeats, who then agreed to stage The Silver Tassie at the Abbey. There was a storm of opposition to its alleged blasphemous features, and as the Free State under Eamon de Valera became increasingly subservient to the Roman Catholic Church, O'Casey's work became increasingly unacceptable. When Red Roses for Me had its premiere in Dublin in 1943, the first O'Casey premiere since The Plough and the Stars, the Dublin critics saw it as a great falling-off from his early drama. They insisted on measuring his achievements by the standards of realism he had long neglected. In that context it was brave to the point of foolhardiness on the part of the actor April Cusack to ask O'Casey for The Bishop's Bonfire (1954). With Tyrone Guthrie as director, Cusack's own company staged it at the Gaiety Theatre, Dublin, in February 1955. O'Casey declined an invitation to attend; a riot was expected, but in the end the play—another comedy satirical of Ireland's regressive society—was quietly if unenthusiastically received.

The newly established Dublin Theatre Festival then bravely asked O'Casey for his latest play The Drums of Father Ned (1957), a gentle comedy of Irish life filtered through memories of the Anglo-Irish War in 1920. Immediately, a controversy arose when the archbishop of Dublin refused to allow the usual solemn votive Mass to inaugurate the festival because of O'Casey's and, indirectly through an adaptation of Ulysses, James Joyce's involvement. This was in effect censorship through clerical authoritarianism. As disappointed as he was angry, O'Casey withdrew his play, and following the controversy unleashed, the festival was canceled for 1958. He promptly banned all professional productions of his plays in Ireland, a ban that stood until 1964. O'Casey now felt vindicated in all of his bitterness against Church-dominated Ireland and ended his career as playwright with two further mocking condemnations, Behind the Green Curtains (1958–1960) and Figuro in the Night (1960). Underlying much of this later work was a glorification of sex, which was one more reason for the puritanical society of the 1950s to find fault with O'Casey.

In the last year of O'Casey's life the American director John Ford visited Dublin to film Young Cassidy, based on two of the best books of the autobiography, Drums Under the Windows (1945) and Inishfallen Fare Thee Well (1949). The script was by British playwright John Whiting and the producers were two American enthusiasts, Robert Emmett Ginna and Robert D. Graff. Sean Connery was cast as Johnnie Cassidy, the character based on O'Casey himself, but when Connery was committed to Goldfinger (1964), the role went to Rod Taylor, with other parts going to Maggie Smith and Julie Christie. Released in February 1965 the film, directed more by Jack Cardiff than by Ford, although it simplifies complex areas of O'Casey's life, stands as an interesting if glamorized treatment from a Hollywood perspective.

On the personal level, O'Casey's last years were blighted by the death of his son Niall from leukemia in December 1956, at age twenty-one. O'Casey poured out his grief in a weekly diary spanning four years, published long after his death as Niall: A Lament (1991). A collection of stories, essays, and reminiscences, Under a Colored Cap appeared in 1962. For decades O'Casey had also been an assiduous letter writer, not only about his work but to ordinary people the world over who consulted him as a sage, and four volumes, edited by his first biographer David Krause, were published between 1975 and 1992. The letters add much information on O'Casey's plays and life. In his later years O'Casey's health deteriorated, as chronic bronchitis and constantly failing eyesight made him virtually a recluse. He died from heart failure in Torbay Hospital, Torquay, Devon, on September 18, 1964, at age eighty-four. After his body was cremated in Torquay, his ashes were scattered at Golder's Green, London.

Assessed some forty years after his death, O'Casey's status as playwright depends mainly on the three early Dublin plays. This is ironic in view of O'Casey's determination to move away from realism and in view of his own belief that his later work was superior. Whereas revivals of the later work, especially of The Silver Tassie, still occasionally take place, it is, perhaps sadly, the case that only The Shadow of a Gunman, Juno and the Paycock, and The Plough and the Stars stand today to represent the O'Casey canon. Yet the frequency of revivals in the United States, Britain, and GERMANY (especially before the fall of the Berlin Wall), as well as in Ireland (where the three plays are more often staged than any other play at the Abbey), makes it possible to claim that O'Casey, in spite of his checkered career, is perhaps the greatest Irish playwright of the 20th century. His influence, as a writer whose work favored the tragicomic form, vivid characterization, colorful language, and a state-of-the-nation theme, is to be seen in much Irish drama, from Denis Johnston to BRIAN FRIEL and Beckett. His influence on world drama is another matter. In some respects the work of BERTOLT BRECHT has, through its greater sophistication, had more lasting impact on writers and directors. Nevertheless, it is possible to trace O'Casey's influence on urban tragedy and TRAGICOMEDY from CLIFFORD ODETS to ARTHUR MILLER, and from ARNOLD WESKER to JOHN ARDEN and EDWARD BOND, all of whom have acknowledged admiration and indebtedness.

PLAYS: The Harvest Festival (1919); The Shadow of a Gunman (1922–1923); The Cooing of Doves (1923); Juno and the Paycock (1924); Kathleen Listens In (1924); Nannie's Night Out (1924–1925); The Plough and the Stars (1925); The Silver Tassie (1927–1928); The End of the Beginning (1931–1932); Within the Gates (1931–1933); A Pound on Demand (1932); The Star Turns Red (1938); Purple Dust (1939–1940); Red Roses for Me (1942); Oak Leaves and Lavender (1944); Cock-a-doodle Dandy (1948); Hall of Healing (1949); Bedtime Story (1950); Time to Go (1950); The Bishop's Bonfire (1954); The Drums of Father Ned (1957); Figuro in the Night (1960); Behind the Green Curtains (1958–1960); The Moon Shines on Kilenamoe (1960)

FURTHER READING

- Harris, Peter James. Sean O'Casey's Letters and Autobiographies: Reflections of a Radical Ambivalence. Trier: Wissenschaftlicher Verlag Trier, 2004.
- Kenneally, Michael. Portraying the Self: Sean O'Casey and the Art of Autobiography. Gerrards Cross, Bucks: C. Smythe; Totowa, N.J.: Barnes and Noble Bks., 1988.
- Kosok, Heinz. O'Casey the Dramatist. Tr. by Heinz Kosok and Joseph T. Swann. Gerrards Cross, Bucks: Colin Smythe; Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1985.
- Krause, David. Sean O'Casey and His World. London: Thames & Hudson, 1975.
- Murray, Christopher. Sean O'Casey: Writer at Work: A Biography. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 2004.
- Schrank, Bernice. Sean O'Casey: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Christopher Murray

THE OCCUPATION OF HEATHER ROSE

The Occupation of Heather Rose (1986), WENDY LILL's third play, is a complex work examining the underside of the ostensibly altruistic, as a "white" nurse who means to help the natives of CANADA's north struggles with her continued assumptions of superiority. Heather Rose, a young nurse who goes to work with native peoples at the Snake Lake Reservation, sees herself as an altruistic and dedicated healer. The play is narrated in one long flashback: Heather, returned to southern Ontario, waits for her mentor, Miss Jackson, in order to complain to her about how badly her stint up north has gone.

Heather Rose reveals how the natives fail to welcome her with the open arms she expects. For all her conscious desire to help these people, her redemptive sense of her own mission gives her a kind of messianic arrogance that crumples in the face of the recalcitrance of those whom she purports to help. While talking to the chief of the peoples who live in Snake Lake, Heather Rose screens out the historical factors affecting the present-day condition of the people for whom she is supposed to care. She sees them only in an immediate social context, using cheery, motivational language to try to uplift and energize them. This might work in a suburban white community where the self-image of the people would reflect Heather Rose's. But, as Heather discovers, the Snake Lake people have been so damaged by generations of mistreatment and relegation her optimistic harangues cannot possibly produce their intended effect. Importantly, Heather Rose is not a one-dimensional monster; instead, she is someone who has mistakenly accepted at face value her own privileged assumptions. Her inexperience is one of the factors that causes her to lose her sanity when she comes to understand that she is an intruder, not a source of comfort. This sense of intrusion plays on the double entendre of the "occupation" of the play's title, referring both to Heather Rose's career and to the control of native lands by whites. This double meaning sets the tone for the scrutiny the play casts on customary assumptions of white liberal benevolence.

Much like Lill herself (who spent time as a consultant to the Canadian Mental Health Association among the native communities of northern Ontario), Heather Rose grapples with how to effect change in communities other than one's own. The play, if not a literal self-critique, is certainly highly complex and self-conscious. While the play's focus is on a particular and localized incident, its feminist and political concerns extend more broadly to other communities wrestling with issues of difference, privilege, and multivalent occupations. The Occupation of Heather Rose was a finalist for the 1987 Governor-General's Award. In the years since then it has generated considerable academic discussion and many theatrical productions, including several in Canada starring Melanie Miller and one in New York featuring Susan Heafner.

FURTHER READING

- Petropoulos, Jacqueline. "Language and Racism: Wendy Lill's The Occupation of Heather Rose." Canadian Theatre Review 114 (Spring 2003): 38–41.

Nicholas Birns

THE ODD COUPLE

There's something wrong with this system. . . . I don't think that two single men living alone in a big eight-room apartment should have a cleaner house than my mother.

—Oscar, Act 2

The Odd Couple (1965), NEIL SIMON's third play, has, in its various incarnations, proven to be one of the most successful COMEDIES in the history of the American theater. Based in part on his observations of his own brother and another divorced man trying to live as roommates, the play offered a new twist on Simon's already established style of farcical domestic comedy driven by expertly placed one-liners. Here, instead of newlyweds (as in Barefoot in the Park) or a parental family unit (Come Blow Your Horn), two middle-aged bachelors end up in a de facto marriage, eventually alienating each other just as they had their former wives.

The action transpires in the New York apartment of sports-writer Oscar Madison who, in the absence of his wife, has visibly degenerated into a slovenly mess. At the opening curtain, he is hosting his usual poker game among friends. One of them, the fussy Felix Ungar, shows up late and suicidal—he, too, has been rejected by his wife, who could no longer put up with his many neuroses. To pacify the dejected Felix, Oscar offers to take him in. Act 2 opens with a brilliant Simon comic tableau—the same apartment, the same poker game, but spotlessly clean and sanitized. Felix has taken over, bringing sterile order to Oscar's locker-room world and taking away much of the fun. In repeating their patterns from their failed marriages, they quickly become a bickering old couple. When Oscar tries to liven things up by arranging a double date with their British neighbors, the Pigeon sisters, Felix's morbid pining for his wife ruins the plans, but he wins the women over anyway with his sensitivity. In act 3 all-out war is declared, as Oscar kicks Felix out and reverts to his old lifestyle. When Felix reappears, it is in the arms of his new roommates, the Pigeon sisters.

After a nerve-wracking out-of-town tryout period (marked by Simon's customarily extensive third-act rewrites), The Odd Couple was received with sensational reviews and blockbuster ticket sales on Broadway. The production, directed by Mike Nichols and starring Art Carney and Walter Matthau (for whom Simon wrote the role of Oscar), ran 966 performances. A very successful 1967 film version featured Matthau and Jack Lemmon in Simon's faithful screenplay adaptation. The movie soon led to an television series spin-off, which ran for five seasons (1970–1975) and for decades longer in syndication. For many across the UNITED STATES and the world, the famous roommates will always be personified by the television actors Jack Klugman and Tony Randall, who continued playing the roles for over twenty years in “reunion” episodes, on television commercials, and in stage revivals.

Even Simon himself was not able to leave the play alone. In addition to an all-female version in 1985, he wrote no less than two sequels—the play Oscar and Felix, which previewed in Los Angeles in 2002, and the film The Odd Couple II (1998), reuniting an aging Lemmon and Matthau in their beloved roles from thirty years earlier.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

Bloom, Harold, ed. Neil Simon. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.

Konas, Gary, ed. Neil Simon: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1997.

Koprince, Susan Fehrenbacher. Understanding Neil Simon. Columbia: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Simon, Neil. Rewrites: A Memoir. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Garrett Eisler

ODETS, CLIFFORD (1906–1963)

Clifford Odets was born on July 16, 1906, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; his father was a reasonably successful businessman in printing and advertising, and the family apparently lived an unremarkable middle-class life. Not particularly accomplished in his class work, at seventeen Clifford dropped out of high school, although he had actively participated in dramatic activities and joined the school's literary club. After doing some radio work and acting in the 1920s, he joined THE GROUP THEATRE, appearing in its initial production, PAUL GREEN's The House of Connelly (1931), and in SIDNEY KINGSLEY's Pulitzer Prize-winning MEN IN WHITE in 1933.

In 1934 Odets joined the Communist Party, where, by his own admission, he stayed for only a few months. Not surprisingly, his early plays were left wing in their adherence to the Party line. The first, WAITING FOR LEFTY, appeared on Broadway in March 1935 paired with his second play, Till the Day I Die, a heavily propagandistic portrayal of a communist cell in GERMANY fighting the Nazis. Poorly written with stereotyped good and bad guys, it was a minor effort.

Lefty's simple stage setting of a row of plain wooden chairs on a bare stage creates the appearance of a union hiring hall, while actors onstage and planted in the auditorium further the audience illusion of attending an actual union meeting. The conditions of the deepening Depression in a society going increasingly awry, causing the assembled taxi drivers to consider a strike, are portrayed by spotlighted vignettes performed in the center of the semicircle of chairs, the most socially significant of which involves the advice given to an actor seeking work that he should read the Communist Manifesto or, better yet, go to Russia, where all are equal and everybody calls you comrade. Then, when a messenger rushes in from the audience to announce that the long-awaited leader, Lefty, has been murdered, those onstage and in the audience erupt shouting “Strike! Strike!” as everybody seems ready to rush into the street and man the barricades. Waiting for Lefty firmly established Odets as an important writer and a major contributor to the Group Theatre's dramatic PHILOSOPHY and liberal social outlook, remaining even now the most literate, and most effective, of the Depression-era AGITATION-PROPAGANDA (agit-prop) plays.

In AWAKE AND SING! Odets's creation of the Berger family and its struggle against the Depression fit perfectly into the Group's preference for the ensemble style of acting. It also earned him the reputation, not always accurately, as the American ANTON CHEKHOV. In the collective manner of the Russian playwright, there is no leading role, with each character of equal importance, and with virtually no "plot" as such, leading to an emotional climax. Each person's inner struggle is constantly evident, with dialogue preeminent over action. What develops throughout the play, told in Odets's mastery of the Bronx Jewish idiom and his consciously underwritten style, is a keen awareness of each character's inward frustrations in the midst of the debilitating Great Depression, while simultaneously gaining sympathy for and understanding of each individual's predicament.

The conclusion clings to the Group's optimistic philosophy, as young Ralph in the long closing scene proclaims a better future if we can all just "awake and sing" as the prophet Isaiah affirms. The finale may not be entirely convincing, but it does its best to lift things up toward something brighter ahead. Despite Odets's personal beliefs, the communist view is restricted to the old grandfather, who is mostly ignored by the others.

Where Awake and Sing! succeeded as one of Odets's best plays, the next one did not. Paradise Lost, which appeared in December 1935, concerns a once comfortably prosperous family, the Gordons, faced with eviction as the business of Leo Gordon has collapsed in the midst of the Depression because of a partner's embezzlement. The action retains Odets's ensemble style as the family faces and discusses at length their many problems. Meanwhile, the Depression continues to crush down.

The Far Left communist view is limited to a single minor character, but the play remains socially oriented. It concludes, however, with a totally unbelievable closing speech by Leo as he stands with his adoring wife and proclaims the optimism of a better future in which no man will stand alone. The result is a curtain tableau reminiscent of a 19th-century MELODRAMA, and it simply does not work.

In the summer of 1935 Odets went to CUBA on behalf of the American Committee to Investigate Labor and Social Conditions, a rather pointless gesture that gained very little for anybody. Then, disappointed with the failure of Paradise Lost, he left the New York scene and fled to what he hoped were better things in Hollywood. Although he received credit as writer or director on seven films, only one, The General Dies at Dawn in 1936, was of any consequence. Never fitting into the Hollywood scene, Odets returned to New York after only eleven months. In the meantime, however, he had met and married the glamorous Academy Award winner Luise Rainer in 1937 (they divorced in 1940).

Odets's return to Broadway was marked by the Group's successful production of GOLDEN BOY, which opened in November 1937. Now more of a social liberal than a revolutionary, he was still deeply concerned about a society willing to reward brute strength and guile at the expense of honor, decency, or artistic talent. Joe Bonaparte—a talented violinist in a society that cannot support his artistry—is seduced by and succumbs to the sleazy world of professional boxing and its large and instant rewards.

Joe's talents as a skillful boxer rather than a slugging fighter quickly carry him to success, but he clearly does not belong in the fight ring, and he hates himself for being there. When his inward rage turns him, literally, into a killer, he finally destroys himself as well. The end result is not the final-curtain optimism Odets had earlier displayed, as he sends Joe and his girl to their deaths in a speeding car, which society has now permitted him to buy. His broken hands and broken spirit deny him the ability ever to realize his genuine artistic talents, permanently taken from him by a totally insensitive society.

Rocket to the Moon (November 1938) is concerned less with social problems and more with romantic involvement. The Depression is still very much apparent in that Ben Stark cannot afford to buy an air conditioner for his sweltering dentist's office, and his young assistant, Cleo, cannot afford stockings. But all this remains incidental. What matters is Ben's obvious unhappiness in a mostly loveless marriage, driving him inevitably toward Cleo's physical attractions. The brief rocket ride to the moon of their sorry little affair only heightens their mutual loneliness, and Ben realizes that he and his equally frustrated wife must remain together. Once again the optimistic, upbeat conclusion is entirely lacking. The play has an often pathetic intimacy about it, prompting a considerable amount of sympathy for its characters, based almost wholly on personalities and almost not at all on the surrounding social ills.

Odets's next three plays did little to maintain his popular reputation. Night Music (1940), Clash by Night (1941), and an adaptation called The Russian People (1942) can all be safely ignored in the Odets canon. Again, he abandoned New York for Hollywood in 1943, where he remained for the better part of five years.

In 1944 Odets wrote and directed None But the Lonely Heart, a sordid story of life in the slums starring Cary Grant. Deadline at Dawn (1946), a murder mystery, was followed in 1947 by Humoresque, a tearjerker about a tough violinist (shades of Joe Bonaparte) trying to make a living in the Depression, featuring Joan Crawford and John Garfield. Meanwhile, in 1943 Odets married the actress Bette Grayson, with whom he had two children; they divorced in 1951.

By 1948 Odets had returned to New York, and his next play, The Big Knife, opened in February 1949. It was designed to poke fun at Hollywood, but its semiautobiographical outlook prompted one critic to call him a "champ sorehead." However, he regained his reputation in November 1950 with the opening of The Country Girl.

All semblance of social comment and protest is left behind in this story of the alcoholic down-and-out actor whose manager and wife work together to bring him back to the stage. It is a fine character study as the self-pitying Frank Elgin, blaming his wife (who defines herself as a simple country girl and who has not infrequently left him in the past) for all his ills, is eventually straightened out and returns in triumph.

The Flowering Peach in December 1954 was Odets's last play. This seriocomic treatment of Noah and the Flood was the only Odets play to be considered for a Pulitzer Prize. This time the antagonist is not society but a demanding and vengeful God who has tapped a seedy reluctant Noah to take on his task of punishing the world. It is a remarkable combination of a serious attempt to discuss man's relationship with his god, at the same time appearing as a kind of clown play replete with Jewish family jokes.

In 1955 Odets left again for Hollywood, and for the last eight years of his life he contributed nothing more to the stage. A screenplay, Joseph and His Brethren, was scrapped, but his name did appear in the credits for Sweet Smell of Success in 1957 about an ambitious businessman and a powerful columnist. He wrote and directed The Story on Page One in 1960, but its story of love and murder and social comment was considered dull and "soapy." His last movie, Wild in the Country (1961), with Elvis Presley, brought him little further recognition.

In 1961 Odets was given the Award of Merit for Drama from the American Academy of Arts and Letters. On June 23, 1963, he entered the hospital for ulcer surgery, but on August 14 he died of cancer. He was fifty-seven years old.

A brief note should be made of Odets's appearances on April 24 and May 19–29, 1952, before the House Un-American Activities Committee in its search for communist influences in Hollywood. He freely admitted his early membership in the Communist Party in an almost ritualistic confession. He was never blacklisted and continued his work uninterrupted, saying, "I am against war. I am against Fascism. I am for a third party."

[See also United States, 1929–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: Awake and Sing! (1935); Paradise Lost (1935); Till the Day I Die (1935); Waiting for Lefty (1935); Golden Boy (1937); Rocket to the Moon (1938); Night Music (1940); Clash by Night (1941); The Russian People (1942); The Big Knife (1949); The Country Girl (1950); The Flowering Peach (1954)

FURTHER READING

Brennan-Gibson, Margaret. Clifford Odets, Playwright: The Years from 1906 to 1940. New York: Atheneum Pubs., 1981.

Cantor, Harold. Clifford Odets: Playwright-Poet. Methuen, N.J.:

Scarecrow, 1978.

Mendelsohn, Michael. Clifford Odets, Humane Dramatist. DeLand, Fla.: Everett-Edwards, 1969.

Murray, Edward. Clifford Odets: The Thirties and After. New York: Ungar, 1968.

Shuman, Robert B. Clifford Odets. New York: Twayne, 1962.

Weales, Gerald. Clifford Odets, Playwright. New York: Pegasus, 1971.

Jordan Miller

OFF- AND OFF-OFF-BROADWAY

After World War II, as television, radio, and film continued their ascendancy over live theater, Broadway successes increasingly tended to be spectacular musicals and conventional dramas. By the end of the century, ARTHUR MILLER would tell Cuban acting students that Broadway had been captured almost exclusively by musicals and pure entertainment and that the few straight plays were limited runs for stars. The situation Miller describes was already well under way in the 1950s and led first to the development of off-Broadway theater, then, a decade later, to the creation of off-off-Broadway.

OFF-BROADWAY THEATER

Off-Broadway began in the early 1950s as a gathering of "New York professional groups actively engaged in theatrical production in places exclusive of the theaters in the Times Square area" (Cordell and Matson, 1959). In 1950 a group of actors leased a defunct cabaret in Greenwich Village, named it Circle in the Square, and produced an in-the-round revival of a semisuccessful Broadway drama Dark of the Moon. Circle in the Square continued through the decade, remounting plays by TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, JEAN GIRAUDOUX, John Steinbeck, Truman Capote, FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA, and ARTHUR SCHNITZLER, which had failed to find Broadway audiences. They were joined in 1952 by the Theatre de Lys (also in Greenwich Village), which mounted a popular 1954 production of the BERTOLT BRECHT–Kurt Weill THE THREEPENNY OPERA; and soon off-Broadway grew to include the Cherry Lane Theatre, the Actors' Playhouse, the Renata Theatre, the Downtown Theatre, the Fourth Street Playhouse, the St. Mark's Playhouse, Greenwich Mews, the Phoenix Theatre, and the venerable Provincetown Playhouse (a holdover from the Little Theater Movement). In 1967 Joseph Papp founded the New York Shakespeare Festival Public Theater to add further institutional solidity to the off-Broadway movement, and that same year Douglas Turner Ward, Robert Hooks, and Gerald Krone started the Negro Ensemble Company to offer an off-Broadway venue for African American plays. Another significant contribution to the development of off-Broadway theater was the 1974 creation of "Theatre Row" on 42nd Street between Ninth and Tenth Avenues. This became a neighborhood of small, nonprofit theaters including Playwrights Horizons, Intar (featuring works by Latino and Latina playwrights); the Acting Company, and the Harold Clurman, SAMUEL BECKETT, and Judith Anderson theaters.

Early off-Broadway dramas typically challenged the conventional fare of Broadway theater, not only by rediscovering artistically worthy Broadway failures but by functioning as a kind of repertory theater for classic European and American dramas (including plays by ANTON CHEKHOV, GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, T. S. ELIOT, William Shakespeare, EUGENE O'NEILL, and SEAN O'CASEY). In addition, off-Broadway offered venues for the emerging Theater of the Absurd: not only its European playwrights—Beckett, EUGÈNE IONESCO, LUIGI PIRANDELLO, and JEAN GENET—but also their American brethren—EDWARD ALBEE, ISRAEL HOROVITZ, and SAM SHEPARD, who would emerge as some of the most influential American playwrights of the 20th century.

From the 1950s onward, off-Broadway drama played an increasingly important role in New York theater. For example, while 1960 was a "disastrous" year for Broadway, according to Daniel Blum (1977), it found off-Broadway "more active than ever," with such productions as Albee's ZOO STORY, a revival of HENRIK IBSEN's HEDDA GABLER, and the premiere of an off-Broadway classic, Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt's The Fantasticks. Off-Broadway productions soon began to receive Drama Critics' Circle Awards (a 1963 citation for Circle in the Square's The Trojan Women), and its alternative theaters were also the site of the first salvos of the black theater movement, such as AMIRI BARAKA's DUTCHMAN (1964), as well as ADRIENNE KENNEDY's Funnyhouse of a Negro (1964). By 1967, in Blum's opinion, audiences had discovered that the "high-caliber productions . . . flourishing Off-Broadway" were "more exciting fare than Broadway offered"; and by the turn of the 21st century, off-Broadway had established itself as the U.S. center for serious live drama.

OFF-OFF-BROADWAY

While off-Broadway theater started in the early 1950s as an alternative to Broadway theater, in the 1960s off-off-Broadway began to produce even more radical alternatives to mainstream drama. In 1966 Village Voice critic Michael Smith defined off-off-Broadway not simply as a new wrinkle in playwriting but as "a novel form of theater":

It is amateur theater done largely by professionals. It is theater with no resources but the most sophisticated audience in America. It is both casual community theater and dedicated experimental theater. It is proposing an alternative to an established theater which hardly knows it exists. (Orzel and Smith, 1966)

While off-Broadway theater was a way of producing dramas that could not find a Broadway home because of the changing economics and aesthetics of commercial theater, off-off-Broadway productions were a collective challenge to accepted definitions of theater in general.

Theater historian Arthur Sainer (1997) saw this fundamentally different viewpoint at play in the superrealistic stage presence of the LIVING THEATRE actors who played junkies in JACK GELBER's The Connection (1959). Noting that critic Kenneth Tynan felt the characters of the play "are beyond the reach of drama, as we commonly define the word," Sainer wrote that the apparent passivity of the actors playing heroin addicts was "not passivity at all but an absence of drama," which had to do "not with character being made but with performers ceasing to make performances." According to Sainer, the most notable and ultimately influential element of The Connection was a shift of focus away from the "presence of character," which had been carefully cultivated in American drama, and especially since the advent of KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY-style techniques, and to the "presence of performer." To Sainer's eyes, "some essential loosening, . . . some radical loosening of the fabric of drama was taking place before our eyes."

This "loosening of the fabric of drama" would become more pronounced in the 1960s and 1970s with the advent of HAPPENINGS, PERFORMANCE ART, and solo performance, all of which were connected to the development of off-off-Broadway. At Judson Church in Greenwich Village's Washington Square the Judson Poet's Theater produced plays by poets and musicals by the Reverend Al Carmines. At Ellen Stewart's La MaMa Experimental Theatre Club, dozens of new playwrights such as Jean-Claude van Itallie, Julie Bovasso, Sam Shepard, ROCHELLE OWENS, Leonard Melfi, MEGAN TERRY, LANFORD WILSON, MARIA IRENE FORNES, H. M. Koutoukas, and Tom Eyen presented fabric-loosening works directed by Joe Cino, Tom O'Horgan, Marshall Mason, and others. Cino himself started his own theater, the Caffè Cino, joining other off-off-Broadway venues including Theatre Genesis and Theater for the New City. In addition, off-off-Broadway nurtured particular theater groups such as Joseph Chaikin's Open Theatre (whose playwrights included Terry, Van Itallie, and SUSAN YANKOWITZ), Richard Schechner's Performance Group, the Bread and Puppet Theater, and RICHARD FOREMAN's Ontological Hysteric Theater.

SYMBIOSIS AND SELF-SUFFICIENCY

While the distinctions between off-off-Broadway and off-Broadway have always been fluid and somewhat amorphous, the stark, confrontational form and content of early off-off-Broadway plays by Sam Shepard (Chicago, 1965) and Lanford Wilson (The Madness of Lady Bright, 1964) stand in sharp contrast to their later, more accessible works. Off-off-Broadway nurtured Shepard's and Wilson's playwriting as they honed their craft and ultimately achieved Broadway respectability, and this is a mark of the symbiotic relationship that developed among off-off, off-, and Broadway itself. In other words, for many playwrights off-off-Broadway stages were the first steps on a path that led uptown through off-Broadway theaters to Broadway, and then on to regional theaters and perhaps Hollywood.

On the other hand, by the 1980s off-off-Broadway also had become its own self-sufficient enterprise, offering a secure platform for such playwrights as MAC WELLMAN, Richard Foreman, and ROMULUS LINNEY, whose works remained centered on its stages; as well as The Wooster Group and the Ridiculous Theatre, companies who achieved success and relative stability by pointedly avoiding Broadway, content in their ability to draw crowds to their own downtown theaters. Off-Broadway could also function in the same way.

By the end of the 20th century, the worlds of off-Broadway and off-off-Broadway had been augmented by the solidification of "performance" as its own genre, in such venues as P.S. 122, Dance Theater Workshop, and The Kitchen. New York City remained the center of American theater, but no longer simply because of Broadway, which had long since ceased to be the sole measure of a playwright's success. Instead, a rich array of different types of live theater offered themselves to those audiences inspired enough to choose drama and performance instead of television, film, and the Internet.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Banes, Sally. Greenwich Village 1963: Avant-Garde Performance and the Effervescent Body. Durham: Duke Univ. Press, 1993.
- Blum, Daniel. A Pictorial History of American Theatre: 1860–1976. Rev. 4th ed. New York: Crown, 1977.
- Cordell, Richard A., and Lowell Matson, eds. The Off-Broadway Theatre: Seven Plays. New York: Random House, 1959.
- Miller, Arthur. "A Visit with Castro." The Nation 278, no. 2 (2004): 13–17.
- Orzel, Nick, and Michael Smith, eds. Eight Plays from Off-Off Broadway. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966.
- Price, Julia S. The Off-Broadway Theater. New York: Scarecrow, 1962.
- Sainer, Arthur. The New Radical Theatre Notebook. New York: Applause, 1997.

John Bell

OFFENDING THE AUDIENCE

PETER HANDKE's controversial play Offending the Audience (Publikumsbeschimpfung) premiered in Frankfurt, GERMANY, on June 8, 1966, under the direction of CLAUS PEYMAN. When several offended audience members rushed the stage and began tussling with the actors, the first performance created a sensation in the German theater world. It also established the twenty-three-year-old author as one of the most important, innovative, and provocative writers of postwar German-language literature.

Originally conceived as a manifesto against the established conventions of the theater, Offending the Audience provides an important theoretical critique of representational theater, in which a dramatic story is acted out as an enclosed world in front of a hidden audience. Handke's one-act Sprechstück (language play) seeks to demolish theater's imaginary fourth wall in a stream of words spoken directly to the audience by four nameless speakers. Using repetition, variation, and contradiction in the rhythmic mode of 1960s beat music, the text penetrates into the psyche of the audience, frustrating—and making them conscious of—their theatergoing habits and expectations: "This room does not make believe it is a room. The side that is open to you is not the fourth wall of a house. . . . There is no back door. Neither is there a non-existent door as in modern drama. The non-existent door does not represent a non-existent door. . . . This stage is not a world, just as a world is not a stage." Handke's play insists that its audience become the characters in their own play and thereby confront the institutional reality of the theater.

True to its name, Offending the Audience ends with the speakers intoning a rhythmic mix of anachronistic and stinging invective. The point of the insults is not to attack a bourgeois and politically complacent theatergoing public as much as an effort to elicit an immediate visceral reaction to words—and thereby completely erase the line between stage and audience. Michael Roloff, who translated the play into English, has suggested it would be more accurate to call the play "Public Insult." In 2000, Roloff recommended that new productions contemporize the insults while still preserving the linguistic rhythms and variation between scathing barbs and quaintly old-fashioned and impersonal diatribe.

Despite its contemptuous critique of classical and contemporary theater conventions, Offending the Audience paradoxically continues a centuries-old German theater tradition as much as it tries to depart from it. From Friedrich Schiller's (1759–1805) "moral institution" through BERTOLT BRECHT's EPIC THEATER to the politically charged DOCUMENTARY theater of ROLF HOCHHUTH, HEINAR KIPPARDT, and PETER WEISS in the 1960s, German playwrights have conceived of theater as an ideal institution for effecting revolutionary social and political change. While Handke's play insists that representational theater is incapable of accurately showing its audience the world outside the theater (either in the form of a problem or a solution), its critique carries on German theater's pedagogical crusade—if now pedantically and obsessively—by dramatizing language's function as a means of social control. Inadvertently, then, Offending the Audience's aesthetic renewal of German drama also renewed the revolutionary potential of the theater.

FURTHER READING

- Firda, Richard Arthur. Peter Handke. New York: Twayne, 1993.
- Handke, Peter. Offending the Audience. Plays, 1. Tr. by Michael Roloff. Intro. by Tom Kuhn. London: Methuen Drama, 1997.
- Klinkowitz, James, and James Knowlton. Peter Handke and the Postmodern Transformation: The Goalie's Journey Home. Columbia: Univ. of Missouri Press, 1983.
- Roloff, Michael. "A 30 Year-After Near-Posthumous Note on Peter Handke's 'Public Insult.'" Translation Journal 4, no. 3 (2000). <http://accurapid.com/journal/13insult.htm>.
- Schlueter, June. The Plays and Novels of Peter Handke. Pittsburgh: Univ. of Pittsburgh Press, 1981.

Jeffrey Schneider

OHASHI YASUHIKO (1956–)

Japanese playwright Ohashi Yasuhiko is a member of the fourth generation of post-1960 “little theatre” (ANGURA and SHŌGEKIJŌ) practitioners and was heavily influenced by TSUKA KŌHEI, foremost representative of the second generation. Tsuka, though shaped by the activism and student unrest of the first generation, forged a playwriting style remarkable for its humorous, ABSURDIST slant on the serious problems of youth. That approach, coupled with the unbridled economic growth of the late-1980s “bubble economy” that fueled widespread pursuit of pleasure, spawned plays concerned less with social reform than with an apolitical, inward-looking journey of self-discovery.

Ohashi's work is visually distinctive for its ingenious stage settings that dazzle spectators with special effects like flowing lava and tossing waves (he majored in electrical engineering). His plays germinate, he maintains, not with an idea or theme but with the performance space, to which he shapes the action in novel ways. To indulge his approach, Ohashi established the Freedom Boat Company (Riburesen) in 1983. Its name combines the Spanish word libre with the Japanese sen or “boat.” Written in characters, another meaning emerges: ri means “separation,” bu “wind,” and re (close to rei) “spirit”—hence, Ohashi defines his theater as indulging in unfettered spiritual journeys to distant shores.

His style is evident in The Red Bird Has Fled . . . (1986), a play based on the worst disaster in aviation history: the 1985 Japan Airlines crash that killed 520 of 524 passengers. The main character is a woman who survived the crash but lost her family. The action occurs ten years after the crash, when Japan Airlines has hired her for a television commercial in an attempt to improve its image and revenues. The undying intensity of feeling for her deceased family empowers her to time warp from the commercial back to the living room of her old home with her family. Ohashi sensitively shows how quickly a heart-rending tragedy, though permanently etched on the bereaved, can fade from mass memory into the black hole of corporate profit.

His signature play is Godzilla (1987), which was awarded the prestigious Kishida Kunio Drama Prize in 1988. Ohashi again uses an actual event as backdrop, this time focusing on the 1986 volcanic eruption on Oshima, an island south of Tokyo. The play opens some time later with a young woman, Yayoi, hiking on the island. She encounters the monster Godzilla, who has been awakened by the volcano, and they fall in love. Members of both families are resistant; steeped in their respective ethnocentric assumptions, each side cites its own common sense and raise the issue of progeny, with great comic effect. At play's end, Yayoi sees her blissful dream fragmented but realizes that such illusions make life possible.

Through Godzilla, a man-made illusion, Ohashi uses this beauty-and-beast love story to plumb the aesthetics of love and suffering, to bemoan the superficiality of the prejudiced mind and the erosion of the ties binding people together. Ohashi senses that only through situations of crisis can he shake his spectators into an awareness of such serious ideas. Contemporary Japanese shingeki playwright INOUE HISASHI has called the work “a masterpiece.”

[See also Japan]

SELECT PLAYS: Can't Really Dance (Dansu wa Umaku Odorenai, 1983); The Red Bird Has Fled . . . (Akai Tori Nigeta . . ., 1986); Godzilla (Gojira, 1987); Mind (Maindo, 1989); The Times, Already . . . (Jidai, Sude ni . . ., 1990); Long Long Time Ago (1992); If I Were Born . . . (Tanjōsuru nara . . ., 1994); It's the Black Ships! (Kurobune da!, 1995); Anybody Will Do! (Doitsumo Koitsumo!, 1997); Ichirō's Disaster (Ichirō no Sainan, 1999); Subjection 2002 (Sabujekushon, 2002)

FURTHER READING

Ohashi Yasuhiko. Akai Tori Nigeta . . . [The Red Bird Has Fled . . .].

Tokyo: Hakusuisha, 1989.

—. Godzilla. Tr. by John K. Gillespie. In Half a Century of Japanese Theater III: 1980s Part 1, ed. by Japan Playwrights Association.

Tokyo: Kinokuniya, 2001.

—. Gojira [Godzilla]. Tokyo: Hakusuisha, 1988.

Senda Akihiko. The Voyage of Contemporary Japanese Theatre. Tr. by J. Thomas Rimer. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1997.

Watanabe Eriko, et al. Gekisakka Hachinin ni yoru Rojikkū Geimu [Mind Games from Eight Playwrights]. Tokyo: Hakusuisha, 1992.

John K. Gillespie

OKAMATO KIDŌ (1872–1939)

Okamoto Kidō (1872–1939) was a Japanese Shin kabuki playwright, theater critic, journalist, and novelist. Okamoto's name is synonymous with a certain type of writing for kabuki, one that almost never upset the predilections of kabuki audiences, who would usually be watching classic plays alongside Okamoto's, but could sometimes be modern enough to provoke intellectual comment. Those plays of Okamoto that have survived now appeal to more traditional tastes, unlike the plays of MAYAMA SEIKA, the thinking man's shin kabuki playwright.

Okamoto's father's friendship with Ichikawa Danjūrō IX, the leading kabuki actor of the day, and his own frequent trips to kabuki turned his early literary aspirations toward the theater. Unable to complete his education because of his family's declining fortunes, he became a journalist. He began writing plays during the last years of the 19th century, but in spite of reforms of kabuki spearheaded by the sam Danjūrō, it was still difficult for an outsider to break into the world of kabuki. After some initial failures, Okamoto burst onto the theater scene with TALE OF SHUZENJI (Shuzenji Monogatari, 1911), which—with kabuki actor Ichikawa Sadanji II in the lead—was something of a sensation at its premiere. At a stroke Okamoto was famous as a writer of new-style period dramas. Sadanji, not a skillful actor of traditional kabuki roles, had been identified by kabuki management as likely to be successful in new plays, with their greater emphasis on dialogue. Okamoto was teamed up with Sadanji and became a full-time playwright.

The decade from Tale of Shuzenji was Okamoto's most productive, with plays such as Onoe and Idahachi (Onoe Idahahi, 1915) and Love Suicide at Toribeyama (Toribeyama Shinjū, 1915). Onoe and Idahachi was consummate theater in its use of stage effects, mainly of natural phenomena, but most interest centered on the main character, Idahachi. As a once-handsome samurai who had botched his love suicide with Onoe, already by the start of the play Idahachi is a depraved executioner, who mistreats and finally kills his former lover. In his defiant rejection of the noble values that he formerly espoused as a samurai, Idahachi broke the mold of the classical double-suicide hero.

The moonlit presuicide scene of Love Suicide at Toribeyama is still a favorite with kabuki audiences, and Okamoto invests this tenderly romantic story with many features of traditional theater. Hankurō, a samurai in the shogun's bodyguard, falls deeply in love with a young prostitute of infinitely lower status. He commits a crime for which he knows he must kill himself, and she determines to follow him in death. Their mutual farewells have a carefully designed sentimentality that has never failed to engage audiences' emotions.

Generalizing about Okamoto is difficult because, like many regular writers for kabuki, his total corpus is huge (around 200 plays) and varied. One feature of his DRAMATURGY that stands out is his abiding concern to show that the complex psychology of samurai characters, expressed principally through the body in classical kabuki, could be theatrically effective within the same environment when mediated by dialogue rather than action.

[See also Japan; Shingeki]

SELECT PLAYS: Tale of Shuzenji (Shuzenji Monogatari, 1911); Love Suicide at Toribeyama (Toribeyama Shinjū, 1915); Onoe and Idahachi (Onoe Idahahi, 1915); History of Theatre in the Tenpō Era (Tenpō Engeki-shi, 1929); Araki Mataemon (1930)

FURTHER READING

- Keene, Donald. Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature of the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama and Criticism. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1984.
- Leiter, Samuel L. New Kabuki Encyclopedia: A Revised Adaptation of Kabuki Jiten. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
- Okamoto Keiichi, ed. Okamoto Kidō Nikki [Diary of Okamoto Kidō]. Tokyo: Seibō, 1987–1989.
- Ōyama Isao. Okamoto Kidō, Hito to Sakuhin [Okamoto Kidō: The man and his works]. Tokorozawa, Saitama: Gikyokushi Kenkyūkai, 1988.

OLD STONE MANSION

Playwright MAHESH ELKUNCHWAR refers to Old Stone Mansion (Wada Chirebandi) as his “flesh and blood” play. It is a close study of relationships among members of a feudal family caught in the turbulent transition toward urbanization and industrialization. The play represents a break from Elkunchwar's earlier symbolic, “experimental” plays in terms of theme, form, and theater.

First performed in Mumbai in 1985 by Kalavaibhav, Old Stone Mansion centers on the Dharangaonkar Deshpande family from Vidarbha, a village in Northern Maharashtra representative of villages in postindependence INDIA. Tatyaji, the head of the family, though a Brahmin, has been a farmer. The play begins after his death. Bhaskar, the eldest son and now head of the family, clings to tradition for security and comfort, which it cannot give any more. The second son, Sudhir, has migrated to Mumbai and personifies “modern” life with its opportunities, individualism, and freedom from tradition. The third son, Chandu, exemplifies the suffering of the servile and unprivileged brothers in a traditional setup where brothers cannot marry unless their sisters are married off, where they cannot enter into any other profession apart from the traditional occupation, and where they have to lead a life of endless work and servility. The children from the young generation are rebellious but do not know exactly how to resolve the identity crisis—they take easy ways out. Ranju, the daughter, takes the family gold and elopes with her teacher, while Parag, the son, drops out of school. The mothers, wives, and daughters, whose aspirations for self-reliance, education, and freedom cannot find any fulfillment either in the feudal patriarchal or the modern urban ethos, are caught up in the family drama. Yet it is the women who save the family from immediate disintegration. Family prestige in the village requires performing certain rituals after death, but that requires money that the family does not have. So the mother sells her part of the house to the moneylender, while the eldest daughter-in-law foregoes gold in order to save the honor of her family and her daughter and establishes a connection with the younger daughter-in-law to maintain family ties.

Old Stone Mansion was followed by two sequels because, in Elkunchwar's words, “the characters had entered my home; [and] they wouldn't leave. . . . They continued to live with me and grow” (1989). Elkunchwar wrote Engrossed on the Shores of a Lake (Magna Talyakathi, 1994) and End of an Epoch (Yuganta, 1994), which continue the family saga. There is a gap of ten years between the plot of each play. On April 11, 1994, all three plays were performed in succession over the course of eight hours, an experiment that had never been attempted in the Marathi theater.

FURTHER READING

- Elkunchwar, Mahesh. Autobiography. Calcutta: Seagull Press, 1989.
- . Old Stone Mansion. Calcutta: Seagull Press, 1989.
- Gokhale, Shanta. Playwright at the Centre: Marathi Drama from 1843 to the Present. Calcutta: Seagull Press, 2000.

OLD TIMES

First presented in 1971 by the Royal Shakespeare Company, Old Times displays HAROLD PINTER's continued interest in power dynamics and language. The play, which opened to critical acclaim, is seen as an improvement on earlier treatments of control, possession, sexuality, and dominance. As Ronald Bryden states in a review for The Observer, "On Pinter territory, every question is an attempt to control and every answer a swift evasion." All three characters are in their forties, although the content of their discussion lies twenty years in the past. As they sit together, Kate is the focus of a duel between Deeley, her husband, and Anna, her former roommate. Deeley and Anna battle to possess Kate, using the past to stake their claims and bait each other in a struggle for power. Kate meanwhile switches allegiances and observes silently before staking her own independence at the conclusion of Old Times.

As the play opens, Kate and Deeley discuss Kate's recollections of Anna, whom Kate has not seen in twenty years, and Deeley asks many questions about Anna that Kate cannot answer. Anna stands alone upstage, with her back to the audience. The scene then shifts to postdinner discussion, with Anna offering a series of recollections. Deeley's responses are competitive: he suggests that Anna is aging and later attempts to objectify her as a sexual object. Their conversation consists of short sentences interspersed with awkward, charged pauses. Deeley and Anna speak of Kate, who remains quiet, in the third person. The two initiate a musical battle, singing lines from songs with undertones of possession, and then return to reminiscences of Kate. Kate observes their objectification of her, but her protests are ignored. Setting Deeley outside of their connection, Kate begins talking to Anna as if they are still young and living together. Kate leaves the room to take a bath as the lights fade.

In the second act, Deeley recalls meeting Anna years before at a tavern and later looking up her skirt as she sat across from him. They then discuss drying Kate, the object of their competition, after her bath. Deeley attempts to assert his dominance again by remarking that Anna must be forty. Kate enters, wearing a bathrobe, as the other two sing to her. Kate and Anna continue their discussion of past acquaintances, as if still living in the past, until Deeley interrupts to bring Anna to the present. Their conversation grows more contentious until Kate dismisses her husband: "If you don't like it, go." Kate then shifts and presents an image of Anna, dead. The final action takes place in silence. Anna walks away as Deeley begins sobbing. After she returns to recline on the divan, Deeley stops. He walks over to stand above Anna, then returns to lay his head in Kate's lap. Finally he moves away and sits alone in an armchair. The three thus end the play isolated and silent, with connections broken down through their power struggle and Kate's final assertion of individuality.

[See also England, 1960–1980]

FURTHER READING

- Cahn, Victor L. Gender and Power in the Plays of Harold Pinter. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.
- Dukore, Bernard F. Where Laughter Stops: Pinter's Tragicomedy. Columbia: Univ. of Missouri Press, 1976.
- Gale, Steven H. "Deadly Mind Games: Harold Pinter's Old Times." In Critical Essays on Harold Pinter, ed. by Steven H. Gale. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Robin Seaton Brown

OLEANNA

You vicious little bitch. You think you can come in here with your political correctness and destroy my life?

—John, Act 3

Few recent plays have provoked as much controversy as Oleanna, DAVID MAMET's scathing exploration of sexual harassment on a college campus. The three-act, two-character play opened at the American Repertory Theatre in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1992 and transferred to New York's OFF-BROADWAY Orpheum Theatre later that year. Oleanna has been the subject of dozens of scholarly articles and has been produced by professional and university theaters throughout the UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, and CANADA. A film version, directed by Mamet himself, was released in 1994.

The title Oleanna refers to a failed 19th-century utopian community, a metaphor for Mamet's depiction of contemporary academia. The play centers on a college professor, John, and his student, Carol. In act 1, Carol has come to John seeking guidance after receiving a poor grade on a paper. John, preoccupied with his ongoing tenure review and his upcoming purchase of a house, offers a variety of opinions and advice on Carol's situation. In act 2, we learn that subsequent to their previous meeting Carol has formally accused John of sexual harassment, which has threatened his chances for tenure. Their second meeting is combative, as both characters strive to define and control the terms of their interaction. Finally, in act 3, the conflict between John and Carol escalates, culminating in physical violence.

Coming in the wake of the October 1991 confirmation hearings for Supreme Court justice Clarence Thomas, Oleanna struck a nerve with audiences still struggling to define sexual harassment. Responses to the play tended to be polarized, with critics either praising Mamet's insightful critique of "political correctness" on college campuses or excoriating the play for its perceived misogyny. Those taking the former view point to the unspecified "group" that has advised Carol to file a formal complaint, to her request that certain books be removed from the course syllabus, and to her charge that John's attempt to prevent her from leaving his office at the end of act 2 constitutes attempted rape. Those advocating the view that the play is misogynistic and reactionary argue that Carol is unrealistically aggressive, that she overreacts to trivial slights, and that John's physical attack on her at the end of the play represents a male fantasy of revenge on women who dare claim they have been sexually harassed.

More recent critics have argued that the play is less about the specific issue of sexual harassment than about the general relationship between power, pedagogy, and language. Both characters are at fault, and to attempt to assign blame is as unproductive as it is impossible. Rather, Oleanna depicts a system in which power flows to the person who can control the terms of the conversation, a theme prominent in Mamet's earlier work GLENGARRY GLEN ROSS (1983). That power, moreover, becomes an end in itself, with the result that the teacher-student relationship, which ideally should be cooperative, becomes competitive. Carol and John have no hope of achieving reconciliation because each is obsessed with winning the battle of words.

Mamet himself refers to the play as a TRAGEDY, in which John undergoes a reversal of fortune (the loss of his tenured position) and a final moment of recognition (after he loses control and resorts to violence). Despite good intentions from both characters, the ending is, in the playwright's words, "surprising and inevitable."

FURTHER READING

- Badenhausen, Richard. "The Modern Academy Raging in the Dark: Misreading Mamet's Political Incorrectness in Oleanna." College Literature 25, no. 3 (September 1998): 1–19.
- Murphy, Brenda. "Oleanna: Language and Power." In The Cambridge Companion to David Mamet, ed. by Christopher Bigsby. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2004. 124–137.
- Norman, Geoffrey, and John Rezek. "Working the Con." In David Mamet in Conversation, ed. by Leslie Kane. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 2001. 123–142.
- Skloot, Robert. "Oleanna, or, the Play of Pedagogy." In Gender and Genre: Essays on David Mamet, ed. by Christopher C. Hudgins and Leslie Kane. New York: Palgrave, 2001. 95–107.

Henry Bial

OLESHA, YURY (1899–1960)

Yury Karlovich Olesha was a Russian prose writer, playwright, and diarist whose works exploring the irreconcilable paradoxes of social upheaval, though few in number, were among the most influential of the early Soviet era. He wrote the drama The Game of Executioner's Block (Igra v plakhu) in 1920 (published 1921 and 1934 but not produced) and began publishing feuilletons in 1921, although his greatest achievement was the novel Envy, printed in 1927 and reworked in 1929 as an independent play, A CONSPIRACY OF FEELINGS (Zagovor chuvstv). It was followed by his fairy-tale novel The Three Fat Men (Tri Tolstyaka), which he published in 1928 and dramatized in 1930. By the time he completed the original play A List of Assets (Spisok blagodeyanii) in 1931, his literary career effectively was at an end. Afterward he wrote some screenplays, unfinished plays, and a smattering of stories and essays. He kept a diary from 1929 until his death, portions of which were published posthumously in Not a Day Without a Line (1965) and Book of Farewell (1999).

Olesha may be seen as an archetype of the refined artist who is left untouched physically but rendered helpless by a totalitarian state. His work reflected the basic conflicts of his age when the needs of the individual were placed second to the requirements of the masses, and practicality and expediency were the new gods. Sincerely attempting to embrace this utilitarian and supposedly egalitarian age, he was disturbed to see the great, though imperfect, human emotions of love, hate, jealousy, vanity, and their corollaries declared obsolete and counterproductive. His speech explaining his point of view at the 1st Congress of the Writers Union of the U.S.S.R. in 1934 was controversial. His works commonly revolved around a tragic rift separating old and new, emotions and reason, creative aimlessness and the pragmatism of progress. Famed for the subtle use of metaphors in his prose, Olesha created slightly contrived and melodramatic but compelling dramas in which characters embody contrasting ideas.

A Conspiracy of Feelings explored a world in which dreamers and poets are marginalized by prudent functionaries. In it one senses Olesha's ardent desire to present all sides with understanding, although his affinity for the "useless" romantic Kavalierov is evident. In A List of Assets a Soviet actress seeks freedom of expression in Europe but discovers the crass dictatorship of commerce and dies a disillusioned heroine, shielding a communist protestor from a policeman's bullet. Written for VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD, it was one of this director's most hotly debated, though short-lived, productions of a contemporary play. The unfinished masterwork The Death of Zand (Smert' Zanda, c. 1929–1933), about a writer who struggles to overcome his own nature but, in the end, cannot force himself to write to order, was commissioned by the MOSCOW ART THEATRE but produced elsewhere only in 1986. An exception to the rule of Olesha's usual thematic is The Three Fat Men, a merry tale about three despots representing wealth, indolence, and gluttony who are overthrown with the aid of itinerant actors. Dramatized for the Moscow Art Theatre, it did not last long in repertory, although it and other dramatizations of the novel were popular throughout the 20th century.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

PLAYS: The Game of Executioner's Block (Igra v plakhu, published 1921 and 1934); A Conspiracy of Feelings (Zagovor chuvstv, 1929); The Death of Zand (Smert' Zanda, unfinished, c. 1929–1933, produced 1986); The Three Fat Men (Tri Tolstyaka, 1930); A List of Assets (Spisok blagodeyanii, 1931)

FURTHER READING

- Beaujour, Elizabeth K. The Invisible Land: A Study of the Artistic Imagination of Iurii Olesha. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1970.
- Gudkova, Violetta. Yu. Olesha i Vs. Meyerhold v rabote nad spektaklem "Spisok blagodeyaniy" [Yu. Olesha and Vs. Meyerhold at work on the production of A List of Assets]. Moscow: Novoye literaturnoye obozreniye, 2002.
- Olesha, Yuri Karlovich. No Day Without a Line: From Notebooks. Ed. and tr. by Judson Rosengrant. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern Univ. Press, 1998.
- . The Complete Plays. Ed. and tr. by Michael Green and Jerome Katsell. Ann Arbor: Ardis, 1983.
- Peppard, Victor. The Poetics of Yuri Olesha. Gainesville: Univ. of Florida Press, 1989.
- Segel, Harold B. Twentieth-Century Russian Drama from Gorky to the Present. Rev. ed. New York: Performing Arts Journal Pubs., 1993.

John Freedman

OLSEN, ERNST BRUUN (1923–)

When I write I do not see the lines. I hear them spoken by actors. I am not a writer, I am a man of the theatre.

—Ernst Bruun Olsen, 1977

Ernst Bruun Olsen, born on February 12, 1923, in Nakskov, started his career as an actor and has directed most of his own plays. Like many dramatists of his generation, he made his debut in the radio theater, then an important incubator for new Danish drama. From 1958 until the stunning success of his and the composer Finn Savery's musical Teenagerlove in 1962 at the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen Olsen wrote almost exclusively for the radio.

Through the story of the pop star Billy Jack, who on his way to the top betrays his faithful wife and his proletarian background, Olsen satirizes the cynicism and cold speculation of the entertainment industry and the new publicity-driven consumer society. With Teenagerlove the Royal Theatre had, according to the critic Svend Kragh-Jacobsen, taken the leap into the musical age with élan, talent, and professional know-how. The musical with Savery's refined mingling of twisted pop and jazz attracted a large audience of young people who would probably otherwise never have dreamed of visiting the Royal Theatre.

A strong social and political commitment is the motor of Olsen's dramatic work, including contemporary plays and historical dramas. Among the first are the untranslatable Bal i den Borgerlige (1966), the result of a new happy collaboration with Savery, satirizing the working-class takeover of middle-class values; The Trapped Prometheus (Prometheus i saksen, 1981), a witty and cruel display of the self-censorship of the media; and Reflections in a Mirror (En kvinde spejler sig, 1995), a woman's reflections on her past and present.

Olsen's inspiration from BERTOLT BRECHT is evident, most clearly in the historical play The Peaceable (De fredsommelige, 1969), taking place during the war between DENMARK and SWEDEN (1658–1660) and dealing with the ordinary people in the great men's war. Many of Olsen's historical plays are metaplays, bringing the theater up for discussion: The Poetic Frenzy (Den poetiske raptus, 1976), leaving the stage to the father of Danish drama, Ludvig Holberg, and his troupe of actors; Claire Lacombe and the Great Revolution (Claire Lacombe og den store revolution, 1989), introducing an until-then-unknown actress as heroine; and Betty Nansen on Betty Nansen (Betty Nansen på Betty Nansen, 1991), an homage to the Danish actress and theater manager, performed in the theater she in 1917 named after herself. All three plays deal with the responsibility of the artist and the theater.

Permanent themes in Olsen's plays are the manipulating forces keeping the population in a state of uncritical consumers, and a praise of women as the sex in possession of common sense, honesty, and vigor, which might make the world a better place to live. With an unfailing sense of style, revealing the true man of the theater, Olsen alternates between a richness of forms and techniques.

SELECT PLAYS: Teenagerlove (1962); Bal i den Borgerlige (1966); Where Did Nora Go When She Went Out? (Hvor gik Nora hen, da hun gik ud, 1968); The Peaceable (De fredsommelige, 1969); The Poetic Frenzy (Den poetiske raptus, 1976); The Postman from Arles (Postbudet fra Arles, 1974); The Trapped Prometheus (Prometheus i saksen, 1981); Claire Lacombe and the Great Revolution (Claire Lacombe og den store revolution, 1989); Betty Nansen on Betty Nansen (Betty Nansen på Betty Nansen, 1991); Irene and Her Men (Irene og hendes mænd, 1992); Reflections in a Mirror (En kvinde spejler sig, 1995)

FURTHER READING

- Lundgren, Henrik. "Ernst Bruun Olsen." In Danske digtere i det 20. århundrede. Vol. 4. Ed. by Torben Brostrom and Mette Winge. 3d ed. Copenhagen: Gad, 1982.
- Rifbjerg, Klaus. "Teenagerlove." Vindrosen 1 (1963).
- Rubin, Don. World Encyclopedia of Contemporary Theatre. Vol. 1, Europe. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Kela Kvam

ON A MUGGY NIGHT IN MUMBAI

On a Muggy Night in Mumbai by MAHESH DATTANI (first performed at the Tata Theatre in Mumbai, INDIA, on November 23, 1998, in a production directed by Lillette Dubey) is the first Indian play to deal openly with issues of homosexuality and to deal sympathetically with questions of love, partnership, trust, and betrayal between gay characters. It shows what happens when members of the gay community are forced into the closet by a hypocritical society.

This bilingual play (in Hindi and English) centers on Kamlesh who, after being dumped by his lover Ed, finds that Ed has proposed to his sister Kiran. It turns out that Ed wants to use his marriage with Kiran to serve as a smokescreen for a continued relationship with Kamlesh. In other words, Ed cannot face being openly gay. The other characters in the play include Bunny, who camouflages his homosexuality with a conventional marriage to a woman, and Ranjit, who has moved to Europe where he can live an openly gay life with his English partner. "Yes, I am sometimes regretful of being an Indian," he says sadly, "because I can't seem to be both Indian and gay." But, he says, he is not ashamed of being gay and accuses Bunny of hiding his shame in marriage. Toward the end of the play Bunny comes to the realization that his wife does not really know him and that the only people who really know him hate him for being a hypocrite. "I have tried to survive. In both worlds," he says. "And it seems I do not exist in either." One of Dattani's strengths as a writer is his ability to use humor to move the audience or to make a point without being sentimental or didactic: "I really wish they would allow gay people to marry," Kiran sighs. "Oh, they do," quips Ranjit. "Only not to the same sex."

Another of Dattani's strengths lies in his ability to intertwine scenes so that each gains depth from the other. The first meeting between Kiran and Ed is intercut with a scene where Kamlesh reveals to Kiran that he loves Ed (without mentioning Ed's name), another scene in which Kiran tells Kamlesh how much she loves Ed, and a fourth scene in which Kamlesh tries to keep Ed from leaving by trying to make him proud (rather than ashamed) of his homosexuality. Time and place collapse in the emotional turmoil caused by a society that forces homosexuality underground.

On a Muggy Night in Mumbai opened to both wildly positive reviews and a storm of protest by people wanting to ban a play that condemns society for the way it positions homosexuality. However, it touched many of its audience members deeply: several came up to Dattani after the show and thanked him profusely for writing a play about gay issues. Some of them shared their own stories. The play had a long run in Mumbai and was successfully received when it toured New York. Dattani made the play into a movie called Mango Souffle.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

FURTHER READING

Dattani, Mahesh. Collected Plays. 2 vol. New York: Penguin, 2000–2005.

Kumar, T. Vijay. "Dattani Transforms Good Themes Into Good Theatre." Deccan Chronicle (Hyderabad) (March 5, 2000).

Malli, Avy. "'Muggy Night' Raises the Curtain on South Asian Gay Issues." AsianWeek.com (June 21–27, 2002). http://www.asianweek.com/2002_06_21/arts_muggynight.html.

"Out of the Closet, on the Screen." The Hindu (March 9, 2003). <http://www.hinduonnet.com/thehindu/mag/2003/03/09/stories/2003030900660500.htm>.

Erin B. Mee

ONCE IN A LIFETIME

In the play Once in a Lifetime by MOSS HART and GEORGE S. KAUFMAN, George, Jerry, and May leave vaudeville and head for Hollywood, where they start an elocution school for silent film actors trying to adapt to the "talkies." Herman Glogauer, a blustering boss but actually the helpless slave of the studio he pretends to command, gives them space on his own lot, and George falls in love with Susan, an inept young actress who is just as charming and foolish as he is.

When Glogauer threatens to close the school, George denounces the studio so forcefully that the boss makes him supervisor in charge of all production. George shoots a script Glogauer rejected, but the film garners raves, and even George's impulsive purchase of 2,000 airplanes becomes a stroke of inspiration when every studio decides to make aerial pictures and needs equipment.

George is the king of fools—unable to analyze experience, he takes everything literally, and even his worst blunders become victories. He forgets to turn on the lights for Susan's movie, and the critics praise him for veiling the climax in darkness and stimulating the imaginations of the audience. He compulsively munches Indian nuts on the sound stage, and one critic acclaims the monotonous cracking as a new version of EUGENE O'NEILL's rhythmic drumbeat in THE EMPEROR JONES.

This Hollywood is full of eager bellboys and cigarette girls who have made pilgrimages in hopes of getting into the movies. Their stories fill a scene set in the lobby of the Hotel Stilton as everyone in town seems to pass through, each involved with his or her private drama and dreams of film glory. The most prominent director is Kammerling, a temperamental German who deserted Reinhardt (who knelt in the Schauspielhaus to beg him not to go) and who obstinately refuses to finish his film until Glogauer finds him an actress who is exactly the right type. Even Glogauer's secretary arrives at the office wearing a black evening dress and pearls in imitation of Elinor Glyn.

The film industry is a world of reverse logic where fools are rewarded and the truly talented go unnoticed. Vail is a skilled playwright whom no one asks to write, and George's movie succeeds due to his own incompetence and Susan's terrible acting. The ultimate statement of Hollywood values occurs when Glogauer accepts George's point of view simply because he makes his case in an emphatic manner. The play is a series of actions that could not possibly happen (but they do), set in a world that could not possibly exist (but it does), populated with characters who could not be alive (but they are). George survives in a crazy mechanism that even the studio boss cannot control, a gizmo that is so unpredictable that only a fool, with his talent for playing the moment without any plan at all, can survive in it.

The play opened on September 24, 1930, with Kaufman in the role of Lawrence Vail. In the New York Times, Brooks Atkinson called it "a hard, swift satire—fantastic and deadly, and full of highly charged COMEDY lines."

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

- Gaines, James R. Wit's End: Days and Nights of the Algonquin Round Table. New York: Harcourt, 1977.
- Goldstein, Malcolm. George S. Kaufman: His Life, His Theater. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1979.
- Hart, Moss. Act One. New York: Random House–Vintage, 1959.
- Mason, Jeffrey D. Wisecracks: The Farces of George S. Kaufman. Ann Arbor: UMI Res. Press, 1988.
- Meredith, Scott. George S. Kaufman and His Friends. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.
- Teichmann, Howard. George S. Kaufman: An Intimate Portrait. New York: Atheneum, 1972.

Jeffrey D. Mason

ONDAATJE, MICHAEL (1943–)

On the island of Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Michael Ondaatje's impressive family name dates back to the 15th century. His descendants include botanists, doctors, lawyers, and plantation owners. Although linked to this rich heritage, Ondaatje's family fortune had nearly evaporated by the time of his birth in Colombo on September 12, 1943, one of four children of Philip Mervyn Ondaatje and Enid Gratiaen Ondaatje. In Ceylon, Ondaatje began his education at St. Thomas College. In 1952, four years following his parents' separation, Ondaatje left St. Thomas College and reunited with his mother in London, ENGLAND. He enrolled at Dulwich College. Not pleased with his English education, Ondaatje joined his older brother Christopher in Montreal, CANADA, in 1962. Two years later, Ondaatje married filmmaker/photographer Kim Jones. The couple became parents to two children, Quintin and Griffin, and legally separated in 1980. Ondaatje received his bachelor of arts degree from the University of Toronto (1965) and his master's degree from Queens University in Kingston, Ontario (1967).

While teaching at the University of Western Ontario in London, Ondaatje began THE COLLECTED WORKS OF BILLY THE KID. Inspired by Ondaatje's childhood memories of playing "Cowboys and Indians," this critically acclaimed piece is an intimate exploration of the legendary outlaw Billy the Kid. It is a fusion of both fact and fiction: a blend of history, biography, and fantasy. A multimedia experience, The Collected Works is an assemblage of poems, narratives, and "fabricated" photographs. For this piece Ondaatje was presented the Governor General's Award in 1970. The Collected Works of Billy the Kid was brought to the stage at the Stratford Festival in 1973.

In 1976 Ondaatje released Coming Through Slaughter. This work illuminates the life of JAZZ-legend Buddy Bolden, believed to be the founding father of jazz. Similar to The Collected Works of Billy the Kid, this piece flows in poetic form and weaves biographical facts into a created backdrop: Ondaatje skillfully integrates the sparse biographical facts of Bolden's life into an appropriate turn-of-the-century New Orleans setting. In the year of its release, Coming Through Slaughter was co-winner of the Books in Canada award for first novels (though even Ondaatje himself is hesitant to label the work as a "novel"). Coming Through Slaughter was adapted for the stage and first performed in 1980 at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille.

In 1992 Ondaatje published The English Patient, which received the Booker Prize, the Governor General's Award, and the Trillium Award in the same year. This highly praised, postcolonial work is set in a burned-out villa in Florence, ITALY, near the conclusion of World War II. The English Patient tells the story of four companions: a fatally burned Hungarian cartographer (Almasy), a "shell-shocked" Canadian nurse (Hana), a Sikh sapper (Kip), and a thief (Caravaggio). Adapted and directed by Anthony Minghella in 1996, the film version of The English Patient received nine Academy Awards and two Golden Globe Awards in 1997.

Ondaatje resides in Toronto with his wife, Linda Spalding. They edit the literary journal Brick.

PLAYS: The Collected Works of Billy the Kid (1973); Coming Through Slaughter (1980)

FURTHER READING

- Barbour, Douglas. Michael Ondaatje. New York: Twayne, 1993.
- Jewinski, Ed. Michael Ondaatje: Express Yourself Beautifully. Toronto: ECW, 1994.
- Minghella, Anthony. The English Patient: A Screenplay. New York: Hyperion, 1996.
- Mundwiler, Leslie. Michael Ondaatje: Word, Image, Imagination. Vancouver: Talonbooks, 1984.
- Ondaatje, Michael. The Collected Works of Billy the Kid. New York: Penguin, 1984.
- . Coming Through Slaughter. New York: Vintage, 1996.

Erica Joan Dymond

ONDINE

Based on La Motte-Fouqué's 1811 tale, JEAN GIRAUDOUX's Ondine (1939), a romantic TRAGEDY, opens with a young water sprite, raised by an old couple, falling in love with Hans, a knight errant. Smitten with her beauty, passion, and natural sexual appeal, and unafraid of her magical powers and mysterious origin, he abandons the dangerous test undertaken for his fiancée Princess Bertha, ignores the warnings of the fishing community, and pledges his love to Ondine. For her part, Ondine is blind to his limitations ("How handsome you are!") and deaf to the admonition of the Old One—her uncle, King of the Sea—that a human husband will inevitably deceive her and thus be punished with death.

When Hans presents his fifteen-year-old bride to the King in the second act, a court entertainment is provided by the Lord Chamberlain, the Superintendent of Theatre, and the Illusionist (her disguised uncle who can control the passage of time). But their fast talk and trickery are more disillusioning than amusing, and Ondine soon discovers her failure to fit into the human world of hypocrisy. Even after lessons in lying, her attempts at pretense prove disastrous. In flash-forward scenes, magically presented by the Illusionist, Hans discovers he has more in common with the all-too-human Bertha than with his sprite spouse.

In the third act, Hans prepares to marry Bertha, with whom he has betrayed Ondine, who has been missing for six months. When Ondine is caught in a fisherman's net and tried for witchcraft, she lies to save Hans from punishment, claiming she betrayed him first. Only when her lie unravels does Hans appreciate her love—and the nonhuman world he has lost. But it is too late. He must die for his infidelity; and as his breath recedes, so does Ondine's memory of their human love and life together.

Like many of Giraudoux's plays, this one explores the union of the ideal (extraordinary Ondine) and the real (ordinary Hans) and comes to the same unhappy conclusion: they are incompatible. Georges Lemaître in Jean Giraudoux: The Writer and His Work (1971) suggests the heroine represents oneness with Nature (she sees clearly in the dark, does not get wet in the rain, sleeps on the surface of the lake, converses with animals and spirits). Thus she flounders in the unnatural, petty world of humans. Their match is doomed to failure, for in any attempt to unite them, the ideal will be compromised, lost. The real will prevail but will not be victorious, as there is no glory in realizing that humans are too limited to accommodate the realm of the imagination.

Produced by Louis Jouvet, Ondine began a unanimously acclaimed run at the Athénée in Paris in 1939, which was aborted in 1940 because of the war; but it was revived in 1949. Adapted by Maurice Valency and starring Audrey Hepburn, it opened in New York in 1954 and won the Critics' Circle Award for Best Foreign Play.

[See also France]

FURTHER READING

- Cohen, Robert. Giraudoux: Three Faces of Destiny. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1968.
- Inskip, Donald. Jean Giraudoux: The Making of a Dramatist. London: Oxford Univ. Press, 1958.
- Le maitre, Georges. Jean Giraudoux: The Writer and His Work. New York: Ungar, 1971.
- Reilly, John H. Jean Giraudoux. Twayne's World Author Series, No. 513. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Patricia Montley

ONE DAY IN ASADH

Although the central character of One Day in Asadh (Asadh Ka Ek Din, 1958) is named after the legendary Sanskrit poet and dramatist Kalidas, the play is not historical—the entire plot is MOHAN RAKESH's invention. The plot centers on the tragic love-relationship of Mallika's selfless love for Kalidas and his self-centered love for her. Through this relationship Rakesh explores two themes. The first is the relationship of the author's creativity to his roots. Mallika and Kalidas live in the backdrop of the Himalayas, among its mountains, valleys, and living creatures. One day a messenger from Ujjaini comes to invite Kalidas to the capital as poet laureate of the state. Kalidas is reluctant to go because somewhere inside he knows he will not be happy if he is cut off from his roots—the mountains, the valleys, its creatures, and of course Mallika. Mallika encourages him to go, and ultimately he does. However, as feared, he feels suffocated in the comfort and luxury of palace life. At the end of the play Kalidas confesses that everything he has written after becoming poet laureate and living in the capital has its roots in his earlier mountainous environment and its creatures. In a poignant speech, he tells Mallika:

People think that living in that life and atmosphere I have written a great deal. But I know that while living there I wrote nothing. Whatever I wrote was a re-collection of life here. The Himalayas are the backdrop of Kumarasambhav, you are the austere Uma. Cut off from his natural environs the creativity of the author gradually dries up. The pain of Yaksha in Meghdut is the pain I felt at being separated from you. Cut off from his natural environment, the author's creativity dries up.

The second theme Rakesh explores is the effect of state patronage on creativity. Patronage may make an artist comfortable, and it may give him exalted status and reputation, but ultimately it suffocates the artist's creativity. Kalidas feels suffocated in the palace and wants to free himself. When he goes back to his village and to Mallika, he hears the cries of Mallika's child. At that moment he realizes time has not stood still in his absence, and it is too late to make a fresh start.

One Day in Asadh was written and published in 1958, and its first major production was done by the theater group Anamika (Kolkata), directed by Shyamanand Jalan. The second major production was directed by Ebrahim Alkazi with the students of the National School of Drama in November 1962, the year he took over the institution as its director. Since then there have been more than sixty productions in various Indian languages including English. In 1968 the play was produced by Mary Washington College, Virginia, in a production directed by Joy Michael.

FURTHER READING

- Jain, N. C. "Some Recent Significant Plays." Enact 25–26 (January–February 1969).
- Nigam, R. L. "Aadhe Adhure: A Comment." Enact 32–33 (August–September 1969).

- Nita, Kumar N. "Halfway House: A House Divided." In Many Indias, Many Literatures: New Critical Essays, ed. by Shormishtha Panja. Delhi: Worldview Pubs., 1999.
- Rakesh, Mohan. "Why Plays?" Enact 13–14 (January–February 1968).
- Sethi, J. D. "Rakesh's Aadhe Adhure: A Breakthrough." Enact 27 (March 1969).
- Taneja, Jaidev. Mohan Rakesh: Rang-shilpa aur pradarshan. Delhi: Radhakrishnan Prakashan, 1996.

Rajinder Nath

O'NEILL, EUGENE (1888–1953)

At the final curtain, there they still are, trapped within each other by the past, each guilty and at the same time innocent, scorning, loving, pitying each other, understanding and yet not understanding at all, forgiving, but still doomed never to be able to forget.

—Eugene O'Neill, letter to George Jean Nathan regarding Long Day's Journey Into Night, 1940

Eugene Gladstone O'Neill was born on October 16, 1888, at the Barrett House, a hotel on Broadway and 43rd Street, in the heart of the theater district in New York City. His father was James O'Neill (1846–1920), an Irish actor who in 1883 began touring with the Charles Fechter dramatization of ALEXANDRE DUMAS-FILS's novel THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO. He cherished the ambition of becoming a Shakespearean actor in the tradition of Edwin Booth, but to his shame he could not resist the lucrative romantic MELODRAMA, and he eventually played Edmond Dantès in over 4,000 performances through 1912. He interrupted his tour to spend just one night with his newborn son and his wife, Ella Quinlan (1857–1922), whose doctor prescribed morphine to help her recover from the delivery, beginning an addiction that would torment her for the rest of her life.

EARLY YEARS, 1895–1915

Eugene spent his first years on tour with his parents, mostly in one-night stands in towns all over the country, and passed summers at their "Monte Cristo" cottage in New London, Connecticut. In October 1895 he enrolled at the St. Aloysius Academy for Boys, a Catholic boarding school in Riverdale, New York, where he served as an altar boy for Sunday Mass and read Rudyard Kipling, Dumas père, Victor Hugo, and William Shakespeare. On his twelfth birthday, he began studies at the De La Salle Institute in New York City and lived in his family's hotel apartment on West 68th Street near Central Park West. In 1902 he enrolled at the Betts Academy, a nonsectarian boarding school in Stamford, Connecticut. During the summer of 1903 his mother tried to stop taking morphine and, while suffering from withdrawal symptoms, tried to drown herself in the Thames River. In reaction, Eugene refused to attend Mass, and after he returned to Betts for the school year, he started spending his weekends in New York City with his elder brother, Jamie (1878– 1923); the two explored theaters, saloons, and brothels, and Eugene began drinking. He read radical political tracts as well as literature by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, HENRIK IBSEN, FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, and OSCAR WILDE.

On September 20, 1906, he entered Princeton University, but he devoted his energies less to his studies and more to women and drinking (in Trenton, New Jersey, as well as the Hell's Kitchen and Greenwich Village neighborhoods of New York City). In 1907 the university dismissed him for failing to take any final examinations. In the meantime, he read LYOV TOLSTOY; Fyodor Dostoevsky, and MAKSIM GORKY. He took a job as a secretary for a New York mail-order firm and lived in his family's apartment in the Hotel Lucerne on Amsterdam Avenue and 79th Street. In 1909 he met Kathleen Jenkins and secretly married her on October 2, just two weeks before his twenty-first birthday. Soon afterward he traveled to San Francisco and then sailed for Honduras with a mining engineer to prospect for gold. After five months he contracted malaria and returned to New York.

O'Neill took a job as assistant stage manager with his father's tour of The White Sister, by Walter Hackett and F. Marion Crawford, and Kathleen bore their son, Eugene Jr., on May 5, 1910. O'Neill saw neither wife nor baby before sailing for Buenos Aires on a Norwegian square-rigged steel bark. He worked a variety of jobs and explored the bars and brothels of the waterfront, and in March 1911 he shipped out as an ordinary seaman on the British freighter Ikala, which became the model for the Glencairn, the fictional ship on which the playwright set some of his early one-act plays. He returned to New York City and lived for a time at a cheap flophouse run by a man known as "Jimmy the Priest," a place he later fictionalized as the setting for THE ICE-MAN COMETH. He sailed for ENGLAND as an ordinary seaman and returned as an able-bodied seaman on the liner Philadelphia. Kathleen asked for a divorce, and on December 29 he set up the grounds for the action by arranging for witnesses to view him bedded down with a prostitute.

In 1912 O'Neill attempted suicide with an overdose of sleeping pills, but his roommate saved him, and he became a bit player in his father's vaudeville version of The Count of Monte Cristo, touring through Utah and Colorado. In August he became a reporter on the New London Telegraph, but he developed a persistent cough in October, and after his illness was diagnosed as tuberculosis, he entered first a public and then a private sanatorium, where he read plays by J. M. SYNGE, GERHART HAUPTMANN, and AUGUST STRINDBERG. By June 3 he was well enough to leave, and he began writing plays. In August 1914 his father paid the costs of publishing Thirst and Other One Act Plays, a collection of his work, and in September O'Neill enrolled in GEORGE PIERCE BAKER's playwriting workshop at Harvard University. Although Baker's model was ARTHUR WING PINERO, author of such plays as THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY (1903), and the precepts he taught would seem formulaic today, the workshop, initiated in 1909, brought respect to the serious study of playwriting.

O'Neill acquired from Baker the lifelong practice of writing a detailed scenario before attempting the dialogue of a new play.

He spent most of the autumn of 1915 drinking in a bar nicknamed the "Hell Hole" in Greenwich Village, and he met an anarchistic alcoholic named Terry Carlin who in June 1916 took him to Provincetown, Massachusetts, where he met a colony of writers, leftist intellectuals, and genteel bohemians including George Cram "Jig" Cook, playwright SUSAN GLASPELL, radical journalist John Reed, Louise Bryant, and others.

FROM PROVINCETOWN TO NEW YORK, 1916–1925

The Provincetown connection changed O'Neill's life. Led by Cook, a visionary and student of classical Greek culture, in 1915 his new friends had founded the Provincetown Players, which developed from an amateur play-reading troupe to one of the more important companies in the art theater movement that transformed the aesthetic and practice of serious theater in America. In place of the commercial approach that treated plays as commodities and mere entertainment, the art theater sought totality of conception, unity of structure, harmony of impression, freedom of style, simplicity of setting, and artistry in scenic design. Maurice Brown and Ellen Van Volkenberg set the pattern in 1912 when they established the Chicago Little Theater, an amateur troupe that engaged in long rehearsal explorations of the works of such playwrights as Y. B. YEATS, Strindberg, ARTHUR SCHNITZLER, and Euripides. In 1914 Hiram Kelly Moderwell attacked DAVID BELASCO's representationalism in The Theatre of Today, and Sheldon Cheney completed The New Movement in the Theatre and founded Theatre Arts Magazine. In 1915 in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Sam Hume mounted a gallery exhibition of scenic designs, the first such event to elevate theater design to the level of fine art.

On July 28, 1916, the Provincetown Players produced O'Neill's one-act play Bound East for Cardiff. Set in the forecabin of the British tramp steamer Glencairn, the play opens with several men trading stories while a seaman named Yank lies in his bunk dying from injuries consequent to missing his footing on a ladder and falling down in the hold. The men are isolated on the sea, and they resent the wealthy owners who live off their labor and suffering. Driscoll, the Irishman, remembers how Yank saved his life after their former ship sank. The captain of the Glencairn can do nothing to stop the pain or to prevent Yank from spitting up blood. Yank assures Driscoll that he is not sorry to leave the hard life of a sailor, and he can only imagine the pleasure of a home on dry land. He is, in seaman's slang, "bound East for Cardiff," and in the last moments of the play, he dies. The production took place in the company's ramshackle theater set on a wharf, so the waves lapped at pilings as the drama unfolded with Cook as Yank and O'Neill himself in the one-line role of the second mate.

Bound East for Cardiff was the first of four one-act plays that were later known collectively as the S. S. Glencairn. In the Zone (produced October 31, 1917, by the Washington Square Players) takes place in the forecabin again, but now the ship is steaming through a war zone, and the men are fearful of submarines, mines, and especially German spies. The tension and helplessness make them quarrelsome and irritable, and they turn their suspicion on Smitty, who has been behaving furtively and hiding a small black tin box under his mattress. The men find a porthole left open in spite of the blackout routine, and they speculate that Smitty has been signaling to another vessel; they even suspect him of deception because he speaks English too well. They capture him, tie him up, and against Smitty's anguished protests open the mysterious tin box, which turns out to contain a series of love letters that conclude with the woman breaking with him owing to his constant drunkenness. Ashamed, the men free Smitty and turn in for the night. In The Moon of the Caribbees (produced December 20, 1918, by the Provincetown Players), the men relax on the main deck under a full moon in the West Indies. Bella, a bumboat woman, negotiates with their captain to sell them fruit and tobacco, and she quietly arranges to provide other commodities: three shillings for a pint of rum and four shillings for the sexual services of any of the women who accompany her. Most of the men go below to carouse out of sight of the officers, but Smitty remains on deck to dwell on the painful memory of the woman who rejected him for his drinking, and he wonders whether love is no more than what the native women sell to the sailors in the forecabin. The party pours out on deck, and one man plays his accordion while the others dance. The festivities turn into a brawl, and someone knifes Paddy, who knocks himself out when he falls. The mate walks in to restore order and sends Bella off with no money as punishment for selling liquor, and the play ends with Smitty still struggling with his loneliness. THE LONG VOYAGE HOME (1917) depicts the defeat of Olson, a Swedish sailor who hopes to return to his family farm but falls prey to waterfront thugs who drug him and shanghai him aboard an outbound windjammer; it seems that the sea will not let him go.

O'Neill's sea cycle works from the naturalistic conception of man as subject to natural forces, and it shows the influence of Joseph Conrad's The Nigger of the Narcissus. In all four plays, the sea dominates the action, providing the backdrop (sound, light, mood) for the characters and acting as master to the men, who become its vassals and servants. Those who acquiesce survive, but the thoughtful suffer: Yank, Olson, and Smitty betray the sea, which kills or enslaves them.

In the fall of 1916, O'Neill, Cook, and others left Provincetown to open a 140-seat theater, the Provincetown Playhouse, in Greenwich Village, where they produced O'Neill's Bound East for Cardiff, Before Breakfast (1916), Fog (1917), and The Sniper (1917). O'Neill spent the spring and summer of 1917 writing in Provincetown, then he went back to the Hell Hole, corresponded with critic George Jean Nathan (finally meeting him in 1919), and met Agnes Boulton, a writer whom he married on April 12, 1918. The couple settled in Provincetown as the playwright worked on BEYOND THE HORIZON. In May 1919 the O'Neills moved into a converted Coast Guard station at Peaked Hill Bar, a gift from Eugene's father. On October 30 their son Shane was born in Provincetown.

Beyond the Horizon opened on Broadway on February 3, 1920. The play tells the story of two brothers, one who loves the family farm and one who yearns to go to sea, but they trade destinies, with disastrous effect, because the girl who lives next door loves the dreamer instead of the farmer. The farmer succeeds in foreign parts but sacrifices his integrity, while the dreamer marries the girl but drives the farm to ruin and finally dies of consumption. O'Neill developed his ongoing themes of mankind's relationship to the sea and the land and of belonging and displacement; the award of the Pulitzer Prize in June established his reputation. On August 10 his father died of cancer in New London, and his brother, Jamie, swore to stop drinking. On November 1 the Provincetown Players opened THE EMPEROR JONES, which became a major success for both the playwright and the company. The expressionistic action follows Jones's flight through a jungle, where instead of finding safety, he meets his own guilt and fear. Played by Charles Gilpin, Jones was one of the first important roles written for a black actor even though the character is a crap-shooting, arrogant Pullman porter. O'Neill later used his influence to persuade the New York Drama League to break their color line and invite Gilpin to their annual awards dinner.

In 1921 O'Neill became friends with critic Kenneth Macgowan and designer ROBERT EDMOND JONES. June brought the Broadway premiere of Gold, a full-length play O'Neill developed from Where the Cross Is Made (1918). While shipwrecked with his crew on a small coral island, whaling captain Isaiah Bartlett finds an inlaid chest that he believes is filled with gold. He kills two of his men for resisting him, and when a ship comes to rescue them, he buries the chest so he can return to retrieve it in secret. He fits a schooner for the voyage, but he is about to depart from his California home when his daughter tricks him and arranges for her lover, the officer on a steamer, to sail the schooner for him so that he will be forced to remain with his ailing wife. The expedition fails when the ship is lost, but Bartlett refuses to believe the disaster until his son assures him that an anklet from the "treasure" is nothing but brass; at that, the captain shrivels and dies.

ANNA CHRISTIE opened on November 2, 1921, and won the Pulitzer Prize in 1922. A Swedish coal barge captain looks forward to meeting his daughter, who years ago he sent to live with cousins and grow up in wholesome circumstances; however, when she arrives, it is clear that she is a hardened prostitute. They help rescue a sailor from a wrecked steamer, and she falls in love with him. The captain resists the match, and the woman feels she is not good enough for her lover, but in spite of ill feeling on all sides, the three accept each other, the men ship out, and Anna plans to keep a home for them on shore.

In the autumn of 1921 O'Neill met his son, Eugene Jr., eleven years old, for the first time. On February 28, 1922, his mother died in Los Angeles, and Jamie got drunk after having stayed sober for two years. On March 9, the very evening that Jamie brought their mother's body to New York, the Provincetown Players opened THE HAIRY APE. This second expressionist play follows Yank, a stoker on an ocean liner; he is strong, rough, and crude, scorning all sentiment in favor of the raw power he finds embodied in the engines he feeds. After an arrogant rich girl visits the stokehole and finds Yank repulsive, he resolves to find her and confront her. His journey into strange territory takes him to the most refined neighborhood in New York City, to the office of the waterfront chapter of the International Workers of the World, and to the zoo, where he releases a gorilla who crushes him to death in spite of Yank's mischievous thought that they are, at bottom, brothers.

O'Neill bought Brook Farm in Ridgefield, Connecticut, to provide a winter home as an alternative to Peaked Hill Bar. In 1923 the National Institute of Arts and Letters awarded O'Neill a gold medal, and on November 8 Jamie died of complications from heavy drinking. O'Neill did not attend the funeral because he was himself recovering from an alcoholic episode.

By that time Jig Cook had gone to GREECE on a pilgrimage, where he died in 1924, so the Provincetown Players came under the leadership of a triumvirate composed of O'Neill, Macgowan, and Robert Edmond Jones. They formed Experimental Theatre, Inc. and strove for a higher level of professionalism, remodeling the theater and offering both printed playbills and press passes to their productions. During the two years of their administration, they emphasized experimental production more than experimental writing. Overall, from 1916 through 1926, the Provincetown Players presented eighteen of O'Neill's plays.

ALL GOD'S CHILLUN GOT WINGS opened on May 15, 1924, amid hate mail and death threats from the Ku Klux Klan because the play tells the story of a black man (played by Paul Robeson) who marries a white woman. The mayor attempted to close the play and refused to issue permits to the child actors required for the first scene, so director James Light read it aloud to the audience. Although the two leading characters play together easily as children, the woman cannot adjust to the fact of her husband's blackness, and she not only loses her reason; she wrecks his ambition to pass the bar by making it impossible for him to study.

DESIRE UNDER THE ELMS opened on November 11, 1924. Old Ephraim Cabot marries yet again, leading two of his grown sons to conclude that they will never inherit the farm and provoking the youngest, Eben, to determined anger. Abbie seduces her stepson, and when Ephraim promises to give her anything if she will bear him yet another son, she produces a child who is actually Eben's. When her lover resents the baby, she smothers it to prove her love. He summons the sheriff but then chooses to share her guilt, so when the two are arrested, Ephraim is left on the farm, completely alone. The play was subsequently banned in Boston and London in spite of O'Neill offering to replace the word whore with harlot, and the district attorney for New York City tried to close the play for indecency in 1925. In Los Angeles, the entire cast was tried in court for giving an obscene play.

FROM BERMUDA TO TAO HOUSE, 1926–1946

O'Neill and his family moved to the island of Bermuda, and on January 1, 1925, he swore to stop drinking and smoking but later reneged. On May 14 Agnes bore their second child, Oona. In 1926 O'Neill saw a psychoanalyst and achieved a degree of control over his drinking. With Macgowan and Jones, O'Neill produced THE GREAT GOD BROWN, opening on January 23. The play is O'Neill's first major experiment with masks; Dion cannot appear in public without the personality he wears as a shield, and after he dies, the ordinary conventional Billy Brown takes Dion's masks and lives as both men until he dies from the burden of suffering and vulnerability.

O'Neill spent the summer in Maine, where he met actress Carlotta Monterey, who had played Mildred in The Hairy Ape, then returned to Bermuda. In 1927 he initiated a serious relationship with Monterey, which led to an angry correspondence with Agnes and the two lovers traveling together to London, France, China, Saigon, Manila, Singapore, Ceylon, and Egypt. Agnes divorced the playwright, and he married Monterey on July 22, 1929.

In January 1928 the THEATRE GUILD produced two of O'Neill's plays. The first was Marco Millions, which develops the conflict between sensitivity and practicality that the playwright explored in The Great God Brown. He presents the fabled trader and traveler Marco Polo as a version of an eager American businessman who interprets every commodity and experience in terms of what price he can negotiate for it. The pope tells him, "On the last day one of your seed will interrupt Gabriel to sell him another trumpet," and then he sends him to Cathay, predicting ironically that he will "set an example of virtuous Western manhood" and drive Kublai, the Great Kaan, "to seek spiritual salvation." Kublai finds Marco amusing because he cannot imagine his own death, so he gives him the freedom of his empire in exchange for periodic reports. After fifteen years he realizes that Marco "has not even a mortal soul, he has only an acquisitive instinct. . . . He has lusted for everything and loved nothing." The trader has become a consummate administrator but blithely tramples on Chinese culture and sensibilities. Kublai sends Marco back to Italy but charges him to escort his beloved granddaughter, Kukachin, to Persia, where she is to marry the king. The Kaan's adviser, Chu-Yin, instructs Marco "to look carefully and deeply into the Princess's eyes and note what you see there" on each and every day of the voyage. Kukachin falls in love with the Venetian, who is completely unable to recognize her passion. The news nearly inspires the Kaan to conquer the West for the sole purpose of torturing and dismembering Marco, but he relents. Marco returns to his bourgeois life in Venice, and Kublai mourns Kukachin, who dies of sadness. The cast included Alfred Lunt as Marco Polo, Margalo Gillmore as Princess Kukachin, Dudley Digges as Chu-Yin, and Sanford Meisner as a papal courier.

The second Theatre Guild production was STRANGE INTERLUDE (1928), with Lynn Fontanne as Nina and scenery by Jo Mielziner. In this nine-act epic about a woman and the men who loved her, O'Neill developed his exploration of staging the various levels of personality by writing out the characters' interior monologues for the actors to speak aloud. Although each performance took nearly six hours, including a ninety-minute dinner break, the production ran for seventeen months, led to two touring companies, eventually earned $275,000 (over $3 million in 2006 dollars) for O'Neill, and won the Pulitzer Prize.

A few months later the Pasadena Community Playhouse opened LAZARUS LAUGHED, staged as a vast pageant with over 170 performers, 400 costumes, and 300 masks. Raised from the dead, Lazarus preaches that there is no death, and he responds to all events with warm, all-encompassing laughter. The aged Roman emperor Tiberius fears death and demands that Lazarus repeat the original miracle, and the mad Caligula endeavors without success to learn from Lazarus the secret of everlasting youth.

While visiting Cap d'Ail on the French Riviera in the spring of 1929, O'Neill began working on MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA. Opening on October 26, 1931, the trilogy interpreted Greek TRAGEDY in American terms, using the Civil War as an analogy for the Greek invasion of Troy and devising counterparts to Agamemnon, Clytemnestra, Electra, Orestes, Aegisthus, and the classical chorus.

In 1932 O'Neill moved to Sea Island, Georgia, to build a home called "Casa Genotta." He became associate editor of George Jean Nathan's new journal The American Spectator and contributed a series of three essays on the use of masks in contemporary theater.

At its best, [the mask] is more subtly, imaginatively, suggestively dramatic than any actor's face can ever be. . . . Why not give all future Classical revivals entirely in masks? Hamlet, for example. Masks would liberate this play from its present confining status as exclusively a "star vehicle." We would be able to see the great drama we are now only privileged to read, to identify ourselves with the figure of Hamlet as a symbolic projection of a fate that is in each of us, instead of merely watching a star giving us his version of a great acting role. We would even be able to hear the sublime poetry as the innate expression of the spirit of the drama itself, instead of listening to it as realistic recitation—or ranting—by familiar actors.

The Theatre Guild produced O'Neill's only COMEDY Ah Wilderness!, which opened on October 2, 1933, with George M. Cohan playing the role of Nat Miller, the father. The action takes place on the Fourth of July in 1906 in a town very much like New London, Connecticut, where O'Neill's family had spent their summers. Richard is O'Neill as he might have been: going on seventeen, just out of high school and bound for Yale, and eager to defy convention. He scorns the Independence Day celebration, telling his father that America is not the land of the free and the home of the brave but the home of the "wage slave ground under the heel of the capitalist class, starving, crying for bread for his children." In addition to reading Thomas Carlyle, Wilde, Shaw, and Ibsen, he has been copying passages of Algernon Swinburne for his fifteen year-old girlfriend, Muriel, but her father finds them so objectionable that he grounds his daughter for a month and forbids her to see Richard again. Still rebelling, the youth visits a bar and drinks with a "swift baby" from New Haven until the owner realizes he is under age and turns him out. He returns home drunk and shocks his family. On the following morning, his mother urges his father to punish him, but before father and son can talk, Richard sneaks out for a clandestine meeting with Muriel on the beach. He tells her all about drinking with what he describes as a chorus girl from New York, and she finally lets him kiss her because the touch will wash off the other girl's kisses. In the last scene, his father reproves him for his earlier folly and tries to explain to him how to handle "certain desires of the flesh" but does not make much progress. The parents leave the boy in the moonlight and enjoy the night together.

On January 8, 1934, the Theatre Guild produced DAYS WITHOUT END, O'Neill's return to some of the concerns and techniques of The Great God Brown and Lazarus Laughed. He called the piece "the mask, pseudo-Faustian, 'modern miracle play'" and set out to explore the nature of deity. The protagonist is John Loving, whom O'Neill divides into John, a conventional character, and Loving, his double but wearing "a mask whose features reproduce exactly the features of John's face—the death mask of a John who has died with a sneer of scornful mockery on his lips." John was raised as a Catholic but lost his faith when his parents died. He finds happiness in loving his wife, but he worries about what will happen if she dies. His demonic self leads him into an affair with another woman, and the infidelity nearly wrecks his marriage and his life. He writes a novel based on his own life, and when he describes the plot, his wife recognizes her husband and herself, and she walks out into a storm, just like the woman in the story, and catches pneumonia. As she lies at the point of death, John retreats to a church where he struggles with Loving. John prays to Christ on the Cross, and when he accepts his love and forgiveness, Loving is defeated. John receives news that his wife will survive, and he declares, like Lazarus, "Death is dead."

Days Without End marked the end of O'Neill's active involvement in Broadway theater. Early in 1934 his health began to deteriorate; over the next decade he suffered from nervousness, digestive problems and stomach pains, depression, prostate trouble, appendicitis, neuritis, low blood pressure, bronchitis, Parkinson's disease, melancholia, exhaustion, a back injury, and a debilitating tremor. Yet in January 1935 he started working on a cycle of eleven plays he eventually called A Tale of Possessors Self-Dispossessed, a project that was to cover the years from 1755 to 1932. In 1941 he met actress Ingrid Bergman and discussed with her the possibility of producing the entire cycle in repertory, but although he wrote several scenarios, he ultimately completed only two of the plays, both produced posthumously: A Touch of the Poet (1957) and More Stately Mansions (1962).

In 1936 O'Neill left Sea Island and went to Seattle, Washington, where on November 12 he learned that he had won the Nobel Prize for Literature; in his letter of acceptance, he acknowledged the influence of Strindberg on his work. He took temporary lodgings in San Francisco, Berkeley, and Lafayette, and late in 1937 he moved into the newly constructed Tao House, set on 160 acres in the California hills opposite Mount Diablo above what is now Danville.

O'Neill lived at Tao House for over six years, until early 1944, and completed four major, full-length plays in spite of the tremor that made writing more and more difficult, with intermittent periods when he stopped work because of his concern over the progress of World War II. He finished The Iceman Cometh in January 1940; HUGHIE, a one-act, in 1942; LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT in 1943; and both A TOUCH OF THE POET and A MOON FOR THE MISBEGOTTEN in 1944. His small writing study was isolated from the rest of the house, and after spending each long morning working on Long Day's Journey Into Night, fighting the tremor to inscribe the dialogue in his meticulously small handwriting, O'Neill would emerge drained and anguished.

In 1943 Oona O'Neill, just eighteen, married Charlie Chaplin in spite of her father's protests. O'Neill's tremor grew worse, making it difficult for him to control a pencil, and because he could not adjust to dictating or to composing at a typewriter, he found himself virtually unable to write. The O'Neills had become increasingly isolated at Tao House after their servants quit to engage in war-related work in 1942, so in 1944 they left to live temporarily at the Huntington Hotel in San Francisco, and the playwright destroyed some of his play manuscripts before moving to New York City in 1945.

The Iceman Cometh opened on October 9, 1946, with scenery by Robert Edmond Jones. The action unfolds in Harry Hope's flophouse, a version of the Hell Hole, and the characters are based on people O'Neill knew there. They drink in search of oblivion, cherishing their dreams of a better tomorrow until Hickey, a regular visitor, walks in to declare that the only way to find happiness is to face life honestly. The flophouse denizens are akin to the damned but still yearning for salvation, while Hickey faces his worst shame, that his wife's love for him has brought her nothing but suffering, and he kills her in order to save her.

FINAL CURTAIN, 1945–1953

O'Neill's last years form a tale of disintegration. He wrote little, if anything, after the war. In 1945 he left a sealed copy of Long Day's Journey Into Night in the Random House safe with instructions that it be published twenty-five years after his death and never produced. The Theatre Guild staged A Moon for the Misbegotten in 1947, touring from Columbus, Ohio, to Pittsburgh, Detroit, and St. Louis, but they did not bring the play to New York. In 1948 Carlotta walked out on him, but she returned after he got drunk and broke his arm, and they moved to Boston. Eugene Jr. slashed his wrists in 1950, and in the following year, O'Neill broke his leg and Carlotta was incorrectly diagnosed with mental illness; the true cause of her disorientation was overmedication. Fearing that someone else would try to finish his work, the playwright burned the drafts and scenarios of his unfinished cycle plays (unintentionally sparing More Stately Mansions), and he died on November 27, 1953, of degeneration of the cerebellum.

O'Neill's reputation blossomed posthumously in the late 1950s, and the director most closely associated with bringing his work back into public view was José Quintero. He revived The Iceman Cometh on May 8, 1956, with Jason Robards as Hickey, and six months later (November 7) opened Long Day's Journey Into Night (which had its world premiere in Stockholm on February 10, 1956) with Robards and Fredric March. Quintero's subsequent revivals included Desire Under the Elms (January 8, 1963) with George C. Scott, Rip Torn, and Colleen Dewhurst; Strange Interlude (March 11, 1963) with Geraldine Page as Nina; Marco Millions (February 20, 1964) with Hal Holbrook in the title role; Hughie (December 22, 1964) with Robards; A Moon for the Misbegotten (December 29, 1973) with Dewhurst and Robards; Anna Christie (April 14, 1977) with John Lithgow and Liv Ullmann; and Welded (June 10, 1981). Harold Clurman directed the premiere of A Touch of the Poet (October 2, 1958) with Helen Hayes, and Quintero revived the play (December 28, 1977) with Robards and Geraldine Fitzgerald.

In Long Day's Journey Into Night, O'Neill presents his most forthright essay in autobiography, depicting his family in the summer of 1912. The father, the mother, and the two grown sons engage in guilt and recrimination as they deal with their various dependencies on whiskey, on morphine, and on deceit. A Moon for the Misbegotten extends the story, following the fall of the older brother as he tries to deal with his guilt over the death of his mother and his own drinking problem, turning to the solace of a woman who knows she cannot save him.

A Touch of the Poet takes place in 1828 and tells the story of Cornelius Melody, the son of an Irish shebeen keeper who rose to be an officer in Wellington's army, had to resign his commission following a duel, and now, to his great shame, keeps a tavern in Massachusetts even while struggling to maintain the appearance of a gentleman. His daughter Sara loves Simon Harford, the son of an aristocratic family, whose father sends a lawyer to negotiate an end to their relationship. Melody, deeply insulted, tries to challenge him to a duel but ends brawling with the servants and thrown in jail. In despair over his crumbling self-image, Melody shoots his beloved mare.

O'Neill's last premiere was More Stately Mansions, in its published version as long as The Iceman Cometh and Long Day's Journey Into Night combined, opening in abridged form at the Kungliga Dramatiska Teatern in Stockholm in 1962. Quintero revived the play (October 31, 1967) at the Ahmanson Theatre in Los Angeles with Colleen Dewhurst as Sara, Arthur Hill as Simon, and Ingrid Bergman as Deborah. Set during 1832–1842, it followed A Touch of the Poet in what would have been the cycle. Deborah Harford retreats into her garden, to the refuge of her summerhouse and her daydream of what it would be like to be the mistress of a powerful man. She tells her son Simon the fairy tale of a king who dares not open a door that might lead to his lost realm, so he remains forever dispossessed. Simon contemplates Jean-Jacques Rousseau's conception of man as essentially good but corrupted by property and possession. At Simon's behest, Sara gradually takes control over the Harford empire, and she tries to leave her peasant origins behind in order to displace the Harfords, to live where they have lived and own what they have owned.

O'Neill remains the preeminent American dramatist of the 20th century. He led the theater away from the formulaic melodrama and contrived psychology of the 19th century and set a precedent that led to such playwrights as ARTHUR MILLER, TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, EDWARD ALBEE, SAM SHEPARD, DAVID MAMET, and TONY KUSHNER. Throughout his career he experimented with new ways to explore story, character, relationship, and psychology in stageable terms, moving from NATURALISM to EXPRESSIONISM to masks and interior monologues until he reached the mature, richly realistic plays of his later years. Scholars have analyzed his work in relation to Greek tragedy, Henrik Ibsen, Strindberg, Shaw, Gorky, SAMUEL BECKETT, the art theater movement, melodrama, Freudian psychology, Friedrich Nietzsche, Eastern philosophy, O'Neill's Irish roots, and gender relations. Many have traced the autobiographical nature of his work, all the way from the early one-acts that dramatized his more remarkable youthful experiences to the later plays that depicted his family either overtly or metaphorically. His legacy has expanded the horizons of theater and drama throughout the Western world.

[See also United States]

PLAYS: Before Breakfast (1916); Bound East for Cardiff (1916); Thirst (1916); Fog (1917); Ile (1917); In the Zone (1917); The Long Voyage Home (1917); The Sniper (1917); The Moon of the Caribbees (1918); The Rope (1918); Where the Cross Is Made (1918); The Dreamy Kid (1919); Beyond the Horizon (1920); Chris Christopherson (1920); Diff'rent (1920); The Emperor Jones (1920); Exorcism (1920); Anna Christie (1921); The Straw (1921); Gold (1921); The First Man (1922); The Hairy Ape (1922); All God's Chillun Got Wings (1924); The Ancient Mariner (1924); Desire Under the Elms (1924); Welded (1924); The Fountain (1925); The Great God Brown (1926); Lazarus Laughed (1928); Marco Millions (1928); Strange Interlude (1928); Dynamo (1929); Mourning Becomes Electra (1931); Ah, Wilderness! (1933); Days Without End (1934); The Iceman Cometh (1946); A Moon for the Misbegotten (1947); Long Day's Journey Into Night (1956); A Touch of the Poet (1957); Hughie (1958); More Stately Mansions (1962)

FURTHER READING

- Alexander, Doris. Eugene O'Neill's Creative Struggle: The Decisive Decade, 1924–1933. University Park: Pennsylvania State Univ. Press, 1992.
- Black, Stephen A. Eugene O'Neill: Beyond Mourning and Tragedy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1999.
- Bogard, Travis. Contour in Time: The Plays of Eugene O'Neill. Rev. ed. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1988.
- Gelb, Arthur, and Barbara Gelb. O'Neill. 1962. New York: Harper, 1974.
- Manheim, Michael. Eugene O'Neill's New Language of Kinship. Syracuse: Syracuse Univ. Press, 1982.
- Pfister, Joel. Staging Depth: Eugene O'Neill and the Politics of Psychological Discourse. Chapel Hill: Univ. of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Sheaffer, Louis. O'Neill: Son and Playwright. Boston: Little, Brown, 1968.
- . O'Neill: Son and Artist. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.
- Wainscott, Ronald H. Staging O'Neill: The Experimental Years, 1920–1934. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1988.

Jeffrey D. Mason

ONG KENG SEN (1963–)

During the late 1990s, SINGAPORE'S Ong Keng Sen emerged as one of Asia's best-known and most influential theater directors on the international stage. Ong's multilingual productions featuring actors from different performance traditions and cultures have challenged existing models of intercultural theater by highlighting rather than minimizing the discontinuities between individual Asian cultures, demonstrating the fiction of any vision of a monolithic Asia.

Initially trained as a lawyer, in 1987 Ong became artistic director of TheatreWorks, a Singaporean theater company founded in 1985. In collaboration with writer Michael Chiang and popular music composer Dick Lee, Ong staged a number of popular Singapore-themed musicals during his first decade at TheatreWorks, including Beauty World (1988), Fried Rice Paradise (1991), and Private Parts (1992). These productions attracted a young, affluent, English-speaking audience to the theater for the first time, building an audience for the company's more adventurous work that followed. By the mid-1990s Ong had already staged a number of works on more challenging themes, including KUO PAO KUN's Lao Jiu—Ninth Child (1990) and Singaporean playwright Tan Tarn How's The Lady of Soul and Her Ultimate "S" Machine (1993), a political satire.

After returning from graduate study at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts in 1994, Ong's work took a more adventurous approach to staging, content, and structure as he began to create original works with collaborators rather than starting with a completed script. The piece that firmly marked this new way of working was Broken Birds (1995), an original, environmental work that sought to excavate the nearly forgotten history of the karayuki, the Japanese prostitutes who worked in Singapore during the colonial era. That same year Ong formed the Flying Circus Project, bringing together practitioners of a wide range of Asian performance traditions from throughout the region. Out of these explorations came the international tours of Lear (1997), Desdemona (2000), and The Continuum—Beyond the Killing Fields (2001), which was based on the true story of Cambodian classical dancer Em Theay and others.

In 1999 Ong founded the Arts Network Asia, which sponsors a wide range of collaborations between artists throughout Asia. He was the founding curator of the In Transit Festival at Berlin's House of World Cultures in 2002, while his 2003 production of The Global Soul—the Buddha Project, which previewed there, has subsequently toured to Singapore and Europe. His European connections were furthered in 2002, when he directed the site-specific Search: Hamlet at a Danish castle, and in 2003, when he served as artist-in-residence at Vienna's Schauspielhaus, where he curated "Myths of Memory" and created two new works. Ong was the first Southeast Asian to direct at the New York Shakespeare Festival with playwright Chay Yew's A Language of Their Own (1995), and his staging of The Silver River by playwright DAVID HENRY HWANG and composer Bright Sheng was seen by audiences at the 2000 Spoleto Festival and the 2002 Lincoln Center Summer Festival.

SELECT PLAYS: Broken Birds (1995); Descendants of the Eunuch Admiral (1995); Six of the Best (1996); Destinies of Flowers in the Mirrors (1997); Lear (1997); Workhorse Afloat (1997); Desdemona (2000); The Spirits Play: Six Movements in a Strange House (2000); The Continuum—Beyond the Killing Fields (2001); Search: Hamlet (2002); The Global Soul—the Buddha Project (2003); The Myths of Memory: Offenes Geheimnis (Open Secret) (2003); Sandakan Threnody (2004); Geisha (2006)

FURTHER READING

- Bharucha, Rustom. "Consumed in Singapore: The Intercultural Spectacle of Lear." Yale Theater 3, no. 1 (Winter 2001): 107–127.
- Latrell, Craig. "After Appropriation." TDR: The Drama Review 44, no. 4 (Winter 2000): 44–55.
- Leverett, James. "Model City/Model Art." Yale Theater 32, no. 2 (Summer 2002): 70–75.
- Ong Keng Sen. "Encounters." TDR: The Drama Review 45, no. 5 (Fall 2001): 126–133.
- Oon, Clarissa. Theatre Life! A History of English-Language Theatre in Singapore Through the Straits Times (1958–2000). Singapore: Singapore Press Holdings, 2001.
- Peterson, William. Theatre and the Politics of Culture in Contemporary Singapore. Middletown, Ohio: Wesleyan Univ. Press, 2001.

William Peterson

ON GUARD BENEATH THE NEON LIGHTS

On Guard Beneath the Neon Lights (Nihongdeng xia de shaobing, huaju), by Shen Ximeng, Mo Yan, and Lu Xingchen, was one of the best-known plays of 20th-century Chinese spoken drama. This nine-act play was first staged in Shanghai, CHINA, in January 14, 1963, and was well received by the general public and the Chinese government. The Chinese officials praised not only the script but the director, crew, score, and performance, calling it wu hao xi (a play with five excellent elements). Drama critics fully confirmed its success, describing it as leading up to a new direction in military drama. Because of its popularity, it was adapted for the screen by Tian Ma Film in 1964. As anticipated, the film was a big box-office hit. In celebration of the play, many other performing troupes throughout the country staged it in the 1960s.

Primarily based on the true account of a model company of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) in Shanghai, the play depicted the young soldiers from the rural areas fighting against the capturing power of the cosmopolitan while they guarded the bustling Nanjing Road, a place noted for commercial grandeur, nightlife spectacle, and urban vice. Awestruck by the urban scenario and lifestyle, Lieutenant Chen Xi failed to carry on the PLA's tradition of simple living and hard working. He found his rural wife, Chun Ni, incompatible with his new status and unfit for Westernized Shanghai and mistreated her during her visit in Shanghai.

On a parallel with Chen Xi, Tong Anan, a new recruit from the city, did not conform to the military regulations and intended to withdraw from the company upon receiving criticism. Unlike Chen Xi, Sergeant Zhao Dada could not adapt to the metropolitan environment and requested relocation to a battleground. To resolve these troubles, the company commander Lu Dacheng and political supervisor Lu Hua timely engendered class education to increase soldiers' awareness of the hidden dangers beneath the neon lights. The play also showcased a group of Nationalist agents who attempted to destroy Shanghai and murder Tong's sister. This stirred and propelled Chen, Tong, Zhao, and their fellow soldiers into the work of eradicating corrupting forces in the city.

This play trumpets a new model of military drama transforming the traditional presentation of battles and heroic acts into a realistic representation of how New China and its masters reconfigure and reconstruct their power in a new battlefield—the city. Although the play superficially features the confrontation between the Nationalist and the Communist, Chinese tradition and Western influence, the play reveals that the city-rural challenge and transformation is an inevitable task with which the Chinese Communist Party must deal. As one of the early post-1949 dramatic works that touch on the city issues, the play, on the one hand, answers the call of Chinese leaders to associate the rural with the city and presents one such integration. On the other hand, it illustrates a long-practiced pro-village ideology.

The ideology tends to relegate urban history to a subordinate role in the grand narrative of modern China and drives the city into the embattlement of political assertions and economic strategies, and it functions as moral and social criterion evaluating characters' deeds and words in the play. For years, the play has been regarded as both military and urban drama.

FURTHER READING

Esherick, Joseph, ed. Remaking the Chinese City. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1999.

Haiping Yan. Theater and Society: An Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1998.

Zhongguo dangdai wenxue yanjiu ziliao: Ni hong deng xia de shao bing zhuanji [The materials of contemporary Chinese literature studies: The special collection of On Guard Beneath the Neon Lights]. Ed. by the Chinese Department of Nanjing Normal Univ. Nanjing: N.p., 1979.

Ping Fu

ONNA NO ISSHO See A WOMAN'S LIFE

ON THE JOB

On the Job was the first play by Montreal, CANADA, playwright DAVID FENNARIO, and its success came as a great surprise to the Canadian theater community and Fennario himself. Born in the working-class neighborhood of Pointe Saint Charles, Fennario was a high school dropout who spent several years drifting through short-term jobs, including working in the shipping room of a dress-making factory, an experience he would draw on to create On the Job. Fennario entered Montreal's Dawson College CÉGEP as a mature student in the early 1970s where his English teacher, Sally Nelson, encouraged him to allow the college to publish his journal. Maurice Podbrey, artistic director and co-founder of the Centaur Theatre, read the journal, published as Without a Parachute, and invited Fennario to be writer-in-residence despite the fact that Fennario had never been in a theater in his life. Podbrey's instinct proved astute, and On the Job was the result.

On the Job, originally directed by David Calderisi in 1975, takes place in the shipping room of a Montreal dress factory near Christmas. The workers exchange "French jokes," sing old songs, and pass a bottle of cheap liquor around in expectation of the afternoon off due to the holiday. A late order from a major department store prompts the newly hired manager to cancel the holiday, heightening tension. The French-speaking foreman Rene, whose "taberna" muttering character borders on stereotype, is the focus of the workers' frustration in the first scenes, especially Gary who seems ready for a fight from the opening scenes. Billy, who has grown children and has worked in the shipping room longer than anyone else, functions as peacemaker, trying to hold on to his job for the next eight years so he can collect his pension. When Billy says, "I don't think there's good people or bad people. There's just people," the feisty Gary responds, "Bullshit." It becomes clear that Rene's Anglophone boss, Shaw, pressures him as much if not more than Rene pressures Gary and the other workers. Ultimately the characters are united in a kind of visceral class consciousness that overrides the timeworn linguistic and cultural antipathy between working-class Montrealers from English- and French-speaking backgrounds. When the short-tempered Gary is fired, the other workers, including Rene, stand by him.

Fennario was to become much more didactic in his later plays, filling his scripts with Brechtian devices such as narrators, historical facts, and direct diatribes against the ruling elite and bourgeoisie. Although politically vague compared to Fennario's later work, the slice of raw, frustrated, masculine life presented in On The Job retains its effectiveness after a quarter century.

Fennario's own story as a poor boy getting his play produced at Montreal's premiere English-language theater made critics, journalists, and the public notice it and him. Fennario was invited to be a guest on CBC television with the urbane and cosmopolitan host Laurier Lapierre. Fennario barely responded to Lapierre's questions, an event alluded to in Fennario's next play Nothing to Lose. Somehow Fennario had managed to make being a monosyllabic Anglo-Quebecer look interesting.

FURTHER READING

Allison, Dianne. "On the Job an Impeccable Performance." Montreal Gazette (October 8, 1976).

Fennario, David. Without a Parachute. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1974.

Zimmerman, Cynthia. The Work: Conversations with English-Canadian Playwrights. Toronto: Coach House Press, 1982.

Donald Cameron McManus

ONWUEME, TESS (1955--)

Together we form this moon shape. Lie in ambush surrounding the throne as the men emerge. We together in this naked legion, will salute them in our natural state. Taunting their eyes with their own shame. This naked dance is a last resort women have had over the ages. If four men force us to the wall, we must use it as our final weapon. Unusual problems demand unusual solutions.

—Omu, Movement 5, The Reign of Wazobia

In the prologue to The Reign of Wazobia by Tess Onwueme, the matriarch Omu's proposed strategy of female insurrection against a male campaign to dethrone Anioma Kingdom's feminist sovereign Wazobia represents a provocative semiotic subversion of patriarchy. An army of female bodies, objectified for ages as things of sex, transform themselves into political statements against the kingdom's conventional structure of male privilege. Men in Anioma Kingdom in the midwestern region of Ilaa believe that "serious matters of state concern are too heavy for the brittle heads of women and children." The women's collective defiance of such assumptions by the destabilization of that ultimate gendered signifier of tradition—the monarchy itself—sets the subversive tone of Onwueme's The Reign of Wazobia. First written and published in 1988, when tradition, ritual, and mythology had become key words informing Nigerian anticolonial narratives in dramatic theory and practice, Onwueme's play sought to decolonize the role of women within the nationalist project to establish a more democratic and pluralistic society.

Tess Onwueme attended the universities of Ife and Benin before moving to the UNITED STATES, where she occupies an endowed chair at the University of Wisconsin, Eau Claire. Her plays include Then She Said It (2002), Shakara: Dance-Hall Queen (2000), Tell It to Women (1999), The Missing Face (1997), Riot in Heaven (1996), Parables for a Season (1993), Legacies (1989), Mirror for Campus (1987), Ban Empty Barn (1986), The Desert Encroaches (1985), The Broken Calabash (1984), and A Hen Too Soon (1983). Her plays consistently interrogate conventional modes of representing women as subjects of history and modernity, particularly their resonances within notions of "mythology" and "traditionalism," which the emergent middle classes were obsessed with in Nigeria. Onwueme does not simply incorporate women's stories into existing myths; she goes on to make mythology and mythmaking an unsafe category of social and historical knowledge heavily implicated in the ideologies of patriarchy. She justifiably uses Igbo mythology to subvert the male prerogatives justified by traditional non-Western cultural norms.

Onwueme's plays The Broken Calabash and A Hen Too Soon challenge the institution of marriage as a socializing idiom that enhances female subjugation to patriarchy. Their themes critique marriage as a social contract that inherently suffocates female subjectivity and agency. The Reign of Wazobia goes even further in visualizing women's transition from the marginal citizenship to which they were relegated by Indigenous and foreign traditions to asserting their rights to more proactive citizenship within a democratic framework. The Reign of Wazobia makes a plea for what Onwueme recently called "internal reparations" (for women) as a complement to the compensation for transatlantic slavery demanded by members of the Africa diaspora from contemporary centers of Euro-American modernity (Onwueme, 2002).

The incorporation of the word Wazobia in the play's title is deeply contradictory since it is fraught with subversive innuendo. As a neologism, Wazobia means "come together," or unity. It is derived from Nigeria's three primary languages—Yoruba, Hausa, and Igbo. Coined by nationalists who believed that the unity of these three ethnic groups guaranteed nationhood, the word continues to be perpetuated by neocolonial nationalists, who also link the preservation of the national union to harmony among the colonially derived ethnic entities. The title Wazobia provokes the question of whether the play is a clichéd call to national unity. Before long it becomes apparent that Onwueme has instead subverted a neologism with a postindependence call for unity among women fragmented by patriarchy, ethnicity, and class. It is, however, a vision that equally critiques monolithic political collectives as utopian ideals that are inevitably untenable as long as internal inequities remain within such collectives.

[See also Africa]

SELECT PLAYS: A Hen Too Soon (1983); The Broken Calabash (1984); The Desert Encroaches (1985); The Reign of Wazobia (1988); Legacies (1989); Parables for a Season (1993); Riot in Heaven (1996); The Missing Face (1997); Tell It to Women (1999); Shakara: Dance-Hall Queen (2000)

FURTHER READING

Ajayi-Soyinka, Folabo. "Who Can Silence Her Drums? An Analysis of the plays of Tess Onwueme." In African Theatre. Women. Ed. by Martin Banham, James Gibbs, and Femi Osofisan. With guest editor Jane Plastow. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 2002.

Bartlett, Juliette E. "Modernity and Tradition in Tess Onwueme's Plays." In Nigeria in the Twentieth Century. Ed. by Toyin Falola. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press, 2002.

Onwueme, T. O. "Buried in the Rubble: The Missing Face in African Literature." Keynote address at the 28th Annual African Literature Association (ALA) Convention, San Diego, California, April 5, 2002.

Uko, Iniobong I. Gender and Identity in the works of Osonye Tess Onwueme. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2004.

Awam Amkpa

OPEN THEATER

The origins of Open Theater (Teatro Abierto) can be traced back to two specific events in 1980 that powerfully illuminate the authoritarian mechanisms of the military dictatorship that devastated ARGENTINA between 1976 and 1983. One of these events, an instance of censorship, occurred when the government's militaristic administration decided to eliminate the department Historia del Teatro Argentino (History of Argentine Theatre) from the Conservatorio Nacional de Arte Dramático (National Conservatory of the Dramatic Arts), under the spurious logic that such theater did not actually exist. This decision came at the end of a long series of unfortunate government interventions within the cultural and educational sectors, including the proliferation of black lists and the shutting down of certain theaters.

The other, an instance of self-censorship, occurred when a group of actors sought the participation of playwright OSVALDO DRAGÚN in composing for them the script that would later become his play To the Rapist (Al violador). Owing to the piece's controversial subject matter—it tells the story of an outcast rapist who becomes a government assassin—and the fear of reprisals, the actors ultimately rejected the project. In this climate of generalized fear, and with the desire to assert the validity of Argentine theater, Open Theater emerged as a form of opposition to the dominant, closed society. Its first season lasted from July 28 to September 21, 1981, and proved a success among critics and audiences alike. Various factors explain this initial success: its substantial media publicity; the fact that most of the pieces were penned by well-known playwrights; the participation of popular television and film actors; and the organization of its performances, composed of twenty brief one-acts, performed thrice daily during—what was for Argentines—the unusual hour of 6:00 P.M.

Yet it was the burning down of the Teatro del Picadero, home to the series' first performances, that would ensure the memory of Open Theater in the public consciousness. This tragic event in August 1981 was followed by demonstrations of solidarity and support for the series. Among the sixteen theaters that had offered their space to ensure that the series would continue, Open Theater selected the theater Tabarís.

The following year, the series was expanded to reach the entire nation. Yet it was not long before serious methodological, aesthetic, and political objections were raised. The first of these pertained to that season's selection process. Of 412 plays and seventy-five experimental projects, thirty-three and seventeen, respectively, were chosen. Celebrated dramatists like GRISELDA GAMBARO, Eduardo Pavlovsky, and Ricardo Monti were excluded from the series.

As a result, the magazine Humor opened its pages to a public debate, led by writers Mario O'Donnell—also excluded by the judges—and Roberto Cassa. The former accused the organizers of privileging a realist aesthetic that confined the more AVANT-GARDE pieces to the experimental session. The latter responded by asserting that, by his account, the quality of the productions was notably better than those of the previous year.

Yet undoubtedly the greatest weakness plaguing this second season was political in nature. Since the submission deadline was in March of 1982, most of the selected plays were out of touch with the nation's most recent political events. Notably absent was the Falkland Islands War, which marked the undeniable failure and slow death of the military government.

Open Theater's third season's series was organized around the slogan "For a popular theater without censorship" and sought to reflect upon the past seven years of dictatorship. It began with a large parade, where an effigy meant to symbolize censorship was burned. Among this season's most notable characteristics were its strongly collectivist character—seven groups of four authors and four directors contributed to each piece—and the space it made for promising young female artists, as much in the writing as in the directorial realm.

In 1984, twenty-one authors were invited to write on the theme of liberty, and five free cultural workshops were offered in which these scripts would be developed into plays. Yet the majority focused on the traumatic experiences of an authoritarian past. In the process, they displayed a marked inability to imagine society under new, democratic conditions. As a result, the series was canceled at the last moment.

The 1985 season, the series' last, can be divided into three parts. The first, Teatraro, was an inaugural street festival, held in distinct locations throughout the country. There were performances in plazas, at train and subway stations, in public transportation, and in various stores. Theater groups from all over Latin America were invited to participate, and September 21 of that year was declared the Day of Latin American Theatre. The second, a program called Otros Autores, Otros Directores (Other Authors, Other Directors) consisted of four scriptwriting seminars, overseen by famous playwrights. Finally, Otro teatro (Other Theater) convened groups of writers to explore such delicate issues as the imprisoned and the "disappeared," the state of working-class women, and the marginalized sectors of Buenos Aires' citizens.

Ultimately, then, Open Theater, which began as a frank resistance to military dictatorship, ended up weakened by the changing historical circumstances. In its beginnings it constituted the first cultural manifestation against the regime. Yet it was this very attribute that would lead to the vacillations that marked the development of later seasons and that showed the series to be incapable of reflecting on its role within the context of the transition to democracy. Curiously, while its ambitions grew, attendance dropped. In aesthetic terms, its marked preference for works of a naturalist and realist bent implied an effort to follow existing national theatrical trends that were more relevant in the prior decade than at the dawn of a new era. Nevertheless, its most prominent characteristic was rooted in the ability it demonstrated to mobilize an entire society against the abuses of repression. As such, it occupies a prominent place in the history of Argentine theater.

FURTHER READING

- Arancibia, Juana and Zulema Mirkin, eds. Teatro argentino durante el Proceso (1976–1983). Buenos Aires: Vinciguerra, 1992.
- Giella, Miguel Angel. "Teatro Abierto 1981." Volumen I: Teatro Argentino bajo vigilancia. Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1991.
- Graham-Jones, Jean. Exorcising History: Argentine Theatre Under Dictatorship. London: Associated Univ. Presses, 2000.
- Taylor, Diana. Disappearing Acts: Spectacles of Gender and Nationalism in Argentina's "Dirty War". Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 1997.
- Villegas, Juan. "Historicizing Latin American Theatre." Theatre Journal 41, no. 4 (December 1989): 505–514.

Norberto Cambiasso (Tr. by Gabriel Milner)

OPERA KECO A See THE COCKROACH OPERA

OPTIMISTIC HESKAYA See AN OPTIMISTIC TRAGEDY

AN OPTIMISTIC TRAGEDY

An Optimistic Tragedy (Optimisticheskaya tragediya), written by the Soviet dramatist Vsevolod Vishnevsky (1900–1951) in 1932 and performed the following year, is based on the March 1921 uprising by Soviet sailors of the Baltic fleet on Kronstadt, a naval base on Kotlin Island in the Gulf of Finland, against Bolshevik political domination. Its rhetorical and propagandist form argues for a mode of socialist realist drama of melodramatic and romantic revolutionary hyperbole.

The play dramatizes the conflict as one between anarchism and Party discipline, against a background of foreign military intervention. Most of the action takes place aboard ship and the central conflict is embodied in the persons of the "Chief" of a group of anarchist sailors, whose principal henchman is nicknamed "Gruff" (because of his voice), who are opposed by a woman commissar sent by the Bolsheviks to deal with the anarchists. Her main supporter is a Finnish Communist sailor, Vainonen, who is murdered by "Gruff." Other important issues that the play deals with center on one of the sailors, Aleksei, a first-class seaman with natural leadership qualities, and the commander of the ship, who is a prerevolutionary naval officer of the old school. The play shows how the commissar recognizes that winning over the anarchists involves winning Aleksei for the cause, because of his personal qualities and because his rejection of Bolshevism is based on an ignorance that can be rectified. In this she is successful, as she is in persuading the captain to lend his expertise to the Bolsheviks, even though his hostility to the new regime is unrelenting.

The most dramatic scenes include one in which, threatened with a direct assault on her person by a half-naked sailor, the commissar summarily shoots him dead; a scene in which Aleksei's authority has been so skillfully exploited by the commissar in undermining that of the "Chief" that the former has the latter led away to be shot by his hitherto intimidated followers; and the final scene, where the dying commissar is brought on stage following the successful repulsion of the interventionist forces by the—now united—body of sailors. The final stage direction follows the commissar's last words: "Show them . . . What the navy's made of . . .," and gives an indication of the play's "revolutionary romanticism" (to use MAKSIM GORKY's phrase) as well as its naïve imperviousness to cynicism: "The regiment stands bareheaded. Every muscle and nerve taut, courage at its peak. The sun is reflected in their eyes . . . A musical call breaks the silence . . . Numberless beings are alive . . . The heart surges with delight at the sight of a world giving birth to people who scorn the old lie about the fear of death. Pulsating arteries. Like the flow of great rivers bathed in light, like the titanic overwhelming forces of nature, terrifying in their mounting strength, there come sounds purged of all melody, raw, crude, colossal—the thunder of cataclysms and the onrushing floods of life."

The stage direction also helps to explain why the "tragedy" is considered "optimistic." Vishnevsky had himself served in the navy during the Civil War and appears to have been permanently attracted to the theme of the Kronstadt rising, writing a play, The Trial of the Kronstadt Insurrectionists (1921), and producing the screenplay for Yefim Dzigan's 1936 film, We Are From Kronstadt.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

- Maryamov, Alexander. "Vsevolod Vishnevsky at His Best." In Soviet Literature Monthly 11 (November 1965).
- Segel, Harold B. Russian Drama from Gorky to the Present. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 1993.
- Vishnevsky, Vsevolod. "Optimistic Tragedy." Tr. by Margaret Wettlin. In Soviet Literature Monthly 11 (November 1965).
- . "An Optimistic Tragedy." In Four Soviet Plays, ed. by B. Blake. Tr. by H.G. Scott and Robert S. Carr. Reissue of 1937 Moscow edition. New York: Benjamin Blom, 1972.
- . "An Optimistic Tragedy." In Classic Soviet Plays, ed. by A. Mikhailova. Tr. by Robert Daglish. Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1979.

Nick Worrall

ORDET See THE WORD

O REI DA VELA See THE CANDLE KING

ÖRKÉNY, ISTVÁN (1912–1979)

Master of the modern Hungarian "grotesque," István Örkény is HUNGARY's most influential playwright of the second half of the 20th century. He was born on April 5, 1912, in Budapest. His World War II experiences in a labor brigade at the Russian front and as a prisoner of war influenced his early, naturalistic writing. After a period of prohibition from publishing following the 1956 Hungarian Revolution, he became a celebrated writer of short stories as well as a major playwright.

Örkény brought a startling and innovative point of view to themes current in Hungarian drama of the 1960s and 1970s. This was a period when the communist regime was loosening compulsory artistic norms. Playwrights were increasingly finding ways to express disillusionment with the system holding the country in its grip and with the manifestly failed ideology sustaining that system. The Hungarian grotesque shares a kinship with the work of such playwrights of the region as the Polish SŁAWOMIR MROŻEK, the Czech VÁCLAV HAVEL, and the Romanian MARIN SORESCU. Whereas Western ABSURDISM posits an a priori absurd world that deprives man of a tragic dimension by presenting him as a helplessly flailing being in the wasteland of existence, the grotesque traps its characters in an inscrutable, labyrinthine, and irrational world determined by the nature and structure of society.

THE TÓTH FAMILY (Tótfék, 1967), Örkény's first grotesque play, is a mordant satire about a family actively participating in its own victimization to achieve what it perceives—mistakenly—as its self-interest. The play anticipates Örkény's other, more absurd treatments of the ambivalent relationship between tyrant and victim. In his last stage work, Screenplay (Forgatókönyv, 1979), the integrity of the protagonist's identity dissipates in the course of a show trial presented as a circus performance. In Stevie in the Bloodbath (Pisti a vérzivatarban, 1969) the title character, played by four actors, represents the national fate. The play is a stylized, carnivallike chronology of modern Hungarian catastrophes, in which Stevie never achieves a coherent identity. He is often simultaneously on antagonistic sides; he is killed only to reap-pear; at one point he becomes a vacuum, at another the Messiah. The play has been called a pretragedy, since Stevie never achieves the personhood necessary to become a tragic figure.

The question of identity is also at the core of BLOOD RELATIONS (Vérrokonok, 1974) and Key Searchers (Kulcskeresők, 1975), which examine aspects of the national character. The seven characters of Blood Relations are related by the absurdly misdirected focus of their lives: the railroad, which is metaphorical for the cause the nation has wasted its energies on. Each character either loves, hates, dies for, spies for, or is otherwise consumed by the railroad. Key Searchers is about the Hungarian capacity for illusion in an all-too-real world. Örkény's lyrical, realistic COMEDY Catsplay (Macskajáték, 1969), about a sexagenarian love triangle, raises the question of emigration to the comforts of the West versus the dogged determination to stay home.

Örkény was awarded Hungary's two most prestigious literary prizes, the Attila József and the Kossuth. He died on June 24, 1979, in Budapest.

SELECT PLAYS: The Toth Family (Tótfék, 1967); Catsplay (Macskajáték, 1969); Stevie in the Bloodbath (Pisti a vérzivatarban, 1969); Blood Relations (Vérrokonok, 1974); Key Searchers (Kulcskeresők, 1975); Screenplay (Forgatókönyv, 1979)

FURTHER READING

- Bécsy, Tamás. Kalandok a drámával, Magyar drámák 1945–1989 [Adventures with Drama, Hungarian Dramas 1945–1989]. Budapest: Balassi Kiadó, 1996.
- Czigány, Lóránt. The Oxford History of Hungarian Literature. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1984.
- Ézsaiás, Erzsébet. Mai magyar dráma [Hungarian Drama Today]. Budapest: Kossuth Könyvkiadó, 1986.
- Müller, Péter. A groteszk dramaturgiája [The dramaturgy of the grotesque]. Budapest: Magvető Könyvkiadó, 1990.
- Radnóti, Zsuzsa. Lázadó dramaturgiák [Dramaturgies in revolt]. Budapest: Palatinus, 2003.

Eugene Brogyányi

ØRNSBO, JESS (1932–)

Jess: Do plays have to be funny?

Ørnsbo: Yes, otherwise it cannot be serious. There is no regular explanation of the world that is not at the same time a babbling joke. Fun is the antistubstance with which we try to fight the insufferableness of existence. Without fun we could not cope with the most wrong construction of this wrong world.

—Jess Ørnsbo interviewing himself, 1988

Danish playwright and poet Jess Ørnsbo (born on August 26, 1932, in Copenhagen, DENMARK) is the godfather of new Danish drama, the boom of playwrights that flourished in the 1990s. His point of departure is MODERNISM, especially ABSURDISM. Ørnsbo has managed to be an enfant terrible and provocateur practically from his debut as a playwright in 1968 with The Dwarf that Disappeared (Dværgen der blev væk), written in 1962 and premiered at the Student Theatre, which was the period's most significant experimental theater. The inspiration from EUGÈNE IONESCO and SAMUEL BECKETT is clear, but lines can also be drawn to AUGUST STRINDBERG'S CHAMBER PLAYS and from Slavic, especially Polish, literature.

Ørnsbo has a university degree in Slavic philology and has written a doctoral thesis about STANISLAW WITKIEWICZ. But in a broader perspective, an equally strong inspiration comes from the kind of coarse real life he came to know from his childhood in the popular Vesterbro quarter of Copenhagen, including a deep pleasure of absurd linguistic nonsense and appreciation of odd types often from the lower strata of society, a world somewhere between REALISM and SURREALISM. A clamorous scandal arose with Ørnsbo's television play The Hash-tree (Hashtreæt), written in 1968 and produced in 1973, an absurd prophecy of the bourgeois confrontation with the hippie movement, which was presented in anything but a romantic light, actually as a sect that thought it could fly! For years Ørnsbo had to fight to be performed. And when he was, his universe was almost automatically criticized for being too disgusting, too animalesque, too black, and too disrespectful of ordinary dramaturgical rules.

It was not until the 1990s that his plays were regularly produced. A kind of breakthrough came with The Trap (Fælden, 1982) and The Children After Today (Børnene derpå, 1984), satirical, absurd COMEDIES about an average couple's existence in a dissolving welfare society, including bizarre fights between parents and children. But it was with The Wrong Ones (De forkerte, 1990) that Ørnsbo reached a larger public and almost unanimous critical recognition: a kaleidoscopic, autobiographical story about a family in a Denmark occupied by the Germans during World War II, a remarkable mixture of DOCUMENTARY and grotesque approaches.

The formula father-mother-children is recurrent in Ørnsbo's plays. This matrix is found in plays like Astma-5 (written 1969, performed 1995), Mayonnaise (Majonæse, 1985), and Ulysses from Vrå (Odysseus fra Vrå, 1993). Education and family and social life are seen as mechanisms of humiliation and war. Ørnsbo takes the part of the defenseless but without being sentimental. The parents are often more infantile and immature than the children; an immense craving or thirst for affection and tenderness breaks out in its opposite: hatred, revenge, aggression. His principal work from the 1990s THE CLUB (Klubben, 1995) circles around this motif. In 1987 he published a volume of fourteen plays, accompanied by harsh attacks on critics and theater leaders, where he defines theater as "the tear and memory of society."

SELECT PLAYS: The Dwarf that Disappeared (Dværgen der blev væk, 1962); Astma-5 (1969); Jealousy (television-play, 1973); The Serbskij

Institute (Serbskij-instituttet, 1973); The Holy People from Vanløse (De hellige fra Vanløse, 1978); The Hobos (television play, Strejferne, 1979); Life in Denmark (Livet i Danmark, 1980); The Trap (Fælden, 1982); The Children After Today (Børnene derpå, 1984); Candies in the Kitchen (television play, Bolsjer i køkkenet, 1985); Mayonnaise (Majonæse, 1985); Love Without Yllers (Kjærlighed uden yllers, 1986); The Wrong Ones (De forkerte, 1990); Johnny Frankikso (1991); 13 Square Meters (13 kvadratmeter, 1991); Ulysses from Vrå (Odysseus fra Vrå, 1993); The Weedy Fellow (Splejsen, 1993); The Club (Klubben, 1995); No Man's Land (Ingenmandsland, 1995); Sewer and Alas (Kloak og ve, 1996); Welfare—Violence (Velfærd—Voldførd, 1997)

FURTHER READING

Kistrup, Jens. "Playwright for and Against Theatre." Danish Literary Magazine 5 (1993).
Theil, Per, and Lise Garsdal. Hvem der? Scener fra 90'erne [Who's There? Scenes From the 90's]. Copenhagen: Høst og Søn, 2000.

Bent Holm

ORPHEUS

The first important dramatic work by JEAN COCTEAU, Orpheus (1926) is based on the myth of the classical lyric poet with whom Cocteau strongly identified. As the artist said of its film adaptation: "It isn't really a film, it is myself, a sort of projection of what really concerns me."

The play is set in contemporary Thrace, with Orpheus and Eurydice imagined as a modern-day bohemian couple. Orpheus, a celebrated poet, has withdrawn from public life in obsessive pursuit of inspiration from the spirit world. As he listens for ghostly communications via a horse, his wife Eurydice breaks a window every day so she can receive a visit from an attentive young glazier, Heurtebise. Eurydice decides to do away with the horse with the help of Aglaonice, a poet and fierce mistress of the Bacchantes. While Orpheus is out, Heurtebise reveals he has brought poison from Aglaonice. But neither can bring themselves to kill the horse, although in the process Heurtebise reveals his magical powers. Disturbed, Eurydice throws him out, but not before sending a letter to Aglaonice in an envelope the latter provided. Too late—the envelope is also poisoned—and Death arrives to take Eurydice to the Underworld and in the process leaves her rubber gloves. Heurtebise advises a bereft Orpheus to put on the gloves and walk through the bedroom mirror to the Underworld.

Orpheus retrieves Eurydice but on condition: if he looks at her, she will die again—this time forever. But neither can endure the strain, and in minutes Orpheus has sent Eurydice to eternal death with a mere glance. A crowd of Bacchantes has gathered outside the house, hungry for blood. Orpheus goes to confront them and is decapitated, although his head continues to cry out for Eurydice. His wife leads his spirit back through the mirror, and they both call for Heurtebise to join them. In the final scene, the three sit down to an otherworldly lunch.

The play is not so much a dramatic narrative as a portrait of the artist's psychological and symbolic vocabulary. Its characters are less memorable than the world in which they move, where an everyday SURREALISM abounds: mirrors are doorways to death, glaziers are really guardian angels in disguise, and literary critics are bloodthirsty Bacchantes. In the midst of this magic, the artist struggles to hear the sound of true poetry—a calling that renders him deaf to the human voices around him. With characteristic ambivalence, Cocteau sees the artist's role as both sublime and absurd, and the play constantly deflates Orpheus's lofty ambitions as much as it celebrates them.

Cocteau wrote Orpheus during a deep depression, following the death of his lover Raymond Radiguet in 1924. Ostracized by the surrealists and addicted to opium, the writer's sense of himself as an outcast was only heightened by the play's reception. Orpheus opened in Paris on June 17, 1926, to mixed reviews. Many found the play's mix of myth and domesticity tonally confusing, but the play was revived a year later, with Cocteau himself in the role of Heurtebise.

[See also France]

FURTHER READING

Ashton, Dore, ed. Jean Cocteau and the French Scene. New York: Abbeville Press, 1984.

Brown, Frederick. An Impersonation of Angels: A Biography of Jean Cocteau. New York: Viking, 1968.

Cocteau, Jean. Orpheus. Tr. by John Savacool. In The Infernal Machine and Other Plays. New York: New Directions, 1963. 97–150.

Charlotte Stoudt

ORTON, JOE (1933–1967)

I'm a believer in original sin. I find people profoundly bad and irresistibly funny.

—Joe Orton, 1986

Born John Kingsley Orton in Leicester, ENGLAND, in 1933, Orton's fame rests on the technical brilliance of his plays, their risqué subject matter, and the sensational nature of his death in 1967 (bludgeoned by his lover Kenneth Halliwell, who then committed suicide). Orton's major works include ENTERTAINING MR SLOANE (1964), LOOT (1966), and What the Butler Saw (1969). Other works include The Ruffian on the Stair (1964), The Erpingham Camp (1966), The Good and Faithful Servant (1967), and Funeral Games (1968). His first plays Fred and Madge (1959) and The Visitors (1961) were published for the first time in 1998. His archive is housed at the University of Leicester.

After attending the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, Orton realized that his talents lay in writing rather than ACTING. Educated and encouraged by Halliwell, he began writing novels with him. Orton's solo work draws on influences as diverse as Ronald Firbank, JEAN GENET, HAROLD PINTER, Greek drama, and Whitehall FARCE. He encapsulated this fusion of farce and TRAGEDY, structure and anarchy, with the comment:

I always say that the theatre is the Temple of Dionysus, and not Apollo. You do the Dionysus thing on your typewriter, and then you allow a little Apollo in, just a little to shape and guide it. (Orton interview with Alan Brien, quoted in Lahr, 1978)

His plays are remarkable for their frank depiction of homosexuality when homosexual acts were still illegal and censored by the Lord Chamberlain. Orton achieved this by inverting society's accepted moral structure, so that outrageous behavior is greeted with equanimity, while the mundane attracts comment. The Ruffian on the Stair, for example, opens with a husband telling his wife about his appointment with a man in the toilets at Kings Cross station. She replies, "You always go to such interesting places." Entertaining Mr Sloane scandalized audiences with its depiction of a brother and sister sexually sharing the young man who murdered their father. Loot was more controversial, satirizing police brutality, Roman Catholicism, and the media's obsession with criminals. What the Butler Saw is the pinnacle of Orton's crusade against society's pretensions and represents the perfect fusion of genres. Set in a mental hospital on a set designed for farce (French windows; multiple doors, windows, and cupboards), the play deals with lunacy, incest, adultery, malpractice, and homosexuality.

Orton's life and work epitomize the social and cultural shifts that occurred in Britain in the 1960s. Born working class, his socially ambitious mother saved to send him to an independent school, but in her ignorance, she sent him to a commercial college rather than an academic institution. Her pretensions to grandeur, coupled with the commercial vocabulary Orton learned at school, provided him with a rich seam of COMEDY and dialogue style for his plays.

At the time of his death, Orton was negotiating with the Beatles to write a film for the band (eventually published as Up Against It). Choosing Orton was a reflection of his own fame; but it also reflected the growth of the cult of the celebrity as it was being refashioned by working-class provincials like himself and the Beatles. Orton's response to this accolade demonstrates his confidence in his star status; it also epitomizes the "Ortonesque":

Because all teenagers are supposed to imitate the Beatles I mustn't have them doing certain things. I wrote a story, but actually as it turned out, by page 25 they had committed adultery, murder, dressed in drag, been in prison, seduced the daughter of a Priest, I mean the niece of a Priest, blown up a war memorial and all sorts of things like that. (qtd. in Hanson, 1967)

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: Fred and Madge (1959); The Visitors (1961); Entertaining Mr Sloane (1964); The Ruffian on the Stair (1964); The Erpingham Camp (1966); Loot (1966); The Good and Faithful Servant (1967); Up Against It (1967); Funeral Games (1968); What the Butler Saw (1969)

FURTHER READING

- Bull, J., and F. Gray. "Joe Orton." In Essays on Contemporary British Drama, ed. by Hedwig Bock and Albert Wertheim. Munich: Hueber, 1981.
- Coppa, F. "Introduction" to Fred and Madge, The Visitors: Two Plays, by Joe Orton. London: Nick Hern Bks., 1998.
- Hanson, Barry. Interview with Orton on Crimes of Passion program, June 1967.
- Lahr, J. Prick Up Your Ears: The Biography of Joe Orton. London: Allen Lane, 1978.
- Orton, J. The Complete Plays. London: Methuen, 1976.
- . The Orton Diaries: Including the Correspondence of Edna Welthorpe and Others. Ed. by John Lahr. London: Methuen, 1986.

Kate Dorney

OSANAI KAORU (1881–1928)

Osanai Kaoru, Japanese director, critic, translator, and playwright, defined the course of SHINGEKI in the early 20th century. At the Free Theater (Jiyū Gekijō) and the Tsukiji Little Theater (TLT; Tsukiji Shōgekijō), Osanai's productions of modern European classics, as well as new works by Japanese playwrights like MORI ŌGAI, TSUBOUCHI SHŌYŌ, and KUBOTA MANTARŌ, were groundbreaking. Throughout his career he introduced Japanese readers to the latest trends in modern European drama.

While still an undergraduate in English literature at Tokyo University, he became acquainted with Ōgai and SHINPA actor Ii Yōhō, for whose company he served as DRAMATURG from 1904 until 1906, also directing various Western plays. By 1906, growing frustrated with shinpa's resistance to reform, he quit Ii's company and, together with several leading naturalist authors like Tayama Katai and Shimazaki Tōson, established the Ibsen Society to promote the study and production of the Norwegian's plays. Together with kabuki actor Ichikawa Sadanji II, who had returned from an eye-opening tour of Europe in 1907, Osanai founded the Free Theatre; its first production, in 1909, of HENRIK IBSEN'S JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN, was one of the major cultural events of that generation. The Free Theatre trained kabuki actors in modern naturalistic acting techniques, but the TLT, which Osanai opened in 1924 with Hijikata Yoshi and others, forged a complete break with the traditional theater. He alienated many Japanese playwrights in 1924 by his decision to produce at first only Western plays in translation there. Osanai also directed Japan's first radio drama, In the Mine (1925), and talkie, Dawn (1927). In direction and acting, his models were Gordon Craig and KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY; his theory of dramaturgy was indebted to William Archer. He made two extensive study tours abroad, the first to Europe in 1912–1913 and the second to the Soviet Union in 1927–1928.

Osanai wrote more than thirty plays, many of which were adaptations of others' work. He published his first, The Non-combatant (Hisentōin) in 1904 but considered his real debut as a playwright was The First World (Dai'ichi no Sekai) which was favorably compared with GERHART HAUPTMANN'S Lonely People; Sadanji's troupe staged it at the Imperial Theatre in 1921. Osanai's skill in stagecraft shows in his dramaturgy. His plays are tightly structured and feature clear and concise dialogue with few stage directions, demonstrating his belief that drama was primarily a theatrical, not a literary, form. Though he experimented in a variety of styles, ranging from REALISM and EXPRESSIONISM to modern revisions of traditional drama, Osanai always stressed the objective portrayal of human character rather than the explication of any particular theme or ideology. In such plays as The Master (Teishū, 1925), The Son (Masuko, 1922; an adaptation of Harold Chapin's Augustus in Search of a Father), and Hades (Naraku, 1926; a work inspired by MAKSIM GORKY'S LOWER DEPTHS), he excelled at portraying the lower classes. Osanai rejected kabuki ACTING but staged several daring adaptations of traditional puppet and kabuki plays.

[See also Japan]

SELECT PLAYS: The Non-combatant (Hisentōin, 1904); The First World (Dai'ichi no Sekai, 1921); The Son (Musuko, 1922); The Master (Teishū, 1925); Hades (Naraku, 1926); Kim Okkyun (1926); Oda Nobunaga, the Christian (Kirishitan Oda Nobunaga, 1926)

FURTHER READING

- Kubo Sakae. Osanai Kaoru. Tokyo: Bungei Shunjūsha, 1947.
- Osanai Kaoru. Osanai Kaoru Zenshū [Complete works of Osanai Kaoru]. 8 vols. Kyoto: Rinsen Shobō, 1976.
- Ottaviani, Gioa. "'Difference' and 'Reflexivity': Osanai Kaoru and the Shingeki Movement." Asian Theatre Journal 11, no. 2 (Fall 1994): 213–230.
- Powell, Brian. Japan's Modern Theatre: A Century of Continuity and Change. London: Japan Library, 2002.

M. Cody Poulton

OSBORN, PAUL (1901–1988)

Success, I often feel, can be a very dangerous thing. Up to that moment your whole life, consciously and unconsciously, your thoughts, your dreams, everything you've done, has been concentrated to that one point. And once it is achieved you are rather empty.

—Paul Osborn

Over a career that spanned nearly forty years, Paul Osborn was a flourishing writer of original plays, stage adaptations of novels, and screenplays based on novels and plays or both. He was born on September 4, 1901, in Evansville, Indiana, and grew up in Kalamazoo, Michigan. He received undergraduate and master of arts degrees from the University of Michigan, where for two years he taught English beginning in 1925. He studied playwriting with GEORGE PIERCE BAKER at Yale University in 1928. He stayed for a year and then moved to New York and "just hung around until I got a play on." From 1928, when his first play, Hotbed, was staged, through the mid-1960s, he wrote almost two dozen scripts that were either produced on the New York stage or filmed by Hollywood studios.

Osborn's most memorable original play is MORNING'S AT SEVEN, a gentle COMEDY of family intrigues. When initially staged in 1939, it was a commercial and critical failure, playing only forty-four performances, but in 1980 it won a Tony Award for best revival of a play on Broadway. It later went on a successful national tour and was produced in London. Osborn's first two original plays produced in New York were not successful. His third, The Vinegar Tree, a sophisticated comedy about free love, performed in 1930, flourished on Broadway, establishing his dramatic credentials. His next original venture, Oliver, Oliver, was poorly received; he then turned to dramatizing novels for the stage. Maiden Voyage, a comic look at the ancient Greek gods, closed in 1957 before reaching Broadway.

While he preferred to write original plays, his greatest talent seemed to be the ability to condense sprawling novels into compact plays and movies without losing the atmosphere of the original work. He brought to these adaptations a keen sense of structure and the ability to adjust characterizations to fit specific actors. His stage adaptations were highly successful—, notably, On Borrowed Time (1938), which ran just short of a year on Broadway, dramatized from the novel by Lawrence Edward Watkin. In the story, a grandfather traps Death in a tree so that he might prolong his life with his much-loved orphaned grandson. A Bell for Adano, based on John Hersey's novel, also had a much-admired Broadway run of 296 performances in 1944. Point of No Return, starring Henry Fonda, dramatized from the novel by J. P. Marquand, was a success of the 1951 season, running for 364 performances.

His screenplays, also based on novels, were usually top-of-the-line projects with major stars and produced by such giants as Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Warner Brothers, and Twentieth Century-Fox. He was nominated for an Academy Award for his film scripts of John Steinbeck's East of Eden (1955, directed by Elia Kazan) and Sayonara, based on the James Michener novel (1957). In 1982 Osborn received the Laurel Award for Screen by the Screen Writers Guild of America in recognition of his "outstanding contributions to the profession of the screen writer."

His career prospered in New York, London, and Hollywood for well over three decades but ebbed when his eyesight began to fail in the early 1960s. Osborn died on May 12, 1988, in New York City.

[See also United States, 1929–Present]

PLAYS: Hotbed (1928); A Ledge (1929); The Vinegar Tree (1930); Oliver, Oliver (1934); On Borrowed Time (adapted from Watkin's novel, 1938); Morning's at Seven (1939); The Innocent Voyage (adapted from Hughes's novel, 1943); A Bell for Adano (adapted from Hersey's novel, 1944); Point of No Return (adapted from Marquand's novel, 1951); Maiden Voyage (1957); The World of Suzie Wong (from the novel, 1958); Film of Memory (1965); Hot September (musical, adapted from Inges's Picnic, 1965)

FURTHER READING

Botto, Lewis. "Triumph at Twilight." Playbill (June 1980).

Hinson, Hal. "At Last, Paul Osborn Finds the Rainbow." Los Angeles Herald Examiner (December 5, 1981): B1.

Kakutani, Michiko. "40 Years Late, Osborn Has a Hit." New York Times (April 14, 1980): C13.

Jim Patterson

OSBORNE, ALAN (1942–)

Born in 1942 in the former industrial town of Merthyr Tydfil, then and now one of the most deprived areas of Wales, Alan Osborne was educated at Quakers Yard Grammar School. He boxed and swam competitively before studying at Newport College of Art. He trained as a teacher, taught art and architecture in Oxford and London, and returned to Wales in 1975 to teach at Afon Taf, Troed-y-Rhiw. He later gave up teaching to be a full-time artist and writer.

Osborne's first plays explore issues of community and place. They are also explorations of the synergies of different art forms: Terraces (1979), Johnnie Darkie (1981), a "Jazz opera" set in Tiger Bay, the multicultural docklands of Cardiff, and Tiger, Tiger (1985) are plays that combine music, the visual arts, and performance to which Osborne wrote the libretti, created the set, and wrote some of the music. His first major play Bull, Rock, and Nut won the Play for Wales competition in 1981 and was produced in 1983. In Bull, Rock, and Nut, Osborne juxtaposes the daily emptiness and hopelessness of the terminally unemployed with the pomp of an unseen funeral of the Merthyr-born boxer Johnny Owen. The small-time boxers Rock and Bull and their manager Nut deliberately avoid going to the funeral because they feel cheated by a community that neglects its young people while cheering its dead heroes. Nut's poignant call to "give us the flowers now" can be read as a leitmotif for Osborne's work in general. In Sunshine and in Shadow (1985) begins with the demolition of a house on the poverty-stricken Gurnos council estate in Merthyr that follows a double suicide. The play then explores the reasons behind the suicide and uncovers the sordid lives of bed-bound, drug-dependent Vee, her partner Day, and their children Babes and Ga-ga. The family and the other inhabitants of the estate are hermetically sealed off from mainstream society, whose representatives have embraced the values of Thatcherism and who regard the poverty of the estate dwellers as an illness to be quarantined. Yet there is a pathetic grandness about Vee, who rules her world from her bed, and the play goes some way to reclaim the humanity of the hopelessly deprived. The Redemption Song (1987) is a short, funny play about Mick and Bob, who have invented a toy that might make them rich. However, they are also constantly stoned, and their hazy, enclosed world, in which they are reduced to dreaming of a better world and trying to escape from violent moneylenders, can be read as a social commentary on 1980s Wales.

In the late 1980s and in the 1990s, Osborne returned to music theater. He wrote the libretto for Forbidden Hymn (1989) and has been involved in the community theater project Katerina (2001), in which Merthyr schoolchildren wrote and staged an opera with the help of members of the Welsh National Opera. Further work includes Fire Tree (2002) and Clockopera (2002). His artwork has also received numerous exhibitions and is held in many private and public collections.

[See also England, 1960–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: Terraces (1979); Johnnie Darkie (1981); Bull, Rock, and Nut (1983); In Sunshine and in Shadow (1985); Tiger, Tiger (1985); The Tuscan (1986); Redemption Song (1987); The Rising (1987); Forbidden Hymn (1989); The Merthyr Trilogy: Bull, Rock, and Nut; In Sunshine and in Shadow; The Redemption Song (1998); Katerina (Welsh National Opera, 2001); Clockopera (Welsh National Opera, 2002); Fire Tree (2002)

FURTHER READING

Adams, Gilly. "Give Us the Flowers Now." In The Merthyr Trilogy, by Alan Osborne. Cardiff: Parthian, 1998. 9–14.

Heilpern, John. John Osborne: A Patriot for Us. London: Chatoo & Windus, 2006.

Osborne, Alan. "Seeing the Possibilities: The Dramatist as Teacher" (interview by Hazel Walford Davies). New Welsh Review 41 (Summer 1998): 69–75.

Theatre in Wales [contains information on Welsh theater]. <http://www.theatre-wales.co.uk/>.

Alyce von Rothkirch

OSBORNE, JOHN (1929–1994)

Most critical opinion concerning British playwright John Osborne tilts toward his lasting importance as a trailblazer for opening up new—and unsettling—themes for the stage, rather than for aesthetic excellence. Yet although under analytic scrutiny his dramas may reveal structural weaknesses, most of his works have an honesty and ardor that lend them impact in the theater.

John James Osborne was born in London on December 12, 1929, son of a barmaid mother he hated (according to his memoirs) and a father (a copywriter) he idolized but who died when Osborne was only twelve years old. Young John was left sufficient funds to attend Belmont College, Devon, but was expelled after punching the headmaster and did not graduate from a university. The combative quality in his personality never abandoned him, and he never hesitated to castigate his four ex-wives (he married five times). Whether the perceived misogyny in his life and works derived from Osborne's closeted homosexuality will remain speculation. Nor did lacerating candor make Osborne a favorite among his former professional colleagues. But that prickly element in his character added to the overall "angry" public image.

Osborne's first hit, LOOK BACK IN ANGER (1956), gave impetus to an explosive reaction on theater stages against the perceived flaccidity and smug self-satisfaction of leadership establishments of post-World War II Western society. Publicity released by London's Royal Court Theatre at the play's premiere alluded to the "ANGRY YOUNG MEN" symbolized by the play's antihero protagonist Jimmy Porter. That phrase came to represent the frustrated fury of an entire generation of young people caught in a class-dominated society from which there appeared no escape.

When starting out, Osborne dabbled in varied forms of journalism but in 1948 turned to the theater where by 1955 he became a leading actor at the Royal Court. Look Back was his fourth play (considered his best) and first hit of many. Successful movies consequently were made of Look Back and several other Osborne plays. His works frequently transferred to the UNITED STATES, where they also were warmly applauded. Look Back, Epitaph for George Dillon (1957, written with his onetime companion Anthony Creighton), Inadmissible Evidence (1964), and THE ENTERTAINER (1957) all received Tony Award nominations, while Luther (1961) won in 1964 as Best Play. In addition to stage plays, Osborne wrote eight television dramas and several movie scripts, one of which, Tom Jones (1963), won him an Oscar. Two volumes of his autobiography and a few books of literary and cultural commentary rounded out Osborne's writing efforts before his death of diabetic complications in December 1994.

Osborne enjoyed greatest success with his earlier works in which he initiated shock treatment to the British theater through virulent, unvarnished, and unrepentant attacks on the self-absorbed, class-bound English society he observed around him. In his dramas he chronicled the disappointment and disillusionment of his generation and class. Most sharply vitriolic was Look Back in which the protagonist Jimmy Porter, educated at a "white-tile" university (not at prestigious Oxford or Cambridge), fires unrelenting salvos at the upper classes represented by his wife, Alison, and her family. The Entertainer documented the demise of an earlier way of life—that of the music hall—using that descent as metaphor for ENGLAND. Inadmissible Evidence psychologically anatomized the enervating loss of moral fiber in marriage and in business—again, to mirror degeneration in society as a whole. Luther portrayed an arch rebel in the field of the religious Establishment during the Reformation, while A Patriot for Me (1965) tackled the lethal atmosphere surrounding the homosexual world of the Austro-Hungarian era.

By tackling such controversial issues and assessing responsibility for broken ideals, Osborne swung the door open for a parade of popular contemporary British playwrights who were ablaze with political, social, religious, and usually anticapitalistic zeal, such as EDWARD BOND, JOE ORTON, JOHN ARDEN, DAVID HARE, HOWARD BRENTON, ARNOLD WESKER, CARYL CHURCHILL, and others.

An important paradox is that although he advocated revolutionary approaches to social problems facing his countrymen, Osborne did not create any startling different dramatic shapes or styles. His themes are expressed in essentially naturalistic modes, leaving more innovative formats to his colleagues such as HAROLD PINTER and TOM STOPPARD.

SELECT PLAYS: The Devil Inside Him (1950); Personal Enemy (1955); Look Back in Anger (1956); The Entertainer (1957); Epitaph for George Dillon (with Anthony Creighton, 1957); The World of Paul Slickey (musical, 1959); Luther (1961); The Blood of the Bambergs (1962); A Subject of Scandal and Concern (1962); Under Plain Cover (1962); Inadmissible Evidence (1964); A Patriot for Me (1965); A Bond Honoured (1966); The Hotel in Amsterdam (1968); Time Present (1968); West of Suez (1971); A Sense of Detachment (1972); Place Calling Itself Rome (1973); The End of Me Old Cigar (1975); Watch It Come Down (1976); Try a Little Tenderness (1978); Déjàvu (1992)

FURTHER READING

Hayman, Ronald. John Osborne. Rev. ed. London: Heinemann, 1972.
Innes, Christopher. Modern British Drama: The Twentieth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2002.
Marowitz, Charles. "Obituary: John Osborne." TheatreWeek (January 9, 1995): 24.
Maschler, Tom, ed. Declarations. London: Readers Union, 1959.
Page, Malcolm, comp. File on Osborne. New York: Methuen, 1988.
Trussler, Simon. The Plays of John Osborne. London: Gollancz, 1969.

C. J. Gianakaris

OSHODI, MARIA (1964–)

Maria Oshodi is both a playwright and an actress. She has been included in books that analyze the works of black British authors, but Oshodi describes herself as a mixed-race Anglo-Nigerian Londoner. Oshodi was born on June 9, 1964, in Clapham North. Although she was not born blind, a hereditary eye condition, glaucoma, caused her to lose most of her sight, leaving her with some light and shade perception. In 1997 Oshodi established Extant, co-directed by Damien O'Connor. Extant is recognized as the first performing arts association in the United Kingdom founded and operated by blind arts professionals. The organization seeks to produce works by and about visually impaired people.

Oshodi was asked to write a play about sickle cell anemia in 1986. After some hesitation, she committed to the project, carried out the necessary research, and created what is now known as BLOOD, SWEAT AND FEARS (1988). The play was produced in May 1988 by Harmony Theatre in London. In the preface of Blood, Sweat and Fears (1988), published in Yvonne Brewster's Black Plays: Two (1989), Oshodi stated that she "felt the need to provide good, strong main characters for young black actors." Thus, black British representation in theater has not always been apparent; however, since the last few decades of the 20th century, blacks have increasingly become key figures in the industry. Oshodi has been instrumental in creating plays that allow for this type of progression.

Prior to writing Blood, Sweat and Fears (1988), Oshodi had not taken up issues related to disability. Her first play, The "S" Bend, produced as part of the Royal Court Theatre's Young Writers Festival in 1984, focuses on cultural difference within the British black community, and From Choices to Chocolate (1986) is set during the 1980s and centers on urban youth in Margaret Thatcher Britain. While attending college, members of the Graeae Theatre Company asked Oshodi to write a play. Oshodi's Hound (1992), said to be one of the first professional plays written by a visually impaired playwright and performed by visually impaired people, was the result. The play explores Oshodi's own experiences with guide dog training. Hound (1992) toured nationally with the Graeae Theatre Company in 1992 and was published in an anthology titled Graeae Plays 1: New Plays Redefining Disability, edited by Jenny Sealey, in 2002. Oshodi earned a bachelor of arts degree in drama and theater from Middlesex University the year Hound (1992) was produced.

Other works by her include Here Comes a Candle (1989), Mag-zine (1990), Mug (1990), Jacks and Kings (1990), and the untitled script for The Dark exhibition featured at the London Science Museum in 2004. Oshodi completed Resistance (2004), based on the true account of Jacques Lusseyran, a blind teenage leader of a resistance movement in Paris during World War II. Resistance toured with Extant in spring 2005. Due to writers such as Oshodi, issues that have an impact on blacks have increasingly become the subjects of British plays. Her work has helped make audible the voices of people of color, the disabled, and the disenfranchised.

[See also England, 1980–Present]

PLAYS: The "S" Bend (1984); From Choices to Chocolate (1986); Blood, Sweat and Fears (1988); Here Comes a Candle (1989); Jacks and Kings (1990); Mag-zine (1990); Mug (1990); Hound (1992); Resistance (2004)

FURTHER READING

Aston, Elaine, and Janelle Reinelt, eds. The Cambridge Companion to Modern British Women Playwrights. London: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000.
Oshodi, Maria. Blood, Sweat and Fears. In Black Plays: Two. Ed. by Yvonne Brewster. London, N.H.: Methuen, 1989.
Sweatman, Sophie. "A Shift in Perspective." Arberry Profile (n.d.). <http://www.arberryprofile.co.uk/features/?story=yes&id=42>.

KaaVonja Hinton

OSOFISAN, FEMI (1946–)

Almost all of my plays, since I became a self-conscious dramatist, have been passionately devoted to it, and dominated by it. In some works I am trying to expose this class failure and probe its causes. In others I am denouncing its corrosive agents, while in others I am ridiculing its antics.

—Femi Osofian, 1998

Femi Osofisan, Nigeria's foremost radical political dramatist, uses his plays to demystify and challenge neocolonial nationalism and oppression in Nigeria and AFRICA. The subjects of his plays are elucidations on existential issues in postindependence Nigeria, particularly to animate his primarily middle-class audiences. After WOLE SOYINKA, Osofisan is Nigeria's leading literary figure whose works are constantly studied in high school and university syllabi and are perhaps the most produced plays by university-based theater artists. Osofisan was born of Christian parents in Erunwon in Nigeria's Ogun state. His education spans the University of Ibadan, Nigeria, the Université Cheick Anta Diop in Dakar, Senegal, and Université de Paris III in FRANCE. Osofisan belongs to a cohort of programmatic radical dissidents often impatient with the seeming utopianism of their intellectual forebears such as Soyinka as he mixes Marxism with Negritudism to produce a politically conscious DRAMATURGY.

The majority of Osofisan's plays are deliberate engagements with Soyinka's dramaturgy. Osofisan indicts his generation of educated elites for losing the will of conceptualizing political agency in a world complicated by neocolonialism and large-scale corruption. According to him: "the educated class is at the core of development in any modern economy, and . . . the failure of Nigeria, and in other African countries, is to be traced to the lamentable decadence of that class" (Osofisan, 1998). He thus sees his plays as contributing to a radical decolonizing culture and language by consistently challenging their apparent collusion with Nigeria's neocolonial state:

I am trying to stir the class out of its customary apathy into combat, provoking it into anger and active resistance. . . . I am constantly, ceaselessly pounding at the educated class, trying to lance, and heal from within, that abscess which Fanon so presciently identified long ago as our distorted consciousness, and which shows itself in collective amnesia and inertia, in cowardice, and an inordinate horror of insurrection. (Osofisan, 1998)

An earlier generation of the educated middle class that led Nigeria's nationalist struggle against English imperialism once imagined Nigeria as a beacon of democracy; such optimism, however, derailed into a political atmosphere of large-scale corruption, military dictatorship, and poverty. The Nigeria Osofisan began to castigate was flushed by windfalls from oil revenue. Demands for the country's crude oil in industrialized economies generated a great deal of material wealth unsupported by any well-organized political vision and infrastructure. The euphoria of postindependence nationalism founded upon unity in diversity did not last too long, particularly for those elements of the middle class who found themselves in a malaise of economic, political, and cultural misadventures. For Osofisan, dramatic literature and theater are discursive forms of challenging social systems in their local and global forms. As the voice of the new disenchanted and more pragmatic bourgeoisie of the 1970s and 1980s, Osofisan distances himself from the utopian ideals of the earlier generation of anticolonial nationalists whose democratic aspirations had failed:

The older writers represented a watershed, in both the socio-historical and the purely aesthetic aspects of artistic expression, and it was a watershed from which we had to depart in order to keep our rendezvous with history. These voices, together with their unending mythopoetic narcissism, had to be outgrown and left behind, because when all is said and done, behind their genuinely humane attitude there was always a plea for reactionary or simply impracticable idealist utopia, engaged in the false maze of a tragic cycle. (Osofisan, 1986)

In his hands Yoruba mythology became a tool for subverting European modernity, as well as crafting an intermodernist language of socialism—itsself a countercultural tradition within European modernity. Such a combination in his aesthetics pervades the themes of his plays from his earliest A Restless Run of Locusts (1975), The Chattering and the Song (1976), Who's Afraid of Solarin? (1978), Farewell to a Cannibal Rage (1986), Once Upon Four Robbers (1980), Esu and the Vagabond Minstrel (1991), Birthdays Are Not For Dying (1990), Morountodun (1983), and Midnight Hotel (1986), to his more recent Tegonni (1994) and Nkrumah-Ni! . . . Africa-Ni! (1994).

Thematically, Osofisan's plays describe Nigeria as a historically determined chaos where protagonists must contest and liberate their identities and the national setting from which they can launch political agency. Characters appear as signifiers of social strife, constantly struggling to redefine themselves in an existential dead-end imposed by neocolonial nationalism. The ideological energies of his plays continue to be particularly attractive to university students and professors whose declining fortunes Osofisan constantly refers to in order to prod them from political quiescence and complacency. As one of the most frequently performed playwrights, Osofisan combines a highly innovative theatricality with political outrage against neocolonialism. Music in its residual and emergent mode, dances in their innovative forms, and storytelling traditions steeped in Yoruba mythology define the aesthetics of all his plays.

SELECT PLAYS: A Restless Run of Locusts (1975); Behind the Ballot Box (1976); The Chattering and the Song (1976); Who's Afraid of Solarin? (1978); Once Upon Four Robbers (1980); No More the Wasted Breed (1983); Morountodun (1983); Farewell to a Cannibal Rage (1986); Midnight Hotel (1986); Birthdays Are Not for Dying (1990); Esu and the Vagabond Minstrel (1991); Nkrumah-Ni! . . . Africa-Ni! (1994); Tegonni (1994); Many Colors Make the Thunder-King (1997)

FURTHER READING

Amkpa, A. Theatre and Postcolonial Desires. London: Routledge, 2003.
Dunton, C. Make Man Talk True: Nigerian Drama in English Since 1970. London: Hans Zell, 1992.

- Jeyifo, B., ed. Modern African Drama. New York: Norton, 2002.
- Osofisan, Femi. "The Alternative Tradition: A Survey of Nigerian Literature After the War." In European-Language Writing in Sub-Saharan Africa, ed. by A. Gerard. 2 vols. Budapest: Akademiai Kiado, 1986.
- . "The Revolution as Muse': Drama as Surreptitious Insurrection in a Postcolonial, Military State." In Theatre Matters: Performance and Culture on the World Stage, ed. by R. Boone and J. Plastow. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1998.
- Richards, S. Ancient Songs Set Ablaze: The Theatre of Femi Osofisan. Washington, D.C.: Howard Univ. Press, 1996.

Awam Amkpa

OSTROVSKY, ALEKSANDR (1823–1886)

Aleksandr Ostrovsky, a Russian playwright who came from Moscow's merchant quarter, was born on March 31 (April 23), 1823, in Moscow. He attended but did not graduate from Moscow University and worked for years as a law clerk at Moscow's commercial court. After the success of his first plays he devoted himself to the theater, writing forty-four original plays as well as seven plays in collaboration with other playwrights. He also translated many plays from different languages, including William Shakespeare. His plays are the most remarkable body of drama in Russian. Whereas Aleksandr Griboyedov, Aleksandr Pushkin, Mikhail Lermontov, Ivan Turgenev, and Nikolai Gogol wrote great plays, it was left to Ostrovsky to create a body of Russian drama and a Russian national theater.

Ostrovsky's early plays are slice-of-life realistic "scenes from Moscow life," as some of them are subtitled. His first COMEDY, A Family Affair (Svoi lyudi-sochtyomsya, 1850), exposes moral cynicism among businessmen. The success story of the emerging class also involves the exposure of shady business tactics. The minimally complicated plot and the traditional mechanics of the play with its "open ending" are characteristic of early Ostrovsky. His REALISM avoids caricature and FARCE since it is based on solid, firsthand knowledge of the life described. The czar agreed with the censor that the play was "immoral," and Ostrovsky was placed under police surveillance, of which he was relieved in the new reign of Alexander II in 1856.

The Poor Bride (Bednaya nevesta, 1852) reflects a broad perception of woman's condition, which the critic Apollon Grigoryev declared to be something quite new in Russian literature. The successful production in Moscow and St. Petersburg of Don't Get Above Yourself (Ne v svoi sani ne sadis, 1853) was a turning point in Ostrovsky's life and in the history of Russian stage. Together with his next two plays—Poverty Is No Crime (Bednost' ne porok, 1854) and You Can't Just Live As You Like (Ne tak zhivi, kak khochetsya, 1855)—it reveals Ostrovsky's talent for representing common people and his extraordinary gift for recreating ordinary speech. His plays forced the style of ACTING to shift from extremes of vaudeville and romantic exaltation to a more subdued "natural" manner, expressing the "spirit of the soil." In A Lucrative Post (Dokhodnoye mesto, 1857), the two major themes of the power of money and the place of women are conjoined. LYOV TOLSTOY called it Ostrovsky's best play to date, adding: "Just like A Family Affair, it contains a strong protest against contemporary manners and mores."

Despite the realistic objectivity claimed by the author, Ostrovsky's plays had important political implications: the despotism that he depicted in family life was a reflection of the police state of Imperial RUSSIA, and reception of his work at the time was definitely shaped by two critics of a sociopolitical bent. Nikolai Chernyshevsky saw in Ostrovsky's early plays an exposure of corruption and the advocacy of a new social order. Nikolai Dobrolybov called the world of his plays the Dark Kingdom, by which he meant the business world of Moscow with its lack of enlightenment and patriarchal abuse of authority. Ostrovsky created the type of samodur, a domestic tyrant and morally limited egotist who tramples on human dignity and freedom. Women are more often the victims of samodurs than men. A girl in Balzaminov's Wedding (Zhenit'ba Balzaminova, 1861) declares: "Men are, in general, more fortunate than women. Woman's misfortune lies in her being always under some authority or other."

Ostrovsky undertook study trips to the Volga region and acquired a rich knowledge of popular speech and beliefs as well as discovering another new world in the kind of provincial Volga town depicted in THE THUNDERSTORM (Groza, 1859). The early 1860s brought about a great change in Russia. It began with the abolition of serfdom and the emancipation of the peasants in 1861, followed by administrative and educational reforms and the transformation of old ways of life. Russia changed from a peasant economy into a modern industrial nation. Ostrovsky's later plays reflect these social changes: the declining gentry and the emergence of the new capitalist class. In the view of A. Skabichevsky, the main character in Easy Money (Beshenyi den'gi, 1870) is "the new type of capitalist-entrepreneur, who undoubtedly will later become the dominant figure of the dark kingdom." Wolves and Sheep (Volk i ovtsy, 1875) is one of three works showing country estates under the unjust rule of women owners and is a satire of corrupt aristocratic rule. While reflecting a ruthless age of loans and land deals, railroad construction, and the founding of industrial enterprises, it also creates superb comedy of character and situation through skillful development of plot and dialogue.

Complicated plots and surprise endings are typical of the later Ostrovsky. A Last Sacrifice (Poslednaya zhertva, 1878) negates romantic love and affirms the power of money. Without a Dowry (Bespridannitsa, 1879) shows greater psychological complexity within a bourgeois ambience and could pass for a play by HENRIK IBSEN. In Belugin's Marriage (Zhenit'ba Belugina, 1878), the contrast between two lifestyles is acutely moral and with middle-class morality emerging as admirable in comparison with the dishonest aristocratic concern with appearances.

Provincial actors are the main characters in THE FOREST (Les, 1871) and in several other plays. Talents and Admirers (Talanty i poklonniki, 1882) is Ostrovsky's best portrayal of theater life, and it is to art that he gives the moral victory. In Guilty Without Guilt (Bez viny vinovatyye, 1884), Ostrovsky developed a theme frequent in his work—the betrayal of a loving heart—and showed how a heroine survives the blow.

He directed several productions and paid close attention to the rhythms of language, so much so that critics called him “the virtuoso of aural perception.” Owing to his example, Russia, unlike most other countries, succeeded in steering clear of the all-pervading school of Eugène Scribe and VICTORIEN SARDOU. The conflicts, everyday speech, and structure of his plays influenced the drama of the next generation, but his successors were minor figures who were not capable of carrying on a vital dramatic tradition. In Russia his plays still provide the bulk of the classical repertoire, along with Shakespeare, and even after perestroika they continue to dominate the Russian repertory. “Only literary works which have had truly popular appeal in their own country have stood the test of time. Such works in the course of time become intelligible and valuable to other nations also, and finally to the whole world,” wrote Ostrovsky in “Notes of the Present State of Russian Drama” in 1882. Ostrovsky died on June 2 (14), 1886, in Shchelykovo.

SELECT PLAYS: It's A Family Affair—We'll Settle It Ourselves, also known as A Family Affair (Svoi lyudi—sochtyomysya, 1850); Don't Sit in Another's Sledge, also known as Don't Get Above Yourself or Stay in Your Own Lane (Ne v svoi sani ne sadis', 1853); A Lucrative Post (Dokhodnoye mesto, 1857); The Thunderstorm (Groza, 1859); At a Lively Spot (Na boikomESTE, 1865); Vasilisa Melent'yeva (written with S. A. Gedenov, 1868); Enough Stupidity in Every Wise Man, also known as Even Wise Men Err or The Diary of a Scoundrel (Na usyakogo: mudretsa dovol'no prostoty, 1868); An Ardent Heart, also known as A Burning Heart (Goryacheye serdtse, 1869); Easy Money (Beshenyeye den'gi, 1870); The Forest (Les, 1871); The Snow Maiden (Snegurochka, 1873); Wolves and Sheep (Volki i ovtsy, 1875); Belugin's Marriage (written with N. Solovyov, Zhenit'ba Belugina, 1878); Without A Dowry (Bespridannitsa, 1879); Guilty Without Guilt, also known as More Sinned Against Than Sinning (Bez viny vinovatyye, 1884)

FURTHER READING

- Cizevskij, Dmitrij. History of Nineteenth-Century Russian Literature. 2 vols. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt Univ. Press, 1974.
- Hoover, Marjorie L. Alexander Ostrovsky. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
- Rahman, Kate Sealey. Ostrovsky: Reality and Illusion. Birmingham Slavonic Monographs No. 30 Edgbaston: Univ. of Birmingham, 1999.
- Slonim, Marc. The Epic of Russian Literature. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1950.

ŌTA SHŌGO (1939–)

Ōta Shōgo, Japanese playwright and director active in the ANGURA AND SHŌGEKIJŌ movement since its inception in the 1960s, belongs to the pioneering group of radical theater innovators that includes playwright-directors KARA JŪRŌ and TERAYAMA SHŪJI, director SUZUKI TADASHI, and others. Ōta had all the major characteristics of his radical generation. He was staunchly anti-modern and antirealism, hostile to the establishment, dedicated to tracing the roots of Japanese culture and arts, and experimental in larger-than-life concerns and DRAMATURGY.

After the renewal of the U.S.–Japan Security Treaty in 1960, young theater practitioners like Ōta became increasingly alienated from the established sociocultural institutions of the Old Left and its counterpart in theater, the established SHINGEKI, and sought for new theatrical forms. After withdrawing from Gakushūin (Peers) University, Ōta launched the Theater of Transformation (Tenkei Gekijō, 1968–1988), with Hodojima Takeo, Shinagawa Tōru, and others in 1968. As its artistic head, resident playwright, and director from 1970, Ōta was central in the selection and dissemination of a novel theatrical code attained through an original combination of indigenous culture, traditional theatrical arts, and modern experimental methods that expressed his vision of human existence. Many of the cultural and artistic concepts that underlie Ōta's theatrical vision can be traced to Western existentialism and Zeami Moto-kiyo's theories of classical nō theater.

His artistic aim is to create a theatrical code of divestiture that enables the viewers to distance themselves radically from society and see humans as species traveling through the birth-to-death life cycle. To this end, he applies the “passive power” of silence, slowed-down movement, and empty space. He won the prestigious Kishida Kunio Drama Prize for his partially silent play, The Tale of Komachi Told by the Wind (Komachi Fūden, 1977). Based on a classical nō play, it is usually produced on a nō stage. His minimalist style was fully developed by 1981, the premier year of his major work THE WATER STATION (Mizu no Eki, 1981), which received the 1984 Kinokuniya Theatre Award in the Group Division. This work is the first of a series of silent “Station plays” that illustrates his code of divestiture to its fullest.

In the 1980s, Ōta and his troupe enjoyed a favorable AVANT-GARDE reputation and expanded their activities to function as a cultural force in theater and society. They conducted frequent overseas tours to major cities in both Europe and North America. After disbanding his troupe in 1988 for financial reasons, Ōta has been active as an independent artist, seeking continual transcendence in theater by promoting experimental performance. From 1990 to 2000, he served as the general director of the Fujisawa Civic Theatre in Kanagawa Prefecture, and from 1994 he turned to college theater education. He is presently senior professor at the Kyoto University of Art and Design and head of the International Affairs section of the Japan Playwrights Association.

[See also Japan]

SELECT PLAYS: Nine Scenes on a Bus (Noriai Jidō-sha no Ue no Kokonotsu no Jōkei, 1970); The Tale of Komachi Told by the Wind (Komachi Fūden, 1977); The Water Station (Mizu no Eki, 1981); The Rose of Death (Shi no Bara, 1982) [title changed to The Plastic Rose (Purasuchikku Rōzu)]; The Earth Station (Chi no Eki, 1985); A Thousand Years of Summer (Sennen no Natsu, 1985) [title changed to Wrecked Under the Sun (Natsu no Fune)]; Afternoon Light (Gogo no Hikari, 1986); The Wind Station (Kaze no Eki, 1986); Rainy Sunday (Mizu no Kyūjitsu, 1987); Vacant Lot (Sarachi, 1991); The Sand Station (Suna no Eki, 1993); Elements (Eremento, 1994); The Water Station 2 (Mizu no Eki 2, 1995); The Water Station 3 (Mizu no Eki 3, 1998); The Arrow: Beckoned (↑ Yajirushi: Sasowarete, 2000)

FURTHER READING

Nishidō Kōjin. Doramachisuto no Shōzō: Gendai Engeki no Zen'ei-tachi [Portraits of dramatists: The avant-garde of modern Japanese theater]. Tokyo: Renga Shobō Shinsha, 2002.

Ōta Shōgo. Geki no Kibō [Hope for drama]. Tokyo: Chikuma Shobō, 1987.

Powell, Brian. Japan's Modern Theatre: A Century of Continuity and Change. London: Japan Library, 2002.

Senda Akihiko. Gekiteki Runessansu: Gendai Engeki wa Kataru [Theatrical renaissance: Modern theater speaks]. Tokyo: Riburopōto, 1983.

———. The Voyage of Contemporary Japanese Theater. Tr. by J. Thomas Rimer. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 1997.

Mari Boyd

OTTAYAN

Ottayan (The Lone Tusker, 1977), by KAVALAM NARAYANA PANIKKAR tells the story of Parameshwaran, a kutiyattam performer who, having made a mistake during a performance and losing faith in himself as an actor, escapes to the jungle. As Parameshwaran enters the jungle and says, "Whither shall I go in this wild jungle," the story stops so the actor can elaborate physically, as a kutiyattam actor would, because Ottayan is based on the dramaturgical structure of a kutiyattam performance. A good kutiyattam actor would be able to improvise for at least an hour with this one line. Using mudras (hand gestures), he would describe the trees he sees, the flowers he smells, and the animals he hears; he might, through a technique known in kutiyattam as anukramam (flashback), relive a memory of another time he was in the forest; he might compare the feelings of his character to those of another character in a similar predicament (which would entail telling the other character's story). The difference between kutiyattam and Ottayan is that in kutiyattam, the actor would improvise these elaborations; in Ottayan they are rehearsed and set by the director.

In the jungle, Parameshwaran encounters a wild elephant. Parameshwaran realizes he will be killed unless he does something quickly. He decides to save himself with "a bit of acting"— he decides to transform into an elephant in order to scare off the other elephant. If he succeeds, he will not only have saved his life but also restored his faith in himself as an actor. In Panikkar's production, this transformation is accomplished through behavior: he changes the way he moves and holds his body. In theatrical terms, he behaves "as if" he is an elephant and asks the audience to suspend their disbelief in order to complete the transformation. After Parameshwaran has successfully transformed into an elephant, he gets so absorbed in his role that he continues to dance as an elephant—until he is spotted by the Woodsman and taken to the Woodsman's leader, Moopanar. To escape, Parameshwaran has to prove that he is not an elephant but an actor performing a role: he has to successfully stage a play. Before he proceeds, Parameshwaran tells the Woodsman and Moopanar that there is a prerequisite to the performance of a successful drama:

Parameshwaran: I shall do drama. But it requires some preparation.

Moopanar: What do you require?

Parameshwaran: Both of you must be ready to see it. Are you ready?

Moopanar: I am ready.

Woodsman: I am also ready.

Parameshwaran: Then half the work is over. . . . Look here, friends, it is not enough on your part to be merely ready to see the play. Watch me closely with your whole mind involved in the performance.

The two woodsmen, and by implication Ottayan's spectators, are being told that the success of the drama depends on the spectators, who must be ready to see the play. More than that, the spectators must be ready to engage. For his dramatic presentation to Moopanar, Parameshwaran builds a house (elephants in Kerala are often used in construction, so this is an appropriate action to choose). He narrates the various tasks—"first of all the ground must be cut and made ready"—as he acts them out to the accompaniment of a drum. He lays the foundation, builds a frame, raises the walls, and then secures a beam. But he cannot lift the beam alone, so he turns to the two woodsmen and says: "That is indeed very hard work. . . . Please join in this task." The two woodsmen join the "elephant," and they lift the beam together. Parameshwaran engages the two woodsmen—and the audience—in an act of the imagination as they all work together to create an imaginary reality. This is the real lesson Ottayan has to offer: it offers proof that you can create what you can imagine. The act of watching the play is, for the audience, an exercise for the imagination.

[See also India]

FURTHER READING

Awasthi, Suresh. "Theatre of Roots': Encounter with Tradition." TDR 33, no. 4 (1989): 48–69.

Mee, Erin. "Contemporary Indian Theatre, Three Voices." Performing Arts Journal 19 (1997): 1–26.

- Panikkar, Kavalam Narayana. Karimkutty and The Lone Tusker. Calcutta: Seagull Bks., 1992.
- Venu, Ji. Production of a Play in Kutiyattam. Trichur: Natanakairali, 1989.

Erin B. Mee

OUR COUNTRY'S GOOD

Written by Timberlake Wertenbaker, Our Country's Good is based on the novel The Playmaker by Thomas Keneally. It was first produced at London's Royal Court Theatre in 1988. Set in the British colony of AUSTRALIA, where the English transported shiploads of convicts in the late 18th century, the play has the first convicts enacting George Farquhar's The Recruiting Officer, ostensibly the first Western theater performance in the colony. The future makers of white Australia, both gaolers and gaolees, are the focus of this play. The gaolers, composed of captains, lieutenants, a reverend, and the Governor General, represent the respectable side of society, while the convicts, both women and men, represent the darker side of human nature at the opening of the play. The idea of good and evil is starkly juxtaposed: as the "respectable" Lieutenant Ralph Clark puts it: "I'm not a convict: I don't sin." (act 1, scene 9). The idea of having the convicts perform Farquhar is Ralph's, and he sets about auditioning the prisoners for parts. The notion of a performance by the prisoners arouses much debate as the majority of the officers think the idea does not hold moral merit and may actually lead the convicts further on the path of wrongdoing.

Wertenbaker's play is a comment on the value of playmaking: its humanizing and moral function. As Captain Arthur Phillip puts it: "Unexpected situations are often matched by unexpected virtues in people." Farquhar's play, with its themes of love and a society divided by its power structures, mirrors the convicts' lives in Wertenbaker's play. The power of theater as a life-changing and life-enhancing process is celebrated in this piece. The notions of the influence of heredity and environment as they affect behavior, the nature of punishment, and the aesthetics of theater are the themes that circumscribe both plays. Both the gaolers and the prisoners are transformed by enacting theater. Ralph, who has regarded all the convict women as disreputable at the opening, sees redeeming qualities in Mary. Their relationship is a landmark in Ralph's previously Victorian sexuality as he sees a woman undressed for the first time. The hint of a modern sensuality in sex is enacted in act 2, scene 9 as Ralph undresses in front of his future wife. The gap between the "respectable" and the "sinners" further closes in act 2, scene 10, which has the gaolers believe an honest convict over and above the word of a drunk and uncertain officer.

The Aborigines, referred to as "savages" and suffering from small pox, function as part of the audience for the convicts' play. While Wertenbaker's play powerfully evokes the notion of the transforming nature of theater especially as practiced in prisons today, its setting in 18th-century Australia seems ambiguous and separatist even as the Aborigines inhabit the margins. As Farquhar's piece begins to the notes of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony even as the curtain falls on Our Country's Good, it is clear that Wertenbaker's play is primarily about the white presence in Australia. Although there is a lone Aborigine who features as part of the play, commenting on the arrival of the convicts, he does not function as a character in his own right, and Aboriginal heritage and culture are entirely ignored. The words given the Aborigine—"This is a dream which has lost its way. Best to leave it alone" (act 1, scene 2) and "How can we befriend this crowded, hungry and disturbed dream?" (act 2, scene 4)—belie the fact that it was the white presence that has largely ignored and marginalized the Australian natives till this day.

[See also England, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Bimberg, Christiane. "Caryl Churchill's Top Girls and Timberlake Wertenbaker's Our Country's Good as Contributions to a Definition of Culture." Connotations: A Journal for Critical Debate 7 (1998): 399–416.
- Davis, Jim. "A Play for England: The Royal Court Adapts The Playmaker." In Novel Images: Literature in Performance. Ed. by Peter Reynolds. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Dymkowski, Christine. "The Play's the Thing": The Metatheatricality of Timberlake Wertenbaker." In Drama on Drama: Dimensions of Theatricality on the Contemporary British Stage. Ed. by Nicole Boireau. New York: St. Martin's, 1997.
- Middeke, Martin. "Drama and the Desire for History: The Plays of Timberlake Wertenbaker." In Anglistentag 1996 Dresden. Ed. by Uwe Böker and Hans Sauer. Trier: WVT, 1997.
- . "Timberlake Wertenbaker: Our Country's Good." In Kindlers Neues Literatur Lexikon. Vol. 22. München: Kindler, 1998.

Dimple Godiwala

OUR POWER AND OUR GLORY

The market is looking brighter.

Will there be war in the East?

—The Stock Exchange Man, Epilogue

Back from Moscow in 1934, NORDAHL GRIEG had plans to write a film script focusing on exploitation by the Bergen, NORWAY, shipping companies of sailors during the World War I shipping boom. The Bergen theater persuaded him that his material was eminently suited for the stage. In the Soviet Union, Grieg had studied film directors' use of the technique of cross-cutting, and the composition of his play, Our Power and Our Glory (Vår ære og vår makt, 1935) is clearly influenced by this technique in the constantly changing scenes.

With rising freight rates due to the danger posed by German U-boats and mines, shipowners such as Ditlef Mathiesen and Freddy Bang are more than willing to risk their highly insured ships in the trade between the Allied powers. A salesman, Eilif Olsen, who aspires to join the rich but lacks the means to speculate, is recruited by a German agent to report on traffic in the North Sea. The British agent, Mr. Cummingham, also employs secret sources of harbor information.

A harbor scene shows sailors saying good-bye to their families before entering the gangway of the Vargeffell; the captain receives instructions from the owner; wounded members of a crew rescued from a torpedoed ship are now heading uptown. One of them, the "Swiller," is hired to replace a stoker on board the ship, which is ready to leave.

In act 2, a scene from a U-boat's control room with the Commander and the Lieutenant at the periscope discussing the brutality of war is followed by a scene from the Vargeffell's crews quarters, where sailors are chatting about women, when the torpedo strikes; then the scene changes to a restaurant where the shipowners are having a party, bailing their drinks out of a huge silver bowl. In the following scene we see the survivors from the Vargeffell in a lifeboat, thirsty and cold, bailing to keep afloat.

In act 3 the spy is being arrested by the police, while the Pastor is bringing sad news to the families of the lost seamen, and Ditlef, who with each ship lost at sea has increased his fortune, is preparing a speech in connection with his donation of an art collection to the city. While the three acts are dated 1917, the epilogue is set in 1935, in the Depression era. The central scene is a lodging for homeless men, many of them unemployed sailors, among them the Swiller, commenting on their present condition, and some of them nostalgic about the old wartime days when jobs were available. The scene finally changes into a tableau-like abstract formation, with the shipowners and a stock exchange figure on the left facing representatives for seamen and workers on the right, with soldiers in the middle.

With its clear political implications as well as the effective use of lighting, musical elements, and harbor sounds, the play is expressionistic and at the same time related to Russian AGITATION-PROPAGANDA drama. Its strong local color also added to a remarkable success in Bergen in 1935, although the shipping circles were generally negative.

FURTHER READING

- Naess, Harald S. Introduction to Five Modern Scandinavian Plays, ed. by Erik J. Friis. New York: Twayne, 1971. 11: 293–298.
Tveita, Jan. Veier til verket: Om Vår ære og vår makt av Nordahl Grieg. Oslo: Ad Notam Gyldendal 1998.

Asbjørn Aarseth

OUR TOWN

Now you know—that's the happy existence you wanted to go back to. Ignorance and blindness.

—Simon Stimson, Act 3

THORNTON WILDER'S Our Town was first performed at the McCarter Theatre in Princeton, New Jersey, on January 22, 1938, and won the Pulitzer Prize the same year. This is a wise and exquisite play that blends the conventions of time and space. Wilder was known for his vivid characters, potent poetical language, and minimalist sets in which he chose to show much in little. The stage, bare except for a few chairs, tables, and a ladder, adds to Our Town's charm and splendor.

By showing how people undervalue life's events, Wilder, in effect, makes those moments monumental. When the play begins, it is 1901. Then it jumps ahead twelve years, back nine years, and ends in 1913. In fact, the play takes place anytime and everywhere. Time rolls forward and backward. It is against this historical background that the fragility of our personal universe becomes evident. As Wilder says, Our Town "is an attempt to find a value above all price for the smallest events in our daily life." Not that all the events are small ones in this record of the Gibbs and Webb families and their neighbors in Grover's Corner, New Hampshire; as the titles of the last two acts indicate, there are "Love and Marriage" and "Death."

Private events achieve their pricelessness when contrasted with the turbulent events of history. The Great Depression was in full swing when Our Town was first produced. World War I had ended two decades earlier, but World War II was about to begin. The cruel, grotesque dictatorships of Joseph Stalin and Adolf Hitler reigned. Asians, Europeans, and Americans lived under the shadow of destruction. In the UNITED STATES playwrights such as EUGENE O'NEILL and CLIFFORD ODETS were writing dark plays portraying complicated and despairing characters. Wilder's characters found life arbitrary but affirming. Love was worth celebrating, despite inevitable tragedies. Wilder was not attempting to depict realistically the social, economic, and philosophical ferment of his own time. He deliberately breaks the action of the play by having the Stage Manager speak directly to the audience, reminding us that this is a play. His choice of form was to show the sublime and honest moments in everyday people's lives. Time is universal; life is always changing and unfinished. Wilder exposed humanity, not the specific details of a setting in a New England village or a boxed-in stage.

Some critics in the 1930s, responding only to the nostalgic surface of the play, misunderstood Wilder's intent. Marxist literary critic Michael Gold felt Wilder's interest in run-of-the-mill folk was vacuous. Leftist critics preferred heavily propagandist novels and plays that are now mostly forgotten. Wilder's characters sought goodness and meaning in life; and to some critics, goodness is harder to tolerate (onstage) than evil. In The Woman of Andros (1930) Wilder writes: "of all forms of genius, goodness has the longest awkward age." Wilder wrote a timeless, eternal masterpiece, not a politically timely drama. As the Stage Manager says, "something is eternal. And it ain't houses and it ain't names, and it ain't earth, and it ain't even the stars . . . and that something has to do with human beings."

After all, is it not against a panoramic background—human, earth, cosmic—that the humanity and poignancy of our individual microcosms become clear? To measure minutiae against the vast infinities of creation inspires wonder.

FURTHER READING

- Goldstein, Malcolm. The Art of Thornton Wilder. Lincoln: Univ. of Nebraska Press, 1965.
- Haberman, Donald. The Plays of Thornton Wilder: A Critical Study. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan Univ. Press, 1967.
- Kuner, M. C. Thornton Wilder: The Bright and the Dark. New York: Crowell, 1972.
- Wilder, Thornton. Three Plays: Our Town, The Skin of Our Teeth and The Matchmaker. New York: Harper, 1985.

Meg Walters

OUYANG YUQIAN (1889–1962)

A well-known actor, playwright, drama educator, and one of the founders of modern Chinese drama, Ouyang Yuqian, né Ouyang Liyuan, was born in May 1889 in Liuyang county, Hunan province. He went to study in JAPAN at the age of fifteen and joined the amateur drama troupe Spring Willow Society in 1907. On his return to CHINA in 1911, Ouyang started his drama career by first acting in numerous plays, including Beijing operas, and then directing plays and training young actors and actresses in various drama schools and institutions. He also took an active part in political and cultural activities during the second Sino-Japanese War (1937–1945) by writing Beijing operas and film scripts of anti-Japanese themes and being involved in the activities of the Shanghai Theatrical Circle Salvation Association. After 1949, Ouyang mainly devoted himself to the teaching of dramatic art until his death in September 1962.

Ouyang's contribution to modern Chinese drama is multifaceted. A lover of local operas and Beijing opera when he was young, Ouyang acted in Beijing operas for fifteen years, winning him praise as the equivalent of MEI LANFANG in southern China. He also acted in many modern dramas, including plays by HONG SHEN, CAO YU, and TIAN HAN.

As a drama educator, Ouyang devoted himself to the training of players throughout his life. After his return to China from Japan, Ouyang, together with some of his old friends in Spring Willow Society, founded several drama societies in Shanghai that became forerunners of Chinese modern drama troupes. In 1918 he was invited to Nantong county, Jiangsu province, to establish the earliest school for Beijing opera actors. In 1929 he went to Guangzhou to set up Guangdong Drama Institute where, as head of the school, he taught drama theory and the history of drama and also introduced foreign dramatists and their plays. After 1949, Ouyang continued as an educator of drama by being the president of the Central Academy of Drama until his later years.

As a playwright, Ouyang wrote forty-three modern Chinese plays and forty Beijing and local operas. Well-known Beijing operas that he wrote were mainly historical plays that include Human Face as Peach Blossom (Renmian taohua, 1920), an adaptation of the play by Kong Shangren (1648–1718) titled Peach Blossom Fan (Tao hua shan, 1937), and Peacock Flies Southeastward (Kongque dongnan fei, 1946). Influential modern plays include Virago (Po fu, 1922), a re-adaptation of Peach Blossom Fan (Tao hua shan, 1947), and Hatred of the Black Slaves (Hei nu hen, 1959). Virago conveys a strong antifeudal theme by extolling individualism and calling for the emancipation of women. Peach Blossom Fan was adapted from a play of the same title by Kong Shangren (1648–1718). A full-length play striking a note of patriotism as it relates the tale of romance between a high-class courtesan and an army general in the late Ming dynasty, it is considered by many to be his most mature play. Hatred of the Black Slave was adapted from American writer Harriet Stowe's novel Uncle Tom's Cabin.

SELECT PLAYS: Human Face as Peach Blossom (Renmian taohua, 1920); Virago (Po fu, 1922); After Returning Home (Huijia yihou, 1924); Pan Jinlian (1926); Peach Blossom Fan (Tao hua shan, huaju, 1937 and 1947); Peacock Flies Southeastward (Kongque dongnan fei, 1946); Hatred of the Black Slaves (Hei nu hen, 1959)

FURTHER READING

- Lehman, James David. "The Rise of Modern Drama in China from Ouyang Yü-ch'ien to Ts'ao Yu." Master's thesis, Univ. of Indiana, 1977.
- Ouyang Yuqian. "Pan Chin-lien" [Pan Jinlian]. Tr. Catherine Swatek. In Twentieth-Century Chinese Drama: An Anthology, ed. by Edward M. Gunn. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1983. 52–75.
- Ouyang Yuqian and Ge Congmin. Ouyang Yuqian. Beijing: Huaxia chubanshe, 2000.
- Su, Guanxin. Ouyang Yuqian yanjiu ziliao [Research materials on Ouyang Yuqian]. Beijing: Zhongguo xiju chubanshe, 1989.

Hongchu Fu

OVERMYER, ERIC (1951–)

A play ought to reveal itself slowly, to an audience and its author. This takes patience, and contemporary audiences and critics are impatient, used to a diet of instantly recognizable cliché conventions. I want to be surprised in the theatre. I want theatricality in the theatre. I want charged, shaped, and heightened language.

—Eric Overmyer, 1993

Identified by the New York Times as one of the United States's most verbally accomplished playwrights, Eric Overmyer's prolific work spans stage, cinema, and television. In his writings Overmyer has understood that each kind of media requires its own particular style, and his work strives to maximize the specific necessities that each form demands. Despite his success as a television writer and producer, as well as a published poet, Overmyer has not abandoned his theatrical roots but instead continues to explore the power of live drama. In an interview (DiGaetani, 1991) Overmyer said that "one of the strengths of theater is that it accommodates poetry and image and myth and metaphor and other things that great playwrights of the past use."

Overmyer was born on September 25, 1951, in Boulder, Colorado. Although he was raised in Seattle, Washington, and attended Reed College in Portland, Oregon, his travels and experience expanded beyond the Northwest. In the 1980s and 1990s he was literary manager for Playwrights Horizons in New York; an associate artist at Center Stage, Baltimore; a member of New Dramatists, New York City; and an associate artist at the Yale Repertory Theatre in New Haven.

Overmyer's most popular play, On the Verge (1985), is a story about three Victorian ladies who set out to explore other countries and then find themselves in the future. The play is about language, relying on visual descriptions and verbal exchanges rather than spectacle to traverse many locales and eras. In his explorations of language, Overmyer uses clichés and banalities to demonstrate how language is debased by slogans and neologisms. On the Verge has been produced extensively throughout the United States, CANADA, AUSTRALIA, and ENGLAND and has been translated into French and Norwegian. A second play, In Perpetuity Throughout the Universe (1988), was translated into Québécois.

Overmyer identifies his most important concerns as language and theatricality. He starts his writing with an image or a notion, rather than a topic. Native Speech (1984) is about a disc jockey, but imagery and visual elements transform the play into a work that has aural appeal rather than logical through-lines. This is a common approach in Overmyer's scripts: his primary interest is the poetry of theater, rather than the plot. His growth is revealed in his adaptation of the classic drama Amphitryon, the title of which demonstrates Overmyer's sensibilities: Amphitryon: A Comedy after Kleist by Way of Molière with a Little Bit of Giraudoux Thrown In (1996). His more recent play Alki: A Version of Ibsen's Peer Gynt Set in The Pacific Northwest and Points South, Drawn Freehand and Writ Large (2004) exhibits Overmyer's love for the play of language.

According to Overmyer, his work has been influenced by such novelists as Don DeLillo, John Bath, and Ishmael Reed; playwrights who have shaped his work include SAMUEL BECKETT, HAROLD PINTER, and ANTON CHEKHOV. All of these writers reject traditional narrative and rely on the spare theatrical moment and a sense of language. For Overmyer, the ultimate arena for linguistic and visual experimentation is the theater.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Native Speech (1984); On the Verge, or The Geography of Learning (1985); In a Pig's Valise (musical, 1986); In Perpetuity Throughout the Universe (1988); Hawker (1989); On the Road to Jerusalem (1989); Don Quixote de la Jolla (1990); Kafka's Radio (1990); Mi Vida Loca (a.k.a. Mi Familia Tropicana, 1990); Heliotrope Bouquet by Scott Joplin and Louis

Chauvin (1991); Dark Rapture (1992); Figaro/Figaro (1994); The Dalai Lama Goes Three for Four (1995); Amphitryon: A Comedy After Kleist by Way of Molière with a Little Bit of Giraudoux Thrown In (1996); Alki: A Version of Ibsen's Peer Gynt Set in The Pacific Northwest and Points South, Drawn Freehand and Writ Large (2004); The Lennon Project (2004)

FURTHER READING

DiGaetani, John L. A Search for a Postmodern Theater: Interviews with Contemporary Playwrights. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Guare, John, ed. Conjunctions 25: The New American Theater.

Annandale-on-Hudson: Bard College, 1995.

Overmyer, Eric. Collected Plays. Newbury, Vt.: Smith & Kraus, 1993.

David R. Kilpatrick

OVER OEVNE, ANNET STYKKE See BEYOND HUMAN POWER

OWENS, ROCHELLE (1936–)

My poetry has much to do with my personal and social identity as a woman in patriarchal culture and resists both in form and idea the absolute power of organized doctrine, principles, and procedure.

—Rochelle Owens

Rochelle Bass Owens was born on April 2, 1936, into a lower-middle-class family in Brooklyn, New York. As the second child of Maxwell Owens, a postal clerk, and Molly, a housewife—who viewed the quest for artistic self-fulfillment as suspect—Owens became interested in art, ballet, and poetry. Although she viewed the discipline required of a dancer to be in accord with her own character, poetry would become the most important form of self-expression to the young girl who saw her gender as a disappointment to her parents and to the woman who used language to underscore the inequities and paradoxes of a patriarchal society.

After graduating from Lafayette High School in 1953, Owens moved to Manhattan, supporting herself with low-paying jobs while briefly studying poetry at The New School, and then acting at Herbert Berghof's HB Studios. She eventually became part of the Beat scene, frequenting Pandora's Box, a popular Greenwich Village café, where she met other artists who would play key roles in the 1960s American AVANT-GARDE. During this period, she met and married David Owens, an artist, salesman, and carpenter. The marriage was annulled in 1959.

Throughout the 1950s, Owens's creative energy was primarily focused on her poetry. Her work began appearing in smaller publications, including Yugen, a poetry magazine published by her friend AMIRI BARAKA, then known as LeRoi Jones. However, it was not until the 1960s that Owens achieved artistic success. The burgeoning OFF- AND OFF-OFF-BROADWAY theater culture provided, arguably, a venue for women playwrights and an arena for writers such as Owens whose approach to language was nonconventional. Ironically, it was her imaginative and innovative use of language that was also the most criticized element of her work. Owens, who characterizes herself as a profeminist, understands this contradiction as indicative of the sexism—which she equates with racism and anti-Semitism—pervading the theater community and American patriarchal culture. She maintains that what theater critics found to be self-indulgent in her work was lauded in the work of SAM SHEPARD and SAMUEL BECKETT.

Although Owens may have received less attention than her male contemporaries, she has received several prizes, including Obie Awards for Istanbul (1965), Futz (1967), and Chucky's Hunch (1982) and an Obie nomination for The Karl Marx Play (1973). In addition to receiving honors from the New York Drama Critics Circle and several grants and fellowships, Owens has enjoyed international acclaim with the successful reception of her work at festivals in Edinburgh, Avignon, and Berlin. As an advocate of artistic communities, she helped found the St. Marks Poetry Project, New York Theatre Strategy, and Women's Theatre Council.

In 1962, Owens married George Economou. They eventually moved to Oklahoma, where she taught creative writing at the University of Oklahoma and hosted a weekly radio show. She continues to write and to explore such new forms as poetry performance.

As an artist and a woman, Owens is a risk-taker, eschewing tradition and writing not only, as she stated many years ago, so that "God will not hate you" but also for "truth" and "joy."

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: Futz (1961); Belech (1968); Homo (1968); Istanbul (1968); The String Game (1968); Futz (screenplay, 1969); Coconut Folksinger (1974); Farmer's Almanac (1974); He Wants Shih! (1974); The Karl Marx Play (1974); Kontraption (1974); O.K. Certaldo (1974); Coconut Folksinger (radio play, Germany, 1976); Emma Instigated Me (1976); The Colonel (1977); Sweet Potatoes (radio play, 1977); The Widow (1977); Mountain Rites (1978); Chucky's Hunch (1982); Who Do You Want, Peire Vidal? (1986); Oklahoma Too: Rabbits and Nuggets (television play, 1987); How Much Paint Does the Painting Need? (television play, 1992); Three Front (radio play, France, 1994); Black Chalk (television play, 1994)

FURTHER READING

- Aronson, Arnold. American Avant-Garde Theatre: A History. Routledge: New York, 2000.
- Betsko, Kathleen, and Rachel Koenig. Interviews with Contemporary Women Playwrights. New York: Beech Tree Bks., 1987.
- Bigsby, C. W. E. Modern American Drama 1945–2000. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000.
- Marranca, Bonnie, and Gautam Dasgupta. American Playwrights: A Critical Survey. New York: Drama Bk. Specialists, 1981.
- Owens, Rochelle. Introduction to The Karl Marx Play and Others. New York: Dutton, 1974.
- Sarkissian, Adele, ed. Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series. Vol. 2. Detroit: Gale Res., 1985.

Meghan Duffy

PAGE, LOUISE (1955–)

English playwright Louise Page was born in London in 1955. Influenced at an early age by the plays of William Shakespeare and ARNOLD WESKER, she began writing verse plays at the age of thirteen. From 1973 to 1976 she studied drama and theater arts at Birmingham University, and she received a postgraduate diploma in theater studies from the University of Wales in 1977. At the Birmingham Arts Lab, Want-Ad became Page's first play to receive professional production in 1977, and later that year Page obtained her second professional production, for Glasshouse in Edinburgh.

In 1978 the Birmingham Arts Lab commissioned her to write a three-actor play for production, and this became Tissue, which continues to be her most produced work to this day, perhaps because it takes for its subject matter a woman's confrontation with breast cancer and her subsequent mastectomy, a topic that continues to be current worldwide. With Tissue, Page established a reputation as a feminist playwright, due to the play's female-centered subject matter and its episodic structure (the play is made of fifty scenes, in which one actor plays the central character and the other two alternate among numerous others).

Page became Yorkshire Television's Fellow in Drama and Television at the University of Sheffield in 1979. She had two more plays, Lucy and Hearing, obtain productions, in Bristol and Birmingham, respectively, in 1979, and House Wives received a production in Derby in 1981 as she completed her studies at Sheffield. In these plays Page continued to build her reputation as a playwright who writes plays about unremarkable women dealing with the challenges inherent to their ordinary life circumstances in a remarkable way.

In 1982, Page's reputation as a leading contemporary playwright became established. She received the prestigious George Devine Award in 1982, for Salonika. This play celebrates of the greater life force elderly people may have than their middle-aged children, represented in the play by a mother-daughter relationship. Salonika was produced at the Royal Court Theatre Upstairs in London, and during the following year Page served as the resident writer at the Royal Court Theatre.

Real-Estate (produced by the Tricycle Theatre in London in 1984), like Salonika, focuses on the relationship between mother and daughter, but this time the mother and daughter have been separated for twenty years and must confront the tension between past and present in their reunion. Golden Girls, written for the Royal Shakespeare Company and produced in 1984, treats the subject of women's worldly ambition through the relationships among a group of female athletes.

Page was awarded the first J. T. Grein Award for Drama in 1985 by the Drama Critics' Circle. In addition to her work for the stage, she has also written extensively for radio and television. Louise has written more than twenty original radio plays, and she served as a scriptwriter for The Archers on BBC Radio-4 for ten years. She currently runs Words4Work, with her husband, writer Christopher Hawes. This series of workshops and seminars assists businesses in improving the standard of their written communications.

[See also England, 1960–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: Glasshouse (1977); Want-Ad (1977); Tissue (1978); Hearing (1979); Lucy (1979); Flaws (1980); House Wives (1981); Salonika (1982); Falkland Sound/Voces de Mavinas (1983); Golden Girls (1984); Real-Estate (1984); Beauty and the Beast (1985); Goat (1986); Diplomatic Wives (1989); Lily and Colin (1989); Adam Was a Gardener (1991); Hawks and Doves (1992); Like to Live (1992); Another Nine Months (1995); The Big Adventure (2002); Kissing Better (2003); Philomel Cottage (2004)

FURTHER READING

Page, Louise. Page Plays 1: Tissue, Salonika, Real Estate, Golden Girls. London: Methuen, 1990.
Turner, Elaine. "Louise Page." In Contemporary Dramatists, ed. by K. A. Berney. London: St. James Press, 1993. 516–517.

Antonia Sophia Krueger

PAKISTAN

Drama, in the Western sense of the genre, has had a relatively short history in Pakistan, as in many other Islamic nations in Southwest Asia. As in Arabic, theatrical productions such as dramatic recitals of epic poems or lyric sequences, crude dramatizations of folk tales, musical revues, and puppet shows seem to have a long history in the largely unrecorded history of popular literature in Urdu and Punjabi. But there has been no dramatic tradition in the formal literature in Urdu and Punjabi that is at all comparable in length or scope to the poetic traditions in those languages. And no Pakistani dramatist of anything near the stature and influence of the Egyptian TAWFIQ AL-HAKIM emerged to legitimize drama as a formal literary genre and to establish broad boundaries for the genre within which subsequent dramatists could work.

The first recorded production of a Pakistani play occurred in 1853 with the staging of Mizra Amanat's The Court of God Indra (Inder Sabha), a musical in Urdu, at the palace of Wajid Ali Shah of Oudh. Within several years, the British deposed Wajid Ali Shah and seized Oudh, but the play outlasted its patron's court by several decades. Its continuing popularity may have inspired enterprising Parsis in Bombay to develop a type of musical theater that became so popular throughout the states of South and Southeast Asia that several professional touring companies were formed. Somewhat formulaically, the so-called Parsi musicals explored romantic themes with carefully modulated shifts between melodramatic crises and comic interludes. Interestingly, the demand for stories was so great that for the first time Urdu playwrights adapted Western plays to their formula, translating some of William Shakespeare's plays. Indeed, even within the constraints of these formulaic plays, some playwrights generated controversy by pushing the limits of popular taste and by exposing seemingly anachronistic customs to implicit criticism.

In the immediate aftermath of the partitioning of British India into the independent states of INDIA and Pakistan, the future for drama in Pakistan seemed to hold vibrant possibilities. At the Government College of Lahore, students founded a dramatic club that presented some plays in English but for the most part Urdu translations of well-known British and continental plays. A decade later, the Pakistani Arts Council, based in Lahore, began producing Urdu versions of more recent and more experimental plays at a theater in its headquarters. The plays proved so popular that, through the Alhamra Drama Group, the Arts Council began offering a full calendar, rather than a seasonal schedule, of productions. In Karachi, in the 1950s, such companies as the Osmania University Old Boys, the British Amateur Society, the Karachi Theater, the Avant Garde Arts Theater, the Drama Guild, and St. Patrick's Dramatic Society presented some remarkable productions of a broad range of classical and modern Western dramas.

In the midst of the dynamic theater scene in Karachi, the first truly noteworthy Urdu dramatist, Khwaja Moinuddin, achieved tremendous celebrity with the staging of his plays Zawal-e-Hydrabad, about Indian oppression of Kashmiris, and La Qile Se Lalukhet, about the dislocations caused by the partition. The latter debuted in a stadium before an audience of 10,000. Other Pakistani playwrights who produced notable work during this period include Ali Ahmed, whose Subh Honay Tak is a loose adaptation of WAITING FOR GODOT; Anwar Knayetullah, whose Jab Tak Chamkay Sona is a dramatic treatment of civil unrest in Pakistan; and Yunus Said, whose The Thing is a preapocalyptic drama written and staged in English, which synthesizes elements of the symbolist and the absurdist dramatic modes.

Nonetheless, the development of the film and television industries within Pakistan initially undercut dramatic productions in two ways. First, theater owners found it much more profitable to show films than to stage plays; so the number of venues for new plays decreased markedly. Second, television and film work attracted many of the talented people associated with the theater because such work offered greater financial rewards and much broader visibility. Many of the most promising playwrights began to devote much of their energies to writing screenplays and teleplays. Indeed, some became producers and directors as well, and a few began to develop impressive lists of credits as actors. This broad trend was not reversed until the burgeoning popularity of VCRs and DVD players in Pakistani homes caused a precipitous decline in ticket sales at movie houses. Theater owners have subsequently become more interested in staging plays. The political realities in Pakistan have, however, impeded what might otherwise have constituted a major revival of drama in the country's major cities.

Under the series of military regimes that have governed Pakistan for much of the last quarter century, drama has been increasingly associated with political activism, which has typically been characterized as subversive. Much to the displeasure of religious fundamentalists and the authoritarian governments—and counter to prevailing trends in postcolonial literature—many Pakistani dramatists have openly promoted such Western concepts as individual political rights, broad-based economic opportunities, and social progressivism. They have asserted the value of secular and internationalist approaches as alternatives to religious and provincial custom. In the 1970s and 1980s, theater groups such as Ajoka and Lok Rehas have been at the center of a "Parallel Theater" movement that has attracted a good deal of international attention for its defiance of the Pakistani military regimes. Unfortunately, international attention has not protected everyone associated with the groups from retaliation.

Indeed, because the most visible Pakistani playwrights of the last quarter century have been either emigrants or exiles to the United Kingdom or the UNITED STATES, many of the most noteworthy Pakistani plays of the period have been written in English, rather than in Urdu or Punjabi. And those plays originally written in Urdu or Punjabi have, of course, been translated into English as a prerequisite to their production in ENGLAND or the United States. The continued use of English has been a more volatile issue in Pakistan than in India because, compared to the tremendous ethnic and linguistic diversity of India, Pakistan is a relatively homogenous nation. So the very negative associations of English with imperialism and continued Western hegemony have been less counterbalanced in Pakistan than in India by the practical benefits of its being a widely, if not universally, used second language. Ironically, those Pakistani plays produced elsewhere outside of Pakistan have often been translated for Hindi or Bengali productions. So as Pakistani drama has become a medium for political and cultural dissent within Pakistan, it has also been somewhat stigmatized by its association with countries and cultures that have been widely demonized in Pakistan. Although plays by emigres and exiles have been increasingly staged in "GUERRILLA" productions at informal venues in Pakistan's major cities, it remains to be seen whether this drama will evolve into a major force within Pakistani literature or will remain largely a subcategory among the "hyphenated" literatures of the West.

The notable dramatists of this most recent period have produced an increasingly diverse body of work. Rukhsana Ahmad's Song for a Sanctuary (1990) treats domestic violence. Pervaiz Alam's Safar—The Journey (2002) concerns the effects of the Partition on a Hindu family that is forced to leave Pakistan and the continuing resonance of the experience in the family's collective memory. Wajahat Ali's Domestic Crusaders (2005) chronicles the daily life of a Pakistani-American family. Karim Alrawi's plays Aliens (1981), Before Dawn (1981), A Child in the Heart (1987), A Colder Climate (1986), Crossing the Water (1991), Divide and Rule (1983), Five in the Lake (1985), In Self-Defence (1983), Migrations (1982), Promised Land (1988), and Sink the Pink (1983) have all been produced in England and have treated overt and subtle manifestations of British racism toward South Asians. Dilip Hiro's To Anchor a Cloud (1970) has had significant productions in London and Calcutta. AYUB KHAN-DIN's acclaimed East Is East (1997) focuses on the effects of assimilation on the children of Pakistani immigrants to the United Kingdom. HANIF KUREISHI's My Beautiful Laundrette (1985) may be most responsible for the current interest in the literature of Pakistani immigrants to the United Kingdom and the United States. SHAHID NADEEM has written more than three dozen produced plays, including The Suffering One (Dukhni, 1997), an exposé of the illicit traffic in women and children across South Asia. Ibrahim Quraishi's Five Streams (World Premiere 2006) is an experimental, collaborative, multimedia exploration of the dynamic interplay among South Asian Islamic cultures. Saman Shad's Lingering Voices (2004) addresses the threats to Pakistani village life posed by uncontrolled development. Imran Shah's Bunch of Lies denigrates political corruption in Pakistan through a puppet show. And Bina Sharif's one-woman drama Afghan Woman (2002) concerns the oppression of women by the Taliban.

FURTHER READING

- Azfar-Khan, Fawzia. "Street Theater in Pakistani Punjab." The Drama Review 41 (September 1, 1997): 1054–2043.
- Brandan, James R., ed. "Pakistan." In The Cambridge Guide to Asian Theater. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1993. 211–213.
- Enayetullah, Anwar. "Theater in Pakistan." Pakistan Quarterly 12, no. 4 (1964): 54–59.
- Marek, Jan. "The Impact of Islamic Culture on Urdu Drama." Die Welt des Islams: International Journal for the Study of Modern Islam 23–24 (1984): 117–128.
- Qadir, Abdul. "Syed Imtiaz Ali Taj: A Pioneer in Modern Urdu Drama." Perspective: A Monthly Digest Published in Pakistan 4, no. 10 (1971): 35–37.
- Qureshi, M. Aslam. Wajid Ali Shah's Theatrical Genius. Lahore: Vanguard, 1987.
- Suvorova, A. "Sources of Urdu Drama." In Proceedings of the Fourth International Conference on the Theoretical Problems of Asian and African Literatures, ed. by M. Galik. Bratislava, Czechoslovakia: Literary Institute of the Slovak Academy of Sciences, 1983. 213–218.

Martin Kich

PALESTINE

Like all other Arab lands, Palestine was part of the Ottoman Empire from 1516 until the end of Ottoman hegemony in the Near East in 1918. During the 19th century, when cultural activities flourished in Beirut and Cairo, the common assumption is that Jerusalem did not witness an emergence of serious, professional drama activities. According to this assumption, the cultural vacuum was not restricted only to Palestine but extended to the other regions of Greater Syria, which also languished under the deteriorating political, social and economic condition of Ottoman rule. Widespread illiteracy and the lack of national educational institutions contributed to the cultural stagnation in Palestine and Greater Syria, causing the region to trail behind EGYPT and Lebanon and driving many literary historians to judge the pre-1920 cultural atmosphere in Palestine to be one of total backwardness. Yet new research on Palestine contradicts such claims. Rashid Khalidi in Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness (1997) demonstrates how cultural life and Palestinian identity in late Ottoman Palestine paralleled similar developments elsewhere in the Islamic and Arab world, particularly in neighboring Arab regions. Jerusalem, Khalidi argues, was an important capital district of southern Palestine, where "its importance extended far beyond that. Its schools, newspapers, clubs, and political figures had an impact throughout Palestine, even before the country's British mandate boundaries were established after World War I." In contrast to a picture of total backwardness, one can see distinctive evidence of cultural consciousness and appreciation of drama and world literature, even if at the time these trends may not have been strong enough to reflect political consciousness to the degree later literary production would.

1850–1900

The so-called cultural awakening in Palestine was not only a result of the visiting Egyptian theater troupes but also of the influence of the missionary schools, which promoted education and encouraged Western drama among Palestinians at the beginning of the 19th century. Drama activities in missionary schools were widespread in "Greater Syria" (present-day Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Jordan), and their numbers increased in the 1910s, especially after the promulgation of Ottoman constitutional rule in 1908.

The influence of these schools, both private and missionary, in Greater Syria is well appreciated. They contributed significantly to the growing cultural and intellectual awareness of the region, strengthening the signs of a budding Palestinian consciousness. Promotion of intellectual and literary activities in Palestine was gaining ground, and this was reflected, in part, in the staging of plays, an activity encouraged by an increasing number of schools. Moreover, local newspapers reported on the school plays and on groups visiting from Lebanon and Egypt, aiming to promote the local troupes and follow their development.

It is clear that a handful of educated Palestinians turned to Western classical literature, such as William Shakespeare and French novels and COMEDIES, especially those of Molière, in the hope of establishing a theater of their own. Bethlehem University professor Qustandi Shomali estimates, despite the lack of documentation for this period, that Palestinians ought to have been aware of the major theatrical trends in Egypt. They may have followed the Egyptian drama that was spreading in the region, or they might have staged plays based on European literature, although the quality of such productions would have suffered from limitations both in form and style. The author provides examples of how the local Palestinian newspapers covered performances of the visiting Egyptian groups of George Abyad and Ṣayḥ 'Ukāša. He also demonstrates how Hamlet was performed in Gaza before World War I.

1920–1948

With the defeat of the Ottoman Empire in World War I, its deteriorating rule in Arab lands came to an end in 1918. Palestine, Transjordan, and IRAQ fell under the British Mandate, while Lebanon and Syria became part of the French Mandate in 1920, the same year Palestine witnessed the first Arab uprising. Political awareness was strengthened after the issue of the Balfour Declaration in 1917, which promised a Jewish National Home in Palestine. Zionist activity in the region and the revival of the economy by the British Mandate, undertaken as part of a scheme to prepare the land for the influx of Zionist immigrants from Europe, were the main elements that contributed to the revitalization of cultural as well as political life in Palestine. Cultural life in general, and Palestinian theater activities in particular, flourished during the British Mandate, stimulated by opening Palestinian national schools and educational institutions, the reactivation of the missionary schools, public libraries, cultural clubs and societies, Christian parish activities, publishing houses, radio stations, newspapers and periodicals, and literary organizations and salons. The changes that took place on the national level, along with external factors, played a major role in stimulating cultural life in Palestine at the time.

The very earliest signs of theatrical activity in Palestine ever mentioned are the shadow play performances known as Ḥayāl az-Zill. In the Ottoman province of Syria before World War I, cities like in Damascus, Beirut, Aleppo, Jaffa, and Jerusalem often performed Ḥayāl az-Zill plays. The shadow plays presented in Damascus and Beirut contained many Turkish elements, especially in the themes they tackled. The shadow plays in Jerusalem, on the other hand, were mainly carried out during the month of Ramadan as night-time shows when the local troupes had to compete with troupes coming from Syria. After Palestine fell under British rule after World War I, the local cultural tradition of Karakūz—main character shadow plays—continued during the month of Ramadan.

Another major revival before 1948, combined with theater activities, involved the old Palestinian folk tradition and religious culture. Most famous is the reappearance of al-Ḥakawātī (the storyteller), who used to be seen in coffeehouses telling stories based on folktales and on A Thousand and One Nights. Further examples are Ṣā'ir ar-Rabāba a singer playing the rabāba—a stringed, violinlike instrument with one or three strings; the itinerant Ṣundūq al-Ağab, known as the Magic Box or the Box of Wonders, telling folk and historical stories, and religious festivals such the traditional Mawlid, held during the Prophet's birthday, or the Mawālīd (the birthday of the saints), as well as the various entertainment shows presented at night during the fasting month of Ramadan. Other theatrical components could be traced back to the traditional Palestinian peasant dance known as the Dabka, and to the Zağal, both of which were performed at special feasts, at wedding celebrations, and at funerals.

External and internal factors also contributed to Palestinian cultural revival. One of the major stimuli for the Palestinian cultural resurgence at the beginning of the twentieth century was the visiting of Palestinian cities by Egyptian, Syrian, and Lebanese theater troupes who performed plays and hence shared their experiences. It appears that the visits of Arab and foreign troupes left an enormous mark on the educated Palestinian youth, moving them to start many ACTING groups of their own. The second most important external factor that contributed to the rebirth of cultural awareness in Palestine is the old foreign missionary schools. In addition, during this period Palestine witnessed the birth of many local amateur theater groups that sprung from schools and were concentrated in the cities of Haifa, Jaffa, Nazareth, Gaza, Jerusalem, and Bethlehem, leaving the southern part of the country untouched. Although these theater activities were very much restricted to individual attempts to cater to local interest, they nevertheless spread out of schools to the various clubs, social associations, cinema houses, and literary salons. It seems that these activities had an impact on the Palestinian public, since many local Palestinian newspapers reported on them.

The establishment of numerous Palestinian associations, including both social institutions and women's associations, was not directly the product of the British Mandate, although the associations grew in number as a reaction to the foreign presence in Palestine. After the promulgation of the Ottoman constitution of 1908, as well as during the British Mandate, many new Palestinian associations came into being and contributed vigorously to political and national awareness, hosting and performing many drama activities. Additionally, many literary salons came into being during this period, in turn giving rise to many Palestinian authors and dramatists like Nağīb Naṣṣār, Ğamīl al-Baḥrī. Unfortunately, most of these associations were closed in 1948 after the war that created the state of ISRAEL, since their members were largely among the majority of Palestinians who fled for their lives. The impact of the social and women's institutions and their various activities on the development of both Palestinian cultural life in general and drama in particular is not fully documented. As for the numerous literary salons, they were places to invite the established poets, writers, and dramatists to read their works, hence contributing to the growth of intellectual trends. The most distinguished one was the ad-Dağānī Literary Salon in Jerusalem, where literary and drama activities were promoted.

The impact of the visiting Egyptian theater groups appears to have been immense during these years. When the Egyptians departed, the local audiences who had flocked to watch their performances and who later constituted the nucleus of the theater-going Palestinian public began demanding more local and original Palestinian performances. In spite of the concentration of drama activities mainly in coastal cities, the local troupes there faced many difficulties. For one, they lacked theater venues. Second and more important, the number of productions decreased because the British Mandate authorities did not encourage and even banned many such activities. These activities were regarded as a threat to the mandatory rule and control over Palestine. The ban was reinforced, superficially, on the grounds that theater productions were illegal gatherings and could result in riots, but another reason was the fact the plays dealt indirectly and directly with the theme of losing Palestine to the influx of the immigrant Jews and with the Zionist activities in the region. What is also interesting during this period is the fact that the British Mandate, which started in Palestine in July 1920, issued various restrictive and oppressive rules and laws concerning every aspect of Palestinian daily life: print, publication, distribution of newspapers, transfer of goods, establishing clubs and association, opening shops or libraries. These suppressive measures of the British Mandate were later adopted and are used to the present day by the state of Israel in its occupation of the territories of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In general, however, drama and theater activities performed in schools, by associations, or by local troupes are very hard to pin down for further study, since these are so poorly documented. Apart from the name of the troupe and the title of the plays staged, which are mentioned in local newspapers, no further information can be found due to the declaration of the state of Israel and the subsequent flight of Palestinians from their native land to other neighboring Arab countries, where they constituted a nucleus for theatrical activity in the lands in which they exiled. The growth and development of the urban Palestinian middle classes also contributed substantially to the serious attempts to establish professional theater troupes. Some well-to-do families took the initiative to start a serious and professional theater by writing original plays and becoming less dependent on the Western and well-known Egyptian and Lebanese plays that toured the area at the time. Moreover, during the British Mandate, Palestine saw the birth of many educated writers for the theater, such as: Nağib Naşşār, the owner of al-Karmil newspaper. The first written Palestinian play The Loyalties of the Arabs (Wafā' al-'Arab) is attributed to him, followed by Ğamīl al-Baħrī, Istifān Salīm, Asmā Tūbī Nağwā Faraħ Qa'wār, Šukrī Sa'īd, and the al-Ğūzī brothers.

An important early encouragement to theatrical activities in Palestine was the foundation of at least fifteen new local Palestinian newspapers in addition to an-Naḡīr, al-Karmil, Ğarīdat Filasṭīn and az-Zahra. These new papers, launched in the years between 1919 and 1921 and mostly in Haifa and Jerusalem, reported both on theater groups visiting Palestine and on the activities of local theater groups. Moreover, the foundation of Maḥaṭṭat al-Quds or Idā'at Filasṭīn (Palestine Broadcasting Station), headed by the well-known Palestinian poet Ibrāhīm Tūqān (1905–1941), and Idā'at aš-Šarq al-Adnā (Near East Broadcasting Station), encouraged men of letters, prominent poets, playwrights, and actors—especially women—to broadcast their work.

One of the first professional troupes was Firqat al-Ğūzī (al-Ğūzī's Theatre Troupe), established and presided over by Naşrī al-Ğūzī from 1930 to 1947, when, after the Nakba, he and his family left Palestine to live in Damascus. He wrote several original plays, but his work was lost during his flight from Palestine, even to the author himself, who does not possess copies of the plays. Naşrī wrote Truth Prevails (al-Ḥaqq Ya'lū) in 1928. His second social moral play, Leila's Heart (Fu'ād Laylā), came out in 1930, as did his The Burning Candles (aš-Šumū' al-Muḥṭariqa). The transition from social to political issues came in 1935 when Naşrī wrote The Ghosts of the Free (Ašbāḥ al-Aḥrār). The one-act-play dealt with themes such as the danger of the influx of Jews to Palestine, defending the lost land, attacking the ones who sold their land, calling for Arab unity, and defying by force both the British and Zionist presence in Palestine. The play was staged at the YMCA theater in 1935 and in 1936; but due to strict British censorship the play was banned in the city of Ramallah and in the rest of the country. In 1945 Naşrī al-Ğūzī became the first Palestinian dramatist ever to write plays for children. Among his ceaseless contributions in this field are The Wisdom of the Judge (Ḍakā' al-Qāḍī); No to the Sale of Land (Lā li-bay'ī l-Arāḍī); The Feast of Deportation ('Īd al-Ğalā'); Palestine, We Shall Not Forget Thee (Filasṭīn lan Nansāki); Loyalty of Friends (Wafā' al-Aşdiqā'); and Break the Idols! (Ḥaṭimū l-Aşnām).

Ğamīl al-Baħrī is yet another prominent Palestinian figure who contributed significantly not only to journalism but also to the theater movement in Haifa before 1948. Ğamīl al-Baħrī owned the journal az-Zahra (The Flower), and the al-Maktaba al-Waṭaniyya (The National Library) published his plays and books in Haifa. In 1919, he published his play His Brother's Murderer (Qātil Aḥīh).

Although the period of the British Mandate over Palestine did see contributions to the revival of cultural activities on all levels, many obstacles caused a slowdown in the development of the Palestinian theater. First was the taboo of women appearing onstage. Generally speaking, in the 1920s and 1930s female roles were performed by men who put on female costumes and makeup and imitated feminine gestures onstage, since real female presence on the stage was limited both by strict Catholic or Muslim teachings and by social circumstances in Palestine. However, with the foundation of the Palestinian Broadcasting Station, women felt more comfortable acting behind the microphone. The second obstacle was the unstable political situation. The demise of the Ottoman Empire, its replacement by the British Mandate, the Balfour Declaration, and the Zionist takeover in the region all contributed to a situation of political instability, not only in Palestine but in the rest of the Arab world as well. Since there was no central national government to speak of, theater arenas, facilities, dramatic schools, and institutions catering to talented youth had no permanent sponsors. This lack of sponsorship had a devastating effect both on the quality of the dramatic work and on the production of original dramatic texts, leading the few Palestinian playwrights who were interested in theater and drama to be dependent on Western texts and literature.

1948–1987

The Palestinian cultural awakening under the British Mandate was silenced abruptly by the 1948 War that established Israel. The 1948 Arab-Israeli war caused panic among Palestinians, causing them to abandon their homes and flee to neighboring Arab countries. The fleeing Palestinians ended up as refugees in Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Egypt, and the West Bank and Gaza Strip. What took place on the political scene had a negative impact on the development of cultural activities in Palestine. This series of traumatic events is termed an-Nakba, the catastrophe.

The greater part of the urban intelligentsia, the traditional and social leaders, and the property owners fled during 1948, causing a state of decline and isolation in cultural activities within Palestine itself (Palestinians in Israel and in the West Bank and Gaza Strip). The immense upset in the wake of the 1948 defeat was that the Palestinian majority in Palestine ended up being the minority in Israel, where the suppressive political climate, as well as the difficult economic and social situation made it nearly impossible for Palestinian writers and poets to be productive. These political and socioeconomic circumstances had a negative effect on the cultural atmosphere in Palestine in general and on theater activities in particular. Thus, all that remained of Palestinian theater as it had been under the British Mandate were a few amateur groups, confined to clubs, associations and schools. Nonetheless, the Palestinian cultural awakening that had existed and flourished in the 1940s was not totally wiped out, although it deteriorated into two separate fragments after 1948: within Israel and outside it.

After 1948, permanent Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip shared the same fate as the refugees. The Hashemite dynastic rule over the West Bank and the Egyptian military one over the Gaza Strip were directed toward suppressing publications of any worthwhile literature of either political or social importance. The direct and suppressive censorship rules forced upon Palestinians by these regimes extended their reach to clubs and educational and social institutions, banning all cultural activities (Ashrawi, 1976). Theatrical performances among Palestinians in the occupied territories were limited in both playwriting and staging, although some cultural and theatrical activities within the framework of summer festivals were held in the West Bank cities of Ramallah and al-Bireh. Another stimulus to theater activities in the 1960s were the several Palestinian plays written in exile by Ghassan Kanafani (1936–1972). In 1964, coinciding with the foundation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and the establishment of Ġam'iyyat al-Masrah al-Filastīnī (Association of Palestinian Theater) in Damascus, cultural activities were promoted aiming to strengthen Palestinian consciousness.

As for those Palestinians who were uprooted from their homes as a result of the 1948 War, they had to face their daily plight and seek other means by which to survive in the refugee camps, either in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or in the neighboring Arab countries, where they faced, and still do face, an extremely unfavorable political and economical situation. As for Palestinians in Israel, the 1950s did witness a few cultural activities encouraged by the Israeli establishment in an attempt to enhance “positive” cultural activities. With the dispersal of the Palestinian urban cultural elite, it was a few immigrant Jewish poets and writers to Israel, mainly from Iraq, who took it upon themselves to fill the cultural vacuum in Arabic productions. The actual Arabic theater activities in Israel in the 1950s were limited to amateurs and took place mainly in schools. It was only in the 1960s that these theatrical activities started to develop rapidly.

During the 1967 War, the Arab armies involved were defeated, and the West Bank and the Gaza Strip fell under Israeli occupation. The 1967 War was the first time that Palestinians in Israel started meeting fellow Palestinians who had until then been cut off across the Demarcation Line (Green Line) dividing Israel from Jordan and Egypt, respectively. Nonetheless, important plays were published following the war, although most of them were not staged immediately. The prominent contemporary Palestinian poet Samih al-Qāsim (1939–) wrote the verse drama Qaraqāš in 1970. Theater activities in the late 1960s and at the beginning of the 1970s can be described as a period when the major stress was on writing new, original dramatic texts as part of an emergence of Palestinian literature in Israel after the 1967 War. In the 1950s, Palestinians in the state of Israel were under “military rule,” whereby the Jews and the Arabs were kept separate and the latter were given self-rule only in terms of religious denominations. This explains why theater activities were widely spread in religious clubs and schools.

The restrictions on Palestinians in Israel were finally lifted in November 1966, and thus a minimum of freedom of mobility was granted. This was also the time when Arabs were permitted to be members of the Israeli Histadrut and many other voluntary committees in order to help Palestinians integrate into "Israeli society." As for the Israeli establishment's involvement in the Palestinian cultural arena, it decreased after the 1967 War, following the same failed path as their previous involvement during the 1948–1967 period. The Ministry of Education inaugurated the Arab-Israeli center Bayt al-Karma in Haifa in 1963; in 1962 came the building of the Frank Sinatra Centre in Nazareth. Other signs of involvement by Israeli establishment include the creation of Firqat al-Masrah bi-Nādi l-Histidrūt (The Theater Troupe in the Histadrut Club of Nazareth) from 1962 to 1966; al-Masrah al-Ḥadīṭ (The Modern Theater) from 1965 to 1977; al-Masrah aš-Šā'bi (The People's Theater); and the investiture of al-Masrah an-Nāhiq (The Rising Theater). The revitalization of Palestinian culture was not restricted to the Palestinians in Israel but also extended to the occupied territories, thus contributing another factor to the renewed unity between the two segments of the Palestinian people.

The October War in 1973 was significant, not only in terms of the inter-Palestinian process but also as a boost to Palestinian morale. This marks the period when one starts to talk about Palestinian culture as a whole without making distinctions, especially on the cultural level. One can recall that while the West Bank was under the Hashemite Rule, publication of any worthwhile literature, especially that of social or political significance, was directly suppressed. The situation in Israeli-occupied Palestine was similar: overt and direct censorship, constant control over social and educational institutions, clubs, and all cultural activities, along with relentless political persecution and the lack of freedom of speech were familiar in Israeli-occupied pre-1967 Palestine. Yet the direct Israeli attempts at suppressing worthwhile literature did not succeed entirely and were gradually emasculated by the continuous and persistent attempts and confrontations of the politically committed writers and poets of the area, despite the constant threat of being charged with endangering the "security of the state." The publication conditions were equally discouraging on both sides of the "Green Line" until progressive publishing houses later opened in Israel (Ashrawi, 1976).

The existence of cultural activities in the occupied territories, in Jerusalem, and within Israel set the stage both nationally and internationally for the Palestinian cultural revival of the 1970s. Mostly concentrated in the Ramallah region, this new theater trend attempted to stimulate the theater movement in the occupied territories. It is extremely hard to study the framework, or the nature of the theater troupes of the 1970s, let alone attempt to categorize them in terms of productions, span of life, or the quality of the plays. An important reason is that most of these groups started presenting theater work in the early or mid-1970s, during which time some of them were composed, dismantled, and reformulated under new names. Second, few troupes continued their theater production past the mid-1980s, due to the political situation in Palestine. A third reason is that founders of the groups either left the troupes forever, ended up creating other troupes, or are no longer participating in theatrical work. Finally, scanty financial resources and the lack of published scripts pose serious problems for the study of this revival.

One very early theatrical event in this revival was the establishment of the ʿĀlīlāt al-Masrah (The Family of the Theater) in Ramallah, which later formed the nucleus of Balālīn (Balloons), a theater troupe built around the Bethlehem-born Palestinian director François Abū Sālīm and the singer Muṣṭafā al-Kurd from Jerusalem. In 1975, another troupe that left marks on the theater movement assumed the name of Ṣundūq al-ʿAğab (The Magic Box). The establishment of al-Ḥakawātī Theatre in East Jerusalem in 1977—a joint project of Arab dramatists, directors, and actors from Israel and East Jerusalem—marked an eminent phase in the professionalization of Palestinian theater. al-Ḥakawātī was founded and developed by François Abū Sālīm and a group of theater people. Actors, set designers, lighting professionals, and musicians were recruited according to needs. The theater's name alludes to the ancient ḥakawātī, that is the itinerant storyteller who used to wander the country and would appear in places such as cafés and public squares presenting his stories based mainly upon traditional folktales, myths, and legends. Gestures, different voices, a stick, and a tarbouche (a fez hat) would accompany al-Ḥakawātī's tales as means to encourage and motivate his listeners to interact. Muḥammad Maḥāmīd, one of the co-founders of al-Ḥakawātī, affirms that the troupe's aim was to establish a Palestinian theater group that could meet the needs of the Palestinian people by creating a nucleus for a professional theater troupe, strengthening the roots of theater, attracting theater audiences, addressing the burdensome realities of the occupation amidst Palestinian society, and thereby generating a Palestinian national theater. Undertaking to articulate national aspirations to Palestinian society under Israeli occupation, al-Ḥakawātī drew upon various folkloric and traditional sources and incorporated different Western concepts. For lack of suitable, available dramatic texts, and due to a desire to experiment, the act of playwriting and devising characters and dialogues became a collective undertaking by the actors themselves and was based largely upon improvisation. al-Ḥakawātī's having to function under military occupation, Dov Shinar (1987) asserts, including such political constraints as censorship and other forms of control, has been influential in leading the group to the development of a style of collective composition. Plays were created through a process of improvisation on agreed topics; they were not based on prewritten texts. The group claimed that plays were written solely for the benefit of the censorship authorities, "who nevertheless fail from time to time, to grasp the real meaning of the messages" (Shinar, 1987). Thus much variation developed during long months of rehearsal and interaction with the audience until the plays were fully shaped.

A well-known al-Ḥakawātī play is In the Name of the Father, the Mother and the Son (Bismi l-ab wa-l-Umm wa-l-Ibn), which was produced during the 1978–1979 season; another is the play ‘Alī, thou Galilean (Maḥḡūb Maḥḡūb, Ġalīlī, yā ‘Alī), written and staged in the 1980–1981 season. In 1984 al-Ḥakawātī presented one of its self-fulfilling prophetic plays, A Thousand and One Nights of a Stone Thrower (Alf Layla wa-Layla min Rāmī l-Ḥīḡāra). Staged just before the outbreak of the intifada (known in the West as the Uprising), the play pictures the confrontation between a Palestinian youth and Gidi, the Israeli military governor who steals from a magic lamp ‘Alā’ ad-Dīn. al-Ḥakawātī leased an-Nuzha Cinema building in East Jerusalem for ten years in November 1983 and converted it into the first Palestinian theater in Jerusalem and the West Bank. Local and foreign donations supported the troupe in renovating the building and set it up as their permanent house to host other professional and amateur drama, music, dance groups, and works of local and international artists. The troupe’s first performance in the new building was The Story of the Eye and the Tooth (Ḥikāyat al-Ayn wa-s-Sinn). This gave al-Ḥakawātī the chance to participate in festivals in Europe, JAPAN and the UNITED STATES.

The outbreak of the intifada on December 8, 1987, imposed a new reality on Palestinian political life; it not only caused the dismantlement al-Ḥakawātī but also led other groups to crumble, thus forcing many groups to search for venues to work in. In addition, the most tangible hindrance was the harsh daily reality of the curfews and roadblocks that prevented many theatergoers from the West Bank and Gaza Strip from entering Jerusalem. The fact that the theater was situated in the heart of Jerusalem was yet another factor making al-Ḥakawātī vulnerable to the Palestinian-Israeli contention over control of the city. The dismantling of al-Ḥakawātī Theater troupe at the an-Nuzha Cinema building in the late 1980s led to the adoption of the name of al-Masraḥ al-Waṭanīal-Filasṭīnī (Palestinian National Theater) as the new central framework for the Palestinian theatrical movement. Many professional and amateur groups used to perform on the al-Ḥakawātī stage and included art exhibitions as well as cultural and political debates.

1987–PRESENT

An important turning point for Palestinian theater came about during the long years of the intifada. The intifada began on December 8, 1987 when four Palestinians were killed and seven injured by an Israeli driver in the Gaza Strip. Within a short time, masses of Palestinians in the nearby Jabaliya refugee camp demonstrated against Israeli troops during the funerals, to protest the random, senseless loss of life. Later on, the intifada spread all over the occupied territories. Despite the harsh years of the intifada, Palestinian theater rejuvenated itself in the early 1990s, especially the Palestinian National Theater (PNT) in Jerusalem. The venue held its first Palestinian Festival in December 1990. While Jerusalem’s cultural establishment consolidated the status of the city, the rest of the occupied territories were under siege during the festival as a consequence of Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait and the ensuing Gulf War. Gaza Strip and the West Bank were isolated from Jerusalem by means of strict checkpoints and roadblocks (which continue to this date).

In 1992, many outstanding plays dealing mainly with the Palestinian plight were produced and performed at Theater Week, held at the PNT. In addition, it also organized various festivals such as Jerusalem Theater Nights in 1998 and 2001. The PNT has also targeted children as its main audience by organizing a yearly puppetry festival from 1989 until 2001, depending on the political situation. In the festivals, various European and Arab troupes performed plays based mainly on fairy tales and including puppets in the form of animals. However, during the intifada, the south of the West Bank and Gaza Strip witnessed such a cultural revival only when the PNT was allowed by the Israeli military to enter into these areas. As for the Palestinians in Israel, they also witnessed many signs of revival, such as the yearly Acre Festivals and the establishment of various theatrical venues.

The cooperation between Palestinians, whether in Israel, in the Gaza Strip, or in the occupied territories, intensified with the Declaration of Principles, which brought an end to the Palestinian intifada with the signing of the Oslo Peace Accords in 1993. Both Palestinians, represented by the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), and Israelis established mutual recognition. Euphoria swept the Gaza Strip and the occupied territories, and various theater activities were launched for some time. Many old troupes resurfaced under new names. Foremost among them is Masraḥ ‘Aštār in Ramallah, north of Jerusalem, which targets school children with its program. Another is Masraḥ al-Qaṣaba in Jerusalem and Ramallah. Both of these theaters were active members of various theater troupes in the 1970s. Yet in the aftermath of signing the 1993 Peace Accords between Israel and the Palestinians, and during the last decade of negotiating for a final solution to the question of Palestine, the theater seems to have added to the condition of Palestinians and affected all walks of life.

The difficulties confronting Palestinian theater, however, are immense. Most of the theater troupes complain about the predominance of amateurism and the lack of professional directors, actors, local playwrights, and venues. For most of the troupes, the solution to the shortage of local dramatic texts is adapting from Western literature. In addition, people involved in the theater rank the lack of national financial support as a major obstacle. In the absence of national institutions to support cultural activities, local theater still needs to turn to Western donors. Such has been the case of ‘Aštār, ‘Inād, and al-Qaṣaba.

It is a fact that foreign funds do guarantee the continuity of theater activities, yet most of the time this support ends up being the only life support offered to contemporary Palestinian theater and art. A great risk thus looms of donors imposing on the troupes, in terms of the selection of texts and, accordingly, the messages conveyed. Ironically, Palestinian theater found itself in a position where it had to recreate settings to face the continuous deteriorating political situation. This feeling was intensified with the al-Aqsa massacres in September 1994 and 1996; recently it was reinforced when the second intifada erupted on September 28, 2000. The continuous violence between the Israelis and the Palestinians and the imposition of curfews, invasions, and assassinations caused the theater to go into yet another period of hybernation, only to rise again.

Currently it is not the Palestinian National Theater taking the lead in Jerusalem but rather al-Qaṣaba, which opened another venue in the city of Ramallah, thus catering to the north of the West Bank, while the south is dominated by various amateur troupes springing from the refugee camps. al-Qaṣaba is the leader in theater activities and has become internationally known. In the last two years, its aim has been to address the daily suffering of its audience. This has been manifested in a collective effort to write and produce Stories Under Occupation (2002), and in Smile, You Are a Palestinian (2004). Both plays won many awards and were performed in various Arab and European countries. In sum, it seems that the predicament of the Palestinian theater inevitably cannot be divorced from its political context.

FURTHER READING

- al-Ġūzī, Naṣrī. Tārīḥ al-Masraḥ al-Filasṭīnī 1918–1948 [The History of Palestinian Theater 1918–1948]. Nicosia: Muassasat Bisan, 1991.
- Ashrawi, Hana. Contemporary Palestinian Literature Under Occupation. Birzeit: Birzeit Univ. Press, 1976.
- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra, ed. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1992.
- , and Roger Allen, eds. Modern Arabic Drama: An Anthology. Indianapolis: Indiana Univ. Press, 1995.
- Maḥamid, Muḥammad. ‘Abed al-Ra’af: Masīrat al-Ḥaraka al-Masraḥiyya fī aḍ-Ḍiffa al-Ġarbiyya [The Journey of the theater Movement in the West Bank]. Israel: Tayba, 1989.
- Nassar, Hala. Performing Palestine: A National Arab Theatre. Florence, Mass.: Interlink Pub. Group, forthcoming.
- Sayegh, Anis, ed. al-Mawsuʿah al-Filasṭīniyah. Al-Qism al-thani: al-dirasat al-khaṣṣah [Encyclopedia of Palestine. Second Part, Special Studies]. Beirut: Hayat al-Mawsuʿah al-Filasṭīniyah, 1990.
- Shinar, Dov. Palestinian Voices: Communication and Nation Building in the West Bank. Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner Pubs., 1987.
- Snir, Reuven. “Palestinian Theatre: Historical Development and Contemporary Distinctive Identity.” Contemporary Theatre Review, Vol. 3, 2 (1995): 29–75.
- . “‘We Were Like Those Who Dream’: Iraqi-Jewish Writers in Israel in the 1950’s.” Prooftexts Vol. 11 (1991): 153–173.
- Sulaiman, Mohamed. The Palestinian Press and the British Mandate Laws (Arabic). Nicosia: Muassasat Bisan, 1988.

Hala Khamis Nassar

PANIKKAR, KAVALAM NARAYANA (1928–)

Kavalam Narayana Panikkar, born in April 1928 in Kavalam, Kerala, INDIA, is one of the most important figures in the theater of roots movement, a post-independence effort to decolonize the aesthetics of modern Indian theater by challenging the visual practices, performer/spectator relationships, dramaturgical structures, and aesthetic goals of colonial performance—which is to say ways of perceiving, ways of interacting, and ways of structuring experience. Many late 19th-century and early 20th-century productions resisted colonial laws and practices in their subject matter, but the roots movement is important because it challenged colonial culture by reclaiming the aesthetics of performance and addressing the politics of aesthetics. Panikkar has used the Natyasastra (a Sanskrit aesthetic treatise), Sanskrit plays, and kutiyattam (a way of performing Sanskrit drama) to decolonize the dramaturgical structure, the aesthetics, and the goal of his work. In fact, many of Panikkar's plays, particularly OTTAYAN (The Lone Tusker, 1977), are based on the dramaturgical structure of a kutiyattam performance.

A kutiyattam performance of a Sanskrit play can take anywhere from five to thirty-five nights to complete. On the first night, a character enters, introduces himself by narrating his personal history and some important details from his own life, presents some of the important events leading up to the play, and expands on details found in the first few lines of text. On the second and third nights, the same character (possibly played by a different actor) tells stories connected to, but not found in, the main story of the play. On each successive night another character appears until all the characters have been introduced, each offering his or her own history and version of the story. In this way the story is told and retold from many points of view, the background to the story is fully explored, and the story is made relevant to the audience. On the final night of kutiyattam, “the play” is performed. “The play” is only a fraction of the total experience. Kutiyattam spectators do not have a “horizontal” experience as they would in Western theater. They do not follow the plot in a linear fashion across time. Instead, they have a series of “vertical” experiences in which they follow the actor as he delves into each moment, exploring it fully at many levels and in many modes. In fact, a kutiyattam performance is not the presentation of a text but an elaboration of it—a performer may spend up to three hours illuminating three lines of text by making political and social analogies, exploring emotional associations, and telling related or background stories. Panikkar has adapted this dramaturgical structure for his modern plays and productions. His production of a ten-page play can last for ninety minutes. (Because Panikkar writes his plays for his company Sopanam and directs most of them himself, it is very difficult to separate his playwriting from his DIRECTING.) This process of elaborating on the text is known as anukirthanam, or “celebration of [the] mood by stretching it out to enhance the ultimate rasa” (Panikkar, quartered in Mee, 1995).

The goal of Sanskrit drama was to create rasa; similarly, Panikkar's goal is to create rasa. The word rasa has been variously translated as juice, flavor, and essence. It is the aesthetic flavor, or sentiment, that is tasted in or through performance. When food and spices are mixed together in different ways, they create different tastes. Similarly, the mixing of different basic emotions arising from different situations, when expressed through the performer, gives rise to an emotional experience or "taste" in the spectator, which is rasa. Panikkar's spectators do not have a cathartic experience while watching his productions but a rasic experience—they savor the emotional essence of the performance.

Panikkar's plays have other similarities to kutiyattam. Kutiyattam characters are alaukika—not of this world—they are gods, demons, and heroes. Similarly, Panikkar's plays, while they are not about gods or demons, are not kitchen-sink dramas. They are, as he refers to them, "myths for a modern sensibility" (quoted in Mee, 1995). For example, Aramba Chekkan (1996), Panikkar's adaptation of the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice, is a cautionary story about the way people take nature for granted. "Aramba" (the name of the Orpheus figure) means "the one who begins," and in the play he represents mankind's discovery of nature. Chekki (the Eurydice figure) is named after an orange forest-flower in Kerala; she personifies the gentle spirit of nature who "blossoms" when she first meets Aramban, then is later destroyed by him. These characters are personifications of ideas. This is true of characters in many of Panikkar's other plays such as Faust (1993), which depicts the battle between good and evil, or Karimkutty (1983). Karimkutty is a spirit, owned by the magician Kondadimadan. Kondadimadan is in debt to his former student Mantravanan. He repays his debt by selling Karimkutty, an act for which he suffers. The play can be read as a parable about the changing role of the traditional artist in contemporary society or as a parable about someone who sells his power to a wealthy but ignorant outsider (Panikkar, 1992). But it can also be read as a warning to those who think they can, or behave as if they can, own others. It is a critique of the caste system and of class relations. The characters are personifications of thematic ideas.

Many of Panikkar's plays focus on the notion of personal identity and what happens to it in a theatrical context. For example, one of Panikkar's most recent plays, The Role of Kali (Kalivesham, 2001) deals with a kathakali actor (kathakali is a classical dance drama from Kerala) who, once "possessed" by his character, cannot escape the effect his character has on him outside the performance.

Panikkar has won many state and national awards for playwriting and directing, including the prestigious Kallidas Samman Award for Theatre (1996). His plays have been presented all over India and in Greece, Japan, Austria, the United States, Russia, and Korea.

SELECT PLAYS: Witness (Sakshi, 1964); Godhead (Daivathar, 1973);

One's Own Hurdle (Avanavan Katamba, 1975); The Lone Tusker (Ottayan, 1977); The Black One (Karimkutty, 1983); The Domain of the Sun (Suryasthan, 1984); The Right To Rule (Koyma, 1986); Latent Fire (Arani, 1990); Marukidathy (1991); Theyyattheyyam (1991); The

Outcast (Poranadi, 1995); The Man on the Other Side (Apprakan, 1998); The Eater of the God of Time (Kalanetheeni, 2003); The Role of Kali (Kalivesham, 2003); The Girl Who Rolls the Stone (Kallurutti, 2004)

FURTHER READING

- Mee, Erin. "Contemporary Indian Theatre, Three Voices." Performing Arts Journal 19 (1997): 1–26.
- . "Folk Philosophy in Kavalam Narayana Panikkar's Poetic Theatre of Transformation, an interview with Kavalam Narayana Panikkar." Seagull Theatre Quarterly 7 (1995): 58–61.
- Panikkar, Kavalam Narayana. "Aramba Chekkan." In DramaContemporary: India. Ed. by Erin B. Mee. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 2001.
- . Karimkutty and The Lone Tusker. Calcutta: Seagull Books, 1992.
- . The Right To Rule and Domain of the Sun. Calcutta: Seagull Books, 1989.
- . "Interview with K. S. Narayana Pillai." In Contemporary Indian Theatre: Interviews with Playwrights and Directors. Ed. by Paul Jacob. Delhi: Sangeet Natak Akademi, 1989.

Erin B. Mee

THE PARASITES

Moral lectures can't make a human parasite a useful citizen. But you can exterminate the parasites! You can exterminate them by opening the eyes of the hard-working people to the parasites—and that shall be my social task. Like a fiery fox terrier pursuing rats and mice—in exactly the same way I shall pursue the parasites.

—Johannes, Act 3

CARL ERIK SOYA'S (1896–1983) The Parasites (Parasitterne, 1926) takes place in a shabby Copenhagen suburb. When the play opens, we see a young student, Johannes, eagerly studying a tiny hole in the earth overrun with weeds. Through the conversation with his fiancée, we understand that he has at long last found his mission in life: he wants to become an entomologist: to study the life of the insects; and he is now preparing a future treatise about "the parasites of Bombus terrestris" by observing the activities of the bumblebees through a magnifying glass. Johannes is in many ways the alter ego of the author, and in the opening scene playwright Carl Soya introduces the theme of the play—parasites—and the technique used—studying his characters through a magnifying glass.

Parasites are not limited to the world of insects but flourish among humans, too, and Johannes happens to lodge with a fine specimen: Gruesen, a man who behind a jovial and vulgar charm is a ruthless impostor and exploiter of his fellow creatures, among them his imbecile and mentally deranged wife who adores him. The Parasites is a picaresque play where the more clever win over the less clever. Gruesen seems to hold a good hand when he takes an elderly and apparently rich "Miss Olsson from America" as a second lodger. By appealing to her sentimental love for children, he asks her to draw up a will for the benefit of his grandchild Evelyne; then, eager to lay hand on the many millions, he intimidates his wife to put rat poison in Miss Olsson's tea. But Gruesen has for once made a miscalculation. Miss Olsson was in fact a poor, lonely person who did not own a thing; moreover, Johannes suspects the true facts and threatens to go to the police. But Gruesen still has a card up his sleeve. He can easily put the blame on his wife and go free. Before the police arrive, however, he is stabbed by her, not because of his deeds but out of jealousy, as she fears he will go to other women while she is in jail. Gruesen dies heroically without a groan, giving a last farewell to his baby grandchild, the latest offspring of his noble line.

In the preface to the published edition from 1929, Soya called The Parasites a naturalistic play. But Gruesen is hardly an individual character. He is representative of the human parasite, and in the course of the play he grows to monumental size—a monster in a Copenhagen suburban milieu. In 1926, Soya sent the play to the Royal Theatre, where it was accepted but not staged. The first performance took place in 1931 in the Det Sociale Teater, a collective of unemployed actors, in a staging that stressed the grotesque and macabre character of the play. When The Parasites reached the Royal Theatre in 1945, the staging there made the play lose much of its bite.

[See also Denmark]

Kela Kvam

PARASITTERNE See THE PARASITES

PARKS, SUZAN-LORI (1964–)

In 2002 playwright, screenwriter, and novelist Suzan-Lori Parks became the first African American woman to win a Pulitzer Prize for Playwriting. In the years since she started writing plays at Mount Holyoke College, her work has encompassed a variety of styles but has consistently impressed critics and audiences by its rendering of colloquial African American speech as poetic, lyrical language that rapidly swings between humor and pathos.

Parks, daughter of an army officer, was born in 1964 in Fort Knox, Kentucky. She had an itinerant childhood as her father's tour of duty took him through six states before stationing him in GERMANY. Parks has credited her time in Germany with giving her a heightened awareness of the English language while providing her with the experience of being an outsider identified more by her nationality than by her race.

As a student at Mount Holyoke, she took a creative writing class with JAMES BALDWIN, who was instrumental in encouraging her to become a playwright. Influenced by the modernists she read as a major in English and German literature, Parks also looked to ADRIENNE KENNEDY and NTOZAKE SHANGE as examples of writers who broke the confines of psychological REALISM in African American theater.

She moved to New York not long after graduating from college, and the second play she produced there, Imperceptible Muta- bilities in the Third Kingdom (1989), won her an Obie Award for best new play, as well as a citation by the New York Times's Mel Gussow as the most promising playwright of the year. The production also began Parks's collaboration with director Liz Diamond, who went on to direct the premieres of The Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World (1990) and THE AMERICA PLAY (1994).

Critic Elinor Fuchs's description of Death of the Last Black Man as "part pageant play, part JAZZ cantata, part Greek TRAGEDY, and always an elegy on the theme of black suffering, loss, and misrepresentation through history" could apply to America Play as well. At the same time, critics such as Robert Brustein championed Parks as one who "avoids the conventions of Black victimology" in works that "portray the humiliation of blacks in white society without complaint or indictment."

Parks's insistence that her "life is not about race," her stated desire to write works as notable for their experimental form as for their content, and her provocative reception by critics such as Brustein made her early plays particularly controversial; critic Shawn Garrett has stated that a planned symposium on Parks in Theater magazine had to be canceled in 1993 because African American critics "objected, in essence, to [Parks's] politics," expressed concern at her appeal to predominantly white audiences, and refused "to go on record with their opinions." Black criticism of Parks reached its height with the 1995 production of Venus, directed by RICHARD FOREMAN; in the African American Review, Jean Young claimed that Parks's portrayal of Saartjie Baartman, a historical figure abducted from South Africa in 1810 and shown through Europe in freak shows that highlighted her large breasts and buttocks, depicted the so-called Hottentot Venus as "complicit in her own horrific exploitation," thereby "diminish[ing] the tragedy of her life as a nineteenth-century Black woman stripped of her humanity at the hands of a hostile, racist society" (Young, 1997).

In her early works, Parks relied consistently on an African American tradition that scholar Henry Louis Gates Jr. has described as "repetition [and] difference." Referred to by Parks herself as "rep and rev," that is to say, "repetition and revision," James Frieze (1998) and other critics have pointed out that the writing technique resonates with jazz compositions in which phrases are repeated in modified forms. Death and resurrection, the evasive presence of history, the motif of digging, and the self-conscious manipulation of racial stereotypes figure prominently in the plays. Of Death of the Last Black Man, Brustein wrote that it was "too densely written for one mind to absorb at a single sitting." After Venus, however, Parks began to show a tendency to use more established dramaturgical conventions, both in terms of structure and language. In the Blood (2006), for example, depicted the desperation of a homeless, single mother trying to raise her children, and it owed as much to BERTOLT BRECHT's THE GOOD WOMAN OF SETZUAN as it did to Nathaniel Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter, which Parks has named as the inspiration for the play.

Parks's screenplay for Girl 6 was directed and produced by Spike Lee in 1996, and she has also written screenplays for Disney and Jodie Foster. In 2000, she became the head of the dramatic writing program at the California Institute for the Arts in Valencia. She received a prestigious MacArthur Fellowship in 2001. In 2003, Parks published her first novel, Getting Mother's Body, to mostly positive reviews. Her latest play In the Blood is based on the flooding in New Orleans that resulted from Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

[See also Black Arts Movement; United States, 1965–Present]

PLAYS: Imperceptible Mutabilities in the Third Kingdom (1989); The Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World (1990); The America Play (1994); Venus (1995); In the Blood (1999); Topdog/Underdog (2002); Fucking A (2003); In the Blood (2006)

FURTHER READING

- Bernard, Louise. "The Musicality of Language: Redefining History in Suzan-Lori Parks's The Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World." African American Review 31, no. 4. (Winter 1997).
- Drukman, Steven. "Suzan-Lori Parks and Liz Diamond: Doo-a-diddly-dit-dit. An Interview." The Drama Review 39, no. 3 (T147) (Fall 1995).
- Frieze, James. "Imperceptible Mutabilities in the Third Kingdom: Suzan-Lori Parks and the Shared Struggle to Perceive." Modern Drama, no. 41 (1998).
- Garrett, Shawn-Marie. "The Possession of Suzan-Lori Parks." American Theatre (October 2000).
- Sellar, Tom. "Suzan-Lori Parks's Venus: The Shape of the Past." TheatreForum, no. 9 (Summer–Fall 1996).
- Young, Jean. "The Re-objectification and Re-commodification of Saartjie Baartman in Suzan-Lori Parks's Venus." African American Review 31, no. 4 (Winter 1997).

Daniel Mufson

PÁSK See EASTER

PÁSKÁNDI, GÉZA (1933–1995)

Géza Páskándi was a prolific Hungarian writer of poetry, fiction, essays, and drama. As a playwright he was at home in ABSURDISM and REALISM. Indeed, some of his historical dramas betray absurdist tendencies.

Born on May 18, 1933, in Szatmárhegy (Viile Satu Mare), Transylvania, as a member of ROMANIA's Hungarian minority of nearly two million, Páskándi was swept up in the government's attempt to crush Hungarian intellectual life in Transylvania following the 1956 Revolution against Soviet domination in neighboring HUNGARY. Páskándi was among the many imprisoned for "nationalist agitation." He spent six years at hard labor, was released in 1963, and moved to Hungary in 1974.

Between the time of his release from prison and his move to Hungary, Páskándi proved a master of a genre that, for reasons of official cultural policy, was relatively new to Hungarian playwrighting. He called his drama "absurdoid" to distinguish it from Theater of the Absurd as practiced in the West. For Páskándi, absurdity does not characterize the human condition as such; rather, it arises out of social realities and is perpetuated by human design or folly. His early absurdoid work includes many droll plays that comment on the ways external authority manipulates its victims into complicity, even against their best interest, and whether or not they are aware of being manipulated.

The play that first brought Páskándi acclaim was Sojourn (Vendégség, 1969). Set in 16th-century Transylvania, it is about a peculiar relationship between betrayer and betrayed, in which each is open about his purpose and believes he is acting in the best interest of the other and the cause they both believe in. This complex exploration of choice and conduct in situations of coercion was incorporated into a trilogy of "bishop dramas" about Reformation figures, collectively titled Transylvanian Triptych (1984). This trilogy examines relations of power from the perspective of the powerless. Another trilogy, Triptych of the House of Árpád (1994), about Hungary's first dynasty, deals with the dilemmas of power among the powerful. The difference reflects a shift in Páskándi's focus following his move to Hungary, from the self-awareness of a member of an oppressed minority to a broader national concern. A didactic intent can be detected in these later dramas. At the core of each play is a destructive fraternal struggle, echoing recent history.

Emblematic of Páskándi's ability to create complex allegories is one of his finest late plays, The Soldiers of Augustus (Augustus katondái, 1992), set during the biblical Slaughter of the Innocents. The Jewish protagonist learns of Herod's plan and must decide whether to declare his newborn a Roman in order to save the child's life. The value of an individual life is pitted against national, religious, and communal survival.

Páskándi returned to his absurdoid roots in his last play, World's Fair (Todogar ajur kvárna, 1995), in which the once static roadside world of SAMUEL BECKETT's tramps Vladimir and Estragon is now threatened by surges of refugees.

Páskándi was awarded the Attila József and the Kossuth Prizes in Hungary for literature. He died on May 19, 1995, in Budapest.

PLAYS: No Conductor (Kalauz nélkül, 1967); The Line (A sor, 1968); Sojourn (Vendégség, 1969); The Hiding Place (A rejtekhely, 1972); I Choose a Tower (Tornyot választok, 1972); King Kálmán (Kálmán király, 1977); Residents of the Windmill (A szélmalom lakói, 1981); Death Bell (Lélekharang, 1986); The Soldiers of Augustus (Augustus katondái, 1992); World's Fair (Todogar ajur kvárna, anagram of "Godotra ujra várnak," that is, "they're waiting again for Godot," 1995)

FURTHER READING

- Bécsy, Tamás. Kalandok a drámdval, Magyar drámák 1945–1989 [Adventures with drama, Hungarian dramas 1945–1989]. Budapest: Balassi Kiadó, 1996.
- Ézsiás, Erzsébet. Mai magyar dráma [Hungarian drama today]. Budapest: Kossuth Könyvkiadó, 1986.

Máramarosi, Iza. Páskándi Géza. Budapest–Ungvár: Primor és Intermix Kiadó, 1994.

Suto, Andras, and Eugene Brogyanyi, eds. Dramacontemporary: Hungary: Plays by Andras Suto, Geza Paskandi, Istvan Csurka, Gyorgy Spiro, Mihaly Kornis. Richmond, Ontario: Hushion House, 1991.

Eugene Brogyányi

PATRICK, JOHN (1905–1995)

John Patrick, one of the most commercially successful dramatists and screenwriters of the mid-20th century, became popular by striving to entertain his audience more than to challenge it. Patrick's dramaturgical craft demonstrated his skills at mixing familiar dramatic and comic elements with a bold theatricality and warm sentimentality. In their time, these qualities endeared Patrick's Broadway plays and films to audiences, but his plays have found consistent production only in collegiate and amateur theaters. The most appreciative critics note that Patrick's dramatic output exudes affection for humanity as evidenced by the richness of his central characters, most of whom are genial, often eccentric survivors whose lives span 20th-century human experience. Detractors, like Harold Clurman, in a 1953 critique in The Nation, dismissed Patrick's plays as mere entertainments, "good-natured, liberal, and constantly indulgent."

Born John Patrick Goggan on May 17, 1905, in Louisville, Kentucky, he was abandoned by his parents, John Francis and Mary (Osborn) Goggan, and spent most of his childhood in foster care. In the mid-1920s, Patrick found work as an announcer for RKO Radio in San Francisco, after which he dropped his last name. His writing career began in 1929 when he scripted an impressive 1,100 episodes of Cecil and Sally, an NBC radio drama. He also wrote for other regular radio series, but his radio career essentially ended with the outbreak of World War II. After the war, he took courses at Harvard and Columbia Universities, although he never earned a degree.

Hell Freezes Over (1935), Patrick's first play, was poorly received on Broadway and closed after a brief run, but it led Patrick to a three-year stint as a screenwriter for Twentieth Century-Fox. Teamed with various writers, he worked on nineteen film scripts between 1936 and 1939. Returning to the stage in 1942 with The Willow and I, a turn-of-the-century gothic drama of the Deep South, Patrick received good reviews, but the play failed commercially. Patrick's breakthrough play, The Hasty Heart (1945), won critical acclaim and long runs in New York and London. Set in a British field hospital in Burma, where a nurse encourages the multinational Allied patients to befriend a lonely, dying Scottish soldier, The Hasty Heart mixes pathos and humor. The Hasty Heart also emphasized basic themes of human dignity and the search for love and connection, all typical of Patrick's plays and films.

Patrick's drama The Story of Mary Surratt (1947) had a short run despite critical approval, but his COMEDY The Curious Savage (1950) bordered on FARCE and was set in a home for mental patients. It became one of Patrick's most produced works despite a mere month on Broadway. Patrick's farce Lo and Behold! (1951) found little favor, but his next play, The Teahouse of the August Moon (1953), adapted from Vern Sneider's novel, ran over 1,000 performances on Broadway and was made into a successful 1956 film scripted by Patrick. A satire on the American military's attempt to "Americanize" Okinawa at the end of World War II, Teahouse became one of the most frequently produced comedies of its time and Patrick's most honored work. It received the 1954 Pulitzer Prize, the Tony Award as Best Play, and the New York Drama Critics Circle Award. Despite this triumph, Patrick never had a major Broadway success again.

Patrick found considerable success as a screenwriter from the mid-1950s onward with such films as Three Coins in a Fountain (1954), Love Is a Many-Splendored Thing (1955), High Society (1956; a musical adaptation of PHILIP BARRY'S THE PHILADELPHIA STORY with a score by Cole Porter), Les Girls (1957), Some Came Running (1960), The World of Susie Wong (1960), and The Shoes of the Fisherman (1968).

As a self-avowed "entertainer," Patrick did not aspire to the serious dramatic goals of contemporaries like TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, ARTHUR MILLER, or EDWARD ALBEE. He was, instead, a forerunner of popular Broadway playwrights like NEIL SIMON, celebrating the status quo with plays that were little more than situation comedies featuring Patrick's warm regard for humanity. Patrick took his own life at age ninety on November 7, 1995, in Del Rey Beach, Florida.

[See also United States]

PLAYS: Hell Freezes Over (1935); The Willow and I (1942); The Hasty Heart (1945); The Story of Mary Surratt (1947); The Curious Savage (1950); Lo and Behold! (1951); The Teahouse of the August Moon (1953); Good as Gold (1957); Juniper and the Pagans (1959); Everybody Loves Opal (1961); It's Been Wonderful (1966); Scandal Point (1967); Everybody's Girl (1968); Love Is a Time of Day (1969); A Barrel Full of Pennies (1970); Lovely Ladies, Kind Gentlemen (1970; musical adaptation of The Teahouse of the August Moon); Opal is a Diamond (1971); Anybody Out There? (1972); The Dancing Mice (1972); Macbeth Did It (1972); The Savage Dilemma (1972); The Enigma (1973); Opal's Baby (1973); Roman Conquest (1973); A Bad Year for Tomatoes (1974); Love Nest for Three (1974); Sex on the Sixth Floor: Three One-Act Plays: Tenacity, Ambiguity, Frustration (1974); Divorce, Anyone? (1975); Noah's Animals (1975); Opal's Husband (1975); People!: Three One-Act Plays: Boredom, Christmas Spirit, Aptitude (1976); Suicide, Anyone? (1976); The Girls of the Garden Club (1979); Opal's Million Dollar Duck (1979); That's Not My Father! Three One-Act Plays: Raconteur, Fettucine, Masquerade (1979); That's Not My Mother: Three One-Act Plays: Seniority, Reception, Optimism (1979); The Magenta Moth (1983); Danny and the Deep Blue Sea (1984); It's a Dog's Life: The Gift, Co-incidence, The Divorce (1984)

FURTHER READING

- Clurman, Harold. Review of Teahouse of the August Moon. The Nation (October 31, 1953).
- Hall, Michael. "John Patrick: Playwright of the August Moon." Master's thesis, Univ. of Florida at Gainesville, 1972.
- Marion, John. "John Patrick." In Dictionary of Literary Biography 7, ed. by John MacNicholas. Detroit, Mich.: Broccoli Clark, 1981.
- Moe, Christian H. "John Patrick." In Contemporary Dramatists, ed. by D. L. Kirkpatrick. 4th ed. London: St. James Press, 1988. 417–418.

James Fisher

PEDRERO, PALOMA (1957–)

Born July 3, 1957, in Madrid, SPAIN, Paloma Pedrero lived the finale of General Francisco Franco's fascist dictatorship, the inauguration of Spain's democratic period, the development of the European Union, and most recently, global terrorism when commuter trains were attacked near Madrid on March 11, 2004. While Pedrero's themes include such sociopolitical events, her interrogation of gender roles distinguishes her theater. With a formation in ACTING, directing, teaching playwriting workshops, and a degree in social anthropology from Madrid's Universidad Complutense, Pedrero is one of a few contemporary Spanish women playwrights to achieve international recognition; she has already seen her plays staged in ENGLAND, the UNITED STATES, COSTA RICA, the Czech Republic, CUBA, and a number of European countries.

Her early plays of the 1980s such as Lauren's Call (La llamada de Lauren, 1984), Wolf Kisses (Besos de lobo, 1986), and The Color of August (El color de agosto, 1987) were relegated to small, marginal Spanish theaters whose budgets provided minimum promotion or distribution of her work. Moreover, as a female writer whose dramas exposed contemporary anxieties about rigid gender conventions within the pluralistic and transitional environment of the early democratic period, critical reviews tended to be subdued or derisive of Pedrero's feminist concerns, in spite of awards some of these plays garnered. These are the very plays, however, that scholars, students, and theater companies in other countries celebrated.

The author's oeuvre ranges from one-act to full-length dramas with a tendency toward verbal economy, linguistic vogue, and poignant humor. Further, the plays display an intensity that confronts, unsettles, and exhilarates audiences who identify with the protagonists' experiences such as defying rigid gender role paradigms (Wolf Kisses, The Color of August, Lauren's Call); brief encounters born of both human desire and the need for compassion (From Midnight to Dawn [De la noche al alba, 1992], First Star [Una estrella, 1990]); the social and global realities of terrorism (Puppies with a Dark Gaze [Cachorros de negro mirar, 1995] and Ana 3/11 [Ana el once de Marzo, 2004]); and self-empowerment (Wolf Kisses and Love Crazy [Locas de amar, 1994]).

During the 1990s, Pedrero began training the next generation of writers and helping them launch their own careers, but it was not until the 21st century that her own playwriting triumphed with Spanish audiences. Nights of Passing Love (Noches de amor enfimero, 1989), composed of three one-acts, has attracted the largest and most mainstream audiences. First staged in a small theater in Madrid in 1990, a revised version of Nights played at Madrid's prestigious Teatro de Bellas Artes, where spectators filled the theater for almost two months during the winter of 2003. Her healthy number of publications and productions in Spain have affirmed Pedrero's significance within Spanish theater history. Outside of Spain, Lauren's Call, The Color of August, and Nights of Passing Love count among her best-known dramas, and her latest plays have already gained momentum on international stages. In 2006, for example, Ana 3/11 premiered in both London and New York, while Midnight's Desire debuted in Cuba (Los Ojos de la noche, 1998). In the same year, First Kiss (Beso a Beso, 2005) was nominated for nine Premios Max (Spain's equivalent to Broadway's Tony Awards). As an established writer associated with the post-Franco democracy, Pedrero is already shaping Spanish theater of the budding 21st century.

SELECT PLAYS: Lauren's Call (La llamada de Lauren, 1984); The Voucher (Resguardo personal, 1985); Wolf Kisses (Besos de lobo, 1986); The Color of August (El color de agosto, 1987); Nights of Passing Love (Noches de amor enfimero, 1989); First Star (Una estrella, 1990); Love Crazy (Locas de amar, 1994); Puppies with a Dark Gaze (Cachorros de negro mirar, 1995); Aging Quarrels (En el túnel un pájaro, 2004); Ana 3/11 (Ana el once de marzo, 2004); First Kiss (Beso a Beso, 2005)

FURTHER READING

- Leonard, Candyce. "Paloma Pedrero." In Major Spanish Dramatists: A Bio-critical Guide to the History of Spanish Theatre, ed. by Mary Parker. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001. 2:337–347.
- Perri, Dennis. "Paloma Pedrero's Theater: Seeing Is More Than Believing." Estreno 29, no. 1 (2003): 43–48.
- Weimar, Christopher B. "Gendered Discourse in Paloma Pedrero's Noches de amor enfimero." Gestos 16 (1993): 89–102.
- Zatlin, Phyllis. "From Night Games to Postmodern Satire: The Theater of Paloma Pedrero." Hispania 84, no. 2 (May 2001): 193–204.

Candyce Leonard

PEER GYNT

To be oneself is: to slay oneself.

—The Button-Molder, Act 5

HENRIK IBSEN's Peer Gynt was originally published as a dramatic poem not intended for the stage. The text was performed as a play for the first time in 1876 and has since then enjoyed much success at theaters in an increasing number of countries all over the world. Divided into five acts with dialogues and monologues in rhymed verse, the action covers the life and changing conditions of the main character, a native of Gudbrandsdal, NORWAY, from the age of twenty until he is an old man. He wants to impress his fellow men and is not considered trustworthy. Even his mother is temporarily fooled by his tall-tale inventiveness. After eloping with the bride at a wedding, and then abandoning her, he is outlawed by the community.

Daydreaming about achievements and honor, even aspiring to become emperor, and yet promiscuous, and running away from the consequences of what he has done, he is constantly on the move, exploring new opportunities. This brings him into situations where he is either on the verge of being annihilated, as with the trolls in the mountain hall of Dovre and the encounter with the enigmatic Voice in the dark (act 2), or fooled and robbed, as with the Bedouin girl Anitra in the Sahara (act 4). In act 3 the young girl Solvejg comes to live with him in his cabin in the forest, but the woman in green, daughter of the Dovre Master, appears and claims that he is the father of her child, so Peer chooses to leave, while Solvejg promises to wait for him to return.

Act 4 is staged in North AFRICA with Peer as a middle-aged gentleman moving from Morocco all the way to EGYPT. Here he decides to be a traveling scholar, observing the enigmatic monuments of antiquity. He is approached by Dr. Begriffenfeldt, the German director of the Cairo madhouse, who crowns him to be Emperor of the Self.

Approaching the Norwegian coast (act 5), he survives a shipwreck and starts moving inland, while his morally wretched life comes back to him in retrospective scenes. The Button-molder is instructed by his Master to get hold of Peer's soul; it is to be melted down because of lack of identity. Peer protests and tries in vain to find people who can witness that he has been himself, but all he can get is testimony to the effect that he has been living by the troll motto "Troll, be thyself—enough!" Gradually he realizes that he has not lived up to his moral obligations and that he is doomed to annihilation. At last he arrives with the Button-molder at Solvejg's cabin, and she does not accuse him: he has been himself in her faith, in her hope, and in her love.

Ibsen has added freely to the exploits of the folk hero, changing his character from the bold and helpful hunter of the local traditions into a selfish man whose behavior is dictated by a wish to avoid commitments of any kind and who vainly tries his luck in changing appearances as troll prince, businessman, prophet, scholar. The poem has been regarded in different ways—as a national satire against the Norwegians, as a fairy-tale play about the young, careless suitor approaching the princess, and as a romantic expansion of a medieval morality play, with Johann Wolfgang Goethe's Faust as its model. There are arguments in favor of all three concepts, the latter one increasingly demonstrated in the final act.

Key to understanding the difficult act 4 is the section on ancient Egyptian art and religion in Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel's Aesthetics. The German philosopher was much studied at European universities in the mid-19th century. He contrasted the symbolic art of the Orient, where animal forms seem to dominate the human element of various sculptures, and the classical art of Greek and Roman origin, where man is triumphing over the animal. Other references to Hegel's PHILOSOPHY are also to be found in the poem, such as his reflections on madness. The Director of the Cairo madhouse, Dr. Begriffenfeldt, may be regarded as a caricature of Hegel.

In act 2 and elsewhere, transformations of a variety of Norwegian folklore figures—for example, trolls with tails and other animal attributes—suggest a mixture of man and animal, corresponding to the enigmas presented by the combined expressions of ancient Egyptian mythology. The imagery of the poem abounds in metaphors and similes involving animal qualities applied to man, most of them aiming at Peer. Not all of these images are easily translated into other languages.

Peer Gynt is not without charm; among foreigners he is often the center of attention, with a talent for entertaining. Intellectually he is not impressive, often facing enigmas but failing to solve them. His monologues are often rich in proverbs and quotations (and misquotations) from the Bible and various other sources, and he may refer to philosophical and moral issues, but rarely in a serious way.

Gradually the story of Peer Gynt turns into an allegory of the ego erring between its lower instincts and its divine essence. For a long time Peer is blind to his own moral imperfections, but following some appalling encounters, such as the madhouse visit and the appearance of the Strange Passenger, he begins to realize that he should lower his aspirations: "among the wild creatures I ought to rank first." Peeling an onion, he is struck by the lack of a core, but he fails to see this as a token of his own spiritual being.

Enigmatic figures, such as the Voice in the dark (generally referred to as the Boyg), the singing statue of Memnon, the Sphinx, the madhouse inmates, can be regarded as mirror appearances, intended to teach Peer the essentials of his own situation. The Button-molder, sent to carry out the judgment, is confronted by Solvejg, the innocent woman, who on the allegorical level can be interpreted as Peer's higher identity. When he finally admits that he is No One, he is ready for the grace mediated through Solvejg. He can sleep and dream; she will be awake.

FURTHER READING

- Aarseth, Asbjørn. Dyret i Mennesket. Et bidrag til tolkning av Henrik Ibsens «Peer Gynt» [The Beast in Man: A Contribution to the Interpretation of Henrik Ibsen's Peer Gynt.], Bergen o.a., Universitetsforlaget 1975.
- . "Peer Gynt and Hegel's Ideas on Egyptian Art." Scandinavian Studies (December 22, 2001).
- Collin, Josef. Henrik Ibsen. Sein Werk—seine Weltanschauung—sein Leben [Henrik Ibsen. His work—his worldview—his life]. Heidelberg: Carl Winter, 1910.
- Fjelde, Rolf. "Peer Gynt, Naturalism, and the Dissolving Self." The Drama Review 13 (1968): 28–43.
- Johnston, Brian. "The Parable of Peer Gynt." In To the Third Empire. Ibsen's Early Drama. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1980. 164–207.

PÉREZ GALDÓS, BENITO (1843–1920)

Benito Pérez Galdós is generally considered SPAIN's greatest novelist. He was also a journalist, translator, and playwright. Born in Las Palmas, Canary Islands, Spain, on May 10, 1843, he was the youngest of ten children in a military family stationed in the Canary Islands. By all accounts the author's mother, María de los Dolores Galdós, was domineering and strict; she may have been Pérez Galdós's model for many strong-willed women in his works such as Doña Perfecta in the novel of the same name (1876). Pérez Galdós concealed his literary interests from her and rebelled against her soon after she sent him to Madrid to study law.

By the time of Pérez Galdós's arrival in Madrid in 1862, Krausism, a liberal PHILOSOPHY named after a minor German philosopher, had taken hold of the Spanish universities. Krausism implored men to live nobly and simply, dedicating themselves to serving and enlightening others. In 1865 Pérez Galdós began his career as a journalist at the Madrid-based La nación, and he would become the editor of the liberal El Debate in 1871. In 1872 he began editing the cultural magazine La Revista de España. While a journalist Pérez Galdós wrote a number of thesis novels between 1867 and 1878 that reflected the influence of Krausism in his work. Beginning in 1881, Pérez Galdós shifted his attention toward writing realist novels that were filled with social criticism of largely urban Madrid society but also included detailed descriptions of the city's customs and hierarchies. Often he would blend his Krausist beliefs with naturalist currents such as those found in the works of ÉMILE ZOLA. In 1889, he was elected to the Royal Spanish Academy. With the publication of forty-six historical novels titled National Episodes (Episodios nacionales, published 1873–1879 and 1898–1912), Pérez Galdós fused his literary talents with his love of Spanish history.

Finally, Pérez Galdós contributed nearly two dozen original or adapted works for the theater beginning in 1892. His most celebrated play Electra premiered in 1901 and was fraught with anticlerical messages as an ultraconservative priest tries to wrestle control over Electra, a young and beautiful woman he deemed convent material, from her modern, liberal cousin. Given the anticlerical context of the post-Spanish American War period, Electra was more a political success than a literary one. In 1914, his native Canary Islands voted him to represent them in the Spanish Parliament despite his deteriorating health and vision. He died in Madrid, Spain, on January 4, 1920.

PLAYS: Reality (Realidad, 1892); Gerona (1893); The Madcap (La loca de la casa, 1893); The Condemned (Los condenados, 1894); The Duchess of San Quintín (La de San Quintín, 1894); Will (Voluntad, 1895); Doña Perfecta (1896); The Festival (La feria, 1896); Electra (1901); Life and Soul (Alma y vida, 1902); Mariucha (1903); Bárbara (1904); Grandpa (El abuelo, 1904); Love and Science (Amor y ciencia, 1905); Pedro Minio (1908); Casandra (1910); Celia in the Depths of Hell (Celia en los infiernos, 1913); Alceste (1914); Sister Simona (Sor Simona, 1915); Solomon the Cheapskate (El tacaño Salomón, 1916); Saint Juana of Castile (Santa Juana de Castilla, 1918)

FURTHER READING

- Berkowitz, H. Chanon. Benito Pérez Galdós: Spanish Liberal Crusader. Madison: Univ. of Wisconsin Press, 1948.
- Bly, Peter. Galdós's Novel of the Historical Imagination: A Study of the Contemporary Novels. Liverpool, England: Francis Cairns, 1983.
- Gilman, Stephen. Galdós and the Art of the European Novel. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1981.
- Labanyi, Jo, ed. Galdós. Modern Literatures in Perspective Series. London: Longman, 1993.

Enrique Sanabria

PERFORMANCE ART

I make art about the misunderstandings that take place at the border zone. But for me, the border is no longer located at any fixed geopolitical site. I carry the border with me, and I find new borders wherever I go.

—Guillermo Gomez-Peña, New World Border, 1996

Almost all performance artists appear to share an obsession with some kind of “border zone,” the liminal region between this and that art form. The great difficulty presented by even defining the term performance has resulted in the grouping together under this rubric of wildly disparate theatrical, quasi-theatrical, and antitheatrical events. One thing can be said: Performance art expresses weariness with traditional boundaries between artistic genres, between elite and popular art, and with the value systems and critical methods of traditional aesthetics. Indeed, it is this very weariness, breeding as it does tremendous innovation and cross-fertilization, that attracts artists, historians, and theorists interested in pushing the envelope.

The term performance art was coined initially to describe the collisions between theater, dance, and visual art coming out of Europe, AUSTRALIA, the Americas, and JAPAN in the early 1970s, but the roots of this tradition stretch back to the 1880s. The historical, theatrical AVANT-GARDE's primary aesthetic goal was to combat the rising cultural dictatorship of the middle class by providing an alternative model promoting freedom of thought and action, negating structures of authority (and authorship), and advocating radical revolutionary politics. The avant-garde was not meant to critique the system from within but to attack it from the outside. Their battle cry of épater le bourgeois! manifested itself partly as an attempt to shock the audience out of its accustomed aesthetic complacency by undermining their expectations about the relationship of the art object to the consumer in an effort to bring radical social change.

The urge to “break the crust” of conventional aesthetics was enabled by the tradition of politically charged practical joking known as fumisme, the “rire jaune” originally associated with the aesthetic innovations of Stéphane Mallarmé and Arthur Rimbaud. Fumisme is a particularly ambiguous form of laughter marked by transgression, subversion, and destruction and is generally acknowledged to be a precursor of Dada and SURRE-

ALISM. Fumistes such as the Hydropathes, the practitioners of the Parisian Le Chat Noir, and ALFRED JARRY employed a kaliedoscope of techniques antithetical to mainstream theater conventions, ranging from the base and vulgar to the aggressive and intrusive. FILIPPO TOMMASO MARINETTI, in his 1913 Variety Theatre, suggested practical jokes on the audience including smearing mud, gum, or sneezing powder on the seats, selling one seat to ten individuals, giving complimentary seats to the mentally unstable, and so on. These experiments continued to escalate in various forms and with varying degrees of success until the rapid rise of fascism in Europe disrupted the development of radical theater in the 1930s.

This tradition reasserted itself in the experimental theaters emerging in Europe and America in the 1960s and 1970s, led by figures such as Peter Brook, Charles Marowitz, and Richard Schechner, who worked to develop performative events that jeopardized traditional relationships between performer and spectator, dependence on literary dramatic texts, and the Aristotelian devaluing of spectacle. The LIVING THEATRE's 1964 Mysteries and Smaller Pieces was a sequence of ritualized behaviors, mostly games; they and other groups, including the OPEN THEATER and the POOR THEATER of Polish director Jerzy Grotowski, searched for the "essential" theatrical experience. Risky body art emerged in the 1970s with the often frightening performances of Vito Acconci, Gina Pane, Adrian Piper, the 1980s work of Orlan (plastic-surgery art that attacks the social construction of beauty and gender identity), and in the 1990s, "posthuman" work synthesizing the human body with a robot's, as in the performances of the Australian artist Stelarc. The emergence of feminist discourse intersected powerfully with avant-garde performance to produce artists like Bobby Baker, Karen Finley, New York's WOW Café, the elaborately stylized art protests of the Guerilla Girls, and the sexually hyperexplicit "speculum" performances of Annie Sprinkle.

In the 1980s, Richard Schechner helped to found PERFORMANCE STUDIES, a new academic discipline to respond to and inspire such innovations. The blurring of conventional boundaries between artistic genres and disciplines coincided powerfully with these experiments. The result was a veritable explosion of experimental performances that did not fit neatly into the traditional definition of "theater." The emergence of postmodernist thought, which eschews the search for "essence" in favor of a romance with surfaces, moved experimental theater closer to the visual arts, particularly in the works of PING CHONG, Meredith Monk, and ROBERT WILSON. Self-reflexive, eclectically hungry, and intensely visual, performance art began to be seen as a logical outgrowth of postmodern discourse. The success of these experiments incited wave after wave of boundary-blurring performance pieces.

By the 1990s, activism and identity politics in performance art embraced ethnicity issues (including the work of Palestinian artist Mona Hatoum), sexuality (Tim Miller's gay-themed solo performances), and disability (as in the dance-based work of Catherine Cole). The Coney Island Sideshow's successful rebirth as a performance art venue gave complex legitimacy to circus-style artists like bearded lady Jennifer Miller. The politically charged work of Guillermo Gomez-Peña and Coco Fusco, who presented themselves outlandishly dressed in an outdoor cage as "undiscovered Amerindians," synthesizes ancient Indigenous performance styles with modern imagery to hyperbolize problems with IDENTITY politics. Performance art also often embraces advances in technology and science, as in the "difficult listening" innovative musical performances of Laurie Anderson, hypnotic with electronically warped sounds and stylized multimedia stage shows.

Performance art, sharing with its avant-garde progenitors a critique of conservatism, found itself under political fire from government censors in the UNITED STATES in the 1990s, when the National Endowment for the Arts radically reduced its funding for performance artists whose work had become controversial. Such criticism made performance art a political pawn in the so-called culture wars of the United States, although similar artists of innovative events are enjoying widespread government funding in Europe and Japan.

[See also Deconstruction; Epic Theater; Happenings and Intermedia; Interculturalism; Postmodernism]

FURTHER READING

- Banes, Sally. Subversive Expectations: Performance Art and Paratheatre in New York, 1976–85. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1998.
- Carlson, Marvin. Performance: A Critical Introduction. London: Routledge, 1996.
- Goldberg, RoseLee. Performance Art: From Futurism to the Present. Rev. ed. New York: Thames & Hudson, 2001.
- Harding, James M., ed. Contours of the Theatrical Avant-Garde. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 2000.
- Howell, Anthony. Analysis of Performance Art: A Guide to Its Theory and Practice. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Schechner, Richard. Environmental Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1983.

Michael M. Chemers

PERFORMANCE STUDIES

It is theatre . . . which haunts all performance whether or not it occurs in the theatre.

—Herbert Blau, The Eye of Prey, 1987

Performance studies as an emergent scholarly discipline is not a discrete field of study so much as a cross-fertilization of many different disciplines. Coming from theater scholarship and criticism, performance studies as an academic discipline was first proposed by Richard Schechner in 1966, when he expanded the definition of "performance" to include forms of ritualistic social behaviors other than traditional theater and dance, such as sports, games, and festivals. Modern performance studies is very much an outgrowth of this foundational work.

Performance studies allies itself most closely with the fields of cultural anthropology and ethnography, embracing the concept of "cultural performance" envisioned in 1959 by Milton Singer, which suggests that human behavior is largely governed by the acting out of predesigned roles, whether consciously or not. This concept is advanced in the work on "social drama" and ritual developed by Victor Turner, particularly in From Ritual to Theatre (1982). Also influential are the cultural anthropologist Clifford Geertz ("Deep Play: Notes on the Balinese Cockfight" [1973] employs performance techniques to analyze social phenomena), folklorist Dell Hynes, and cultural historian Johan Huizinga.

Performance studies engages psychology, sociology, and linguistics as well, particularly the work of Erving Goffman; The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (1959) shows "theatrical" conventions are in play in most social situations. Performance studies is deeply concerned with the relationship between performance and the construction of social and individual identities, a central point for cultural studies and poststructuralist theory. Another concern of performance studies is the ever-widening field of performance that does not fit easily into the broad categories of theater, dance, or other traditional classifications.

Performance studies enables anthropologists, sociologists, psychologists, cultural scholars, and linguists to see the usefulness of theater-related criticism in describing social phenomena. In addition, this growing field has increased the range of events that interest scholars: theme parks, folk festivals, religious displays, sporting events, popular entertainments like circuses and freak shows, and even political demonstrations and riots are seen as extensions of the theatrical activity of humanity.

While many scholars in these cross-pollinated fields are excited by such interdisciplinary opportunities, some critics have been troubled by the blurring of boundaries. Anthropologists, who usually avoid "interference" in the cultures they study, are troubled by the personal involvement of performance theorists in the social phenomena they study. Theater scholars worry that their work is raided for expedience and not engaged fully. Other critics ask, If theater is such a powerful metaphor for human behavior, then what aspect of human interaction is not theatrical? If performance studies allows the theatrical metaphor to be overdetermined in this way, it may cease to have relevance at all. These issues and others have resulted in some tension and even suspicion between performance studies and the other fields, a tension that has slowed the development of historical techniques within performance studies.

[See also Deconstruction; Epic Theater; Interculturalism; Performance Art; Postmodernism]

FURTHER READING

- Carlson, Marvin. Performance: A Critical Introduction. London: Routledge, 1996.
- Counsell, Colin, and Laurie Wolf. Performance Analysis: An Introductory Coursebook. London: Routledge, 2001.

- Pollack, Della, ed. Exceptional Spaces: Essays in Performance and History. Chapel Hill: Univ. of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Schechner, Richard. Performance Studies: An Introduction. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Stern, Carol Simpson, and Bruce Henderson. Performance: Texts and Contexts. New York: Longman, 1993.
- Stucky, Nathan, and Cynthia Wimmer. Teaching Performance Studies. Carbondale: Southern Illinois Univ. Press, 2002.

Michael M. Chemers

PERU

Peru has an active, dynamic theatrical life that transcends the obstacles of political instability, economic hardship, and even violence. Throughout the country there are playwrights and theater groups that create and perform works that reflect national identity. Nowhere is this more true than in Lima, which is not only the political capital of the country but also its cultural center. Much of the theatrical activity in Lima stems from the university groups, the most important of which are the Teatro de la Universidad de San Marcos (begun in 1946 by Guillermo Ugarte Chamorro) and the Teatro de la Universidad Católica (started in 1961), which have encouraged and trained new playwrights. The Teatro Nacional and its director Ruth Escudero have also been instrumental in bringing attention to autochthonous theatrical productions, as have contests such as Concurso Solari Wayne, Teatro Peruano Norteamericano, Hacia Una Dramaturgia Joven, among others, as well as festivals such as Muestras de Teatro Peruano.

Politically and economically, the 1980s were a time of instability in the country as a whole. In the capital, people's lives were daily interrupted by bombs, assaults, assassinations, kidnappings, blackouts, lack of water and other resources, and a constant state of fear. The biggest and most active terrorist group committing the majority of the attacks was Sendero Luminoso, or the Shining Path, a maoist group that was started in the mountains and moved its rebellion toward the cities. One of their most effective strategies was exploding electrical towers, which caused constant blackouts. The roads in and out of the city were dangerous, there were car bombs within the city, and anyone who was perceived to be in a position of authority was a target. Government reprisals were no better and often helped to create militants through a resentment of the heavyhanded methods of dealing with terrorism and of the complete lack of respect for human rights. All of this took place at the same time that hyperinflation and low employment rates added another stress to life in Lima. Economic uncertainty and fear for their safety kept many audiences away from the theaters.

The social upheavals and political violence of the 1980s ushered in an era of theatrical experimentation. The creación colectiva, or collective creations, in which several playwrights, with the collaboration of actors and directors, would create a play, often took the place of the individual playwright. These groups were created beginning in the 1950s but became most active in the 1970s and 1980s. In 1953, Reynaldo D'Amore, an Argentinian playwright and director, along with Grégor Díaz and several other playwrights, founded the Club de Teatro de Lima, and in the 1960s Sara Joffré founded Homero Teatro de Grillos, whose most important purpose was the publication of Peruvian theater. These efforts led in the 1970s to the teatro colectivo, or teatro de grupo, among which the two most well known and influential groups are Cuatrotablas and Yuyachkani, which have a liberal social and political agenda. Other groups are Magia, Alondra, Teatro Del Sol, Clavo y Canela, Yawar, Audaces, and many others. Almost all significant theater in the 1980s in Peru stemmed from the collective groups. The members of many of the groups worked together, traveled together, and organized workshops and even strikes. Their themes were mostly political, and their style experimental. They valued corporal expression over language and group improvisation over the individual playwright. The Movimiento de Teatro Independiente, or MOTÍN, was founded in 1985 and encompassed many theatrical groups in a professional guild. In 1990, MOTÍN was organized into regional divisions to which many playwrights and theater groups belonged and whose goal was to promote a national theater and an emphasis on new theories and praxis.

The new playwrights of the 1990s were active, dynamic, and individual. The resurgence of the importance of the playwright can be attributed to a certain extent to a reaction to the collective creation of the previous decade. Although much relevant and influential work continues to come from those groups, the individual playwright came into the spotlight in the 1990s, after more than a decade. The efforts of the playwrights themselves, as well as of directors and professors at the university theaters, helped to bring about a new generation of very active and productive playwrights. The collective creative movement did, however, influence the manner in which the present playwrights work, in that they are now more involved in the productions and are considered to be in partnership with the actors and director. The most influential of the collective groups remain active, but individual writers are now on the scene: Alonso Alegría, César Vega, Aureo Sotelo, César de María, Sara Joffré, Eduardo Adrianzén, Rafael Dumett, Javier Maraví, Alfonso Santistevan, María Teresa Zúñiga, Delfina Paredes, and Eduardo Valentín are some of the most active authors, according to Luis A. Ramos-García. To that list we can add Claudia Besaccia, Maritza Kirchhausen, and Aldo Miyashiro, among others.

The themes for this new theater of the 1990s are mostly the individual, identity, sexuality, generational conflict, family crises, and feminism. It is surprising, given the political violence of the previous decade, that the playwrights of the 1990s do not often have violent themes, and if they do, they are not generally directly linked to national politics. The Risk of Living (El riesgo de vivir), by Lucía Fox Lockert, published in 1982 in the anthology Voces en escena: Antología de dramaturgas latinoamericanas (Voices on the stage: Anthology of Latin American Women Playwrights), is one of the few graphically violent plays that directly address the problem of terrorism. In the play, a young middle-class woman is taken in by the guerrilla's maoist ideology, without fully understanding the extent of the violence involved. When her cousin and some friends are kidnapped and tortured, she decides to help them, but it is too late. The situation is desperate, and no solution is proposed, but the criticism of the terrorists, the government, and the self-blinded bourgeoisie is evident.

Other plays, such as Kamikaze! or The History of the Cowardly Japanese Man Kamikaze! o La historia del cobarde japonés (1999), by César de María, and Theatrical Wake Función velorio (2000), by Aldo Miyashiro Ribeiro, confront violence but are also not all that common. In the former, two Japanese brothers during World War II face difficult decisions. One is a cowardly soldier but protects his family at all costs, while the other is capable of fighting and murder but protects only himself. De María himself asserts that this is a commentary on the violence lived during the height of the war with the Shining Path guerrillas, but in removing the action in time and place, he avoids addressing head-on the domestic situation in Peru. In Miyashiro Ribeiro's play the subject is the theater itself and the desperation of a single playwright to get his work produced and receive the attention he feels he deserves. In order to do this, the playwright writes a final scene in which all of the characters actually die: the actors agree to take their own lives during the production. While this may reflect a hyperbolic commentary on the state of the theater in Peru, and illustrates the conflicts between individual characters, it does not directly address the Shining Path terrorists, although it can be argued that the use of murder to attract attention was one of their main strategies. The main themes for Limeño theater today continue to be existential, focusing mostly on the identity of the individual. This can, perhaps, be attributed to the fact that both the playwrights and the public no longer want to reflect on the violence but desire to move on.

Peruvian theater, and in particular Limeño theater, continues to confront obstacles, the greatest of which is a lack of audience, perhaps attributable to the economic problems and the high rate of unemployment that the country still experiences. There have been a few anthologies of Peruvian theater in the past decade, but in all there is not much published theater, and what exists is difficult to find because the editions tend to be limited. The advent of the Internet is helpful in that there are some plays and a great deal of information available online. Theater in Peru, and especially in Lima, is growing in influence and maturing in its search for a national identity. In the coming years there will very likely be continued lively productivity and interest in plays written by local authors.

FURTHER READING

Castro Urioste, José, and Roberto Angeles, eds. Dramaturgia peruana [Peruvian dramatic art]. Lima: Latinoamericana, 1999.

- Gonzalez Echevarría, Roberto, and Enrique Pupo-Walker, eds. The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature. 3 vols. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1996.
- Morris, Robert J. The Contemporary Peruvian Theatre. Lubbock: Texas Tech Press, 1977.
- Oleszkiewicz, Malgorzata. "Muestra Nacional de Teatro: The New Theatre in Peru." The Drama Review, TDR 33, no. 3 (Autumn 1989): 10–17.
- Ramos-García, Luis. "El discurso de la memoria teatral peruana en los noventa" [Discourse of Peruvian theatrical memory in the 1990s]. LATR (Fall 2000): 173–192.
- . Voces del interior: Nueva dramaturgia peruana [Voices of the interior: New Peruvian dramatic art]. Minneapolis, Minn.: Teatro Nacional del Perú, Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 2001.
- Sotomayor Roggero, Carmela. Panorama y tendencias del teatro peruano [Panorama and trends of the Peruvian theater]. Lima: Herrera, 1990.

Patricia Suppes

PERU, RELIGIOUS THEATER

PERU is a country that celebrates its dual heritage in popular theater, especially during the feast of the patron saint. The faithful perform dance dramas to please and placate the local saint and to assure good health and harvests. The fiesta suspends the daily struggle to survive, enhances the status of the performers, and affirms their collective identity. Adapted from familiar historical and sacred texts, these plays have evolved into a theater of self-affirmation. By reconciling native spirituality with Catholic rituals, the performance summarizes the mestizo (biracial and bicultural) identity of Andean peoples.

Religious theater is communal: financed by community donations, mounted by religious brotherhoods, and performed by working-class people in large outdoor venues. Created collectively from local traditions, the productions feature large troupes, lavish costumes often marked with symbolic images, and ritualized choreography set to live music. In the highlands, the performers tend to be Indians and mestizos; on the coast, these may include Afro-Peruvians. Structurally, the continuous action—without division into scenes—retains pre-Hispanic dramatic form. The scripts are fluid and modified continuously. Some productions are in Spanish, some in Quechua or Aymara, the languages of native Andeans; most are bilingual. Their roots stem from the dance dramas of medieval SPAIN and ancient Peru, which converged when missionary friars used Christian content and native actors, languages, and aesthetics to evangelize the indigenes. Most of today's performances, however, arose in the 1940s as a result of the Indigenous movement to vindicate Aboriginal culture.

The Death of Atahualpa (La muerte de Atawallpa), the most-often-performed play in Peru and Bolivia today and during colonialism, portrays the conquest of the Inca from a native perspective. Considered a demigod, the Inca Atahualpa is identified with the Apu, the local protector mountain god. The action begins as various sectors of Inca society greet the royal family with elegant dances and spectacular costumes. The Spanish arrive, capture Atahualpa, and massacre the Quechua soldiers. Pizarro accepts the famous "king's ransom" (two roomfuls of silver and one of gold), then baptizes and executes the Inca. After the ritual lament, the Priest proclaims the marriage and miscegenation of Spanish-Andean peoples, and they all dance off into history.

Some scholars date the first conquest play to 1555 in Potosí, now in Bolivia, but two watercolors from 1780s northern Peru provide the oldest proof of age. Conquest plays are more mythic than historical. Sometimes history prevails, and Atahualpa is garroted; in other versions he is decapitated or executed by sword, or the Emperor and Pizarro embrace in reconciliation. Some feature battles on horses reminiscent of the Spanish plays called Moros y cristianos. While historical references to conquest dramas abound, the oldest published texts date from 1955 (Bolivia) and 1985 (Peru).

In contrast, The Little Devils (Los diabólicos) hails only from Túcume, a village in north coastal Peru. It depicts the allegorical struggle between good and evil known as "The Dance of the Seven Vices." Hell and the devil were popular themes of missionary theater because holy terror created more converts than compassion. In effect, Lucifer trumped Christ. Like The Death of Atahualpa, proof of antiquity comes from a 1780s watercolor. Local lore traces The Little Devils to a colonial hoax. At night Spaniards masked as devils emerged from the pyramids nearby and rode through town in a pageant wagon pulled by horses to frighten the natives into accepting Catholicism. This hoax evolved into The Little Devils.

The action begins as the devils enter in two columns, a common pre-Conquest choreography. Then each of seven devils recites the evil he embodies: pride, lust, envy, and so on. After reciting the verses, they build a goat and dance in his honor. Occasionally, the Angel interrupts to battle with Lucifer. The Angel defeats him and converts the goat into the "Lamb of God" and the heathens into Christians. In celebration, the Angel invites everyone to dance around the plaza. While there are numerous versions of Atahualpa, The Little Devils belongs only to Túcume, and the representation has remained relatively stable since its colonial emergence.

The most famous popular production in Peru is the Feast of the Sun (Intraymi), celebrated in June in Cuzco, the ancient capital of the Inca empire. While this ceremony has dramatic elements, the modern version is a tourist attraction, more commercial than religious.

Religious theater reflects popular worship and societal values; the performers embody the community. On the surface Catholic devotion moves the action, but embedded elements allude to older forms of worship related to Andean sacred geography and the agricultural cycle. The nonverbal performance strategies validate the struggle of workers and farmers to honor their pantheistic worldview. The Apu (Inca mountain god) protects, and Pachamamá (Mother Earth) provides. In contrast, the Catholic saint punishes those who fail to fulfill their ritual obligations. Andean spirituality has many double gods.

Spanish authorities made repeated attempts to extirpate the idolatrous elements from sacred dance dramas, even banning them totally—to no avail. Ritual drama is inextricable to Andean culture. When they did not fume or look the other way, the Spaniards saw happy natives processing dogma into representation. Blinded by what they wanted to see, they failed to perceive the ironic and subversive nuances. In effect, religious theater provided a means for the colonized people to satirize their oppressors and express attitudes deemed dangerous in words. Los Diablicos, for example, resemble tricksters, caricatures more laughable than threatening. The small goat looks more like a toy than a weapon. The sword-wielding Angel, symbol of the Church, repeatedly attacks them, not the reverse. The real devils were the Spaniards who resorted to trickery to impose the faith; hell was the abuses of colonialism. In Túcume, the faithful fear the punishments of the Virgin Mary more than the temptations of the devil.

Today's oppressors descend from a caste system that still controls society. Even the conciliatory ending of The Death of Atahualpa does not diminish the people's contempt for the invaders. It projects the opulence and dignity of the Inca with stately movements to reaffirm native contributions to national culture. The imperial grandeur confirms the performers' descent from a great civilization and elevates their self-image. Thus conquest plays glorify the Inca past, and The Little Devils projects ambiguous images of good and evil. Atahualpa is mainly a highland play and The Little Devils strictly coastal; together they represent a broad spectrum of religious spectacle in Peru today.

FURTHER READING

- Beyersdorff, Margot. Historia y drama ritual en los andes bolivianos (siglos XVI–XX). [History and ritual drama in the Bolivian Andes (16th–20th centuries)]. La Paz, Bolivia: Plural Editores, 1998.
- Chang-Rodríguez, Raquel. Hidden Messages: Representation and Resistance in Andean Colonial Drama. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell Univ. Press, 1999.
- Feliciano, Wilma. Los diablicos de Túcume: Festividad de la Virgen Purísima [The Little Devils of Túcume: Holiday of the Purest Virgin]. Lima, Peru, 2002. Spanish/English video.
- Millones, Luis. Dioses familiares: Festivales populares en el Perú contemporáneo [Familiar gods: Popular festivals in contemporary Peru]. Lima: Fondo Editorial del Congreso del Perú, 1998.
- Quintana-Owen, Benito. The Americas in Spanish Classical Theater: Mythology, Romance, Religion and Politics (Mexico, Peru, Chile). Ann Arbor, Mich.: ProQuest/UMI, 2006 [e-book].
- Versenyi, Adam. Theatre in Latin America: Religion, Politics, and Culture from Cortes to the 1980s. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1993.

Wilma Feliciano

PETA See PHILIPPINE EDUCATIONAL THEATER ASSOCIATION

PETER PAN

The character of Peter Pan first appeared in J. M. BARRIE's novel The Little White Bird (1902) and then in a 1904 London stage production Peter Pan; or, The Boy Who Would Not Grow Up. After several dramatic and novelistic adaptations of the Peter Pan story, the script was first published as Peter Pan in J. M. Barrie's Collected Plays of 1928. Peter Pan is a five-act play and is best known as a fantasy for children, although several lines of the dialogue are clearly aimed at adults. The play features an eternally young boy who lives in Never Land with his friends and companions the Lost Boys. Coming into the Darling family nursery, he beckons the Darling children (Wendy, John, and Michael) to fly away with him to Never Land, where Wendy acts as a mother to the Lost Boys, and the group as a whole has many adventures fending off Captain Hook and his pirate crew.

Peter Pan is remarkable for its combination of fantasy and psychological REALISM. Fantasy elements include the famously ageless protagonist Peter and the children's flight to the Never Land with the help of fairy dust. These fantastic situations—perhaps paradoxically—rely on a great deal of NATURALISM and simplicity in the dialogue to achieve their magical effect. Additional character and plot development is provided by an extended preface, prose commentary before each act, and elaborate STAGE DIRECTIONS. A long preface connects the writing and significance of Peter Pan to Barrie's relationship with the Llewelyn Davies family. Barrie described his boyish hero as a composite portrait of the five boys of this family: "That is all he is, the spark I got from you." The stage directions to the play, many of which are several paragraphs in length, offer detailed descriptions of the costumes and physical actions of the characters. The stage directions also comment very directly on psychological interactions between characters. As one example, we find in the stage directions the following comment on Wendy's relationship with Peter: "She is too loving to be ignorant that he is not loving enough."

While a fantastic tale for children, the play text also includes social satire primarily aimed at adults, as in the exclamation of Nibs, a Lost Boy: "All I remember about my mother is that she often said to father, 'Oh, how I wish I had a cheque book of my own.'" The innocence of children in the play is often contrasted to a wider world of adult awareness, as we see, for example, in Peter Pan's oblivion to the sexual desire aimed at him by Wendy, Tinkerbell, and Tiger Lily. The play ultimately establishes a sharp line between the realm of adult life and child fantasy, as the Darlings return to their own home and Peter Pan, unable to contemplate a conventional human life, returns to the Never Land.

[See also England; Scotland]

FURTHER READING

- Carpenter, Humphrey. Secret Gardens: A Study of the Golden Age of Children's Literature. Boston: Houghton, 1985.
- Gilead, Sarah. "Magic Abjured: Closure in Children's Fantasy Fiction." PMLA: Publications of the Modern Language Association of America 106, no. 2 (March 1991): 277–293.
- Green, Roger Lancelyn. Fifty Years of Peter Pan. London: P. Davis, 1954.
- Jack, R. D. S. The Road to the Never Land: A Reassessment of J. M. Barrie's Dramatic Art. Aberdeen: Aberdeen Univ. Press, 1991.
- Rose, Jacqueline. The Case of Peter Pan or the Impossibility of Children's Fiction. Houndsmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1984.
- Wilson, Ann. "Hauntings: Anxiety, Technology, and Gender in Peter Pan." Modern Drama 43, no. 4 (Winter 2000): 595–610.

Carrie Hintz

THE PETRIFIED FOREST

On May 8, 1934, ROBERT E. SHERWOOD checked into a Reno, Nevada, hotel to wait the required six weeks for a divorce. His past two years had been harrowing, beginning with a European vacation trip with Mr. and Mrs. MARC CONNELLY and spanning the failure of Sherwood's play Acropolis (1933) in London, the scandalous behavior of his wife in New York, his near nervous collapse at his English home in Surrey, and a growing involvement with Madeline Connelly. In Reno he passed his time playing tennis, gambling, and enjoying an occasional side trip. One such ride to Carson City inspired him to ask for an office and a typewriter. Four weeks later The Petrified Forest was finished, and Sherwood received his divorce in June 1934 and sailed immediately for ENGLAND.

It is 1934—the Depression in the UNITED STATES—and in the lunchroom of the Black Mesa Filling Station and Bar-B-Q, located in eastern Arizona near the Petrified Forest, Gabby explains her dreams of visiting FRANCE, her mother's home, as she waits on a customer, Alan Squier. A disillusioned eastern writer, hitchhiking west, Squier is looking for something worth living for—or dying for. Although Squier soon hitches a ride with a rich couple, they are forced to return by Duke Mantee, a gangster-killer who has evaded a police dragnet and chosen this lunchroom to meet his girlfriend. As they wait, Squier compares himself with Mantee—both individuals, both part of a vanishing race, both symbolically a part of a petrified forest. In a moment of romantic idealism, Squier signs over his life insurance policy to Gabby, who has impressed him with her dreams, and asks Mantee to shoot him before he leaves. As the sheriff's posse closes in, Mantee obliges and flees; Gabby cradles the dying Squier and promises to bury him in the Petrified Forest.

Wanting something to dream about, Depression America found great appeal in this romantic linking of the gunman and the poet. Onstage the play was a brilliant success, almost immediately becoming a popular movie. Man, the intellectual, thought that he could conquer Nature, but Nature struck back with neuroses, and Man—"Homo-Semi-Americanus—a specimen of the in-between age"—now lives in a "world of outmoded ideas," where the idealists are condemned: only the fittest survive. Into this situation Sherwood introduces Mantee, who stimulates a few people to think and to act. At this point, too, Sherwood sensed the garbled expression of his thoughts. Neither Squier nor Mantee is seemingly fit to survive: neither is heroic, and each dies for a woman unworthy of the sacrifice. Although in Squier's statement that he belongs to a "vanishing race" Sherwood attempted to show the disillusionment of his age, he admitted that he lost control of his theme. He liked the first act, he once confessed, but finding no meaningful way to end his play, he resorted to a hokey, melodramatic, and theatrically successful conclusion.

The Petrified Forest ran for seventeen weeks and earned Sherwood $110,000 for movie rights. In June 1935, he and Madeline Connelly were married in Budapest, HUNGARY, where Sherwood saw some drab-looking American chorus girls plodding through their routine at the Club Arizona and found inspiration for another successful play, IDIOT'S DELIGHT.

FURTHER READING

- Krutch, Joseph Wood. The American Drama Since 1918. Rev. ed. New York: Brazillier, 1957.
- Lawson, John Howard. Theory and Technique of Playwriting. New York: Putnam's, 1936.
- Meserve, Walter J. Robert E. Sherwood: Reluctant Moralist. New York: Western Pub. Co., 1970.

Walter J. Meserve

PEYMANN, CLAUS (1937–)

Claus Peymann extensively shaped the profile of German-language theater in the second half of the 20th century, both as a director and as the head of major stages. He was born on June 7, 1937, in Bremen, GERMANY. Without any formal theater training and with BERTOLT BRECHT (1898–1956) as his model, Peymann honed his directorial and political skills during the early 1960s in the flourishing student theater movement, which eventually merged with the student protest movement. A leftist activist, Peymann remained committed to a theater addressing the major issues of the day in a provocative, innovative, and at times confrontational manner. In contrast to the intellectual heaviness that frequently characterizes German theater, Peymann quickly distinguished himself on account of his sense of humor and playful imagination.

From the beginning, Peymann nurtured young and difficult artists in all fields of the theater and continued to work with them throughout his career. His collaborators include the playwrights THOMAS BERNHARD (1931–1989), PETER HANDKE (1942–), ELFRIEDE JELINEK (1946–), HEINER MÜLLER (1929–1995), Gerlind Reinshagen (1926–), and GEORGE TABORI (1914–); the designers Karl-Ernst Herrmann and Ernst Wönder; director and designer Achim Freyer (1934–); and especially his DRAMATURG and co-artistic director Hermann Beil (1941–), who has proved himself the most loyal collaborator as the conceptual and coordinating genius behind Peymann's bold vision and confrontational politics. Unlike most directors at the helm of major theaters, Peymann has consistently worked with other outstanding, internationally acclaimed directors, such as Andrea Breth (1952–), Manfred Karge (1938–), Matthias Langhoff (1941–), and Peter Zadek (1926–). Like Peter Stein (1937–), Peymann developed a core company of actors who have moved with him to the various theaters he has headed over the decades. With little sympathy for psychological NATURALISM, they developed a spare REALISM, inspired by Brecht and transformed by the influence of Heiner Müller and ROBERT WILSON (1941–). In contrast to the exquisite, often preciously self-conscious artistry of Peter Stein's ensemble, Peymann's actors have been more robust and animated by a more visceral joy of performing.

After his early association with the experimental theater collective at Frankfurt's TAT theater, where he premiered Handke's OFFENDING THE AUDIENCE (Publikumsbeschimpfung) and KASPAR, among others, Peymann briefly joined Peter Stein as co-director of Berlin's Schaubühne. Peymann's subsequent directorships of major theaters in Stuttgart and Bochum and, most prominently, of the venerable Viennese Burgtheater were frequently marked by political controversies and public scandals surrounding his aesthetic innovations and political provocations. Asked frequently how he could justify his relentless attacks on the government while accepting full state subsidization of his theaters, Peymann boldly claimed for himself the traditional fool's privilege at the king's court.

One of the early promoters of Brecht's plays at a time when they were boycotted in West Germany and Austria due to the playwright's controversial position in East Berlin, Peymann became artistic director of the Berliner Ensemble in 1999, fifty years after the theater was founded by Brecht and Helene Weigel (1900–1971). Peymann radically broke with the dogmatic legacy of Brecht's successors, only to replace it with his own brand of traditionalism in a repertoire based on previous successes and proven methods with his lifelong collaborators that left little room for genuine innovation.

FURTHER READING

- Honegger, Gitta. Thomas Bernhard: The Making of an Austrian. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 2001.
Koberg, Roland. Claus Peymann. Berlin: Henschel, 1999.

Gitta Honegger

PHILADELPHIA, HERE I COME!

I've stuck around this hole far too long. I'm telling you, it's a bloody quagmire, a backwater, a dead-end! And everybody in it goes crazy sooner or later! Everybody!

—Gar Public, Episode 2

Irish dramatist BRIAN FRIEL's Philadelphia, Here I Come! premiered at the Dublin Theatre Festival in 1964, where it was directed by Hilton Edwards, co-founder of Dublin's famous Gate Theatre. It transferred the following year to the Helen Hayes Theatre in New York, where it was an instant hit—and it also achieved much success in its first London production in 1967.

The play is set in Ballybeg, a small town in the north of IRELAND, on the night before Gar O'Donnell, a twenty-five-year-old man, is due to immigrate to America. In the course of the play, we learn about Gar's troubled relationship with his father, S.B.—and about his confused attitude to his hometown. The atmosphere of Ballybeg is claustrophobic, emotional stunting, and sexually repressive, but Gar's feelings about leaving home are ambivalent, and throughout the play the audience learns more about the nature and cause of his doubts.

The play's main innovation is its representation of Gar, who is performed by two actors, one portraying his public self, and the other his inner thoughts. Although the action is presented realistically—with the public Gar interacting naturally with the other characters—his private self is visible only to the audience. The contrast between Gar's public utterances and his private thoughts makes the play very funny. But as the narrative develops, the contrast becomes deeply affecting: the audience realizes that Friel has been forced to put the private life of Gar onstage because the public man is too emotionally suppressed to express himself fully. The play's ending is fiercely moving and unnervingly inconclusive: Gar's inner voice asks why he must leave Ireland, and the response of his public self—and the play's last line—is “I don't know. I—I—I don't know.”

The play has had lasting significance. It was Friel's first international success, allowing him to set forth interests that have preoccupied him throughout his career, such as the relationship between Ireland and America, the clash between public and private, the connection between REALISM and THEATRICALITY, and the often troubled relationships of fathers and sons. Furthermore, it signaled the emergence of a “second phase” of modern Irish drama. This phase is distinct from the Irish literary revival of WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS, J. M. SYNGE, and SEAN O'CASEY and features such writers as Hugh Leonard, John B. Keane, THOMAS KILROY, TOM MURPHY, and Friel himself. While these writers explored many different themes, all share an interest in charting the disjunction between the traditional Ireland, as represented in the plays of the Revival, and the rapidly industrializing Ireland of the 1960s and later.

However, the play's greatest significance is probably its ongoing popularity with audiences, which can be explained by Friel's skillful combination of humor with a serious treatment of the pain of a young man forced to emigrate.

FURTHER READING

- Grene, Nicholas. The Politics of Irish Drama: Plays in Context from Boucicault to Friel. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.

Pine, Richard. Brian Friel and Ireland's Drama. London: Routledge, 1990.
 Maxwell, D.E.S. Brian Friel. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell Univ. Press, 1973.

Patrick Lonergan

THE PHILADELPHIA STORY

The Philadelphia Story opened in New York's Shubert Theatre on March 28, 1939, and ran for 417 performances. With this production, playwright PHILIP BARRY solidified his position as the premier creator of high COMEDIES in America and revived the ACTING career of Katharine Hepburn, who had been labeled "box-office poison."

The play explores the world of the megarich Lord family of Philadelphia's Main Line. The action occurs in the twenty-four hours before eldest daughter Tracy is to wed George Kittredge, a major force in the coal-mining industry. Trouble ensues when brother Sandy Lord allows reporters to cover the wedding in exchange for their silence about father Seth Lord's dalliance with a chorus girl. Into this mix, younger sister Dinah and ex-husband C. K. Dexter Haven conspire to prevent what they consider an ill-matched union.

Tracy Lord, Barry's central and signature character, is the quintessential "Barry Girl." She is beautiful, sporty, witty, well read, and wealthy. She strives for excellence in all things and has little patience for any who fall short of this goal. Seth Lord tells her, "You have a good mind, a pretty face, and a disciplined body that does what you tell it. In fact, you have everything it takes to make a lovely woman except the one essential—an understanding heart." Tracy, like many other characters in Barry comedies, must acquire self-awareness and tolerance in order to mature.

Reporter Macaulay Connor and his partner, photographer Liz Imbrie, represent the "regular folks" who are allowed to glimpse the rarified world of the Lord family. Exhibiting popular preconceptions about the rich, Barry allows his audience to make the discovery with Conner "that in spite of the fact that someone's up from the bottom, he may be quite a heel. And that even though someone else's born to the purple, he still may be quite a guy."

The character of Tracy Lord was modeled on Helen Hope Montgomery Scott, a popular Main Line socialite and the wife of Barry's friend, railroad baron Edgar Scott. Also friendly with the Hepburn family, Barry had Katharine in mind to play Tracy from the outset. The cast also included Van Heflin as Macaulay Conner, Joseph Cotton as C. K. Dexter Haven, and Shirley Booth as Liz Imbrie. As Tracy Lord, Hepburn enjoyed her first Broadway success, and she quickly secured the film rights.

The film version of The Philadelphia Story remains fairly close to the original; however, modifications were made to increase the role of C. K. Dexter Haven, played by Cary Grant. Jimmy Stewart replaced Heflin as Macaulay Conner. Donald Ogden Stewart's adaptation and George Cukor's direction moved the emphasis of the work toward visual rather than verbal humor. The film was released in 1940, enjoyed a record-breaking $1.3 million profit, and won two Academy Awards.

Philip Barry was at his best when he wrote The Philadelphia Story. It is often praised as one of America's finest high comedies.

[See also Holiday; United States]

FURTHER READING

- Broussard, Louis. American Drama: Contemporary Allegory from Eugene O'Neill to Tennessee Williams. Norman: Univ. of Oklahoma Press, 1962.
- Gassner, John. "Philip Barry: A Civilized Playwright." In The Theatre in Our Times: A Survey of the Men, Materials, and Movements in the Modern Theatre. New York: Crown, 1954.
- Roppolo, Joseph Patrick. Philip Barry. Twayne's United States Authors Series. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Judith Midyett Pender

PHILIPPINE EDUCATIONAL THEATER ASSOCIATION

Cecelia Reyes Guidote wrote "Prospectus for the National Theatre of the PHILIPPINES" for her master's degree at the Dallas Theater Center. Returning to Manila in January 1967, she implemented the plan founding the Philippine Educational Theater Association (PETA) with the support of the National Office of Radio and Television, the Citizens' Council for Mass Media, and the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The National Parks Service provided the theater site in Ft. Santiago for the open-air Raha Sulayman theater. The group called for theater in Filipino languages instead of English and saw performance as a tool of education and political awareness. Tickets were inexpensive and shows timed to suit workers' schedules. While the Kalinangan Ensemble for professional production was the most visible aspect of the organization, classes for students, media initiatives, and information dissemination were equally important. Projects in prisons and touring/workshops in the provinces and other Asian countries became the norm.

PETA was a training ground for grassroots political activism and the workshop for a generation of playwrights. First, European plays were adapted to reflect Philippine culture, but soon new works in Indigenous genres became frequent. With ninety percent of its repertory new plays, the company stimulated Philippine dramatic writing. PETA indigenization and stylization weaned audiences from the middle-class REALISM and psychological theater of the 1940s–1960s. PETA was the Filipino participation in the international movement of people's theaters in the 1960s that also brought el Teatro Campesino, Bread and Puppet, and so forth. As in those groups, BERTOLT BRECHT and later AUGUSTO BOAL were significant theoretical influences.

The history of the group falls into three periods. The early years (1967–1972) under Guidote's leadership were a period of self-definition. As Ferdinand Marcos declared martial law in 1972, Guidote was forced to flee the country, but others continued the mission including Lino Brocka, Lutgardo Labad, and Soxie Topacio. From 1972 to 1986 theater became an important tool in building consensus against the government, as PETA and groups inspired by it prepared the downfall of Marcos. With regime change the third phase (1986–present) began. Now the focus moved to diverse issues, from environmental concerns, to examination of the Muslim minorities, to the search for Filipino epics, and to rival of the rich theatrical traditions of Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) neighbors. But the momentum and united political resolve of the earlier years were lost. As company members established families, many left the group whose aesthetic of "POOR THEATER" allowed only minimal payment.

An early work was the 1971 staging of Isagani Cruz's Monster (Halimaw, 1971), which drew on the musical form of ZARZUELA to attack tyrannical power. The 1972 It Hurts (Ai 'Dao) by MALOU JACOB considered the political situation in the Muslim south. Juan Tambo (1979), also by Jacob, showed a social worker whose political consciousness is raised when she studies a street urchin. Nuclear (Nukleyar!, 1983) and Nuclear 2 (Nukleyar II, 1985) decried nuclear armament and campaigned against power plants. Oath to Freedom (Panata sa Kalayaan, 1986–1987) by Chris Millado, Al Santos, Rudy Vera, and others depicted the triumph of People Power over the Marcos dictatorship. The 1994 Linawa in the Kalinga language dealt with the issues of Chico Dam, championing Indigenous people's rights over the forces of globalization. In The Long Journey of Radiya M. (Ang Mahabang Paglalakbay ni Radiya Mangadiri) by Rody Vera, a Filipino Ramayana rediscovered Asian roots. Call Libby Manaoang (Tumawag Kay Libby Manaoang, 2002) and Libby Manaoag Files (2003) by Liza Magtoto explored domestic violence and women's reproductive rights by depicting a radio talk show. Choruses of dancing pregnant women belt out their gripes in wacky and wonderful style. Whatever the issue of the day, that is the material of PETA's presentations.

FURTHER READING

- Almazan, Elizabeth. A Case Study of the Philippine Educational Theater Association: Towards a Realization of a National Culture. Manila: N.P., 1983.
- Krishan Jit. "The Philippines: Modern Drama." In Cambridge Guide to Asian Theatre, ed. by James Brandon. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1993.
- Labad, Lutgardo. PETA and Brecht: A Story of Friendship. Weimar: N.P., 1983.
- Oath to Freedom*. Asian Theatre Journal 8, no. 1 (Spring 1991): 48–88.
- Tiongson, Nicanor. Dulaan: An Essay on Philippine Theater. Manila: Cultural Center of the Philippines, 1989.

- Van Erven, Eugene. Stages of People Power: The Philippine Educational Theatre Association. The Hague: Centre for the Study of Education in Developing Countries, 1989.
- . The Playful Revolution: Theatre and Liberation in Asia. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1992.

Kathy Foley

PHILIPPINES

In spite of conflicting ideologies, most Filipinos today will agree that it is important for the country to forge a consciousness and a culture that would be identifiable as uniquely and proudly Filipino.

—Nicanor Tiongson, Dulaan: An Essay on Philippine Theater, 1989

Drama in the Philippines can be divided into Hispanic-influenced, American-influenced, and the postcolonial theater that looks to both Indigenous and international sources for inspiration. While Indigenous and Islamic-influenced song, dance, storytelling, and ritual were widespread by the 16th century, developed dramas first evolved during the long period of Spanish rule (1565–1898).

HISPANIC PLAYS

During colonization, theater was used to convert, focus community emotion, and entertain. Various seasonal religious plays, komedya (also called moro-moro, linambay, arakyo), and ZARZUELA are the three significant genres created during the Hispanic period.

Seasonal religious plays, introduced by Catholic missionaries, fall into genres developed in other Spanish colonies. Christmas plays called panunuluyan portray Mary and Joseph seeking lodging in Bethlehem in processional performances that conclude in the Church at midnight. Maudy Thursday brings last suppers (sinakulo). Holy Week pasayon presentations sometimes involve actual crucifixion. Related to pan-Catholic patterns, these performances have remained flashpoints for public display of emotion and have been reinterpreted by modern companies to raise contemporary issues.

Komedya scripts might depict the life of a patron saint as in the Play of Saint Michael (Comedia de San Miguel), written around 1890 and still staged in Illigan city. Popular stories showed the clash between Muslims and Christians. An example is the komedya of St. Helena, which is performed in several towns of Nueva Ecija. It shows St. Helena seeking the true cross, while her son Constantino fights the Moors as a Moorish princess falls in love with a Christian general. After spectacular marches and battles, the defeated Moors convert and the lovers unite (Tiongson, 1989). Such performances continue to frame ethnic relations between Christians and Muslims. Francisco Baltazar ("Balagtas"; 1788–1862) was a prolific author of this genre, creating over 100 plays. While these are outdoor performances full of spectacle, they helped introduce the idea of a set text as the basis of dramatic performance. Komedya started the transition from the purely religious drama toward a more secular theater.

The zarzuela promoted indoor stages, scenic effects, and professional companies. This operatic form rose from the Spanish SAINETE COMEDY and was produced in Spanish. It was introduced in Manila in 1879 by Dario Cespedes, the author of To Play with Fire (Jugar con fuego). In the 1880s Alejandro Cubero's troupe, which featured actress Elisea Raguer, developed many writers and artists of the new genre. Early zarzuela borrowed the romantic plots from komedya but incorporated modern aspects. An 1887 production (Pascual Bailón) created a sensation by incorporating the cancan, which brought a scathing pastoral letter from the archbishop of Manila. At the turn of the century, playwrights like the Pampangan writer Mariano Proceso Pabalan (1863–1904) wrote zarzuela in local dialects. His Ing Magnape (1900) was an instant success. Severino Reyes (1861–1942) joined the movement, writing in Tagalog. His RIP (Requiescat in Pace, 1902) called for the burial of the old komedya and support of this “realistic,” musical genre. Reyes's work also showed incipient nationalism: his Without a Wound (Walang Sugat, 1902), created with Fulgencio Tolentino, began a campaign to populate zarzuela with Filipino rather than foreign heroes. A scene where Spanish friars were shot onstage in revenge for torturing patriots marked the transition. The European zarzuela hero was gone; the Filipino took center stage.

Perhaps the most popular zarzuela of all time was Country Maiden (Dalagang Bukid, 1919), which follows the trials and tribulations of a flower seller and her student suitor. They outwit the lecherous landowner, Don Silvestre, who tries to use the girl's parents' addiction to gambling to gain power over her. The great actress Atang de la Rama rose to prominence playing the lead. From the beginning of the 20th century the zarzuela had become a fully Indigenous genre that captured the hopes and fears of Filipinos. Bicol, Pampangan, Tagalog, and Ilocano language zarzuela abounded. Today zarzuela's spirit lives on in television drama and film.

AMERICAN-INFLUENCED PLAYS

American occupation after 1898 had an immediate impact in theater. As the American colonial authority brutally suppressed opposition of a guerrilla war, playwrights wrote the so-called seditious plays. These patriotic works by young ilustrados (the educated elite) were quickly banned by the Americans who recognized the attacks. Playwrights, actors, and producers were arrested and tried. Examples include Free (Malaya, 1898) by Tomas Remigio; Golden Chain (Tanikalang ginto, 1902) by Juan Abad; I Am Not Dead (Hindi aco patay, 1903) by Juan Matapang Cruz; and Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow (Kahapon, ngayon, at bukas, 1903) by Aurelio Tolentino.

Golden Chain tells of the girl Liwanang (“Light,” representing the Philippines) threatened by the Maimbot (“Greedy,” representing America). She is saved by K’Ulayaw, representing the revolutionary Filipino. In Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow, Inang-bayan (Mother Country) and Taga-ilog (Patriot) overcome Chinese rulers, Spanish colonizers, and American military. The last act features a vision of young Filipinos massed to fight behind Taga-ilog, and the play concludes with America granting Filipino freedom (Tiongson, 1989).

Vaudeville called bodabil was introduced from America by 1916 and was very popular for almost half a century. The short scenes, songs, dances, and other turns, often modeled on American acts, only lost popularity in the late 1940s.

Modern theater in English developed as it became the medium of instruction. Though there are a few early modern spoken dramas in local languages, the form really developed as a result of English-language productions in the schools. What came to be called “legitimate plays” (i.e., William Shakespeare and authors of the modern Western cannon) were read, produced, and emulated. A Modern Filipina (1915) by Jesus Araullo and Lino Castillejo was the first local script in English. It was created at Philippine Normal College (Fernandez, 1987).

This theater developed in the context of higher education. From the 1940s to the 1960s, REALISM waxed. Ateneo de Manila and the University of the Philippines became the major training and performance venues for both Western works and Filipino scripts in English. Wilfred Ma Guerrero (1917–) taught at the University of the Philippines and led its Drama Club for sixteen years from 1947, developing over 100 plays. His work includes Wanted: A Chaperone (1940), which deals with traditional customs challenged by modernity. Forsaken House (1940) shows a patriarch whose tyranny destroys his children. Three Rats (1948) is considered the first Filipino psychological play. Severino Montano (1915–1980), who studied theater at the University of the Philippines and Yale University, established the Arena Theatre at Philippine Normal College, producing almost 200 performances, which toured throughout the country between 1953 and 1964. His major plays are Parting at Calomba (1953), Sabina (1953), The Ladies and the Senator (1953), and The Love of Leonor Rivera (1954). The latter probes the passionate love of Rivera for national hero José Rizal, an affair complicated by their marriages to other partners. Alberto Florentino (1931–) was another realist whose plays often featured the poor including The World Is an Apple (1954), Cavort with Angels (1959), and Oli Iompan (1959).

Though noted author NICK JOAQUIN created only a few theatrical works, his Portrait of the Artist as Filipino (1951) is the most-produced Filipino play. A memory play set amid the rubble of World War II, it recounts the experience of two sisters and their artist father living in Intramuros, the walled capital of the Hispanic era. The play mourns the loss of the rich Hispanic past in the era of Americanized modernity. Remembrance of things past and documentation of the struggle to survive the Japanese occupation struck a deep chord.

English prevailed through the opening of the Marcos's showcase Cultural Center of the Philippines in 1969, which was celebrated with Flower Drum Song. But since the 1970s only a few playwrights have continued to use English. These include Joaquin and Elsa Martinez Coscolluela, whose In My Father's House (1987) recounts the disintegration of a family during the Japanese occupation. Other authors rejected the language of colonial rule and returned to Indigenous vernaculars.

POSTCOLONIAL THEATER

Soon a politically engaged and Asian-focused theater would be everywhere. Theater moved from proscenium stagings and psychological realism, taking to the streets and exploring Indigenous styles with BERTOLT BRECHT-influenced approaches. The founding of PETA (PHILIPPINE EDUCATIONAL THEATER ASSOCIATION) by Cecile Guidote-Alvarez led the way. Returning from study in the UNITED STATES, where she wrote a master's thesis titled "Prospectus for a National Theatre of the Philippines" (1964), Guidote inaugurated this company in 1967. PETA has been a major source of new plays for over thirty years. Early works include It Hurts (Ai 'Dao, 1972), which explored political discontent in Muslim communities of Mindanao. Guidote-Alvarez fled the country to avoid arrest by Ferdinand Marcos's government after the imposition of martial law in 1972 and did not return until 1986. But others continued PETA's work, critiquing the political and social agenda of the government. The Nation's Worship (Pgasambang Bayan, 1977), written by BONIFACIO ILAGAN and directed by Behn Cervantes, combined street theater, rituals of communion, and singing to examine the plight of peasants and workers under the regime. The playwright was investigated and the director detained. In the 1980s PETA took on environmental issues in the Al Santos-Joey Ayala rock operas Nuclear (Nukleyar!, 1983) and Nuclear 2 (Nukleyar II, 1984), which campaigned against nuclear power and armaments. In this period, AUGUSTO BOAL's ideas on a Theater of the Oppressed took root, and theater workshops were used by many to probe social and political issues.

Companies resurrected sinakulo, zarzuela and pasayon but infused them with new political content. Virgilio Vitug's Passion Play of the Nation (Sinakulo ning Balen, 1983), for example, featured a Christ figure, who condemns bribe taking, government corruption, and false uses of RELIGION. MALOU JACOB's Juan Tambo (1979) depicts the interaction of Juan, a child who lives on the streets eating cockroaches, and a female social worker who studies him. Her politicization reflected the consciousness raising of the Filipino middle class.

Theater was an important force in the fall of Marcos's government in 1986. Oath to Freedom (Panata sa Kalayaan, 1986–1987) was PETA's celebration of the success of People Power in displacing the dictatorship. The play mocked the excesses of the regime with extravagant costumes and stylized staging. In the concluding scenes, actors wove cloth together to form a Filipino flag that filled the stage. Theater of the 1970s and 1980s was a cry for justice and freedom, which resulted in political change.

Activism in theater is less highlighted in the last decade. With greater democracy, the issues become less clear-cut, and other media (film, television) are open to writers to express views. However, companies continue to do significant work addressing, for example, the exploitation of Filipino female domestic workers in cities like Hong Kong and SINGAPORE. Environmental and Indigenous people's rights are another theme: Malou Jacobs Macli-ing (1988) examined the plight of Cordillera people of the north. A search for Asian roots begun in the 1970s continues in the work of authors like AMELIA LAPENA-BONIFACIO. She, like many of her peers, turned to Asia rather than Europe for theatrical models. The Journey of Sisa (Ang Paglalakbay ni Sisa, 1976) borrowed from the Japanese NŌ technique to call back the ghost of the mad woman in Rizal's Touch Me Not (Noli me tangere). In Lapena-Bonifacio's puppet company, she generates many Asian-influenced performances meant for adult as well as child audiences. Other groups have mined Islamic culture of the Islands to create new work. Diamond surveying the theater scene in 1996 saw the "quest for the illusive self" as the unifying theme of the diverse work, while Krishan Jit (1993) noted the retrenchment of the 1990s with loss of a unifying political focus and advent of economic crisis. The Cultural Center of the Philippines 2003 production season included works like Malou Jacob's Anatomy of Corruption (Anatomiya ng Korupsyon), a COMEDY about petty intrigues and human foibles in a government agency. Oraciones by four playwrights (Rene Villanueva, Liza Magtoto, Rody Vera, and Nick Pichay) interprets Filipino-American relations through the characters of the first American secretary of the interior, a Filipina suffragette, a Hukbalahap peasant, and filmmaker Francis Coppola. The Ramon Obusan Folkloric Group presented Carnival of Manila (Carnaval de Manila), a historical travelogue exploring American intervention in the social, economic, and political lives of Filipinos at the turn of the century. It borrowed from zarzuela and bodabil for staging.

Playwrights like Jacobs, Lapena-Bonifacio, Tony Perez, Paul Dumol, Rene Villanueva, and Jose Dalisay and directors like Chris Millardo and Nonon Padilla continue to use the Philippine stage to explore Filipino issues and identity. To do so they utilize the mixed resources that make up Filipino heritage, a culture with both Asian and Western roots. The resulting work is mestizo, a mixing of elements that results in something unique.

FURTHER READING

Cultural Center of the Philippines. CCP Encyclopedia of Philippine Art.

Vol. 7, Philippine Theatre. Manila: CCP, 1994.

Fernandez, Doreen. "Philippine Theatre After Martial Law." Asian Theatre Journal 4, no. 1 (1987): 108–114.

—. Palabras: Essays on Philippine Theatre History. Quezon: Ateneo de Manila Press, 1996.

Hernandez, Thomas. The Emergence of Modern Drama in the Philippines (1898–1930). Honolulu: Asian Studies Program, Univ. of Hawaii, 1976.

Krishnan Jit. "The Philippines: Modern Drama." In Cambridge Guide to Asian Theatre, ed. by James Brandon. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1993.

Tiongson, Nicanor. Dulaan: An Essay on Philippine Theatre. Manila: Cultural Center of the Philippines, 1989.

Kathy Foley

PHILOSOPHY AND DRAMA

The major periods in the history of Western drama have occurred at times of radical changes in philosophical thought. This was true of ancient Greek drama and of the drama of the Renaissance, and it is equally true of the drama of the 19th century.

1860–1960

Western culture underwent a seismic shift around 1800, signaled in politics by the French Revolution, in science by theories about the evolutionary development of life, and in art by an increasing interest in the irrational. Central to this development was the growing belief in material and social progress and in the perfectibility of man. The classic, pre-Christian view that universal history consisted of vast recurring cycles was replaced by a belief that mankind was marching slowly but steadily upward, while the Christian belief that life on earth was a preparation for the life to come yielded slowly to the conviction that earthly existence was an end in itself. Darwin's theory of evolution (his Origin of Species was published in 1859), with its implication that life arose out of matter and was not created by an omnipotent god, became, directly or indirectly, a major influence on philosophy. God was increasingly marginalized. When science advanced one step, God retreated one step.

HEGELIAN INFLUENCE

These progressive ideas were implicit in the work of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831), who quickly came to dominate philosophical thought in northern Europe in the first half of the 19th century. Hegel postulated an immaterial force, the Absolute Spirit, that proceeded by setting up opposition within and against itself. In the popular version of his logic, any idea would immediately by implication give rise to its opposite. An idea A (thesis) inevitably evoked its opposite non-A (antithesis). Out of this clash arose a synthesis B, which in turn would give rise to its opposite; and so on through all of time. These triads could be employed to explain progress in every field, and Hegel's writings covered everything from logic to history, from art to law, from religion to politics.

Hegel caught on because he offered something to just about everybody. Politicians liked him because he made the state the greatest achievement of man. Liberal Christians accepted him because he made spirit the wellspring of all being. Religious skeptics liked him because he sidelined the Christian God. Scientists accepted him because he offered a philosophical basis for evolution. Above all, his philosophy was optimistic.

From this Hegelian fountainhead, three streams flowed forth. The first and broadest one maintained the optimistic spirit, but its very breadth caused it to divide into two lesser streams, one covering society, the other the individual. Karl Marx (1818–1883), whose concept of dialectical materialism is an economic version of the triads, predicted the inevitable reform of human organizations. Henri Bergson (1859–1941) converted Absolute Spirit into the élan vital, the Life Force, and probed into the psychic life of the individual. In Marx matter brought about changes in man's way of living; in Bergson, mind affected matter.

The second current was thoroughly pessimistic. Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860) redefined Hegel's Absolute Spirit and argued that progress was an illusion created by human beings to make life bearable.

The third stream was reactionary. The Dane Søren Kierkegaard (1813–1855) in a ferocious sustained assault on Hegel reasserted Christian values and the primacy of the individual over abstract ideas.

HENRIK IBSEN's position as father of the modern drama is due in no small measure to the philosophical ideas embedded in his plays. His breakthrough as a thought-provoking author in Scandinavia came with his two poetic dramas Brand (1865) and Peer Gynt (1866), which are imbued with the uncompromising idealism of Kierkegaard, the most discussed and most controversial of contemporaneous thinkers in midcentury Scandinavia.

As a guide to human existence, Hegel's philosophy was, in Kierkegaard's eyes, worthless, since the individual must decide in the present moment between two alternatives (either–or), not on the basis of a future unforeseeable synthesis (both–and). For Hegel, "whatever is, is right"—all part of the ever-evolving spirit. Hegel omitted what was most important, the judgmental factor to which the individual human being contributes. Kierkegaard stressed the freedom of choice that the individual has and also the anguish (angst) that accompanies this freedom. To choose means to commit oneself to an ideal or to a vision; commitment entails sacrifice, the extent of these sacrifices being the measure of the individual's worth. Each decision brings with it consequences that no one can be sure of, since the plan of the universe, whether divine or earthly, pace Hegel, is not knowable.

Kierkegaard's emphasis on the sense of anguish that accompanies freedom of choice led to 20th-century existentialism, but it was first voiced in Brand. The hero, a priest, seeks to live the ideal life, a life without compromise, but each crucial decision he is compelled to make brings with it ever greater sacrifices. Eventually, the love of family and of his fellow human beings must yield to the demands of his ideal. At the end he achieves his goal, symbolized by his ascent up a mountain, but he is alone, questioning the path he has taken, and dies in an avalanche, leaving readers to wonder whether Ibsen was praising or damning his hero.

Ibsen followed up Brand with Peer Gynt, where the hero refuses to make any real commitment and comes to realize in the famous onion scene that there is no core to his being. In act 4 Ibsen caricatured Hegel as Begriffenfeldt, the head of an insane asylum.

Subsequently Ibsen changed his mind about Hegel. His over-riding concern was to find some way of reconciling a life based on higher ideals and involving total commitment and sacrifice with a life based on a complacent acceptance of the world as it is. Many of his later plays are based on this conflict between two fundamentally irreconcilable principles. His huge two-part drama EMPEROR AND GALILEAN (1873), which Ibsen himself considered his greatest work, pictured this philosophical conflict as a clash between Christian and pagan values.

In THE WILD DUCK (1884) Ibsen sets Gregers Werle, with his Brandian demands, against Hjalmar Ekdal, the charming and ineffectual dreamer. In the clash between the two, TRAGEDY ensues. Hjalmar's fourteen-year-old daughter, susceptible to Gregers's ideals, kills herself, making the complete sacrifice out of love for her father.

It has been argued by Brian Johnston (1992) that all of Ibsen's realistic dramas form a cycle based on Hegel's philosophy, an approach that most readers find too reductive.

SCHOPENHAUER'S LASTING INFLUENCE

The impact that Hegel made on the drama was matched and perhaps surpassed by his antagonist Arthur Schopenhauer. While Kierkegaard assailed Hegel's philosophy as having no value as a guide to living, Schopenhauer attacked the very basis of Hegel's philosophy, the assumption that behind all the phenomena of existence there was a positive, evolving spirit spiraling ever upward.

Schopenhauer said that this helical development was a Hegelian illusion and that the energy driving the universe had no direction and served no purpose. Unhappily he labeled this force, this boundless energy, the will, a term that seemed to imply purpose. This will or energy provides the background to everything that happens in the universe and in everything that humans do. Humans differ from other beings in that they have developed minds that ascribe meaning to the will. But all that man accomplishes, and all that the mind creates, is no more than spume on the waves of a universal ocean, droplets that are cast up and behave for a moment as if they were of individual significance before falling back into the vast immeasurable sea.

Of the major thinkers perhaps Schopenhauer exerted the widest and most lasting appeal on dramatists, who saw a kindred soul in the philosopher. Schopenhauer said that if one seeks the ultimate truth, one turns not to the scientists and the moralists but to the great artists and above all to the great composers. In music the universal energy is mobilized and channeled, not made meaningful (impossible) but made beautiful. He extolled music as the highest of all arts because it expressed the universal will more faithfully than words or pictures could.

The life of the human being consists in a vain effort to impose a meaning on this chaos of energy. Through art the human triumphs over the world will. Instead of being horrified by a confrontation with nothingness, he finds it beautiful and therefore consoling.

This dour view of human endeavor caught on in Europe when the 1848 social revolutions failed, and it made its way into the drama through RICHARD WAGNER. Disillusioned by the crushing of the political radicals in 1848, Wagner increasingly turned his thoughts inward. He discovered Schopenhauer in 1854 and found in him the philosophical basis for Tristan and Isolde, a music drama that pictured the inner life, a drama of the soul. Wagner equated love and sex at their most intense with death and the union of the lovers as tantamount to a submission to and reunification with the world will.

This seminal work, built on the dualism of the conscious and unconscious life, the world of appearances as opposed to the universal will, had a tremendous impact on the symbolist writers at the end of the 19th century. What Wagner accomplished through music, putting the life of the soul onstage as directly as possible, the symbolists sought to accomplish using other means. MAURICE MAETERLINCK retold the story of Tristan and Isolde in his Pelléas and Mélisande (1893). But his attempt to make words do what Wagner's ninety-piece orchestra did was doomed to fail.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW proclaimed in 1902 that the success of Tristan made it apparent that there was "no future now for any drama without music except the drama of thought." For Shaw the drama of emotional effect was "impossible when the dramatist must write in the language of a newspaper reporter."

Not too far removed from Schopenhauer's universal will in the spectrum of philosophical ideas was Charles Darwin's evolutionary appetite. Darwin inevitably influenced all spheres of thought by effectively disposing of the need for any spiritual force in the universe that guided human beings toward some higher end. In place of this teleological view, he offered the possibility of explaining all progress without reference to a higher power. The struggle for existence was the basic drive in the universe, not some supernatural god or abstract spirit. NATURALISM, which pictured the human being as a product of his heredity and environment, provided the literary and dramatic equivalent of Darwinism. Championed by ÉMILE ZOLA, naturalism came to dominate the serious drama in the latter half of the 19th century. Ibsen admitted it into his realistic plays, while AUGUST STRINDBERG (for a while) and ANTON CHEKHOV enthusiastically embraced it.

FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE became a major influence on the drama because he brought Schopenhauer and Darwin together in one philosophical and cultural concept. Accepting the implications of Darwinism, he famously declared that God was dead. In fact God had been moribund for some time. Johann Wolfgang Goethe in his Faust had reduced him to a mere observer; Hegel had transformed God into a pervasive spirit struggling with itself; and Schopenhauer had treated the supreme being along with religion in general as illusions that human beings create in order to avoid facing the great nothingness. Nietzsche spelled out the consequences. If there was no God like the one in the Bible, there was no transcendent moral code to guide human beings. If there was no after life, there was no need for salvation. If there was no meaning to existence in any religious sense, then it follows that the universal, blind will must on the level of the individual be the will to power, exhibited in those superior human beings who in a Darwinian world of struggle determine the course of events in history, in the arts, and in politics. The highest form of human activity is the creation of a superman, who embodies new values and imposes himself in place of God as doer and maker. In his essay on Schopenhauer, Nietzsche conceived of these superior individuals as artist-philosophers.

Along with Darwin, Karl Marx adopted a materialistic approach to progress, dispensing with any higher spirit. The struggle for existence that was the driving force in Darwin was narrowed by Marx into a conflict between social classes, the working men and women and the owners of the means of production. In the drama his impact was felt in the 20th century in the innovative productions of ERWIN PISCATOR and the plays of BERTOLT BRECHT in GERMANY, in the urban dramas of EDWARD BOND in ENGLAND, in the avowedly communist plays of JOHN HOWARD LAWSON in the UNITED STATES, and in the technically venturesome late plays of SEAN O'CASEY in IRELAND, to say nothing of the postrevolution Russian drama.

Arriving on the scene at the end of the 19th century, Bernard Shaw, the most philosophical of the major dramatists, at least in the sense of giving most space to philosophical discussions, could pick and choose from among the great ideas of his predecessors. He created his own system of thought, drawing on Bergson's Life Force, Nietzsche's superman, and Marx's critique of society. He pictured the artist-philosopher in MAN AND SUPERMAN, a coruscating discussion drama, five hours of brilliant talk. Unlike Marx, Shaw believed that the purely materialist approach left the progress of mankind without a motivating force. There had to be something that drives living things in their struggle with one another. He called it the Life Force (after Bergson's élan vital), and he hoped to found a new, up-to-date religion to replace Christianity. His dramatic cycle BACK TO METHUSELAH was intended to be the bible of what he called Creative Evolution. Although Shaw never succeeded in setting up a new church, the lengthy preface to Methuselah is one of the most brilliant philosophico-religious essays of the modern period.

Of the major philosophers, Schopenhauer has cast the longest shadow over dramatists, perhaps because of a natural affinity between him and artists in general. He exalted artists above scientists and theologians as thinkers. And his pessimism found a response in those dramatists who confronted the horrors of the 20th century.

Take the case of EUGENE O'NEILL. As a young man, he discovered Nietzsche, and the Apollo-Dionysus dichotomy left deep traces in his plays, especially in THE GREAT GOD BROWN. But in his efforts to find a faith to take the place of Christianity, Nietzsche failed him. After a long absence, he returned to the stage with THE ICEMAN COMETH, his most nihilistic work. Dionysian intoxication here is mere drunkenness.

In the long run, the spirit of Schopenhauer prevailed in O'Neill's dramas. The sea that haunted O'Neill to the extent of being the major symbol in his oeuvre can be seen as Schopenhauer's will. It provides the background to the early sea plays and to ANNA CHRISTIE, in which "dat ole davil, sea" becomes a refrain. The very title of STRANGE INTERLUDE seems to be an allusion to Schopenhauer's belief that the life of the individual is a mere episode between his emergence from the infinite will and his return to it. Perhaps no O'Neill play is more permeated by Schopenhauer's philosophy than LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT, where once again the sea and the fog form the background—the infinite realm—against which the Tyrone family act out their family drama. Edmund's great speech in act 4 is a summing up of O'Neill's own philosophy: "I dissolved in the sea . . . belonged, without past or future, within peace and unity and a wild joy, within something greater than my own life, or the life of Man, to Life itself! To God, if you want to put it that way."

World War II helped to make existentialism the most popular philosophy of the mid-20th century. It made angst an English word and brought Kierkegaard out of Scandinavian obscurity. It also produced some significant plays, chiefly those of JEAN-PAUL SARTRE, who advocated a "theater of situation" in place of the conventional "theater of characters" in his 1946 essay, "Forgers of Myths," a theater in which the human being is not defined by his psychological constitution but by the choices he makes in the world of other human beings. The war made Sartre's position, as dramatized in THE FLIES and NO EXIT, seem particularly relevant.

Existentialism and the absurd were both products of the war, but they differed in attitude. Just how much they differed can be seen in comparing SAMUEL BECKETT and Sartre. The absurdist surrendered to meaninglessness, while the existentialist encouraged human beings to act, to forge new worlds. The Sartrean hero is willing to clean the slate of old ideas and move on. Beckett does not do this. He resigns himself, à la Schopenhauer, to an empty universe, without values, without meaning. The last words of Beckett's defining drama WAITING FOR GODOT are, "They do not move."

[See also Absurdism; Apocalypse in Modern Drama; Symbolism]

FURTHER READING

Bentley, Eric. The Playwright as Thinker. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1946.

Peter, John. Vladimir's Carrot: Modern Drama and the Modern Imagination. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1987.

Johnston, Brian. The Ibsen Cycle: The Design of the Plays from Pillars of Society to When We Dead Awaken. Rev. ed. Pittsburgh: Pennsylvania State Univ. Press, 1992.

Williams, Raymond. Modern Tragedy. Stanford: Stanford Univ. Press, 1966.

Evert Sprinchorn

1960–PRESENT

During the 20th century, existentialism and drama were closely linked. Existentialist philosophy questioned universal truths, the Enlightenment, and scientific determinism. Søren Kierkegaard, FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, Karl Marx, and Martin Heidegger were among the most influential of these philosophers, but JEAN-PAUL SARTRE applied the philosophy to modern drama. His play NO EXIT (Huis clos) features three characters trapped in an endless purgatory and reveals that human existence is essentially “being in a situation.” SAMUEL BECKETT, whose WAITING FOR GODOT became associated with existentialism, also wrote plays about “being there,” a reference to Heidegger’s observation that human consciousness is twofold: operating in the functional world and transforming phenomena into ideas and meaning. Existentialist playwrights present humans trying vainly to explain their existence, as in TOM STOPPARD’S ROSENGRANTZ AND GUILDENSTERN ARE DEAD.

The Theater of the Absurd focused on images and situations rather than linear narrative. ABSURDISM, however, represented a break from existentialist philosophy by dispensing with the unity of life and thought, revealing fragmented and disjointed lives defined less by morality than by necessity. In addition to Beckett, JEAN GENET (THE BALCONY, Death Watch), EUGÈNE IONESCO (The Chairs, THE LESSON), and ARTHUR ADAMOV (The Invasion, Parody) were leading proponents of absurdism. In the UNITED STATES, EDWARD ALBEE attacked that country’s post-war optimism and romanticized family structure (The American Dream, WHO’S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOOLF?), and in ENGLAND, HAROLD PINTER reduced human life to savage games played out in destitute rooms (THE BIRTHDAY PARTY, THE CARETAKER).

Martin Heidegger examined the difference between “presence” and “disclosedness” by distinguishing how we gain knowledge from what is factually “presented” to us. RICHARD FOREMAN’S Ontological Hysterical Theater, created during the late 1960s (Pandering to the Masses: A Misrepresentation, Rhoda in Potatoland), dramatizes this philosophy by creating theater in which the audience is asked to perceive a production from multiple standpoints. Often creating a kind of mirror metaphor in which he doubles this process, Foreman exposes the production mechanism, framing events using repetition, reflection, and focus.

BERTOLT BRECHT and ANTONIN ARTAUD continued to exert influence on post-1960 theater. Brecht, initially influenced by EXPRESSIONISM, drew from Karl Marx’s philosophy of dialectics in which society is observed from multiple vantage points and defined by the contradictions among them. Playwrights often used Brecht’s concept of “ALIENATION,” in which the spectator is drawn skeptically into the artificiality of a performance rather than being swept away by the imposed reality of the play. Numerous plays utilize the Brechtian “epic format.” U.S. plays with political themes (The Serpent, Zoot Suit, Viet Rock), British plays about social injustice (The Romans in Britain, Plenty, The National Health), and African plays condemning colonialism (Bopha!, A Play of Giants) are just a few examples of Brecht’s influence on global theater.

Artaud’s concept “Theater of Cruelty” integrated perfectly into the revolutionary philosophies of the 1960s. Artaud thought of theater as a shared, cathartic experience between performers and audience. Under the influence of non-Western performance practices, Artaud wrote that “the plague” of Western theater culture had corrupted natural tendencies of performing and should be exorcised. In 1964, Peter Brook devoted a season to Artaud in London with the Royal Shakespeare Company. Brook’s production of PETER WEISS’S MARAT-SADE merged ritual and text into a “holy” event. Artaud, Brook, Jerzy Grotowski, Richard Schechner, and Eugenio Barba were among many practitioners who used Asian performing traditions (kabuki, nō, Chinese opera, Balinese dance, shamanism) to develop a philosophy for spiritual transformation. The LIVING THEATRE, committed to revolution and social change, asked the audience to transform themselves into a new consciousness by attaining higher spirituality (Paradise Now) or by participating in violence and execution (Frankenstein).

POSTMODERNISM had its roots in structuralist philosophy of the 1920s. Using linguistic and literary theories, Roland Barthes, prominent French philosopher and linguist, created a method for “reading theater” through the study of signs. Structuralists believed it was impossible to produce a narrative without reference to an implicit system of rules and meaningful units. In drama, this means that meaning is not fully explicable onstage without exposing the structure of the text. Barthes was critical of mainstream French theater and found Brecht’s epic format and the bodies of professional wrestlers and dancers far more dramatically stimulating. Performance artists who use their own bodies as signifiers owe much to Barthes’s dialectic between signifier and signified.

Jacques Derrida, often called a “poststructuralist,” went a step farther by arguing that true meaning is “differed” and depends on the individual “reading.” “DECONSTRUCTION” refuses to accept the idea of construction and suggests that meaning is never absolute: every aspect of a performance is governed by the connotation of words, the textual and peripheral actions onstage, and the primary and secondary meanings of objects. In the United States, the Wooster Group was probably the leading exponent of this philosophy in theater. In Route 1 & 9, portions of THORNTON WILDER’S nostalgic play OUR TOWN were juxtaposed with a blackface minstrel show, and L.S.D. (. . . Just the High Points) borrowed portions of ARTHUR MILLER'S THE CRUCIBLE to comment on present-day witch hunts. Deconstruction suspends all that we take for granted about language, experience, and human behavior.

Jean-François Lyotard, a French philosopher best known for his book The Postmodern Condition, has had an enormous influence on the storytelling aspect of post-1960 drama and theater. Lyotard rejected the grand narratives of modernity, preferring multiple, fragmentary, and discontinuous narratives. Postmodern dramatists often redevelop narratives by using other media and art forms. ROBERT WILSON (Einstein on the Beach, Civil Wars) incorporated dance and music and freely juxtaposed time and place to create new texts from theater classics. CARYL CHURCHILL relies on a more conventional dramatic structure than Wilson but nevertheless juxtaposes time, place, and characters. In CLOUD NINE, she satirizes the British colonial ethos by juxtaposing gender roles, historical eras, and performance styles, while in TOP GIRLS she introduces historical characters and transforms them in modern settings.

Many philosophers were critical of racism, particularly racism against black people, and celebrated black culture using terms like negritude, black consciousness, and Black Orpheus. Negritude, in particular, grew into a philosophy celebrating a cultural consciousness distinct from Western European perceptions. AIMÉ CÉSAIRE, Leopold Senghor, and Jean-Paul Sartre celebrated African culture, conceptualizing a racial essence of African thought. African dramatists drew from the philosophy of Muntu, which celebrates the "force" of living and the belief that there is a central point of thought affecting all living and dead people. Amos Tutuola (The Palm Wine Drinkard) and WOLE SOYINKA (Death and the King's Horseman) reveal that African philosophy cannot be destroyed by European culture. This philosophy of racial and political empowerment partly inspired the BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT in the United States, which began soon after Malcolm X's assassination in 1965 and featured many black playwrights, most notably AMIRI BARAKA.

During the 1970s and 1980s, feminist playwrights frequently rejected the limitations of realistic linear plots and created new dramatic structures. Simone de Beauvoir's 1949 The Second Sex claims that women are not living a life of their own but are objectified through the eyes of the male subject, a key idea for those critical of theater as social institution. Michel Foucault wrote extensively about subjugation, sexual identity, and power and is often cited in feminist thought. The French feminist movement (HÉLÈNE CIXOUS, Julia Kristeva, Luce Irigaray) advocates that women reclaim feminine space by "re-reading" traditional patriarchal myths (such as fairy tales) and develop their sexuality outside of the male gaze. Materialist feminism subverts the patriarchal tendencies of linear plots by establishing gender as social construction rather than biological destiny. The linear structure and realistic style of liberal feminist plays (Crimes of the Heart, THE HEIDI CHRONICLES) contrast with the more image-conscious and fragmentary style of materialist plays (Mineola Twins, FEFU AND HER FRIENDS).

Queer theory developed out of feminist philosophy, post-structuralism, and GAY AND LESBIAN studies. The theory suggests that sexuality is a complex array of codes and forces and studies how institutional power shapes the ideas of what is normal, essential, or biological. CHARLES LUDLUM and the Ridiculous Theater Company took the theatricality of "queer" behavior to hilarious lengths with plays that parodied famous literary texts through cross-dressing and transpositions of high and low culture (for example, Bluebeard, Camille).

By the end of the 20th century, dramatists drew from philosophies including catastrophism, chaos theory, and nihilism. British playwright HOWARD BARKER called for a new theater to replace liberal, humanist, and popular philosophy, a theater "without conscience" where the horror and ugliness of human activity can be freely presented and debated. Chaos theory, used in quantum mechanics, investigates parallel developments across the arts and sciences and emphasizes the unpredictability of natural occurrences. SAM SHEPARD and DAVID RABE endow their characters with random behavior and violent outbursts. Many would argue that nihilism is not a philosophy because it rejects all thought and meaning. In the 1990s a group of young British playwrights, nicknamed "In-Yer-Face" (SARAH KANE, MARK RAVENHILL, ANTHONY NEILSON, PATRICK MARBER, among others), were labeled nihilists because of their subversive way of presenting plays. They used graphic sex, gratuitous violence, humiliated characters, and broken taboos.

Intercultural connections remain at the center of drama's explorations of philosophy after 1960 as philosophies from around the globe are incorporated into dramatic theatrical structures. The state of philosophy and drama today essentially reflects a hybrid of cultures and philosophies.

FURTHER READING

- Artaud, Antonin. The Theatre and Its Double. New York: Grove, 1958.
- Demastes, William W. Theatre of Chaos: Beyond Absurdism, into Orderly Disorder. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1998.
- Eslin, Martin. The Theatre of the Absurd. New York: Anchor Bks., 1961.
- Kourany, Janet A., James P. Sterba, and Rosemarie Tong, eds. Feminist Philosophies. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1992.
- MacDonald, Erik. Theatre at the Margins: Text and the Post-Structured Stage. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan. Press 1993.
- Norris, Christopher. Deconstruction Theory and Practice. London: Routledge, 1991.
- Solomon, Robert C., and David Sherman, eds. The Blackwell Guide to Continental Philosophy. Oxford: Blackwell, 2003.
- Willett, John, ed. and trans. Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic. New York: Hill & Wang, 1964.

THE PHYSICISTS

Our science has become terrifying, our research dangerous. . . . We must retract our science, and I have retracted it.

—"Möbius," Act 2

In FRIEDRICH DÜRRENMATT's The Physicists (Die Physiker), the greatest physicist of all time has become delusional. Tormented by the voice of King Solomon, Wilhelm Heinrich Möbius has spent the last fifteen years in a psychiatric institution in the care of the hunchbacked, eccentric Doctor Mathilde von Zahnd. He shares a suite with two other physicists, "Newton" and "Einstein," who have recently strangled their nurses. Then Möbius strangles his nurse who loves him and has tried to arrange his release from the asylum. All three nurses had stumbled on a secret, which the physicists reveal in the second act. Newton and Einstein, a CIA and KGB agent, respectively, are on secret missions to bring Möbius back to work for their governments. Möbius, however, has no intention of leaving the asylum. He has feigned his delusions in order to have the freedom to research out of view of the scientific community. To this end Möbius is willing to sacrifice his marriage and his reputation, because he has discovered forces that could destroy the world. In a moving speech he convinces the agents to keep up the deception and remain in the asylum for the good of humanity. However, the secret is already out. The doctor, too, has heard the voice of King Solomon and at his orders has been drugging Möbius, copying his manuscripts and exploiting his formulas. "You are mad!" Möbius screams at the doctor, who is poised to rule the world. Insane murderers in the eyes of the law, the physicists are trapped.

Coincidence, the prime mover in Dürrenmatt's dramatic universe, has struck Möbius when he was most certain of success. He has chosen the one asylum in which the doctor was opportunistic, power hungry, and ruthless enough to thwart his plan. But Möbius's greater error lies in trying to retract his science. Dürrenmatt believed that, once conceived, an idea is communal property, because it can always be thought again. There can be no pure research without responsibility for the consequences. Problems that concern everyone can only be solved by everyone. The courageous individual acting alone cannot save society.

In large part the play is a response to BERTOLT BRECHT's THE LIFE OF GALILEO (Leben des Galilei, 1955). Heeding Galileo's warning to scientists not to capitulate to governmental authority, Möbius errs to the opposite extreme by fleeing into a supposed ivory tower. A second inspiration for the play was a book Dürrenmatt reviewed in 1956, Robert Jungk's Brighter than a Thousand Suns, about the creation of the atomic bomb. Premiering in Zürich on February 21, 1962, at the height of the Cold War, a year after the first manned space flights and only months before the Cuban missile crisis, The Physicists is very much a testimony to the angst and pessimism of the time. It joins Brecht's Galileo and MICHAEL FRAYN's COPENHAGEN (1998) as one of the most important modern dramas on the moral responsibility of the scientist. With nearly 1,600 performances, it was the most-performed play of the 1962–1963 theater season in German-speaking Europe.

[See also Germany]

FURTHER READING

Crockett, Roger A. Understanding Friedrich Dürrenmatt. Columbia: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1998.

Jenny, Urs. Friedrich Dürrenmatt: A Study of His Plays. Tr. by Keith Hamnet and Hugh Rorrison. London: Methuen, 1978.

Peppard, Murray. Friedrich Dürrenmatt. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Tiusanen, Timo. Dürrenmatt: A Study in Plays, Prose, Theory. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1977.

Whitton, Kenneth. The Theatre of Friedrich Dürrenmatt: A Study in the Possibility of Freedom. London: Oswald Wolff, 1980.

Roger A. Crockett

DIE PHYSIKER See THE PHYSICISTS

THE PIANO LESSON

What is you ready for, Berniece? You gonna drift along from day to day. Life is more than making it from one day to another.

—Avery Brown, Act 2

AUGUST WILSON's The Piano Lesson was inspired by a 1983 painting, also titled The Piano Lesson, by African American artist Romare Bearden. Wilson's play was written in 1986 and first produced the Yale Repertory Theatre in 1988 under the direction of longtime Wilson collaborator Lloyd Richards. It opened on Broadway on April 16, 1990, at the Walter Kerr Theatre. It ran for 328 performances and received widespread critical acclaim.

The drama takes place in Pittsburgh in 1936, at the height of the Great Depression. It tells the story of a brother and a sister forced to confront their responsibilities to the past. Boy Willie appears one day on his sister Berniece's doorstep and wants her to sell their family piano so that he can buy the same Mississippi land that their ancestors once worked as slaves. The piano, beautifully carved with African images by their grandfather, a former slave and carpenter, is a reminder not only of the family's enslavement but a testament to their survival. The carvings depict the history of the family during slavery. Berniece passionately opposes selling the piano. Through this conflict between the practical need of owning land versus the desire to preserve a treasured piece of family history, Wilson deals directly with past family wounds and the legacy they leave for the descendants of slaves.

The play is both poetic and poignant. Wilson intertwines a complex drama about American social history with family relationships. The family dissolves as it decides what to do with the piano and all that it represents. The play also incorporates supernatural elements, which ultimately alter the progress of the story and provide the play with an element of magical REALISM, when Boy Willie confronts the ghost of Old Sutter who was the slave owner of Willie's family. This confrontation results in Berniece's ability to play the piano again and exorcise the demons, an unusual supernatural element in Wilson's work.

The Piano Lesson is part of Wilson's ten-play cycle about the experience of black Americans throughout the 20th century. The play earned Wilson his second Pulitzer Prize for Drama. In addition to this, The Piano Lesson was awarded a Drama Desk Outstanding New Play Award, a New York Drama Critics' Circle Award for Best Play, a Tony Award for Best Play, and the American Theatre Critics' Outstanding Play Award. Wilson also adapted The Piano Lesson for a television movie. This adaptation earned eight Emmy nominations. It has been suggested by critics that the lovingly carved, thoughtfully adorned piano is a metaphor for black history and that as such it is an element of cultural identity that cannot be sold or overlooked. This would seem to be the lesson Wilson finds in the quotidian life of generations of African Americans.

[See also United States]

FURTHER READING

Bogunil, Mary L. Understanding August Wilson. Columbia: Univ. of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Perlira, Kim. August Wilson and the African-American Odyssey. Urbana: Univ. of Illinois Press, 1995.

Wilson, August. The Ground on Which I Stand. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2001.

Ellen Anthony-Moore and Christopher Moore

PICKTHALL, MARJORIE (1883–1922)

Canadian writer, poet, and playwright Marjorie Pickthall was born in Gunnersby, Middlesex, ENGLAND, on September 14, 1883. She was a daughter of Arthur C. Pickthall, an electrical engineer, and Helen Mallard. Her family moved to Southwater, Sussex, and then to Toronto in 1889. Pickthall attended St. Mildred's College and Bishop Strachan School. While at Bishop Strachan she sold her first story, "Two-ears," to the Toronto Globe. When she was only seventeen, Pickthall won a Mail and Empire Christmas competition with the poem "O Keep the World for Ever at the Dawn," attracting nationwide attention. She continued to publish poems and short stories in leading periodicals in England, the UNITED STATES, and CANADA. From 1910 to 1912 she worked as an assistant librarian at Victoria College Library in Toronto (currently, the library holds the largest collection of Pickthall's manuscripts and personal papers). In 1912 she moved back to England, near Salisbury, where she lived until 1919. During World War I, she worked as an ambulance driver, a farm laborer, and a library clerk. It was a particularly prolific period in her life. After World War I, she returned to Canada and moved to Vancouver, where she lived until her death on April 19, 1922.

In November 1913 her first collection of poems, A Drift of Pinions, was published by the University Magazine in Montreal. The collection sold out within ten days. Her first novel, Little Hearts, was published two years later, in 1915. Altogether, Pickthall published over 200 short stories, approximately 100 poems, three novels, and a number of articles and essays in journals such as Atlantic Monthly, Harper's, and Scribner's. Pickthall's reputation rests predominantly on her career as a poet, so her play THE WOODCARVER'S WIFE has only recently gained the critical attention it deserves. First produced in Toronto and Montreal and published posthumously in 1923, this one-act modernist verse drama is not typical of Pickthall's rather sentimental poetry. Centered on the love triangle, The Woodcarver's Wife touches on issues of gender, race and eroticism, all charged with violence and intensity that though not easily accessible in the 1920s ultimately became an object of great interest for modern feminist critics.

PLAY: The Woodcarver's Wife (published 1923)

FURTHER READING

Badir, Patricia L. " 'So Entirely Unexpected': The Modernist

Dramaturgy of Marjorie Pickthall's The Wood-Carver's Wife." Modern Drama 43, no. 2 (2000): 216–245.

Garvin, John William, ed. Canadian Poets. Toronto: McClelland, Goodchild & Stewart, 1916.

Kizuk, Alex. "The Case of the Forgotten Electra: Pickthall's Apostrophes and Feminine Poetics." Studies in Canadian Literature 12 (Winter 1987): 15–34.

Pacey, Desmond. Creative Writing in Canada: A Short History of English-Canadian Literature. Toronto: Ryerson, 1952.

Magda Romanska

PICNIC

Oh, Mom, what can you do with the love you feel? Where is there you can take it?

—Madge, Act 3

WILLIAM INGE's 1953 Pulitzer Prize-winning COMEDY-drama is set on Labor Day in a small Kansas town where the sudden appearance of Hal Carter, a virile young drifter, arouses sexual and emotional undercurrents in three generations of the town's women. Hal is strongly attracted to Madge Owens, local beauty queen, who has been dating Alan Seymour, a bland young man whose family wealth offers the prospect of a secure life. Alan wins the favor of Flo, Madge's mother, who resists Hal, whose presence painfully reminds her of her wayward spouse. She fears that Madge will fall victim to her fate. Flo turns to her feisty widowed neighbor, Helen Potts, but the sharp-tongued old lady seems invigorated by the passion evident between Madge and Hal. Unable to conform to small-town proprieties, Hal's wanderlust is heightened by the whistle of the passing train. Madge, who longs to escape small-town life, grapples with the safe choice of Alan versus her forbidden attraction to Hal.

Picnic also focuses on Rosemary Sidney, a lonely, middle-aged schoolteacher, who feels increasing urgency to find herself a mate. Her only prospect is Howard Bevans, a local merchant, who is not at all certain that he wants marriage. Their seriocomic battle of wills is set against the Hal-Madge-Alan triangle, but it all takes a dramatic turn when the distraught Rosemary literally begs Howard to marry her. Rosemary's desperation encourages Madge to follow her passion for Hal. As the play ends, Madge runs off with Hal, dashing Flo's hopes for her daughter's comfortable future.

The lyrical REALISM of Picnic is, to a great extent, inspired by TENNESSEE WILLIAMS's plays. Featuring elevated poetic language, multiple symbols, and larger-than-life characters, Williams's brand of lyrical realism attracted Inge. Lacking the soaring language typical of Williams, Inge instead demonstrated skill in creating strong characterizations and in depicting the details of small-town midwestern life in the first half of the 20th century. Picnic represents the peak of Inge's dramatic achievement, and it is the strongest evocation of his frequent exploration of the joys and pains of romance and sexuality. Set against the arid surroundings of small-town America, Inge illuminates the crosscurrents of desire and the bittersweet aspects of love, both lost and found.

In 1950 Inge had written a one-act play, Front Porch, which he expanded and renamed Women of Summer before it evolved into Picnic. There was a popular film version in 1955, and it was remade for television in 2003. Despite critical and commercial success, Inge later revised Picnic, shifting the play's focus to the relationship of Rosemary and Howard. Titled Summer Brave it was produced at the Equity Library Theatre in 1973, but the critics were not favorable. The original Picnic remains a classic piece of lyrical realism from the post-World War II Broadway stage.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Armato, Philip M. "The Bum as Scapegoat in William Inge's Picnic." Western American Literature 10 (1976): 273–282.
- Donovan, Robert K. "The Dionysiac Dance in William Inge's Picnic." Dance Chronicle 7 (1985): 413–434.
- Lange, Jane W. "'Forces Get Loose': Social Prophecy in William Inge's Picnic." Kansas Quarterly 18, no. 4 (1986): 57–70.
- Smith, Christopher. "Picnic." In Contemporary American Dramatists, ed. by K. A. Berney. Detroit: St. James Press, 1994. 709–711.
- Wentworth, Michael. "The Convergence of Fairy Tale and Myth in William Inge's Picnic." Kansas Quarterly 18, no. 4 (1986): 75–85.

James Fisher

PILLARS OF SOCIETY

A citizen's home ought to be like a glass cabinet.
—Rummel, Act 4

After EMPEROR AND GALILEAN (1873), an expansive double drama of world history, HENRIK IBSEN decided to return to contemporary small-town Norwegian society, limited in both space and time. In Pillars of Society (Samfundets støtter, 1877) all four acts take place in the spacious garden room in Consul Bernick's house. The rear wall is entirely of glass, overlooking part of the garden and a street beyond. The device of the glass wall was introduced by BJØRNSTJERNE BJØRNSON in 1875 and developed further by Ibsen. By lowering or raising curtains the distinction between the interior sphere and the world outside is emphasized. The play exploits this scenographic contrast by opposing the complacent atmosphere of the insiders to the unexpected appearance of intruding elements from a larger world.

Arriving on a ship from America is Lona Hessel, once the sweetheart of Karsten Bernick, who was rejected by him for a more profitable alliance with her half sister. With her unconventional approach, Lona causes a stir in the quiet small town. Informed about one or two offenses committed by Bernick in his younger days, and blamed on her brother, who left for America, she is determined to make Bernick confess his misdeeds publicly. Bernick's business management has not been stainless, either. As a shipyard owner he has been eager to have an old vessel hastily repaired, endangering the life of crew and passengers. When he learns that his twelve-year-old son Olaf has boarded the ship as a stowaway, he is seriously concerned.

Business friends of the Consul have prepared a celebration in his honor, to strike back against rumors that undermine his position as a pillar of society. In the last act the curtains are lifted in front of a cheering crowd of townspeople, with music and speeches. The Consul, however, who has just been informed that the ship is held back and his son is safe, does not accept the honor offered him. He is now ready to confess his several offenses, and the celebration is subdued. At the end Bernick honors the women of his family as the pillars of society, but Lona Hessel does not agree: the spirit of truth and the spirit of freedom hold that position.

It has been debated whether Consul Bernick's confession and moral turnaround are credible. Compared to Ibsen's later endings, this one seems rather lighthearted. No doubt, he advanced further in his dramatic art from A DOLL'S HOUSE onward. And yet Pillars of Society became his greatest international success so far, particularly in GERMANY, where it was performed in thirty-one German theaters in 1878.

[See also Norway]

FURTHER READING

- Ewbank, Inga-Stina. "Drama and Society in Ibsen's Pillars of the Community." In Drama and Society: Themes in Drama 1, ed. by James Redmond. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1979. 75–97.
- McFarlane, James. "Pillars of Society: Comedy, Irony and Deeper Meaning." Contemporary Approaches to Ibsen 8 (1994): 121–129.

Northam, John. "Pillars of Society." In Ibsen's Dramatic Method. 1953. Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1971. 40–58.

Asbjørn Aarseth

THE PILLOWMAN

The little boy was just like you said it'd be. I chopped his toes off and he didn't scream at all. He just sat there looking at them. He seemed very surprised. I suppose you would be at that age. His name was Aaron. He had a funny little hat on, kept going on about his mum. God, he bled a lot. You wouldn't've thought there'd be that much blood in such a little boy. Then he stopped bleeding and went blue. Poor thing. I feel quite bad now, he seemed quite nice. . . . But the girl was a pain in the arse. Kept bawling her eyes out. And she wouldn't eat them. She wouldn't eat the apples, and I'd spent ages making them. It's really hard to get the razor blades inside. You don't say how to make them in the story, do ya?

—Michal, Act 2, Scene 1

MARTIN McDONAGH's play, first performed in November 2003 at the National Theatre in London, deconstructs the shifting relationship between stories, the storyteller and those to whom stories are told. McDonagh utilizes the familiar narrative tropes of interrogation, flashback, and children's stories to examine the ways in which narratives control, bind, and restrict even as they help us to overcome our isolation and despair.

Set in an unnamed totalitarian state, act 1 opens with its protagonist, Katurian K. Katurian, blindfolded in a police interrogation room. Two policemen question and torture Katurian due to the uncanny resemblance between a series of child murders in his town and the gruesome content of his stories. The similarity between art and life, representation and the real, is made even more problematic given that Katurian's art is conjured from the bizarre experiment conducted by his parents that damaged the mind of his brother Michal when they were both children. Katurian's stories are seductive, first teasing then pulling us into their world. As the tales unfold, they horrifyingly materialize the ways in which children's stories shift from joy to violence, evoke nightmares through words, collapse the known and the familiar, subvert the comforting and innocent, and transform the safe mythology of home into a terrifying locus of violence.

The writer endures the worst critics imaginable—Detective Tupolski, an imaginative, articulate storyteller in his own right, and his violent thug of an assistant, Ariel. What becomes clear, as the unchecked authority of the interrogation proceeds, is that the detectives have stories of their own, stories that serve to underscore the link between state-sanctioned violence and the familial violence of Katurian's narratives. This connection is further elaborated through the play's structure, as the unfolding stories of the interrogation room and Katurian's stories are given theatrical life. The interrogation begins with a familiar theatrical idiom of simultaneously frightening and hilarious exchanges that recall HAROLD PINTER's early menacing COM-

EDIES. These scenes are punctuated by Katurian's stories, which come to life as if they are being lifted out of an illustrated children's pop-up book. Katurian's stories abruptly dislocate time and place, pulling us into the psychic space of childhood.

Toward the end of act 1, Michal admits to his brother that he has killed children. A stunned, horrified, and protective Katurian evolves into "The Pillowman," of one of his stories, suffocating his brother to spare him execution by the police. The end of act 1 leaves us desirous to know what happens to the little girl in "The Little Jesus" story. What has Michal done to a little neighborhood girl? We are thus tangled and made complicit with the play's mixture of pleasure and violence in storytelling.

The Pillowman begins with a blindfolded artist and ends with his sight blocked by a black hood over his head, ironic materializations that frame the exploration of the role of the storyteller, artistic responsibility, and the consequences of art as it extends beyond the stage.

[See also England, 1960–Present; Ireland]

FURTHER READING

McDonagh, Martin. The Pillowman. London: Faber, 2003.

Worthen, Hannah, and H.B. Worthen. "The Pillowman and the Ethics of Allegory." Modern Drama 49, no. 2 (2006): 155–173.

Kerry Moore

PIÑERA, VIRGILIO (1912–1979)

One of the most internationally renowned Cuban playwrights, VIRGILIO PIÑERA was born in Cárdenas, CUBA, on August 4, 1912. He led the dramatic theatrical revolution before the political revolution drove him out of the country. In the late 1950s, nightly performances of his plays were performed to large audiences. Electra Garrigó (1941) established him as a leading dramatist and contemporary of Carlos Felipe. It adapted the myth of Electra to the disintegrating Cuban bourgeoisie. As the 1960s expanded Cuban drama, he produced The Fat Guy and the Skinny Guy (El flaco y el gordo, 1959) and The Philanthropist (El filántropo, 1960). His Cold Air (Aire frío, 1959) is considered by many Cubans a masterpiece of 20th-century Cuban drama. This autobiographical play portrays several decades of a middle-class Cuban family in transition.

Thematically, his plays portrayed the social and economic evils manifested by the corruption of prerevolutionary regimes. After EUGÈNE IONESCO's THE BALD SOPRANO was staged in 1956, AVANT-GARDE playwrights wrote and staged plays incorporating elements of the Theater of the Absurd. Piñera's plays from the early 1960s until his death in 1979 utilized absurdist elements. He also overtly satirized and challenged the status quo through his oppressed and disenfranchised characters defeated by the new regime. They confront absurd conflicts or challenges that dehumanize each character who must destroy or be destroyed in the final resolution.

Piñera did not address the contradictions of the revolution itself in his early plays. Until the late 1960s, playwrights wrote and staged their works without governmental intervention. In 1961 Fidel Castro's "Words to the Intellectuals" ("Palabras a los intelectuales") initiated a crackdown on artistic expression. Piñera was the only audience member to directly contest Castro among the crowd of intellectuals rounded up for the edict. As a result of Castro's admonition, most playwrights fled the country or stopped writing. Despite censorship and ostracism from the theater community, Piñera, Antón Arrufat, and a few survivors defied the regime and continued to write.

These blacklisted works were rarely published or performed until restrictions were eased in the 1990s. Piñera was most prolific during his later years. An international literary jury awarded him the Casas de las Américas prize in theater for Two Panicky Old Folks (Dos viejos pánicos) in 1968. Editors in Buenos Aires, where he lived for several years, published several short plays and story collections.

Piñera wrote incessantly, despite the exigencies of the new regime. After devoting his life to the advancement of Cuban arts and letters, he died of a heart attack at home on October 19, 1979. Governmental officials confiscated his manuscripts immediately after his death. Some works were released upon demand by literary scholars and colleagues to be edited and published posthumously. After 1986, the government released plays that were published, including The Siamese Twins (Los siameses), The Trip (El viaje), The Rink (El rink), Soap Bubbles (Pompas de jabón), Inermes, and A Pick or a Shovel? (¿Un pico o una pala?). Many manuscripts of plays and stories remain in governmental archives, unedited as of 2005.

[See also Absurdism]

SELECT PLAYS: Electra (Garrigó (1941); False Alarm (Falsa alarma, 1948); Jesus (Jesús, 1948); Cold Air (Aire frío, 1959, 1988); The Fat Guy and the Skinny Guy (El flaco y el gordo, 1959); The Philanthropist (El filántropo, 1960); Requiem for Yarini (Réquiem para Yarini, 1960); The Wedding (La boda, 1960); The Servants (Los siervos, 1962); An Empty Shoebox (Una caja de zapatos vacía, 1968); Two Panicky Old Folks (Dos viejos pánicos, 1968); Study in White and Black (Estudio en blanco y negro, 1970); No (El no, performed 2005)

FURTHER READING

Carrió, Raquel. Dramaturgia cubana contemporánea [Contemporary Cuban dramaturgy]. Havana: Editorial Pueblo y Educación, 1988.
de Armas, José R., and Charles W. Steele. Cuba: Consciousness in Literature. Miami: Ediciones Unival, 1978.
Domínguez, Carlos Espinosa. "A Century of Theatre in Cuba: An Introduction to Cuban Theatre." N.d. <http://www.repertorio.org/education/pdfs/cubateatro2.pdf>.
González-Cruz, Luis F., and Ann Waggoner Aken, trans. Three Masterpieces of Cuban Drama. Los Angeles: Green Integer, 2000.

Carole Anne Champagne

PINERO, ARTHUR (1855–1934)

I hope the time will come—is coming—when the Englishman like the Frenchman, will write his play for all nations.

—Arthur Pinero

English actor, director, and playwright Arthur Pinero was knighted (1909) for his contributions to stage literature. Born to middle-class parents of Portuguese Jewish descent, Pinero was sent to work in his father's law offices at the age of ten. As a child Pinero also spent many hours at the Sadler's Wells and the Prince of Wales theaters, where he was introduced to the "cup and saucer" plays of THOMAS WILLIAM ROBERTSON. After his father's retirement, fifteen-year-old Arthur found work as a solicitor's clerk by day and studied elocution at Birkbeck Institute at night. Although he eventually rejected the law profession, the influence of the nine years Pinero spent in solicitors' offices can be seen in many of his plays. Legal details, particularly those related to wills and trusts, and the problem of the law's inequality to women feature prominently in a number of his works.

Pinero excelled in his elocution courses and gained opportunities to perform on tour in Edinburgh and Bristol. During this period Pinero composed his first plays, though none was accepted for performance. In 1874 Pinero abandoned the field of law in order to pursue his childhood dream of ACTING. Actor-manager Henry Irving discovered him in 1876 and engaged him in the company at the Lyceum in London. During his nearly five years at the Lyceum, Pinero gained a reputation as a reliable character actor. Irving also encouraged the budding playwright and staged some of his work. Pinero performed the leading male role in his first produced piece: the one-act 200 £ a Year was staged at the Globe Theatre on October 6, 1877. His first hit, The Money-Spinner (1880), opened in Manchester and later enjoyed a successful run in London.

In 1881 Pinero moved to the Haymarket, where he continued to act and write plays until 1884. Greatly influenced by Haymarket managers Marie and Squire Bancroft, Pinero began to emphasize ensemble work and eschew melodramatic effects in favor of a more intimate, naturalistic approach to drama. He gained notice as an emerging playwright with early FARCES Imprudence (1881) and The Squire (1881). The play script of The Squire illustrates Pinero's conception of his plays in terms of the combined textual, visual, and performance elements of theater. Here, as in his other plays, Pinero included elaborate directions for set design and construction, detailed descriptions of stage business, and specific physical and psychological outlines of his characters.

Between 1882 and 1884 Pinero wrote seven full-length plays, three of them early versions of the marriage PROBLEM PLAY. In 1883 the playwright himself married actress Myra Holme, who had starred in his 1882 play Girls and Boys. About this time Pinero established the practice of printing the full script of a new play in order to provide copies for all of the actors. Previously, actors only received "sides"—sections of the text that record cues and give only the speeches of the actor's own role. The result of Pinero's practice was to encourage an ensemble effect and enable the development of realistic acting. During this period, the influential drama critic William Archer (1882) wrote of Pinero as "a thoughtful and conscientious writer with artistic aims, if not yet in command of his artistic means . . . [showing] sufficient promise to warrant a hope that we have in this author a playwright of genuine talent."

After 1884 Pinero's work can be divided into four genres: farce, problem play, social COMEDY, and sentimental comedy. Some of his most skillfully constructed works were his farces for the Court Theatre, all of which took a single social target: the law (The Magistrate, 1885), the Church (Dandy Dick, 1887), politics (The Cabinet Minister, 1890), education (The Schoolmistress, 1886), and marriage (The Amazons, 1893). Pinero's best and most popular Court farce, The Magistrate, centers on a woman named Agatha who lies about her age—and the age of her nineteen-year-old son from a previous marriage—in order to wed her second husband, the honest magistrate Mr. Poskett. The Magistrate also marks Pinero's first venture into DIRECTING his plays, a practice he continued throughout his career. Following the success of Pinero's London production of The Magistrate, he directed a subsequent production in New York in the playwright's only trip to America.

Pinero's reputation as a director was that of a skillful and precise perfectionist who controlled each stage of the production process. As opposed to casting according to convenience or availability, Pinero refused to accept any actor he did not consider to be the best person for the role. He also was one of the first English directors to cast according to physical type. Rehearsal periods for Pinero's productions ran long—sometimes six or seven weeks—and the playwright gave specific direction for line delivery, facial expressions, and stage business. Despite the seeming limitations of this somewhat restrictive approach, Pinero's productions largely received favorable notices from critics and audiences alike.

In 1887 Pinero wrote The Profligate, a masterful problem play that was heralded by critics as a breakthrough in English drama. In it, Pinero draws on the melodramatic conventions of coincidence, aside, and soliloquy and appropriates the character of the raisonneur from the "well-made play." The Profligate centers on a premise that pervaded many of Pinero's later problem plays: a dark secret of the past haunts the protagonist's present and threatens his or her future. More significantly, The Profligate addressed the pressing social issue of the sexual "double standard." The plot centers on Lesley Brudenell—an innocent and morally rigid woman who cannot accept the debauched and immoral past of the profligate, Dunstan Renshaw. Initially considered too controversial for performance, The Profligate was only produced two years after it was written—and then only after the tragic ending had been revised (the only time Pinero rewrote his work). However, Pinero published the original ending, in which Renshaw is abandoned by Lesley and, believing himself unforgiven for his past sins, commits suicide, dying just as Lesley returns to him.

Pinero's next four "problem plays" all centered on women: THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY (1893), The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith (1894), Iris (1901), and MID-CHANNEL (1909). While many critics assumed Pinero modeled his problem plays on those of HENRIK IBSEN, the playwright himself claimed, "When I wrote The Profligate I had no knowledge of Ibsen, nor have I, I believe, been influenced in the smallest degree by his works." Although distinctly different in personality, the female protagonists of these psychological studies are all somehow trapped by their relationships with men and rendered powerless by societal expectations and structures—including the law. Most notable among these works is Pinero's masterpiece The Second Mrs. Tanqueray. Composed over a two-year span, it was acclaimed as the best English play since Richard Sheridan's The School for Scandal.

Other plays of note include Pinero's highly popular "sentimental comedies" Sweet Lavender (1888) and Trelawny of the "Wells" (1898) and his finest comedy of manners, The Gay Lord Quex (1899). Sweet Lavender, which was closely modeled on playwright T. W. Robertson's dramatic style, explored social class as a barrier to true love. Pinero's longest-running play Sweet Lavender was translated, adapted, and performed on the Continent as well as throughout the English-speaking world. In Trelawny of the "Wells," Pinero sought to recreate the theatrical world of Sadler's Wells and celebrate Robertson's development of early English REALISM. Initially, the play was criticized as "sordidly disagreeable, too destitute of romance or story" (The Times, January 21, 1888). Nevertheless, it gained popularity over time, with several revivals and a filmed staging by 1928. The beautifully constructed comedy of manners The Gay Lord Quex has been likened to Restoration comedies in its satirical critique of a hypocritical, cynical, and amoral society.

Following a period of extensive but intermittent travel on the Continent, Pinero produced three of his best plays at St. James's Theatre: His House in Order (1906), his greatest financial success; The Thunderbolt (1908); and Mid-Channel (1909). The universally acclaimed 1906 play His House in Order features Pinero's satirical critique of snobbery, hypocrisy, and "noble" self-sacrifice. The Thunderbolt portrays one middle-class family's hypocrisy and greed as they wrangle over the estate of their recently deceased brother. Mid-Channel, one of Pinero's "woman problem plays," chronicles the disintegration of a marriage and the destructive effects of the sexual double standard on a middle-aged wife.

However, after 1910, Pinero's popularity and influence as a playwright began to decline. Pinero's production of The "Mind the Paint" Girl (1912)—a satire on the famous Gaiety Girls—was jeered at by audiences and dismissed by critics. Between 1914 and 1918, wartime audiences preferred light entertainment to Pinero's realistic offerings. Late in his career, Pinero began to experiment with form in his plays: Mr. Livermore's Dream (1917), The Enchanted Cottage (1922), The Freaks (1918), and Dr. Harmer's Holidays (written in 1923–1924). In 1928, the Garrick Club honored Pinero's contributions to theater on the fiftieth anniversary of his debut as a playwright.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

PLAYS: 200 £ a Year (1877); Two Can Play at that Game (1878); Daisy's Escape (1879); Bygones (1880); Hester's Mystery (1880); La Comete: or, Two Hearts (1880); The Money-Spinner (1880); Imprudence (1881); The Squire (1881); Girls and Boys: A Nursery Tale (1882); Lords and Commons (1883); The Rector (1883); The Rocket (1883); In Chancery (1884); The Iron Master (1884); Low Water (1884); The Magistrate (1885); Mayfair (1885); The Hobby-Horse (1886); The Schoolmistress (1886); Dandy Dick (1887); Sweet Lavender (1888); The Weaker Sex (1888); The Profligate (1889); The Cabinet Minister (1890); Lady Bountiful: A Story of Years (1891); The Times (1891); The Amazons (1893); The Second Mrs. Tanqueray (1893); The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith (1894); The Benefit of the Doubt (1895); The Princess and the Butterfly: or, The Fantastics (1897); The Beauty Stone (with J. Comyns Carr, music by Arthur Sullivan, 1898); Trelawny of the "Wells" (1898); The Gay Lord Quex (1899); Iris (1901); Letty (1903); A Wife Without a Smile: A Comedy in Disguise (1904); His House in Order (1906); The Thunderbolt (1908); Mid-Channel (1909); Preserving Mr. Panmure (1911); The "Mind the Paint" Girl (1912); The Widow of Wasdale Head: A Fantasy (1912); Playgoers (1913); The Big Drum (1915); Mr. Livermore's Dream (1917); The Freaks: An Idyll of Suburbia (1918); Monica's Blue Boy (music by Frederic Cowen, 1918); Quick Work (1919); The Enchanted Cottage (1922); A Seat in the Park (1922); A Private Room (1928); Child Man (1930); Dr. Harmer's Holidays (1931); A Cold June (1932); Late of Mockford's (1934)

SELECT PLAYS: The Fresh Truffles (I nuovi tartufi, 1865–1866); Fading Roses (Rose caduche, 1867); Honor I (L'onore I, 1869); Rustic Chivalry (Carvalleria rusticana, 1884); The Porter's Lodging (In portineria, 1885); The She-Wolf (La lupa, 1886); After (Dopo, 1886); Mastro-don Gesualdo (1889); Rustic Chivalry (Cavalleria rusticana, 1896); The Wolf Hunt (La caccia al lupo, 1901); The Fox Hunt (La caccia alla volpe, 1901); What's Yours Is Mine (Dal tuo al mio, 1903)

FURTHER READING

- Archer, William. English Dramatists of To-day. London: Sampson Low, 1882.
- Dunkel, Wilbur Dwight. Sir Arthur Pinero: A Critical Biography with Letters. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1941.
- Fyfe, Sir Hamilton. Sir Arthur Pinero's Plays and Players. London: Ernest Benn, 1930.
- Griffin, Penny. Arthur Wing Pinero and Henry Arthur Jones. New York: St. Martin's, 1991.
- Lazenby, Walter. Arthur Wing Pinero. New York: Twayne, 1972.
- Wearing, J. P. "Pinero the Actor." Theatre Notebook 26, no. 4 (Summer 1972).

Leslie A. Dovale

PINGET, ROBERT (1919–1997)

The Swiss-born French novelist and playwright Robert Pinget practiced law in Geneva as a young man. He was born on July 19, 1919, in Geneva, and in 1946 he moved to Paris to study painting but abandoned his studies to travel abroad. Back in FRANCE, he turned from painting to writing, publishing a book of stories, Entres Fantoine et Agapa (Between Fantoine and Agapa) in 1951. Recognition, however, came late for Pinget; despite finding publishers for his first three novels, they were mostly ignored.

Eventually, Editions de Minuit took a risk on his fourth novel, Graal Flibuste (1955) and later reissued his previous three. He soon became associated with the writers of the nouveau roman—Alain Robbe-Grillet, Claude Simon, NATHALIE SARRAUTE, Michel Butor, and others—who rejected the conventions of the traditional novel in favor of techniques that explored subjective experiences of personal anguish, the passage of time, and problems of communication. Throughout his career, however, Pinget resisted particular expectations of genre or identification with any school of writing.

In both fiction and drama, Pinget dealt with personal utterance; for him, writing was synonymous with the human voice. Consequently, he wrote several early plays for radio—The Crank (La Manivelle), for example, which his friend SAMUEL BECKETT adapted into The Old Tune (1960), a favor Pinget returned when adapting ALL THAT FALL and Embers. Others he adapted from his fiction. Architruc (1961), Dead Letter (Lettre morte, 1959), and Clope (1961) were based on his novels Baga (1958), Le Fiston (1959), and Clope au dossier (1961). Often compared to Beckett, Pinget's plays differ in outlook and manifest an apparent lack of concern for theatrical space and physical action.

Spoken language is the primary impulse of Pinget's drama. His speakers demonstrate his fondness for everyday speech and discourse. His use of language, however, resists the notion that the purpose of drama is to recreate objective reality. Nor do his plays adhere to conventional notions of plot, time, or psychology. They do, however, deploy language in the service of dramatic and comic purpose; his usual tools for achieving his aims are repetition, malapropism, and misunderstanding. His themes emerge from the desire of his characters to satisfy elusive inner needs and their frustrated attempts to understand them. Thus, in Dead Letter, Monsieur Levert searches fruitlessly for a letter from the son who abandoned him. Gorman and Cream in The Old Tune try to retrieve and verify memories of their shared past. The eponymous characters in Abel and Bela (Abel et Bela, 1971) struggle in vain to create the text for a play; their failure creates Pinget's success. The drama of the writer-in-process also informs Identity (Identité, 1972), Paralchimie (1973), and the two "Mortin" plays (About Mortin [Autour de Mortin, 1965] and Mortin Not Dead [Mortin pas mort, 1986]), which raise the question of what survives after an author's death.

At first, Pinget's project seems pessimistic, for the pattern of his design is the linguistic formation and dismantling of human will, which degenerates into fantasy, or chaos, revealing a negation of self. However, his originality, his humor, and his sincere, soul-searching protagonists mitigate against a thoroughly hopeless vision. Pinget died on August 25, 1997.

PLAYS: Tous ceux qui tombent (from Beckett; All That Fall, 1957); Dead Letter (Lettre morte, 1959); The Old Tune (based on The Crank [La Manivelle], 1960); Here or There (Ici ou ailleurs, 1961); Architruc (1961); Clope (1961); The Hypothesis (L'Hypothèse, 1961); No Answer (Le Fiston, 1961); About Mortin (Autour de Mortin, 1965); Abel and Bela (Abel et Bela, 1971); Identity (Identité, 1972); Night (Nuit, 1973); Paralchimie (1973); A Bizarre Will (Un Testament bizarre, 1986); The Chrysanthemum (Le Chrysanthème, 1986); Crazy Notion (Lubie, 1986); Dictation (Dictée, 1986); Mortin Not Dead (Mortin pas mort, 1986); Sophism and Sadism (Sophisme et sadisme, 1986); About Nothing (De rien, 1995); The Beefsteak (Le Bifteck, 1995); The Ducreux Business (L'Affaire Ducreux, 1995)

FURTHER READING

Esslin, Martin. The Theatre of the Absurd. Rev. ed. New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1969.

Henckels, Robert M., Jr. Robert Pinget: The Novel as Quest. Tuscaloosa: Univ. of Alabama. Press, 1979.

Rosmarin, Leonard R. Robert Pinget. Twayne's World Authors Series. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Michael D. Kinghorn

PINTER, HAROLD (1930–)

Harold Pinter, winner of the 2005 Nobel Prize in Literature, is often considered by critics to be among the most influential English dramatists of the last half of the 20th century. One overarching reason for such respect is the breadth of his artistic achievements. Pinter has written twenty-nine highly regarded stage plays to date, plus twenty-one screenplays and assorted radio dramas. But he began his theater profession as an actor, also becoming a first-rate stage director with twenty-seven productions to his credit. Additionally, Pinter is a widely published poet and essayist. Finally, he remains a busy political activist who is not afraid to generate controversy. Pinter thus represents a vital man both of the theater and world affairs. In awarding the Nobel Prize, the Swedish Academy said Pinter was an author "who in his plays uncovers the precipice under everyday prattle and forces entry into oppression's closed rooms."

Like many leading authors of post-World War II ENGLAND, Pinter succeeded not through class advantages but despite the lack of them. Born in 1930 in Hackney, a working-class section of East London, Pinter was the only child of a tailor of Portuguese-Jewish heritage. While still a very young boy, he was evacuated several times from London during the German bombings of World War II. Because of his Jewish background, young Pinter was drawn into frequent fistfights on returning to London where an increasingly anti-Semitic, fascist current had emerged. He attended the all-boys Hackney Downs Grammar School from 1942 until 1948 and became attracted there to literature and theater. Pinter acted lead roles in Shakespearean plays while in school, though his interests also included poetry, politics, film, and journalism. Sports were important to Pinter during his school years, as well, including football, cricket, and especially track, a sport where he set school sprint records.

At age eighteen, Pinter entered the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art (RADA) under a scholarship. Feeling out of his depth among more sophisticated students, however, he dropped out and later enrolled at the Central School of Speech and Drama. During that period, Pinter also displayed a strong political consciousness that remained evident in his life and career. On the personal side, when he was eighteen years old and subject to national conscription, he chose the path of conscientious objector rather than serve in the British armed forces—a choice that earned him a fine but not jail. In speeches and in essays he has steadfastly argued on behalf of human rights issues and against politically inspired wars. During the 1990s, when fully established as one of England's premium playwrights, Pinter refused a knighthood because it was proffered by Prime Minister John Major's party whose policies contrasted with Pinter's positions.

Some of his popular playwrighting colleagues (DAVID HARE, EDWARD BOND, HOWARD BRENTON) wrote mostly politically charged dramas. But more like TOM STOPPARD and PETER SHAFFER, Pinter created worlds in his plays extending beyond strictly temporal themes. The exceptions include his One for the Road (1984), Mountain Language (1988), Moonlight (1993), and a few other lesser-known works. The "public" persona has not impeded the "artist" in him. As early as 1950, Pinter had his poetry first published. He also began then to perform radio plays over the BBC. His involvement with the legitimate theater took hold, as well, and he toured IRELAND and the English countryside, ACTING William Shakespeare's plays and current dramas. While touring, Pinter met actress Vivien Merchant, whom he married in 1956. They divorced in 1980, at which time he married Lady Antonia Fraser, an aristocrat and noted writer-biographer.

While continuing to write and publish poetry and fiction, Pinter also seriously contemplated potential subjects for plays. A friend in 1957 asked Pinter to write a play based on tone proposed topic. Pinter was acting on tour at the time but in four days wrote the one-act piece The Room—his first work for the stage. It proved a success in performance at Bristol University and then at Bristol's Old Vic Theatre. When asked by a commercial producer for other plays, Pinter offered him The Dumb Waiter (1959) and THE BIRTHDAY PARTY (1958).

The inquiring producer Michael Codron paid Pinter for the option to stage The Birthday Party in Cambridge and in London during the spring of 1958. Most critical response was scathing and audience attendance dismal. Harold Hobson, a critic of The (London) Sunday Times, however, recognized evidence beneath the enigmatic surface of the play of "the most original, disturbing and arresting talent in theatrical London" (May 25, 1958). Within two years of its rocky start, The Birthday Party was produced again to far better reviews. It played on television and in several large venues including San Francisco—his first play performed in the UNITED STATES.

From our perspective today, we have little difficulty in recognizing the unique strengths of The Birthday Party—Pinter's second work and first full-length play. Composed of three conventional acts, the play embeds many of Pinter's dramatic techniques within a permeating atmosphere of eerie menace. The opening act presents traditional exposition but with a twist. A middle-aged couple, Petey and Meg, share their modest English seaside house with a boarder, Stanley. When approached by two strangers in business suits, only Stanley becomes alarmed. Act 2 portrays a wild birthday party, intended to honor Stanley, though it is not his birthday. The idea for the party was suggested by the two outsiders, Goldberg and McCann, and during the festivities it becomes clear the men are there to get Stanley and take him away. The last act depicts Goldberg and McCann assisting an apparently traumatized Stanley into a large black automobile. After the strangers and Stanley are gone, Petey and Meg are left to figure out what has occurred.

Pinter creates a mysterious situation in The Birthday Party, wherein Stanley's identity and past history are left blurred. Stanley's explanation that he had been a concert pianist and entertainer does not hold up under questioning. There are hints that Stanley once was associated with McCann and Goldberg, had perhaps broken some company policy, and was to return with them to face some form of justice. But that is supposition, since Pinter's plot refuses to clarify issues of identity or past and future events. The play ends up an intriguing puzzle that audiences are entreated to solve.

Most of Pinter's earlier dramas exhibited techniques derived from ABSURDISM, a theatrical movement popularized by critic Martin Esslin in his influential 1961 book Theatre of the Absurd. Average playgoers in 1958 were confused by the absurdist illogicalities and gaps in plot of The Birthday Party. Nor had most critics yet become conversant (or comfortable) with absurdism that early in its evolution. Other Pinter features that unsettled audiences were dialogue punctuated with pauses and silences plus sharp innuendo and invective, qualities also found in SAMUEL BECKETT's landmark puzzlers.

From 1958 on, Pinter's career advanced steadily and impressively. His one-act play The Dumb Waiter premiered in Frankfurt, GERMANY, in 1959, and his radio drama A Slight Ache, written in 1958, was performed in a stage version in London in 1961. The Dumb Waiter, almost an extension of Birthday Party, shifted to London's Royal Court Theatre following its opening in Germany. Except for being a one-act play, Dumb Waiter shares much with Birthday Party, especially a pervasive tone of menace and ambiguity. The play revolves around Gus and Ben, two men waiting in a small room; the sole feature of interest in the colorless chamber is a dumb waiter in one wall. Parallels with McCann and Goldberg are obvious, and the two forbidding men are revealed as criminal types, probably hit men on a "job." Little overt action occurs, the chief interest being centered on the distinctions between the two hoodlums. Ben is the no-nonsense leader who receives cryptic messages conveyed through the dumb waiter. The dumb waiter apparatus ultimately becomes catalyst in a life-and-death situation. Gus is less experienced, vulnerable, and nervous about the job ahead. His relative innocence may represent our own discomfort when kept in the dark.

The play features dialogue between the two reflecting their uncertainty about what is expected of them. The answer gradually is divulged to Ben via the dumb waiter that serves as metaphoric messenger from a mysterious, unseen boss. Ironical humor arises when several messages strongly suggest the room once served as a restaurant kitchen where food orders were received. Meanwhile, the audience tries to grasp the significance of the proceedings. Pinter's works typically project an air of uncertainty and puzzlement with spectators drawn into mind games. The goal is to solve the riddle in each play.

Pinter's powerful play THE CARETAKER (1960) opened in London where it enjoyed a run of over 425 performances. It proved to be Pinter's first genuine hit and soon was produced in numerous countries, including the United States. Additionally, it earned prestigious awards for best drama in the United States (i.e., Page One Award of the Newspaper Guild of New York), suggesting that Pinter's specific blend of ambiguous plot, inarticulate speech, and dark menace no longer baffled and irritated audiences. The Caretaker was written using naturalistic techniques, though the transparency of the format did not carry over into a clarity of meaning. As in many of Pinter's works, possession of a house or room plays a key role in The Caretaker. The beginning point of the story are two brothers, Aston and a younger sibling Mick, who become rivals in winning the support of the down-and-out old Davies whom Aston has saved from a street brawl. Upon bringing Davies to the brothers' home, Aston invites the tramp to stay with them and become caretaker. Mick at first is repulsed by the shabby intruder but reverses course and plays up to Davies, also asking him to stay on.

Ambiguity reigns in The Caretaker. Davies clearly is eager to remain in the room furnished him by the brothers, but his identity comes into question. To authenticate who he is, Davies would need to leave the room, with the probability that once gone from the room he would not be permitted back in. Davies's description of himself as cultured is belied by his being smelly and unclean. Aston's seeming kind and benign personality, meanwhile, is thrown into question when he admits having received shock treatments in a psychiatric clinic. Does Aston's confession therefore mean everything he says is false or unreliable? Accepting Aston's declaration at face value, Davies turns his back on Aston, thinking himself superior to anyone who is mentally deficient. Davies then directs his attention to the other brother, only to have Mick reject him. Davies's fatal miscalculation leads to his being exiled from the home he covets.

From one perspective, the brothers' actions appear as an act meant to deliberately mislead the "victim." According to such a view, Pinter consciously plays on his characters'—and audiences'—expectations. The raw truth of the situation is never made clear, and conceivably the brothers are nasty tricksters who waylay gullible strangers. A multiple interpretation of events becomes the prudent approach when dealing with Pinter's dramatic calculus. Paradoxically, in a program note prepared for The Dumb Waiter a month before the opening of The Caretaker, Pinter wrote, "The desire for verification is understandable, but cannot always be satisfied." This play reverberates with countless potential meanings.

By 1962, Pinter was co-directing his latest hit drama The Collection in London with the exciting new director Peter Hall. Pinter's association with Hall climaxed in 1965 when Hall singly directed a first-rate West End production of THE HOMECOMING. Pinter's career seemed at its zenith. The Homecoming combined in a single package nearly all of Pinter's greatest strengths. Already winner of various British awards, The Homecoming production transferring to Broadway earned six 1967 Tony nominations. Among the four actual winners were one for Best Play (Pinter) and one for Best Direction (Peter Hall). A splendidly made filmed version also appeared.

As with most of the works by Pinter, Homecoming offers strong elements of undesigned threats, ambiguity regarding past events, and controversial power struggles—all taking place in a single-room setting with minimal physical action. Dialogue often is opaque, and pauses relate as much information as words. The story is deceptively simple at the surface. Teddy, an English émigré, teaching philosophy at an American college, returns with his English-born wife Ruth to his modest family home in suburban London. Living there are Ted's crusty old father Max (a retired butcher), his benevolent uncle Sam (a chauffeur), and his two brothers Lennie (apparently a pimp) and Joey (part-time boxer). Teddy and his wife are received calmly by his family, odd considering he has been away for six years. Each man living in the house plays a distinct role in the male hierarchy ostensibly ruled over by Max, the tyrannical patriarch. However, the others pay him minimal attention as he harangues and bullies. Lennie displays sly intelligence and evidently is quite successful living off his ladies. Joey trains regularly for a prize fight that will never take place. The full-length play chronicles Ruth's gradual ascension up the family's power network until she takes total command by story's end. Her trump card is serving as the men's sexual companion as well as potentially becoming their profitable whore.

Not all audiences of The Homecoming were amused or entertained. The unexpected and scarcely explained actions in the work were less a problem than the absence of expected moral values. All spectators nonetheless feel the dynamics of a momentous power struggle underlying the drama. Sex and power combine forcefully in Homecoming, making it hard to forget once viewed in the theater.

A new play by Pinter appeared nearly each year during the 1960s, firmly planting him among the era's most popular writers for the stage. His playwriting continued in the 1970s but at an increasingly slower pace. No Man's Land (1975) returned Pinter to the spotlight, followed by his hit BETRAYAL, opening in 1978 at the National Theatre where Pinter had been an associate director. Some familiar stylistic techniques are found here but also a novel structure that proved ideal for expressing a story of marital infidelity. In Betrayal, the playwright turns chronology on its head, starting with the action's conclusion, then staging scenes progressively backward in time. Thus at the play's beginning, two husbands—once best of friends—sit talking about their present lives. From their conversation we learn that Jerry had been unfaithful to Judith with Robert's wife Emma. Succeeding scenes trace events backward chronologically through several stages, back to the play's final scene that depicts when, years earlier, Jerry and Emma first decided to get together and began deceiving their respective spouses.

Sardonic humor occasionally filters through the play, because the mistreated spouse already had discovered the adultery before the guilty parties confessed to it. Power plays arise as in Pinter's other works, but the ultimate discovery is cautionary: one might not have the exclusive knowledge—hence power—one thinks he has. On several occasions a character is surprised to learn he or she was the last to "know" the facts. Solving the riddle of what is "true" is the play's greatest pleasure, rather than wrestling with metaphysical considerations. Parenthetically, Pinter has admitted to biographers that certain incidents in Betrayal parallel his personal life and led to his divorce from Vivien Merchant.

After Betrayal Pinter wrote no new full-length stage work until Moonlight (1993), Ashes to Ashes (1996), and Celebration (1999). Many of his shorter pieces during the 1980s and early 1990s, as previously noted, reflected urgent political themes then preoccupying him. Pinter's recent health issues make future writing projects uncertain. The appearance of fewer new plays from Pinter to date has not meant reduced activity on his part, however. During the decades of the 1980s and 1990s he pursued careers in acting and DIRECTING while also writing scripts—just as he had as early as the 1960s. As a repertory stage performer before success caught up with him in the 1950s, Pinter toured the English countryside in acting troupes. Once his playwriting career was secure, he acted in and/or directed some of his own works. For example, he acted Mick in The Caretaker (1960), Lenny in Homecoming (1969), Deeley in Old Times (1985), Hirst in No Man's Land (1992–1993), Roote in The House (1995), Harry in The Collection (1997, 1998), and Nicolas in One for the Road (2001). Pinter also made time for performing in films and television dramas, evidencing another facet of his professional life. Among his films are The Servant (1964), Accident (1966), Turtle Diary (1985), Mojo (1997), Mansfield Park (1998), and The Tailor of Panama (2000).

He has performed in many television plays, such as in his own A Night Out (1960), The Basement (1967), and The Birthday Party (1987), as well as in JEAN-PAUL SARTRE's No Exit (Huis Clos, 1965), Rogue Male (1967), Langrishe, Go Down (1978), Breaking the Code (1997), Samuel Beckett's Catastrophe (2000), and Wit (2000). Moreover, Pinter worked in radio beginning as a youth in the early 1950s and has altogether broadcast at least fifteen programs, including readings from his own plays.

But it is with screenwriting that Pinter most parallels his theater endeavors. Most of his acclaimed film scripts are adaptations of major literary works, including his own. The list of Pinter's movie-writing credits is long and impressive. The best known include his own The Caretaker (1962), The Pumpkin Eater (1963), his The Servant (1963), The Quiller Memorandum (1965), Accident (1966), his The Birthday Party (1967), The Go-Between (1969), his The Homecoming (1969), The Last Tycoon (1974), The French Lieutenant's Woman (1980), his Betrayal (1981), Turtle Diary (1984), The Heat of the Day (1988), and The Trial (1989). Viewers of these movies will instantly recognize how much the films benefit from Pinter's strong scripts.

Playgoers familiar with Beckett's plays built on existentialist premises perceive absurdist elements in Pinter's dramas. Martin Esslin's Theatre of the Absurd opened the way for later artistic generations to portray a contemporary world functioning with different assumptions than previously. Values no longer stand unchallenged, and truth no longer is self-evident. Enfeebled language rarely delivers a crystalline message now, leaving the discovery and transmission of "truth" all the more problematic without articulate dialectics. Pinter utilizes absurdist devices—such as omitting crucial information from the plot line—but also has evolved a personal style. Often we term an opaque situation "Pinteresque" in honor of the lack of certitude in his plays. In 1960 program notes, he wrote: "A character on the stage who can present no convincing argument or information as to his past experience, his present behavior or his aspirations, nor give a comprehensive analysis of his motives is as legitimate and as worthy of attention as one who, alarmingly, can do all these things." As for dialogue, Pinter's creed is conveyed in the same program notes: "The more acute the experience, the less articulate its expression." Pauses and silences in dialogue must—and do—convey needed meaning.

Pinter thrusts us into the world of ambiguity conjured in his plays. It is a system where nothing is absolutely true or absolutely false. Menace and mysterious unknowns dominate. Surprises lurk at every turn, and precise comprehension is impossible because no articulate communication is possible. Pinter portrays the world today—as he sees it. Whether called "Pinteresque" or not, we recognize it as our world as well.

SELECT PLAYS: The Room (1957); The Birthday Party (1958); The Hothouse (1958); A Slight Ache (1958); The Dumb Waiter (1959); A Night Out (1959); The Caretaker (1960); The Dwarfs (1960); Night School (1960); The Collection (1961); The Lover (1962); The Homecoming (1964); Tea Party (1964); The Basement (1966); Landscape (1967); Silence (1968); Old Times (1971); No Man's Land (1975); Betrayal (1978); A Kind of Alaska (1982); One for the Road (1984); Mountain Language (1988); The New World Order (1991); Party Time (1991); Moonlight (1993); Ashes to Ashes (1996); Celebration (1999)

FURTHER READING

- Billington, Michael. The Life and Work of Harold Pinter. London: Faber, 1996.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Harold Pinter. Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
- Demastes, William W., ed. British Playwrights, 1956–1995: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- Dukore, Bernard F. Harold Pinter. Modern Dramatists Series. New York: Grove, 1982.
- Innes, Christopher. Modern British Drama: The Twentieth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2002.
- Raby, Peter, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Harold Pinter. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2001.

C. J. Gianakaris

PIRANDELLO, LUIGI (1867–1936)

While Luigi Pirandello is certainly among the most studied of 20th-century Italian authors, he remains mysterious and strangely distant, inviting ever more investigation and interpretation. Both his life—divided between the centuries of candlelight and electricity—and his varied texts—literary, theatrical, essays, and personal (letters, confessions, memoirs)—continue to provide a seemingly inexhaustible source for widely different readings by successive generations of readers.

Pirandello was born on June 28, 1867, in a country house known as Il Caos (Chaos), between Sicily's Porto Empedocle and Girgenti (renamed Agrigento by the fascist government in 1927). He was the second of five children.

Though raised in a rural environment defined by his father's occupation as a sulfur miner, with the help of his mother, who understood him completely, Luigi was able to pursue a higher education. He enrolled him in an accounting school and then moved to Palermo to pursue humanistic studies. Later Luigi studied at the University of Rome, then earned his degree in philology (on the dialect of Agrigento) in 1891 in Bonn, GERMANY, where he stayed on for another year as lecturer. During these years Pirandello published several volumes of poetry.

Concerns about his health led him to return to ITALY at the end of 1892. Settling in Rome, he wrote for newspapers and journals while working on his first novel (1901), L'esclusa (The Outcast), published serially in 1901 in the daily paper La tribuna. Already in 1894 he had published a collection of short stories titled Amori senza amore (Loves Without Love); the same year he married Antonietta Portulano, the daughter of his father's business partner. He received a teaching appointment in Italian literature at the University of Rome. Several years of peaceful tranquility came to an end with the birth of his third son, Fausto, in 1899, and his wife's nervous breakdown.

Due to Antonietta's illness and the chaotic family situation, to supplement his small teaching stipend Pirandello worked as a private literature tutor, publishing small works here and there; among these his second novel, The Late Mattia Pascal, was published between April and June 1904 and again as a serial in the journal Nuova Antologia, a work that strongly influenced 20th-century Italian narrative. During this time he published several short-story collections, and in 1908 he published two volumes of essays, Arte e scienza (Art and Science) and L'umorismo (The Humor), which articulated the poetic and aesthetic principles of his narrative and theater. Because the short stories sketch out, almost photographically, small vignettes of life, Pirandello thought to translate these photographs into the medium of theater, a more effective mirror of real life. On December 9, 1910, his career as a playwright began: at Rome's Teatro Metastasio two of his one-act plays were performed—one, The Vise (La morsa), written in 1898 and titled The Epilogue (L'epilogo), that was based on his short story "The Fear" (La paura), the other, Limes from Sicily (Lumie di Sicilia), adapted from a short story of the same name. Thereafter he dedicated ever more energy to this new genre, and a strong sign of growing recognition of his dramatic skills came in Milan, on April 19, 1915, when MARCO PRAGA's theater company presented his play If Not So (Se non così) at the Teatro Manzoni. For such a prestigious director to stage this new playwright's play was a great honor. Meanwhile he continued to write novels.

The World War I years were very difficult for Pirandello, because both of his sons, Fausto and Stefano, were soldiers, and the latter was captured and taken prisoner early in the war. This contributed to Antonietta's still deteriorating mental state and in 1919 she was committed to an asylum. Also, Pirandello's mother passed away around this time. Amid these personal crises and sorrows, Pirandello's success in the theater grew as more and more of his works were performed by well-known actors. He wrote many plays in these years: in 1913, The Doctor's Duty (Il dovere del medico); in 1916, Think It Over, Giacomino! (Pensaci, Giacomino) and Liola; in 1917, The Jar (La giara), RIGHT YOU ARE (If You Think You Are) (Così è se vi pare) and The Pleasure of Honesty (Il piacere dell'onestà); and in 1918, This Time It Will Be Different (Ma non è una cosa seria) and The Rules of the Game (Il giuoco delle parti). By the end of the war, Pirandello had definitively moved into the forefront of modern theater both in Italy (Grafted [Linnezzo] and Man, Beast and Virtue [L'uomo, la bestia e la virtù]) in 1919; All for the Best [Tutto per bene], As Before, Better than Before [Come prima, meglio di prima], Chee-Chee [Cecè], and Mrs. Morli, One and Two [La Signora morli, una e due] in 1920) and abroad, especially after the opening of SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR (Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore) 1921.

But Pirandello's career as a playwright could be conflicted at times. Alongside enthusiastic supporters, both the public and critics were often hostile to his works, as they introduced controversial novelties in conflict with conventional practices in the theater. Reactions after Six Characters, in Rome in 1921, were indicative: public outcry against the play and its author was so vehement that Pirandello had to remain backstage and could only leave the theater by a backdoor after everyone else had left. With Six Characters, Pirandello gained a name as an important figure in contemporary theater both in Italy and in the wider European world. He had begun to portray on stage the "uneasiness" of representation, dramatizing tensions between the text, the characters, and their author. These metatheatrical developments, in many ways revolutionary, continued to occupy Pirandello for the rest of his career. In 1922, Henry IV (Enrico IV) and Clothe the Naked (Vestire dli ignudi) were performed; in 1923, The Man with the Flower in His Mouth (L'uomo dal fiore in bocca) and The Life I Gave You (La vita che ti diedi); and in 1924, Each in His Own Way (Ciascuno a suo modo).

In 1923 Pirandello began to travel abroad, to follow and oversee various productions of his plays, and in 1924 a "Pirandello Season" was produced on Broadway. Then in 1925 he accepted the opportunity to found and direct the Teatro d'Arte di Roma, which sought to promote young and promising playwrights. This position brought him closer to the world and daily lives of actors, giving him a privileged glimpse into and understanding of actors and their experiences. The Teatro d'Arte was also the magical place where Pirandello met Marta Abba, a young Milanese woman who became the company's star actress and with whom the writer would develop an intense and affectionate relationship. After a long period of pain and unhappiness in his marriage and family life, Marta Abba appeared and erased his past. Suddenly, with her youthful presence, she brightened the unhappy life of the writer. In time she would grow into a kind of obsession of his, which exercised a profound influence on his later works. With Marta Abba the female characters in his plays acquired a new, more definite profile and an unmistakable voice, creating the new woman of Pirandellian theater. Before Marta Abba his female characters tended to be diffuse, secondary figures in dramas written largely for male leading roles. These stage women, oppressed by confusions and incapable of finding their own identities, seem inspired by Pirandello's experience with his wife. With Marta Abba the female character becomes the protagonist and is at last capable of dominating the stage in her own right, giving dramatic expression to the conflict between life and form (see below). One can see this total fusion of writer and actress in Diana and Tuda (Diana e la Tuda, 1926), The New Colony (La nuova colonia, 1928), and in As You Desire Me (Come tu mi vuoi, 1930), the play that fits Marta Abba probably better than any other work Pirandello wrote for her. As You Desire Me remains even today the most unforgettable example of creative collaboration between a playwright and a performer.

In 1924, after the assassination of socialist leader Giacomo Matteotti, Pirandello joined the Fascist Party, a common enough move of self-preservation for intellectuals in the confusion of the times, but by 1927 Pirandello began to question the decision, and he considered moving elsewhere.

During that three-year period the Teatro d'Arte took Pirandello as a director around the world (touring Europe and South America, provoking everywhere both enthusiasm and criticism), accompanied by Marta Abba. For some time, however, the company's finances had been precarious due to bad administration, and on its return from South America to Italy, collapsing under the weight of debts, it attempted a comeback in November 1927. After the last performances, in Viareggio in August 1928, the Teatro d'Arte company foundered. Pirandello, disillusioned and exhausted, but always eager to begin again, decided to move to Germany, and Marta Abba and her sister Cele went with him.

Though busy with many international duties, his creative activity continued. In 1926 he published the novel Uno, nessuno e centomila (One, None, and One Hundred Thousand). In 1928–1929, in Berlin, he wrote Belonging to One or No One (O di uno o di nessuno) and TONIGHT WE IMPROVISE (Questa sera si recita soggetto), performed in German at Königsberg in 1930, and soon after in Berlin, Lazarus (Lazzaro, performed in 1929 first in ENGLAND, then in Turin), and for Marta Abba—who by March 1929 had returned to Italy—As You Desire Me, which she inaugurated with great success on February 18, 1930, at Milan's Filodrammatici Theater. However, in the Hollywood film version of As You Desire Me made two years later, Marta Abba was replaced by a bigger name: Greta Garbo. That same year Tonight We Improvise premiered in Germany and Italy. Pirandello also began working on The Mountain Giants (I giganti della montagna), the play that would occupy him until the end of his life, ultimately remaining unfinished. His last few plays include To Find One-self (Trovarsi, 1932), written for Marta Abba; When You Are Somebody (Quando si è Qualcuno, 1933); The Fable of the Changeling (La favola del figlio cambiato, 1934); One Doesn't Know How (Non si sa come, 1935); and Dream, But Maybe Not (Sogno ma forse no, 1936).

All this literary activity brought him much honorific recognition, including his election to the Accademia d'Italia (1929), and most notably, on December 10, 1934, he received the Nobel Prize for Literature. On December 10 of that year, ill with pneumonia, he died at his house in Rome while working on his last play, The Mountain Giants. For his funeral Pirandello left precise instructions requesting an inconspicuous private ceremony:

1) My death should pass in silence. From my friends and enemies, the courtesy not to publicize it in the newspapers, not even the slightest reference. No obituary, no announcements. 2) Once dead, I should not be dressed. Wrap me naked in a sheet. No flowers on the bed. No candles lit. 3) A carriage of the lowest class, that of paupers. Naked. No one is to accompany me, neither relatives nor friends. A carriage, a horse, and a coachman—it's sufficient. 4) Burn me. And my body, once turned to dust, let it be dispersed so that nothing, not even my ashes, will remain. But if this cannot be done, the urn should be brought to Sicily and interred in a rough stone in the countryside of Girgenti where I was born.

These last requests, it would seem, were a dismissive gesture to reigning social conventions in Italy; but it was also something of an implicit criticism of the fascist regime, which Pirandello knew would try to exploit the memorial of his death for its own propagandistic purposes.

From these last requests one can surmise that Pirandello, in his life's conclusion as in his works, wished to convey the message of a life lived without a mask, without concealment, revealing instead its "naked" truth. It is from this perspective that one best approaches his written works as well, beginning with his essays, where Pirandello articulates in theory his vision of life and its representation in writing or on the stage. For central to all his work in different genres is his preoccupation with character, both as a literary or aesthetic fiction and as a problematic psychological entity.

ESSAYS

Early on Pirandello undertook theoretical investigations on fundamental problems of aesthetics and personality. These eventually served as a basis for his theatrical imagination. In essays published in the 1890s the young Pirandello dealt with problems of science and especially psychology. In Arte e coscienze d'oggi (Art and Consciences Today, 1893) he expresses his interest in Max Nordau's theories, as discussed in his two best-known books Conventional Lies of Society (1883) and Degeneration (1892), on contemporary moral crises. He attributes some responsibility for humanity's bewilderment to science, which had undermined many traditional points of reference and destabilized conventional measures of value. RELIGION, too, had become largely incapable of answering pressing questions of conscience. This inadequacy is conveyed in his conclusion that certain knowledge about life is no longer possible, only impressions "mutable and various."

In 1900 Pirandello published Scienza e critica estetica (Science and Aesthetic Criticism; later expanded and reissued in 1908 as Arte e scienza [Art and Science]), where he discusses the work of psychologist Alfred Binet, Les altérations de la personnalité (Deteriorations of the Personality, 1892), which constituted the basis of a subjective and relativistic mode of knowledge, the direction in which Pirandello's thought was moving. In Binet he finds a concept of the psyche congenial to his view as a dramatic artist: the dissolution of a stable ego image, and the coexistence of and conflict between multiple personalities. Pirandello also found in Binet scientific explanations of that unconscious part of the ego, described as a seat of dark and covert desires, of irrational and instinctive impulses, that unconscious that Sigmund Freud too was exploring in those years. But Binet's theories were enough to fuel Pirandello's own explorations of the kinds of identity crises that random turns of events might provoke. His dramatic plots often hinge on just such scenarios of personality disruption.

In his essay On Humor, Pirandello emphasizes the reflexive component, that pause for reflection that intervenes in the genesis of art, explaining how humor brings into art the problem of existence. He observes that if art is ordinarily created in a harmonious form, so that thought conceals itself within the conception of any comic work, reflection serves to analyze and distill perceptions, and this secondary thought process will generate another impression that Pirandello called the "sense of the opposite" (sentimento del contrario). To render his idea more concrete, Pirandello sketched a famous example of an elderly woman:

I see an old lady whose hair is dyed and completely smeared with some kind of horrible ointment; she is all made-up in a clumsy and awkward fashion and is all dolled-up like a young girl. I begin to laugh. I perceive that she is the opposite of what a respectable old lady should be. Now I could stop here at this initial and superficial comic reaction: the comic consists precisely of this perception of the opposite. But if, at this point, reflection intervenes to suggest that perhaps this old lady finds no pleasure in dressing up like an exotic parrot, and that perhaps she is distressed by it and does it only because she pitifully deceives herself into believing that, by making herself up like that and by concealing her wrinkles and gray hair, she may be able to hold the love of her much younger husband—if reflection comes to suggest all this, then I can no longer laugh at her as I did at first, exactly because the inner working of reflection has made me go beyond, or rather enter deeper into, the initial stage of awareness: from the beginning perception of the opposite, reflection has made me shift to a sense of the opposite. And herein lies the precise difference between the comic and humor. (Pirandello, 1974).

Reflection, then, functions to divide up the various images of perception, every appearance of reality, every form that like a living prison inside each person distances them from an authentic existence and constrains them to mask themselves behind false identities. Following Binet, Pirandello describes the personality as a dynamic equilibrium, a constant oscillation between opposing poles, a struggle among the hopes, forebodings, memories, and perceptions that tend to dominate the personality, in other words, a dichotomy between "life" and "form." Life is that continual flux people are always trying to stop, to fix in definite forms (concepts, ideas, conditions) in a constant effort to make things coherent and stable. But inside human beings, life's flux continues, formless and undivided, transcending the limits we impose on it to construct a personality. The art of humor searches for the true causes of our behavior, beyond social pretensions, beyond the reasons we provide, which are not as logical as they may often appear. "There are in man four, five souls struggling amongst themselves." It is the task of the humorist, then, to divide out one's fragmentary internal characters into their separate parts and highlight the contradictions among them. On the stage these fragments of personality might become distinct characters, and their interactions, relations, and conflicts the dramatic action itself.

Despite so much dramatization of abstract philosophical theories, Pirandello's interest focuses mainly on the existential crisis of contemporary humanity, deprived of values and reference points to guide them in a chaotic and fragmented world. For this reason also, social life, from a humoristic-relativistic perspective, is always the site of inauthentic existence that conceals and defends itself with lies. From this one may conclude that individuals, in relationship with others, dissimulate and perform roles, or close themselves off either out of ineptitude or out of a need for reassurance or simply out of a desire to be left alone in whatever crystallized form others project upon them. At this point any unpredictable event might cause this form to explode, an eruptive manifestation of the real life that lies beyond the prison of forms and roles that we put on and perform. Many of Pirandello's characters suffer this sort of traumatic experience, and after realizing with pain and surprise the fragmentation of their personality, the characters attain a relativism that refracts into innumerable images, corresponding to and determined by others' perceptions and judgments, which before had led to the loss of identity.

The persisting idea, then, that animates all his works—novels, short stories, and plays—is the drama of inner torments common to the human condition. In particular, it was problems of personality that he continually studied and represented in all its aspects, especially its social dimensions.

NOVELS

For reasons just discussed, Pirandello's novels often explore similar themes as in his short stories and plays. His novels' characters, in fact, often seem to exist in a world that is already a grotesque masquerade of "real" life. His first novel, The Outcast, written in 1893–1894 and originally titled Marta Ajala, is a dramatic story about a woman cast out of her family after her husband accuses her unjustly of an extramarital affair. Her eventual reacceptance in her family is fraught with irony, however, because by this time she has committed the very sin she was originally accused of. Il Turno (The Turn, 1895), his second novel, has many humorous touches, and the rules of life are fragmented by unexpected and fortuitous events. His early masterpiece followed, The Late Mattia Pascal (1904), the first work to give Pirandello some recognition abroad. It deals with the “double” of a man, Mattia Pascal, whom people believe is dead (therefore “late”) but who becomes for awhile Adriano Meis. Here Pirandello’s concept of the “sense of the contrary,” defined in his essay On Humor, seems to have its first creative incarnation. The Old and the Young, published between January and November 1909 in the periodical Rassegna Contemporanea, Pirandello described as a “novel of Sicily after 1870, very bitter and crowded, which contains the drama of my generation.” A historical novel of sorts, it deals with the events of the Fasci siciliani, the birth of labor unions and the Banca Romana scandal. The writer describes the dissolution—and disillusion—of the Risorgimento and the disappointments of the young intellectuals who believed in the new socialist movement.

This historical scene is then replaced by the satirical atmosphere of Rome’s literary society described in Her Husband (1911). Pirandello had to remove the book from circulation to appease the writer Grazie Deledda, who recognized herself in the novel’s main character, Silvia Roncella, a strong woman who upends conventional family roles by dominating her husband Giustino Boggio. An unfinished revised version was published posthumously under the sarcastically upside-down title Giustino Roncella, “Maiden Name” Boggio. In Action! Pirandello introduces the theme of moviemaking (published in the Nuova Antologia in June–August 1915 and reissued ten years later as The Notebooks of Serafino Gubbio, Cameraman). Here Pirandello represents the mounting crisis of modern man in relation to the technological apparatus that allows the main character, a cameraman for Kosmograph studios, to see through the camera’s lens the fragmentation of human beings, the consequent estrangement of humankind from natural feelings and behavior, which in the end annuls his very being. For professional reasons, Serafino Gubbio comes to identify himself with the hand that turns the movie camera’s crank: he views himself as merely a part of the motion picture camera. But in the act of telling his story he recuperates his humanity and destroys the unfeeling mechanism that before had trapped him. Serafino Gubbio was an important early literary response to the new artistic and technological mode of cinematic representation, which seemed to transform theatrical productions into mass-produced market commodities.

Returning to themes and formal elements from Mattia Pascal, in 1925–1926 Pirandello published in La Fiera letteraria the novel Uno, nessuno e centomila (One, Nobody and One Hundred Thousand). Like the earlier work, it explores ideas about the doubling, even the multiplication, of identity. Here doubling extends to the dissociation of being and appearance for the protagonist Gengè, who realizes that everyone perceives him in their own way, not just in external aspects of appearance, but also that each person has a distinct idea of his character and personality. Hence the title: each person is not “one” but “one hundred thousand” and therefore “nobody.” (As Gengè says at one point: “I believe I am, I delude myself that I am one. Instead, I am nobody: for those who see me, I am one hundred thousand, because I appear different in the perceptions of each.”) Therefore he conceives the desire to destroy all the false images that other have constructed of him, in order to search for an authentic self concealed in the many masks and “forms” that falsify his true self. The novel’s genesis was long and complex. Already in 1922 Pirandello, announcing its imminent publication, suggested an intimate relationship between this new novel and his plays: “This novel should have been the preface to my theatrical works; instead it will be an epilogue.” Indeed, he had begun the work much earlier, but his novels had been sidelined in intervening years as theater increasingly occupied his time and energy.

SHORT STORIES

Unlike the longer, more time-consuming novel, the short-story form was a creative outlet for his many ideas, and Pirandello turned to it readily throughout his career, especially as a means for sketching out ideas for the theater. Although critical attention to his short stories has often been overshadowed by greater interest in his plays, it would be unfair to count these among his minor works. In fact, many consider Pirandello a genius of the short story, for his originality, inventiveness, acute introspection, and analysis of characters who often occupy lower social strata: busy officeworkers, petty clerks, corrupt and corrupting lawyers, restless small-time businessmen, small crowds tormented by little problems that make their lives unbearable. They are often like sketch COMEDIES of everyday life, even comedies of errors. Pirandello has with some reason been compared to William Shakespeare for his perceptive representation of quotidian affairs. His characters are men and women incapable of adjusting to reality because their fixations on specific ideas or notions render them unable to follow the continual flux of their lives. Pirandello’s master plan was to write 365 short stories, one for each day of the year. Thus the stories are collected under the title Novelle per un anno (Novels for a Year). But this plan was never achieved—there are only 245—again on account of the overwhelming activity in the theater. Nevertheless, critics have expressed great admiration for his short stories, ranking him among other great artists of the genre, like ANTON CHEKHOV and concluded that he thought of human identity as the product of perception and circumstance. Like mirrors, people reflect the world around them. Pirandello’s life and his art symbolize the struggle between one’s true self and the selves society imposes. The intensity of their representations display his great talent for sketching rich pictures of life in rapid, urgent and vital dialogues between characters oppressed by adverse destinies from which they cannot escape and against which they are powerless. Nor do their comic aspects avoid caricature and the grotesque. In all this, Pirandello’s own experience, which he dissected, subjected to scrutiny, and continually recomposed into different configurations, scenarios, and situations, was critical. Indeed, even before he wrote plays, it was in short stories that Pirandello plumbed the depths of human character, behavior, its rationalizations, and underlying motives. And in moving from prose fiction to dramatic forms, Pirandello often drew ideas first sketched out in his short stories in order to shape his dramas that scrutinize the semblances of reality, casting them into relativity, diffracting it into its constituent parts.

THEATER

To understand Pirandello, one must remember of his career that Pirandello has been identified as an “intellectual” playwright, more interested in ideas than in people, more concerned with abstractions than with their applicability to particular situations. His characters are often attacked for being either puppets manipulated for his own ends or abstractions lacking flesh and blood. The character given the most abstract speeches in any play is usually identified as a raisonneur figure (the director), created to represent the playwright’s viewpoint and to expound his philosophy.

Pirandello’s plays do explore such complex issues as the multiplicity of human personality, the relativity of truth, and the difficulty—if not impossibility—of establishing boundaries between reality and illusion. The focus, however, is usually on the characters’ interactions with these concepts, their struggles to deal with the effects such ideas have on their lives. As Pirandello himself wrote, “My works are born from living images, which are the perennial source of art; but these images pass through a filter of concepts that have taken hold of me. Without a doubt no work of art is ever a concept trying to express itself through images; on the contrary, it is an image, often one of life’s most vivid images, that, nourishing itself in the travails of my spirit, assumes by itself, for the sole legitimate consistency of the work of art, a universal value.” Ideas do not exist in a vacuum for Pirandello, and any attempt to discuss his philosophy at a remove from those characters, treating them as symbols or puppets and not people, risks grave distortion of his work. Pirandello himself, in 1935, a year after winning the Nobel Prize and a year before his death, wrote the following evaluation of his critics: “The world of international literary criticism has been crowded for a long time with numerous Pirandellos—lame, deformed, all head and no heart, gruff, insane and obscure—in whom, no matter how hard I try, I cannot recognize myself, not even in the slightest degree.”

The theater was the perfect medium for Pirandello’s artistic expression, for what better place to deal with illusion, pretense, and role-playing than where actors assume a role for an audience that accepts them as characters and yet is also aware of their existence as actors? Pirandello realizes that a character’s theatricality need not be unexamined or unconscious, that it can be used by its possessor for certain ends. He uses the theater self-consciously in the same way, to examine itself and its relationship to life. Just as the masks and illusions of life need to be examined, with the assistance of the humorist who probes beneath their surfaces, so in the same way the theater, both the mirror of human actions and the source of what it sometimes reflects, must be examined as it is being used to communicate insights into the human activities it imitates. Thus in the plays usually referred to as his theater trilogy—Six Characters in Search of an Author, Each in His Own Way, and Tonight We Improvise—Pirandello pushes theater into modernism by exploring theatrical process and its relationship to the world it mirrors. Although not composed as a trilogy in the usual sense, with continuity of either chronology or plot and character, the three plays form a unity because each is set in the theater and takes theatrical experience as its subject matter and its major metaphor for the author’s vision of life.

All three of the theater trilogy plays break through the imaginary “fourth wall” of realistic theater in an attempt to destroy the barrier between auditorium and stage. Although all three include many common dramatic figures, the focus of each work is on one of the three essential components of the process: Six Characters emphasizes the subject matter, the characters whose script is dramatized onstage; Each in His Own Way, the audience that views the theatrical performance; and Tonight We Improvise, the actors who interpret the script and bring it to life for the audience. Despite this difference in perspective for each play, the trilogy as a whole becomes an examination of the relationship between theater and life, their interdependence and interpenetration.

In particular, with Six Characters, still his best-known play, Pirandello made a sharp break with his previous work, initiating a revolutionary turn in theater. It opened the window between the stage and audience and eliminated many familiar theatrical trappings. Between 1921, when Six Characters premiered, and 1925 the author subjected the play’s text to four different revisions. Most important, in 1924 Pirandello added a Preface, conceived in a polemical spirit and aimed in part at his critics, as a self-defense and counterargument, and in part at his audience, who had refused to understand his art. The Preface now assumes a capital importance. As the key to penetrating the complex Pirandellian world, it is a sure aid to interpreting not only the play that the Preface discusses but also most of his work. In the first part of the Preface Pirandello discusses his theory of art; in the second he offers a critical interpretation of his play. For its general theoretical statements, the first part is most interesting. Pirandello, servant of “fantasia”—the inventive force—has to interpret what his imagination creates from a universal viewpoint. The imagination has an absolute value, autonomous and present in each author as nature spontaneously revealed.

“The mystery of artistic creation,” Pirandello writes, “is the same mystery as natural birth.” Nature is creative force, and an author is nothing other than a means through which nature labors and produces. An author has but two choices: either accept that nature works through the author as medium, so that the creation of art takes place, or refuse to provide a medium for nature, so that creation is renounced.

In the second part of the Preface Pirandello discusses a problem fundamental to Six Characters and to other plays of the same period: the conflict between “having form” and “being form.” All that “has form” is condemned to continual change, which ends up destroying that form. All that “is form” is immutable and eternal. Every work of art, every character born alive in the mind of an author and fixed in life by means of the word, is form. A character is static in form and never suffers change. A human being, a being who by nature “has form” and changes day by day, is forced to act in different ways. In the Six Characters the vision is twofold: the Father, like every other character, is form, but as a human symbol he rebels against the fixity of the form in which he feels himself bound. The father suffers from having been caught in a particular moment of his life and for being judged solely for this. In human affairs there cannot be fixity of form. Nevertheless, all of Pirandello’s characters are possessed of this dual force: as characters in themselves they are form—immutable and eternal—but as symbols of human beings they have form, often fighting against that form’s mutability.

These are some of the reasons why Pirandello is considered one of the foremost innovators in 20th-century theater. GEORGE BERNARD SHAW is said to have called the Six Characters the most original play ever written, and more than eighty years after its first performance in 1921, the play’s power to fascinate is undiminished.

In the author’s last creative period, beginning around 1928–1929, Pirandello entrusts his tortured investigations of truth to “myths,” as a last hope for coherence, even if illusory, in the face of the relentless fragmentation of forms. The rejection of the world of contingency, against which Pirandello had first reacted with irony and then with dramatic contempt, develops finally into a nostalgic aspiration to a mythic absolute that will generate a new form of fabulous and surrealistic theater. Again, also decisive for this period was his encounter with Marta Abba, the actress for whom he wrote Diana and Tuda, The Wives’ Friend (1927), and The New Colony. Works from this time are suffused with autobiography, reflecting his love for Marta Abba and displaying a depth of emotional expression not found in his earlier work. The New Colony is the first stage in his new “mythic theater,” in this case a utopian vision of love and basic human solidarity that leads a band of outlaws and a prostitute, La Spera, to take refuge on a deserted island, abandoned by its inhabitants because it might sink into the sea. This ideal community is doomed to fail when “the others” arrive on the island, that is, people already corrupted. An earthquake makes this fallen garden of Eden crumble into the sea, all except the tip of a rock, on which La Spera and her infant son take refuge; it rises up to bear witness to this first miracle of Pirandellian theater.

Society cannot be changed, and only the natural maternal instinct is allowed to survive the final cataclysm.

Pirandello confronts religious dilemmas in Lazarus (1929), the second “myth,” focusing on the fanatic asceticism that leads Diego Spina to sacrifice himself and his family. The presence of God, however, allows two miracles: Diego is hit by a car and dies but is resurrected thanks to an injection a doctor gives him; and the little daughter Lia, who is paralyzed, miraculously regains her ability to walk.

The third and last “myth,” The Mountain Giants, intended as a final artistic statement opposing artistic values to the spiritual coarseness of the world, would remain unfinished. In this work, many themes and motives gathered, some giving rise to separate plays, including As You Desire Me and The Fable of the Changeling. Three worlds stand opposed in the play: that of the Scalognati (“the Unfortunate”), isolated in a villa, at the will of the magician Cotrone (really a stage director who uses theatrical and cinematic devices learned from ERWIN PISCATOR and MAX REINHARDT), where the images of his imagination take shape; that of the Actors, who arrive at the villa with the first actress Ilse wanting to stage a play called The Fable of the Changeling (a sly reference to the author’s own work); and finally the world of the Giants, personifications of brutal reality who represent the builders of new industry, with huge muscles but hard and thoughtless minds. His eight years of correspondence with Marta Abba testify strongly to the many apprehensions and hopes wrapped up in this last drama, meant as a testament to the power of fantasy and poetry and to the TRAGEDY of art in a brutal modern world. The myth of The Mountain Giants was a constant companion through the vicissitudes in the relationship between writer and actress. In a sense, then, the final Marta, the truest Marta, is Ilse (the incarnation of the ultimate sacrifice of self to art) of The Mountain Giants, a work that was, by its very nature, unable to be finished, perhaps for reasons above and beyond the death of the author.

PLAYS: Limes from Sicily (Lumie di Sicilia, 1910); The Vise (La morsa, 1910); The Doctor’s Duty (Il dovere del medico, 1913); If Not So (Se non così, 1915); Think It Over, Giacomino! (Pensaci, Giacomino!, 1916); The Cap to Sonagli (Il berretto a sonagli, 1917); The Jar (La giara, 1917); Liola (1917); The Pleasure of Honesty (Il piacere dell’onestà, 1917); Right You Are (If You Think You Are) (Così è se vi pare, 1917); The Rules of the Game (Il giuoco delle parti, 1918); This Time It Will Be Different (Ma non è una cosa seria, 1918); Grafted (L’innesto, 1919); Man, Beast and Virtue (L’uomo, la bestia e la virtù, 1919); The Patent (La patente, 1919); All for the Best (Tutto per bene, 1920); As Before, Better than Before (Come prima, meglio di prima, 1920); Chee-Chee (Cecè, 1920); Mrs. Morli, One and Two (La Signora Morli, una e due, 1920); Six Characters in Search of an Author (Sei personaggi in cerca d’autore, 1921); At the Gate (All’uscita, 1922); Henry IV (Enrico IV, 1922); The Imbecile (L’imbecille, 1922); Clothe the naked (Vestire dli ignudi, 1923); The House with the Column (L’altro figlio, 1923); The Life I Gave You (La vita che ti diedi, 1923); The Man with the Flower in His Mouth (L'uomo dal fiore in bocca, 1923); Each in His Own Way (Ciascuno a suo modo, 1924); Our Lord of the Ship (Sagra del Signore della nave, 1925); Diana and Tuda (Diana e la Tuda, 1926); Bellavita (1927); The Wives' Friend (L'amica delle mogli, 1927); The New Colony (La nuova colonia, 1928); Scamandro (1928); Belonging to One or No One (O di uno o di nessuno, 1929); Lazarus (Lazzaro, 1929); As You Desire Me (Come tu mi vuoi, 1930); Tonight We Improvise (Questa sera si recita a soggetto, 1930); To Find Oneself (Trovarsi, 1932); The Fable of the Changeling (La favola del figlio cambiato, 1934); When You Are Somebody (Quando si è Qualcuno, 1934); One Doesn't Know How (Non si sa come, 1935); Dream, But Maybe Not (Sogno ma forse no, 1936); The Mountain Giants (I giganti della montagna, unfinished, 1936)

FURTHER READING

- Bassnett, Susan. Luigi Pirandello. New York: Macmillan, 1983.
- Biasin, Gian-Paolo, and Manuela Gieri, eds. Luigi Pirandello: Contemporary Perspectives. Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1999.
- Borsellino, Nino. Ritratti e immagini di Pirandello [Portraits and Images of Pirandello]. Rome: Laterza, 1991.
- Bragaglia, Leonardo. Interpreti pirandelliani [Pirandellian Performers]. Rome: Trevi, 1969.
- Büdel, Oscar. Pirandello. London: Bowes and Bowes, 1966.
- D'Amico, Alessandro, and Tinterri, Alessandro, eds. Pirandello capocomico [Pirandello, Leader of the Theater Company]. Palermo: Sellerio, 1987.
- DiGaetani, John Louis. A Companion to Pirandello Studies. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Giudice, Gaspare. Luigi Pirandello. Turin: UTET, 1963.
- Macchia, Giovanni. Pirandello o la stanza della tortura [Pirandello of the Tortured Characters]. Milan: Mondadori, 1981.
- Oliver, Roger W. Dreams of Passion: The Theater of Luigi Pirandello. New York: N.Y. Univ. Press, 1979.
- Pirandello, Luigi. On Humor. Tr. by A. Illiano and D. P. Testa. Chapel Hill: Univ. of North Carolina Press, 1974.
- Sogliuzzo, A. Richard. Luigi Pirandello, Director: The Playwright in the Theatre. New York: Scarecrow, 1982.
- Vicentini, Claudio. Il disagio del teatro [The Uneasiness of the Theatrical Performance]. Venice: Marsilio, 1993.

Pietro Frassica

PISCATOR, ERWIN (1893–1966)

Erwin Piscator pioneered the “epic” style of theater production, which in his particular case meant highly stylized and mechanized productions featuring wide-ranging social content and communist ideology. Piscator was born on December 17, 1893, in Ulm, GERMANY. After an internship at Munich's Hoftheater, he was drafted into the German army in 1915, serving two years in combat, a radicalizing experience that convinced him that the stage must serve as a platform for left-wing politics. He joined the German Communist Party in 1918 and in 1920 became a founding member of Berlin's Proletarian Theater.

In 1924 he was invited to direct at Berlin's Volksbühne, where he staged Alfons Paquet's (1881–1944) Flags (Fahnen), a play about labor agitation in Chicago. The first of Piscator's productions to be labeled “epic drama,” Flags used a revolving stage, presentational ACTING, characterization based on social stereotypes, and projections of scene titles, posters, and newspaper headlines to reveal the relationships between politics and economics that shape daily life. For Piscator the set “would symbolize the social order” (Braun, 1982). In the two years following the success of Flags, Piscator staged eleven productions including Paquet's Tidal Wave (Sturmflut, 1926), a revolutionary fantasy in which he incorporated motion pictures in the mise-en-scène for the first time. Later he adopted a device known as the Schicksalsbühne, or “stage of fate,” a glass platform lit from beneath that depersonalized the actors performing on it, turning them into projections of historical or social forces.

In 1927 Piscator left the Volksbühne and started his own company, the Piscator Bühne, which was to be housed in a new facility, the famous “Total Theater” designed by Walter Gropius (1883–1969). This project never materialized. Instead the Piscator Bühne was installed at Berlin's Theater am Nollendorfsplatz where, in 1928, Piscator staged ERNST TOLLER's Hoppla, Such Is Life! (Hoppla, wir leben!) and an adaptation of Max Brod (1884–1968) and Hans Reimann's (1889–1969) Adventures of the Good Soldier Schweik. The theater's “Dramaturgical Collective” included BERTOLT BRECHT, who collaborated on a number of productions, including the Schweik adaptation. Brecht would go on to incorporate many of Piscator's ideas in his own version of EPIC THEATER. The 1929 bankruptcy of the Piscator Bühne marked the end of the major phase of Piscator's career. Following a brief prison term on tax charges, he decamped to RUSSIA in 1931, staying until Joseph Stalin's campaign against “formalism” in the arts made it prudent to move elsewhere.

Piscator settled in New York in 1939, forming a Dramatic Workshop and a Studio Theater at the New School for Social Research. Among his American productions were adaptations of War and Peace (1942) and All the King's Men (1948). In 1951 he returned to Germany, becoming director of the Freie Volksbühne in West Berlin in 1962. Among the major accomplishments of his last years was the staging of DOCUMENTARY plays by HEINAR KIPPHARDT and PETER WEISS and his production of ROLF HOCHHUTH's The Deputy (Der Stellvertreter, 1963), which helped restore Piscator to prominence after a period of relative obscurity.

At the height of his career Piscator was a major figure of the cultural Left. His theater was an important asset to the Communist Party, attracting the attention of Berlin-based agents of Stalin who advised him on its affairs. He died on March 30, 1966, in Starnberg, West Germany.

FURTHER READING

- Braun, Edward. The Director and the Stage: From Naturalism to Grotowski. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1982.

Innes, C. D. Erwin Piscator's Political Theatre: The Development of Modern German Drama. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1972.

Piscator, Erwin. The Political Theatre. Tr. by Hugh Rorrison. New York: Avon Bks., 1978.

Martin Andrucki

PLATONOV

By scholarly convention, not authorial intention, Platonov (1878; also known as Fatherlessness and Play Without a Title), ANTON CHEKHOV's first large-scale drama, is named after its main protagonist. Found among the playwright's papers after his death, Platonov anticipates Chekhov's four major dramas but departs sharply from them in its structure and frequent theatrical clichés. The long, ungainly Platonov dwarfs the later plays and lacks the economy of Chekhov's best work. Nonetheless, Chekhov pinned high hopes on this apprentice piece and submitted it to the famous actress Maria Ermolova, hoping for a production at the Maly Theater. Ermolova rejected the play, and the playwright set Platonov aside. Its publication in 1923 came nearly twenty years after Chekhov's death.

In Platonov, Chekhov treats the breakdown of the old order for the first time in dramatic form. The confrontation between a vital, if uncultured, business class and a failing aristocracy is starker here than in the later work. Vengerovich and Bugrov, two businessmen, lack the moral complexity and self-awareness of a character like Lopakhin in THE CHERRY ORCHARD and garner less sympathy. Likewise, the aristocratic Anna Voinitseva lacks the tragic quality of a Ranevskia (also in The Cherry Orchard) even though both are widows who stand to lose their estates.

The meandering plot threatens to disintegrate at times. Its unity, such as it is, depends on its eponymous protagonist, who issues from a long line of superfluous men, ineffectual members of the intelligentsia burdened by the consciousness of their own inadequacy. Like his literary forebears, Platonov remembers the high hopes of his youth and grapples with the disparity between those aspirations and adult reality. At times, he lashes out at society, and several of his speeches recall the acidic judgments of Aleksandr Griboedov's Chatsky in Griboedov's Woe from Wit (1824). Unlike Chatsky, however, Platonov is weak. To the chagrin of his wife Sasha, he loses himself in love affairs. Chekhov's portraits of the highly individuated women with whom Platonov becomes involved constitute one of the play's strengths. Voinitseva's aimless, destructive lust stands in sharp contrast to Maria Grekova's idealism. However, the play's pivotal romance involves Platonov and his first love, Voinitseva's daughter-in-law Sofia, who offers him a new life (a theme characteristic of Chekhov's later work). Platonov is too weak to embrace it, and the culmination of the plot takes on a melodramatic coloration as threats of and attempts at suicide and murder follow one another in quick succession. Despite its overwrought emotionalism, the ending grows organically out of the dramatic material and reflects Chekhov's intuitive grasp of the rules of drama: Sofia cannot abide Platonov's betrayal and, in anger, shoots him.

Although Platonov suffers from theatrical clichés and prolixity, it introduces many of Chekhov's most important themes and demonstrates his early mastery of characterization. When he returned to drama years later, he abandoned the play of direct action and sought a new form that would come to fruition in his four masterpieces.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

Chekhov, Anton. Platonov. In The Oxford Chekhov Vol. 2, ed. and tr. by Ronald Hingley. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1964.

Eekman, Thomas A. "Anton Chekhov and His Play Without a Title."

In Critical Essays on Anton Chekhov, ed. by Thomas A. Eekman.

Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.

Gilman, Richard. Chekhov's Plays: An Opening Into Eternity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1995.

Magarshack, David. Chekhov the Dramatist. New York: Hill & Wang, 1960.

Timothy C. Westphalen

THE PLAYBOY OF THE WESTERN WORLD

The Playboy of the Western World, J. M. SYNGE's most famous play, was first produced by the National Theatre Society at the Abbey Theatre on January 26, 1907, under the direction of W. G. Fay, who also played the lead role of Christy Mahon, while Maire O'Neill (Synge's own beloved) took the part of Pegeen Mike, the Playboy's sweetheart. The action of the play takes place in a pub on the Belmullet peninsula of County Mayo in the West of IRELAND, a wild lonely territory. It is night when a stranger, Christy Mahon, caked with mud from long travels by foot, arrives at the pub seeking shelter and a hiding place. The barmaid, Pegeen Mike, and the other townspeople soon get it out of him that he is on the run because he killed his own father with the blow of a loy, a spade for digging potatoes. The people are ready to help nearly any man in flight from the hated British police, but they are especially impressed by a man who had the courage to kill his father.

Christy is hired by Peegen's father to help out in the pub, and he soon manages to sweet-talk Peegen out of her engagement with her cousin, the cowardly, priest-fearing Shawn Keogh. Life was never so good for Christy, who had had no idea before that a woman could love him or that he had anything to offer. His triumph is upset by the arrival, with a bloody bandage around his head, of his father, Old Mahon. Before Christy can be exposed as a liar, the Widow Quin—who loves him herself—sends the father off on a false trail. Yet he recognizes his son before he is clear of the town, and the people turn on Christy. Hoping to win their admiration once again, and to keep his beloved Peegen, he strikes his father a second time, but the townspeople have come to see the difference between a great story and a dirty deed. They tie him up, where he is to stay until he can be hanged by the authorities. But Old Mahon comes back from the dead a second time, and father and son, laughing at what fools there are in Mayo, go prancing off together, leaving Pegeen to wail at the play's curtain that she has "lost the only playboy of the western world." She does not mean, of course, that she has lost Hugh Hefner; the meaning of "playboy" then current was, first, a man who, full of devilry, lives for sport, amusement, and pleasure; second, one who was still full of boy's play; and finally, one who plays many a part.

The riot that greeted the first production of The Playboy of the Western World is the most famous protest by an Irish audience against a play in the 20th century. The uproar was reproduced on a smaller scale in the UNITED STATES in 1911 when the play was taken on tour; some of the players were then arrested for participating in an obscene performance. Initially, in Dublin the outrage focused on a single sentence. In place of Pegeen, the Widow offers Christy herself, a dowry, an escape route, and "finer sweethearts at every waning moon," but he refuses:

It's Pegeen I'm seeking only, and what'd I care if you brought me a drift of chosen females, standing in their shifts itself maybe, from this place to the Eastern World.

According to LADY GREGORY's telegram to W. B. YEATS, the outbreak occurred precisely at the word "shifts," a ladies' white undergarment. But the audience was already worked into irritation by the comic representation of Irish country people as drunken, swearing, priest-fearing, and fickle. Were such people worthy of self-government? The audience hoped the Irish dramatic revival would aid the home rule movement; this play seemed to damage it.

While changes in the Irish political situation fairly quickly led to the play becoming a favorite in Ireland, it retains its power to disturb and delight. Christy Mahon has patent similarities to Oedipus, Christ, Narcissus, Achilles, and Caesar. The language—especially the love talk—put in the mouths of characters alludes not just to Irish peasant dialect but to François Villon, William Shakespeare, Charles Baudelaire, and the Jacobean playwrights. Along with THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST and WAITING FOR GODOT, it is one of the classic plays that Ireland has contributed to world literature.

FURTHER READING

- Greene, Nicholas. The Politics of Irish Drama. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
- Harrington, John. The Irish Play on the New York Stage 1874–1966. Lexington: Univ. of Kentucky Press, 1997.
- Kiberd, Declan. Synge and the Irish language. 2d ed. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1993.
- Levitas, Ben. The Theatre of Nation: Irish Drama and Cultural Nationalism, 1890–1916. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 2002.

Murray, Christopher. Twentieth-Century Irish Drama: Mirror Up to Nation. Manchester: Manchester Univ. Press, 1997.

Adrian Frazier

PLAY WITHOUT A TITLE See PLATONOV

PLIEKŠĀNS, JĀNIS See RAINIS

THE PLOUGH AND THE STARS

Premiered at the Abbey Theatre in Dublin in 1926, The Plough and the Stars is the last and arguably the greatest of SEAN O'CASEY's three Dublin plays, which are sometimes regarded as a trilogy. Like the two plays that preceded it, Plough has a strong base in actuality, this time in the events leading up to the 1916 Rising in Dublin as seen from the vantage point of Dublin's poor. The politics of the play are foregrounded: O'Casey sets out to demythologize 1916 by mocking the romantic notions of heroism and blood sacrifice held by militant republicans such as Patrick Pearse. Underpinning his analysis is the conviction that because it did nothing for the urban poor, the Rising was a tragic mistake. By inference, the play also attacks James Connolly, leader of the working-class Irish Citizen Army, whose flag gives the play its title. As the Covey says in act 1, this flag symbolizes communism and has no place in a mere nationalist struggle.

The power of the play comes from its vivid characterization and poetic language. Some of O'Casey's best-known creations are people in their tenement setting: Fluther Good, the good-hearted carpenter with a drinking problem; Bessie Burgess, the street vendor with a wicked tongue and a heart of gold; testy Uncle Peter; the fanatical Marxist known as the Covey; and the macabre Mrs. Gogan, whose love of funerals is amply satisfied as the play progresses. O'Casey's rich language is often described as Elizabethan. It is rhetorically elaborate (characters rarely using one word where they can add ten more) and must be understood as the language of an impoverished class for whom rhetoric is a resource and a consolation. The response required is an appreciation of fine phrasing; many of the longer speeches should be regarded as operatic arias.

More experimentally structured than O'Casey's earlier two plays, Plough moves epic-style from the Clitheroes' apartment to a public house, then to the streets during the Rising, and finally to a cramped attic that reflects the end of all hope of liberation. In the domestic setting of act 1, O'Casey highlights the predicament of newly wed Nora Clitheroe, another of his young women whose will drives her toward creating a way of life transcending the limitations imposed by tenement conditions. Nora's opposition to her husband's political ambitions is rooted in her instinctive desire for a home and a recognition that Jack's motive is unacknowledged vanity. The play bears out Nora's point of view as her home is destroyed, she suffers a miscarriage and a breakdown, and the British soldiers, dismissing the Rising as only a bit of a “dog fight,” join in the song “Keep the Home Fires Burning” as they occupy the dead Bessie’s apartment.

Riots greeted Plough on its fourth night at the Abbey, as republican sympathizers, specifically women who had lost menfolk in the Rising, protested in organized opposition to the play. They particularly objected to the public-house scene in act 2, in which the prostitute Rosie Redmond is ironically juxtaposed with the Figure in the Window, recognizably Patrick Pearse (excerpts from whose speeches are used in this scene), and in which the Irish tricolor and the flag of the Irish Citizen Army are introduced. The protesters found the idea of flags in a public house grossly insulting. As the play was disrupted, W. B. YEATS, then managing director of the Abbey, rebuked the audience. Referring to the riots over J. M. SYNGE’s PLAYBOY OF THE WESTERN WORLD (1907), Yeats said that O’Casey’s fame had been born on that night: “this is his apotheosis.” O’Casey had to look up the word in his dictionary when he got home and was alarmed to find he was being placed among the gods.

Plough indisputably placed O’Casey among the great antiwar playwrights of the 20th century. It remains the most frequently staged play in the repertory of the Abbey Theatre. Its qualities as a TRAGICOMEDY have also made it a classic of the international stage, for its use of irony is strongly modernist. Although the politics of the play may cause audiences outside Ireland some difficulty, its solid theatricality invariably renders performances both amusing and moving. In a strange mixture of REALISM, satire, and vaudeville, O’Casey managed to weave a historical tapestry rendering the lives of the poor against a background of a war of liberation.

[See also Ireland]

FURTHER READING

- Ayling, Ronald, ed. O’Casey: The Dublin Trilogy. London: Macmillan, 1985.
- Kearney, Colbert. The Glamour of Grammar: Orality and Politics and the Emergence of Sean O’Casey. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.
- Lowery, Robert, ed. A Whirlwind in Dublin: “The Plough and the Stars” Riots. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.
- Murray, Christopher. A Faber Critical Guide: Sean O’Casey. London: Faber, 2000.
- Scrimgeour, James R. Sean O’Casey. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Christopher Murray

POLAND

Closely tied to Poland’s history, drama has occupied a special position in the cultural life of the country. During long years of foreign domination, drama became a prime force for maintaining national identity, evolving as a metaphoric art that dealt with political, social, and philosophical issues, rather than with private psychological concerns. In the 19th century the forbidden romantic poet-playwrights, living in exile, became revered as seers, but although theater flourished, serious drama, shackled by censorship, stagnated.

PRE-WORLD WAR I DRAMA

Modern Polish drama begins in the late 1890s when writers in the Austrian sector of partitioned Poland, where government control was less severe, came under the influence of new Western European modernist movements—NATURALISM and SYMBOLISM—and participated in the first stagings of previously banned Polish romantic dramas.

It was not the bustling metropolis of Russian-ruled Warsaw but the small ancient city of Cracow that became the breeding ground for a progressive aesthetic movement of cross-fertilization in the arts known as Young Poland. A new theater—the Miejski, built in 1893—introduced the modern repertory of HENRIK IBSEN, AUGUST STRINDBERG, and GERHART HAUPTMANN. Soon Polish writers abroad became caught up in the new trends and came home and embarked on careers as playwrights.

A medical student in Berlin, STANISŁAWA PRZYBYŚZEWSKA (1868–1927), frequented the Black Piglet cabaret with Strindberg and Edvard Munch and, influenced by FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE, developed a theory of “the naked soul” foreshadowing EXPRESSIONISM. In 1898 Przybyszewska settled in Cracow, where he began to edit the innovative artistic journal Życie (Life). His lurid dramas of hysterical passions leading to murder and suicide, For the Sake of Happiness (1900), The Golden Fleece (1901), and Snow (1903), once widely staged in RUSSIA and championed by VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD, now seem like fin de siècle period pieces.

GABRIELA ZAPOLSKA (1857–1921) learned the new stagecraft as an actor in Paris at Antoine’s Théâtre Libre and Lugné-Poe’s Théâtre de l’Oeuvre. She created well-crafted satirical COMEDIES of manners that have never ceased to be popular in the Polish theater. Her masterpiece, The Morality of Mrs. Dulska (1906), a tragicomic unmasking of the hypocritical bourgeoisie, became an instant classic. Although disdained by high-bow critics and condemned by the Church, Zapolska was an outstanding European naturalist and the leading woman playwright of her time.

While studying painting in FRANCE, STANISŁAW WYSPIAŃSKI (1869–1907) discovered opera and RICHARD WAGNER. An artist of dual vocation, he approached playwriting with the eye of a painter. Creating his own synthesis of the arts, Wyspiański established the modern Polish tradition of poetic drama rich in powerful images that metaphorically embody complex social and political issues. His landmark drama THE WEDDING (1901) critically reexamines romantic myths about failed rebellion and the role of the artist-intellectual in an oppressed society.

More obscure but equally innovative is the poet Tadeusz Miciński (1873–1918), who shared Wyspiański’s notions of the sacred functions of theater and called for drama to return to its origins in the religious mysteries. A mystical sage and pan-Slavist, Miciński wrote a dozen plays designed to unite East and West, reconcile Catholicism with the orthodox faith, and bring Poland and Russia together. The best of his oddly shaped and difficult-to-stage works are The Revolt of the Potemkin (1906), a DOCUMENTARY and visionary fantasy on the 1905 mutiny, and In the Shades of the Golden Palace (Basilissa Teophano, 1909), a dreamlike historical drama about the decadent Byzantine Empire.

Appealing to actors, the naturalistic model of a satirical comedy of manners represented by Zapolska had other skillful exponents, including Jan August Kisielewski (1876–1918), whose In the Net (1899) depicts a young girl's attempted rebellion against repressive parents; Tadeusz Rittner (1873–1921), author of ironic dramas about family life, such as Silly Jacob (1910); and Włodzimierz Perzyński (1877–1930), best known for his subtle, Chekhovian Frano's Luck (1909). But it was Wyspiański's poetic idiom calling for inventive mise-en-scène that became dominant, particularly in the post-1956 years when directors reigned in the Polish theater.

WORLD WAR I ERA

World War I and the Treaty of Versailles, which put Poland back on the map as an independent nation, constituted a major turning point in the evolution of Polish drama. The country and its arts were, for the first time in over 100 years, no longer under foreign domination. The war with the Soviet Union in 1919–1920, successfully waged by strongman Józef Piłsudski, intensified Polish fears of Russian Bolshevism, and the authoritarian government harassed writers, confiscated magazines, and raided theaters suspected of being communist or anarchist.

During twenty years of precarious freedom, new authors attempted to create a dramatic literature attuned to postwar realities of urban life, mechanization, and mass culture. Now that the issue of Polish nationhood appeared settled, writers abandoned the grandiose neo-romantic style and sought for dynamic new forms that could keep pace with the automobile, cinema, and modern psychology. Bruno Winawer (1883–1944) and Antoni Cwojdzński (1893–1972), both physicists by training, developed a genre of light comedy dealing with the impact of science and technology on society, exemplified by Cwojdzński's Freud's Theory of Dreams (1937).

The novelist Stefan Żeromski (1864–1925), who began his career as a playwright with Rose (1909) and other social dramas, had his greatest success in the theater with My Little Quail Has Flown Away (1924), about a utopian scheme for building a cultural center that miscarries because of tangled human passions. Another prewar writer, Adolf Nowaczyński (1876–1944), who had specialized in historical comedies that debunked the great, continued his mockery in the Aristophanic political satire War for War (1928). Karol Hubert Rostworowski (1877–1938), author of many prewar historical verse dramas, wrote one powerful naturalistic TRAGEDY, The Surprise (1929), about a peasant woman who unwittingly robs and murders her own son.

In the 1920s and 1930s a protofeminist drama exploring the role of women in society was developed by several leading female authors. The novelist Zofia Nałkowska (1884–1954) wrote The House of Women (1930), with an all-female cast, about three generations of a single family. The poet Maria Pawlikowska-Jasnorzewska (1894–1945) contributed subtle psychological comedies: Egyptian Wheat (1932), Heavenly Lovers (1933), and Mama's Return (1935). The actress-turned-playwright Maria Morozowicz-Szczepkowska (1889–1968) reached American audiences with Monika's Case (1932), about working women, extramarital sex, single parenting, and abortion, which became the Broadway production and Warner Brothers film Doctor Monica.

Despite church and state hostility to experimentation in the arts, a small but vigorous Polish AVANT-GARDE theater with leftist political orientation sprang up during the interwar years. The poet Felicja Kruszevska (1897–1943) created a powerful tragicomic expressionist drama, A Dream (1927). The play's hallucinatory visions of the rise of fascism and the heroine's longing for a providential savior spoke directly to Polish audiences about their deepest anxieties.

Witold Wandurski (1891–1934) and Bruno Jasieński (1901–1936) vainly attempted to establish a workers' theater in Poland and later immigrated to the Soviet Union, where, after a warm reception, they were later liquidated during Stalin's purges. Wandurski's Death on a Pear Tree (1925) is an antiwar fable about the capture of Death by a crafty peasant. After settling in Moscow where he edited Literature of the World Revolution, the futurist Jasieński wrote his Mannequins' Ball, in which Parisian fashion dummies stage a revolt against their capitalist masters.

The socialist poet Tadeusz Piper (1891–1969) wrote two experimental plays unstaged in his lifetime: Six O'clock! Six O'clock! (1925), which contrasts stage time with real time by inversions of chronological order, and If There Is No Him (1933), a drama about loss of identity during a revolution. Underservedly neglected, Stanisława Przybyszewska (1901–1935) was the author of a brilliant trio of plays about the French Revolution, of which only THE DANTON CASE (1929) was performed, in truncated form, during her lifetime.

The playwright who best captured the turmoil and anxiety of the times was STANISŁAW WITKIEWICZ (1885–1939), but he remained seriously misunderstood and undervalued by his contemporaries. Of his more than thirty plays written between 1918 and 1933, only a handful reached the stage during his lifetime, and few were published. Witkiewicz was rediscovered in the late 1950s, when his works served as an antidote to SOCIALIST REALISM. His breadth of vision, playful dramatic imagination, and seismographic reading of civilization's fault lines now make Witkiewicz a classic of the European avant-garde.

Another major figure of 20th-century Polish literature, novelist WITOLD GOMBROWICZ (1904–1969), was also out of step with his time. He began playwriting with Iuona, Princess of Burgundia (1935), a grotesque fairy tale about a persecuted outsider, not performed until 1957. The Marriage, a complex exploration of interpersonal mythmaking, was written in 1946 in ARGENTINA, where Gombrowicz was stranded when World War II broke out, published in Paris in 1953, but only produced ten years later. Operetta, a history of modern Europe in the form of a musical parody, was written and published in France in 1966 and staged throughout Europe. Because Gombrowicz wrote as a permanent exile critical of the regime, his last two plays could not be performed professionally in Poland until after his death.

WORLD WAR II–1970S

During World War II in Nazi-occupied Poland, no open theater existed, except for collaborationist light entertainment. Most actors refused to appear publicly; instead, clandestine performances were given by conspiratorial groups in private homes. Underground playwriting competitions encouraged new talent, but many young writers were put in concentration camps or killed. The resistance poet and soldier Andrzej Trzebiński (1922–1943) wrote To Pick Up the Rose (1942), a grotesque comedy about revolution, Ping-pong, and political power, not long before being shot in a random street execution.

Despite vast physical destruction, especially in Warsaw where not a single theater was left standing, theatrical life was quickly reestablished throughout the country when the war ended. At first the communist government, busy consolidating its control, could not impose ideological conformity on writers. From 1945 to 1949 many Western plays were staged, and prewar playwrights picked up their careers. Jerzy Szaniawski (1886–1970), author of popular whimsical comedies in the 1930s, wrote The Two Theatres (1946) about recent war experiences, using the play-within-the-play device to contrast superficial REALISM with a deeper theater of dreams. Catholic playwrights like Jerzy Zawieyski (1902–1969) and Roman Brandstaetter (1906–1987) wrote historical, mythical, and contemporary dramas dealing with moral and metaphysical issues. Karol Wojtyła (1920–2005; the future Pope John Paul II), an actor with the Rhapsodic Theatre, also wrote plays, such as Our God's Brother (1947) and The Jeweler's Shop (1950), as well as essays on theatrical theory. Each week in a popular Cracow literary magazine, the poet Konstanty Ildefons Gałczyński (1905–1953) created an episode of the Little Theatre of the Green Goose (1946–1950), a miniature nonsense theater that spoofed stage conventions and parodied the myths of Polish and world culture.

This lively diversity in dramatic fare came to an abrupt end in January 1949, when socialist realism was proclaimed the only acceptable style, and later the same year a Festival of Russian and Soviet Drama was instituted to teach Polish playwrights how to write in the Moscow-approved style. All theaters were put under centralized bureaucratic control, Polish romantic dramas were banned, and for the next five years Stalinism ruled over the arts.

With the bloodless October Revolution of 1956, Poland acquired an autonomous policy in the arts. Socialist realism was discarded; formally the arts were free, although censorship of content continued, ruling out truthful presentation of everyday social reality, criticism of the Soviet Union, and treatment of religious or sexual issues that might offend the Catholic hierarchy and upset the delicate church-state balance. The effect of the “thaw” on the theater was extraordinary—the repertory became immense and varied, consisting of some 400 new productions a year, the majority contemporary foreign works.

The public was hungry for plays attuned to modern sensibility. For six years cut off from contact with the West, Polish drama immediately became responsive to foreign influences. Starting with the production of WAITING FOR GODOT in 1957, the previously forbidden Theater of the Absurd was rapidly assimilated by Polish actors, audiences, and writers. Witkiewicz's plays were staged, many for the first time and after battles with the censor.

Theater proved to be the only public arena where national obsessions and grievances could be aired—at least in oblique form. There was a sudden explosion of playwriting. Nearly everyone in the literary world—poets like Zbigniew Herbert (1924–), Stanisław Grochowiak (1934–1976), Tymoteusz Karpowicz (1921–), and Andrzej Bursa (1932–1957), as well as Marxist philosophers like Leszek Kołakowski (1927–)—began writing plays. The flowering of Polish drama after 1956 was made possible by lavish state subsidization, which helped to attract the best talent to the theater. The constant pressure of censorship inclined playwrights to parable and metaphor, devices central to the Polish dramatic tradition. Almost all important new Polish plays were published prior to performance and widely read in the drama magazine Dialog, started in 1956 and still published today.

After years of war, occupation, concentration camps, Holocaust, and Stalinist repression, playwrights took an ironic view of ideals and ideologies, including the Polish romantic tradition. In his philosophical allegory The Names of Power (1956), Jerzy Broszkiewicz (1922–) scrutinized the arbitrary nature of political power in three scenes set in different historical epochs. The poet Miron Białoszewski (1922–1983) set up a private Theatre Apart (1953–1961) in his apartment where the author and friends gave performances of radical linguistic experiments for invited audiences.

The two playwrights who dominated the Polish stage in the second half of the 20th century were TADEUSZ RÓŻEWICZ (1921–) and SŁAWOMIR MROŻEK (1932–). Although often labeled Theater of the Absurd and compared to SAMUEL BECKETT and EUGÈNE IONESCO, their works, conditioned by history, belong to a native tradition of the grotesque with roots in Witkiewicz, Gombrowicz, and Gałczyński. Satirist of a totalitarian age in Tango (1964) and Emigrés (1974), Mrozek reveals the complex bonds between hunter and hunted in a world of illusory freedom where both victim and victimizer use reason to accommodate to unreason. In fragmented open texts that challenge theatrical conventions, like Card File (1960) and White Marriage (1974), the poet Różewicz probes the terror that lies within, disclosing fear and fascination with eros, self, and the body.

Other outstanding playwrights from the 1960s and 1970s include Ireneusz Iredyński (1939–1985), author of short radio plays and violent neo-naturalistic allegories, such as A Modern Nativity Play (1966), about a troupe of actors in a concentration camp giving a Christmas performance, and An Altar to Himself (1981), investigating the suicide of an opportunistic party member finally driven by inner demons to revolt against his own degradation. Poet and director Helmut Kajzar wrote innovative plays such as Pater Noster (1970) that project dreams in scenic images. Janusz Głowacki (1938–) created satirical comedies in Poland and after 1981 continued his career in New York, writing about Poles abroad in Hunting Cockroaches (1984).

POST-1970S

By the late 1970s drama was losing its commanding position at the center of Polish cultural life. As in the West, innovative alternative theaters stopped performing plays; instead, ensembles created their own collaborative spectacles. Official state-supported theaters maintained their broad literary repertoires, which no longer spoke to the changing times. No new playwrights with unique voices appeared. The rise of Solidarity, imposition of martial law, and successful battle against communism made public life more exciting than any play. Written drama could not keep up with the drama in the streets.

The underground theater active during martial law in the early 1980s rarely used Polish plays. Oblique metaphoric drama with its hidden codes and allusions lost its power and relevance. Younger spectators preferred a theater of entertainment imitated from the West and flocked to see American-style musicals, such as Metro (1992).

After the collapse of communism in 1989 and subsequent abolition of censorship, the Polish theater achieved the freedom for which it had so long struggled. But with its oppositional role eliminated, theater found itself without clear function or direction in a democracy. Since the dismantling of the old system of ideological controls, Polish playwrights have reacted against politics and abandoned the romantic model of national narratives in favor of microsituations and mute existential dramas submerged in everyday life.

Circumstances do not favor the writer. A decentralization of Polish artistic life and proliferation of alternative theaters and festivals have led to ensemble-created works and adaptations of novels and documents rather than new plays. Innovative younger directors show little interest in contemporary Polish playwrights.

At the start of the 21st century, Polish identity and national issues are no longer central concerns of dramatic literature. Personal, not Polish, problems have taken center stage, and psychological realism has made an unexpected comeback. Previously silenced "others" at the margins of society are being given their chance. Polish drama is now attempting to catch up with the latest Western trends by addressing the formerly tabooed subjects of sexuality and the body, gay and lesbian love, and the physically challenged.

Art historian Ingmar Villqist (1960–) has a distinctive new voice, but it sounds no more Polish than does his Scandinavian pseudonym, by which he pays homage to Henrik Ibsen, August Strindberg, PER OLOV ENQUIST, INGMAR BERGMAN, and Lars von Trier, while distancing himself from the Polish romantic tradition. In plays with Scandinavian names and settings like Helver's Night (1999), deeply disturbed characters—driven by fear and guilt to violence—face childhood traumas, suffer from AIDS, confront sexual abuse, or deal with complex psychological relationships resulting from their being "different." Villqist has gone back a hundred years to Przybyszewska's and Zapolska's naturalism and psychologism—also a Scandinavian import—but has given it an up-to-date colloquial style and modern "Euro" look.

Other recently staged playwrights making debuts include novelist and German scholar Jerzy Łukosz, whose biographical plays Mann and Hauptmann treat the artist's relation to the state; actor and director Andrzej Pieczyński, whose Killing Is Too Good for You is a family drama of an abused child; and the pseudonymous Amana Muskaria, author of Journey to Buenos Aires, a MONODRAMA about old age as linguistic disintegration. Of an earlier generation, Tadeusz Słobodzianek, whose Czar Nicholas and Prophet Ilya were highly acclaimed, has written Dream of a Bedbug, or Comrade Christ, a sequel to VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY's play, in which Pripykin's return to Moscow is taken as the Second Coming.

FURTHER READING

- Braun, Kazimierz. A History of Polish Theater, 1939–1989: Spheres of Captivity and Freedom. Contributions in Drama and Theatre Studies, No. 64. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- . A Concise History of the Polish Theater from the Eleventh to the Twentieth Centuries. Studies in Theatre Arts, Vol. 21. Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Czerwinski, Edward. Contemporary Theatre and Drama (1956–1984). Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1988.
- Gerould, Daniel, ed. Twentieth-Century Polish Avant-Garde Drama. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell Univ. Press, 1977.
- Miłosz, Czesław. The History of Polish Literature. London: Macmillan, 1969.
- Taborski, Bolesław. "Poland." In Crowell's Handbook of Contemporary Drama, ed. by Michael Anderson et al. New York: Crowell, 1971. 359–371.

Daniel Gerould and Jadwiga Kosicka Gerould

POLITICAL THEATER IN THE UNITED STATES

Theater advocating political causes is as old as Aeschylus and TRAGEDY. But the special political and economic chaos of the 1930s brought a seeming novelty in form and ideas to the American theater.

GREAT DEPRESSION ROOTS

The trend toward political drama began very early in the 1930s with small theatrical troupes, largely in New York City, that were sponsored by left-wing political groups, such as the Communist Party and various labor unions. They sought to advocate their simple political solutions to the complex social and economic problems of the Great Depression by staging small amateur productions of "agit-props," earnestly satiric skits designed to agitate and propagandize audiences (AGITATION-PROPAGANDA theater). This theatrical format was borrowed from GERMANY and Soviet RUSSIA, where it had developed in the 1920s. The plot lines were episodic, always leading the cartoon characters from political naïveté to left-wing beliefs and, theoretically, sending audiences, thus instructed and agitated, to the revolutionary barricades. The Workers' Laboratory Theatre (WLT) summed up the aim of all agit-prop troupes with a slogan emblazoned on a red banner hanging over its tiny stage: "The Theatre Is a Weapon." But the actors were preaching the class struggle to the converted, and even the converted did not rush to the barricades. There were no right-wing political theaters.

As the agit-props developed in the 1930s, they became more realistic in their subject matter and their characterizations, while still retaining their primary revolutionary message. In 1932, for example, these small troupes, under the aegis of the League of Workers' Theatres (later renamed the New Theatre League), continued to produce agit-props as well as more conventional realistic plays heavily laden with propaganda. Politically concerned actors and directors from professional stages, such as the GROUP THEATER, lent their skills to both agit-props and realistic dramas. While keeping the episodic form of the agit-prop, these professionals, influenced by the traditional realistic drama, transformed the cartoon characters like the "Capitalist" into historical figures like Henry Ford. In Dimitroff (1934), an agit-prop about the Reichstag fire, Art Smith and Ella Kazan of the Group Theater developed the same cartoon capitalist into Adolf Hitler and Hermann Goering. Historical events succeeded the theatrical class struggle as subject matter.

By 1935 ordinary people and their everyday problems of survival in the Great Depression became the realistic subject matter of CLIFFORD ODETS's WAITING FOR LEFTY. This agit-prop, written and performed by left-wing members of the Group Theater, had its premiere under the aegis of the New Theatre League. Later in 1935 the Group itself staged this play. The message, though a bit subtler than the earlier agit-props, was still class war. When the character Agate led the audience in the call to "Strike," his raised fist—the communist salute—indicated clearly that he was agiting for revolution. In 1936 the New Theatre League continued to alternate between realistic dramas like Private Hicks by Albert Maltz and Hymn to the Rising Sun by PAUL GREEN and agit-props with humanized characters in the style of Waiting for Lefty. The New Theatre League folded in 1940.

In 1933, because most early agit-props had been so unprofessionally staged, a coalition of left-wing groups organized Theatre Union to produce plays OFF BROADWAY, but with the professional sheen of the Broadway stage. Most of the plays were in the realistic style popular on Broadway but with strong leftist themes. Peace on Earth (1933) by George Sklar and Albert Maltz was an antiimperialist war drama featuring the conversion of a professor from liberalism to Marxism. Stevedore (1934) by Paul Peters and George Sklar, preaching against racism in the South, concluded with a fight between the races in which the white members of a Marxist union rescued the oppressed African Americans. Though Theatre Union presented this ending in a seemingly realistic manner, the rescue was more fantasy than reality. This kind of wish fulfillment was known as "SOCIALIST REALISM." The future as predicted by Marxist theoreticians was shown "realistically" as if it already existed.

Not all of Theatre Union's plays followed socialist realism. FRIEDRICH WOLF's The Sailors of Cattaro (1934), translated by Keene Wallis and adapted by Michael Blankfort, concluded with the proletarian sailors being executed for their failed mutiny. This failure was based on history. Black Pit (1935) by Albert Maltz told a story of class war in the coal mines, ending in defeat for the miners, but with a prediction that workers would ultimately triumph over their capitalist bosses. The play was advertised as a "proletarian tragedy" because it displayed the fall of a mineworker, but the predicted proletarian triumph was not part of the tragic tradition.

In its next play, MOTHER (1935) by BERTOLT BRECHT as adapted by Paul Peters, Theatre Union tried the experimental form of EPIC THEATER, in which the political lessons taught were more important than the usual emotional empathy generated by the characters and the story of realistic drama. In its episodic form with slogans on signs and slides, Mother taught revolution directly to the audience in the manner of the agit-props. But Theatre Union, unwilling to abandon REALISM totally, presented the Russian mother in a sympathetic, emotional way and even added touches of realism by using a real onstage stove boiling real cabbage with its attendant odors emanating out into the audience. Brecht himself, attending a rehearsal, was highly displeased and stormed out of the theater.

Theatre Union's next play was Bitter Stream (1936), Victor Wolfson's adaptation of Ignazio Silone's novel Fontannara, an account of Italian peasants who form a union to stop the fascists from stealing their land and water. This play was once again in the realistic format of the company. It was the last play staged at the Civic Repertory Theatre off Broadway before Theatre Union moved to Broadway for its final production: JOHN HOWARD LAWSON's Marching Song (1937). Lawson told the topical story of an autoworkers' union strike that developed into a general strike against evil capitalists and their fascist agents, ending with the triumph of the proletariat. Lawson led the Theatre Union back to socialist realism. The Marxist theoreticians had really recreated 19th-century MELODRAMA, which had been delightfully sent up by W. S. GILBERT in the Mikado's epigram, "It's an unjust world, and virtue is triumphant only in theatrical performances." All Theatre Union had done to melodrama was redefine moral virtue as the political power of a radicalized proletariat.

Unlike Theatre Union, the more successful political theaters advocated action much closer to the middle-class aspirations of most Americans, as epitomized by Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. Larger and broader audiences were more easily persuaded that labor unions—rather than revolution—would alleviate the plight of workers. Reform of labor law was easier to accept than a Soviet America. The theatrical forms of such milder political advocacy did not matter. They could be melodrama, realism, or even experimental agit-props—provided they entertained audiences.

The most entertaining show of the time was Pins and Needles (1937–1941), a musical revue advancing the political cause of unionism by means of songs and sketches. It was produced by Labor Stage, which had been organized by Louis Schaeffer as the theatrical arm of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. Satirizing the enemies of labor in the tradition of the agit-prop, the sketch writers—such as Joseph Schrank, Arthur Arent, MARC BLITZSTEIN, and Emanuel Eisenberg—and the composer-lyricist Harold Rome created several editions of the show that were blessed with humor, irony, wit, and sophisticated music. These qualities had eluded most of the dedicated revolutionaries like John Howard Lawson, who tried to write plays to be used as weapons in the class war. Pins and Needles preached unionism but never forgot to entertain its audiences with the staples of the musical revue: satiric sketches and singable songs ranging from romantic and sentimental ballads to humorous parodies and patter songs. And the show boasted a chorus line of beautiful working girls. In its long run, first off Broadway and later on Broadway, Pins and Needles skewered the enemies of unions ranging from Hitler to Father Coughlin and, later on, from Joseph Stalin to the Daughters of the American Revolution. Most humorously, it also skewered the best of the Marxist playwrights from Bertolt Brecht to Clifford Odets.

The 1930s also saw some political plays offered by theaters that were not founded to advance political causes. For example, the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT was established in 1935 by the American government to provide employment for unemployed theater professionals and to provide free entertainment for audiences across America. Headed by Hallie Flanagan, who had staged three agit-props in 1931 at her Vassar College Experimental Theatre, Federal Theatre produced a small percentage of political plays out of a varied repertory of new plays and classic theater. These ranged from an African American Macbeth to T. S. ELIOT'S MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL.

But the most exciting productions were those of political plays, especially the living newspapers, a new theatrical genre that aimed to analyze some of the social problems that came to light during the Great Depression. These living newspapers drew on techniques long established by the musical revue with its plotless structure, blackout sketches, and songs. They also drew on the agit-props, movie newsreels, and radio programs to create highly theatrical and politically significant theater. In Triple-A Plowed Under (1936) Arthur Arent and his staff writers presented a history of the agricultural depression, focusing on the destruction of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA) and concluding with the creation of a new Farmer-Labor political party. Arent's 1935 (1936) depicted a wide variety of injustices in American society during the title year. Injunction Granted (1936) by Arent and staff was a history of the labor movement in relation to the courts. In its original form, the left-wing political bias was so strong that Hallie Flanagan ordered the production toned down. Arent's next edition of the living newspaper, Power (1937), presented a study of the government's creation of electric power by way of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA). In One-Third of a Nation (1938) Arent depicted the plight of the poor who lacked adequate housing. It was the last living newspaper staged by Federal Theatre.

Although Federal Theatre produced some political plays in more conventional forms like the very successful antifascist It Can't Happen Here (1936) by Sinclair Lewis and John C. Moffit, the most inventive theatrical pieces were the living newspapers. But this new dramatic form ceased when the U.S. Congress, fearing the political impact of communist influence on Federal Theatre, cut off its funding. Only one of its many plays, The Revolt of the Beavers (1937) by Oscar Saul and Lou Lantz, clearly advocated a communist revolution, even though it was presented in the guise of an allegorical children's fairy tale. But Congress had great fear of communist propaganda.

The Mercury Theatre, founded by Orson Welles and John Houseman, broke away from the Federal Theatre in 1937 when the Works Progress Administration (WPA) canceled the opening of MARC BLITZSTEIN's militantly anticapitalist opera THE CRADLE WILL ROCK. Defying the government and Actors' Equity, Welles and Houseman presented the piece with the singing actors performing among the spectators in the audience and Blitzstein playing the piano accompaniment onstage. There was greater political interest in the defiant producers and performers than in the opera itself with its cartoon characters and its schematic agit-prop format that presented a revolutionary solution to many social evils.

On Broadway there were some political plays sponsored by the THEATRE GUILD, the Group Theatre, the Playwrights' Company, and Independent producers. But these were not primarily political theaters. Though dramatists like ROBERT E. SHERWOOD, ELMER RICE, PHILIP BARRY, and MAXWELL ANDERSON presented political themes, they did not advocate any specific political program. Only Clifford Odets of the Group Theatre came close to urging revolution. But after Waiting for Lefty (1935) and AWAKE AND SING! (1935), Odets became much less revolutionary in his political themes. The most successful political production on Broadway was Of Thee I Sing (1931), a musical COMEDY by GEORGE S. KAUFMAN and Morrie Ryskind, with music by George Gershwin and lyrics by Ira Gershwin. Sending up the entire American political establishment, this show offered satiric laughter and Offenbachian irreverence but not a blueprint for revolution. Playwrights like LILLIAN HELLMAN came close to Marxism, but her message was usually implicit.

Political plays of the 1930s failed to win many converts to any political causes. Since dramatists stacked the premises of their arguments, theatergoers did not follow the political path outlined, unless they had already decided to do so on the basis of their own perceptions of the real world. The most that political theater achieved was to raise questions that might sharpen those perceptions.

FURTHER READING

- Clurman, Harold. The Fervent Years: The Story of the Group Theatre and the Thirties. New York: Hill & Wang, 1957.
- Flanagan, Hallie. Arena: The History of the Federal Theatre. New York: B. Blom, 1940.
- Goldstein, Malcolm. The Political Theater: American Drama and Theater of the Great Depression. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1974.
- Himmelstein, Morgan Y. Drama Was a Weapon: The Left-wing Theatre in New York, 1929–1941. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers Univ. Press, 1963.
- Levine, Ira A. Left-wing Dramatic Theory in the American Theatre. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Res. Press, 1985.
- Mathews, Jane DeHart. The Federal Theatre, 1935–1939: Plays, Relief, and Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1967.
- Weales, Gerald. Clifford Odets, Playwright. New York: Pegasus, 1971.
- Williams, Jay. Stage Left. New York: Scribner's, 1974.

Morgan Y. Himmelstein

SECOND HALF 20TH CENTURY

Political theater in the UNITED STATES in the second half of the 20th century reflected the problematic status of political art in the United States, where, unlike Europe, there has been no agreement about its propriety. On one side are playwrights such as DAVID MAMET who believe that “[i]t’s not the dramatist’s job to bring about social change” (Three Uses of the Knife, 1998), and on the other are theater makers such as Bread and Puppet Theater director Peter Schumann, for whom “the arts are political, whether they like it or not” (“Puppetry and Politics,” 1986).

This apparently irreconcilable difference is contradicted by a second aspect of political theater in the United States: whenever circumstances become sufficiently dire—during the Depression, World War II, the Vietnam War, the AIDS crisis, and the U.S. war against Iraq—intractable disputes about political art are superseded by an overwhelming sense of its immediate necessity.

By 1940 the United States had witnessed the steady development of an American political theater tradition, which at the beginning of the century included the American Pageant movement, certain aspects of the Little Theater movement, and contemporary African American theater, particularly as promulgated by W. E. B. DuBois. The 1930s saw the largest single experiment in American political theater of the 20th century: the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT, which, despite its popularity and its invention of such innovative theatrical techniques as the Living Newspaper, was crushed by conservative members of Congress in 1939. After the United States entered World War II, anti-Nazi plays such as LILLIAN HELLMAN’s 1941 Watch on the Rhine and patriotic musicals such as This Is the Army (1942, featuring actual servicemen onstage) became popular staples of Broadway theater. As the Cold War superseded World War II, its reverberations could also be felt in mainstream theater, for example, in the 1947 Broadway failure of BERTOLT BRECHT’s THE LIFE OF GALILEO.

Usually the term political theater is used to define drama that counters prevailing political ideology by articulating alternative points of view. This was certainly the kind of theater the German director ERWIN Piscator promulgated at his Dramatic Workshop in New York City (1939–1951), where among his prize students was Judith Malina. In 1947 Malina joined with Julian Beck to create the LIVING THEATRE, the first, longest-lived, and perhaps most influential American political theater group of the century. The Living Theatre began modestly by performing classic works from the European AVANT-GARDE (JEAN COCTEAU, FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA, Brecht, and LUIGI PIRANDELLO), but also produced plays by such American writers as GERTRUDE STEIN, William Carlos Williams, and Paul Goodman. Under Malina’s direction the company’s first performances took place in Manhattan apartments, and although the company soon found OFF-BROADWAY theaters in which to play, it also included street performances and demonstrations as an essential part of its activities, which in the 1950s were influenced by anarchist activism and opposition to atomic weapons.

While the Living Theatre’s production of The Connection (1959) shocked audiences with its jazz-inflected hipster NATURALISM, The Brig (1963) was a political provocation: a head-on critique of American militarism in the middle of the Cold War. The company’s production of Kenneth Brown’s semiautobiographical story of a military prison in occupied Japan typified the Living Theatre’s approach to political art. Directly influenced by the grand theories of Brecht and VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD, the Malina-Beck production was also profoundly affected by the writings of ANTONIN ARTAUD, who placed great focus on the performance of the individual in crisis. In the 1960s the Living Theatre's radical approach to ACTING, DRAMATURGY, and design led it to produce Frankenstein (1965), Brecht's Antigone (1966), Paradise Now (1968), and Seven Meditations on Political Sado-Masochism (1973), which all expressed the company's desire to expand the limits of acting and transgress the boundaries of the Western stage. The Living Theatre became a world-traveling collective whose work caused tumult and furor in Europe, in South America, and across the United States. Members of the Living Theatre were often arrested, and in New York City their performance spaces were shut down by government officials. For many years the company exiled itself in Europe. After the death of Julian Beck in 1985 Hanon Reznikov joined Judith Malina as co-director, and the Living Theatre rerooted itself in New York City and continued work, now under the radar of most theater critics.

The San Francisco Mime Troupe was started by Ronald G. Davis in 1959, a direct outgrowth of the famed Actor's Workshop. The Mime Troupe sought inspiration from Brecht, but also from Italian commedia dell'arte traditions, not only in its use of physical acting and masks, but also in its practice of street performance. The latter caused trouble for the company as early as 1961, when city authorities attempted to prevent the Mime Troupe from passing the hat after performances in San Francisco parks. The Mime Troupe successfully argued its case in court, and free performances in city parks became a hallmark of the company's work. A Minstrel Show; or, Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel (1965) marked the company's turn to contemporary political issues, which continued with a version of Carlo Goldoni's L'amant militaire (1967) refocused to examine the Vietnam War. When Davis left the troupe in 1970, it became a collective whose experiments included even further examination of popular theater forms (such as MELODRAMA, detective stories, American musical theater, and science fiction), as well as a continuing interest in Brecht, whose THE MOTHER was a Mime Troupe production of 1973. The Mime Troupe's productions of The Independent Female; or, A Man Has His Pride (1970), The Dragon Lady's Revenge (1971), Hotel Universe (1977), Americans; Or, Last Tango in Huahuateno (1981) and other plays toured widely across the United States and in Europe, but the company kept its connections to San Francisco and park performances, which continue to be the center of its work in the early 21st century.

El Teatro Campesino was founded by LUIS VALDEZ in 1965 after a brief stint with the San Francisco Mime Troupe. El Teatro Campesino's approach to political theater combined the richness of Chicano theater traditions with a desire to tell stories about campesinos in short plays called actos. In the 1970s and 1980s El Teatro Campesino widened its scope to present an array of brilliantly performed political tragicomedies, including The Great Tent of the Underdogs (La grarcapa de los Rasquachis, 1973), The End of the World (El fin del mundo, 1975), and Zoot Suit (which reached Broadway in 1979), addressing political and social issues of concern to wider American and European audiences.

The Bread and Puppet Theater began in New York City in 1963, when German-born artist Peter Schumann combined his interests in sculpture and dance to create puppet shows that addressed themselves to the same issues and methods other performance forms were tackling. Although early Bread and Puppet shows took place in the context of avant-garde performance in Greenwich Village, Schumann sought to avoid the isolation and exclusivity of the downtown scene by performing in city streets, first with short puppet shows and picture performances, then in community parades supporting Puerto Rican tenants' rights, and ultimately in antiwar protests. In Spanish Harlem in 1966, Schumann and his colleagues created A Man Says Goodbye to His Mother with and for the mothers of soldiers serving in Vietnam, a street show that, according to some critics, was the most influential drama of the Vietnam War period. Schumann's large-scale, expressionist-styled puppets came to define street demonstrations of the Vietnam War era, and his more formal shows about the war, including A Man Says Goodbye to His Mother, Fire (1965), The Cry of the People for Meat (1968), Grey Lady Cantata #2 (1970), and The Birdcatcher in Hell (1971), established a new visual vocabulary for American theater. Like the Living Theatre and other political theater groups, Bread and Puppet's theater work achieved much more critical and financial success in Europe than in the United States, but its influence has been global. In 1970 Bread and Puppet moved to Vermont and began a twenty-seven-year tradition of annual Domestic Resurrection Circuses at its farm in the town of Glover. The last Circus was produced in 1998, but Bread and Puppet continues to perform outdoor shows in Glover, as well as indoor theater spectacles, installations, and street parades around the world.

African American theater has tended to have a political context regardless of the intentions of its makers, at least since W. E. B. DuBois and Alain Locke debated the merits of political art in the 1920s. The Federal Theatre Project deemed Abram Hill and John Silvera's 1938 Liberty Deferred (a Living Newspaper about the history of slavery in the United States) too volatile to be performed. Later, ALICE CHILDRESS's Trouble in Mind (produced off-Broadway in 1955) focused on the problems of racism as they affect African American actors, but the author's refusal to give the play a happy ending prevented it from advancing to Broadway. In this context the 1959 Broadway success of LORRAINE HANSBERRY's A Raisin in the Sun stands out as an anomaly. The 1960s rise of a militant African American political activism spawned the Black Theater movement, in which such playwrights as AMIRI BARAKA and ED BULLINS wrote Black Consciousness dramas that articulated specifically African American characters and situations primarily for African American audiences. Baraka forsook the off-off-Broadway theaters of Greenwich Village for stages in Harlem and then in Newark, New Jersey.

Barbara Ann Teer founded the National Black Theatre in Harlem in 1968 to create "Sunday Afternoon Blackenings" and "Ritualistic Revivals," which were later toured to the Caribbean and Nigeria. Vinnette Carroll, another graduate of Piscator's Dramatic Workshop, founded New York City's Urban Arts Corps in 1967 to encourage young minority theater makers. In 1972 Carroll became the first African American woman to direct a Broadway show: Don't Bother Me, I Can't Cope. Even AUGUST WILSON's 1980s Chekhovian dramas of African American life emerged from the Black Theater movement's development in Pittsburgh, and the inevitable political contexts of race in America were clearly at the center of ADRIENNE KENNEDY's abstract dramas, as well as the later works of ANNA DEEVERE SMITH and SUZAN-LORI PARKS.

The 1950s civil rights movement was not often reflected in mainstream American drama, with the major exception of A Raisin in the Sun. But when the Vietnam War became a contentious issue in the mid-1960s, off- and off-off-Broadway theaters were both available and inclined to include dramas about the war. The Open Theatre performed MEGAN TERRY's satirical musical Viet Rock at La MaMa in 1966; and the following year Macbird! (Barbara Garson's treatment of Lyndon Johnson's presidency as a Shakespearean tragicomedy) was another off-Broadway success. Beginning with The Basic Training of Pavlo Hummel (1971), Vietnam veteran DAVID RABE wrote a series of plays about the conflict—including STICKS AND BONES (1969) and Streamers (1976)—that first appeared at Joseph Papp's Public Theater and then all moved to Broadway. Other Vietnam War dramas, including The Trial of the Catonsville Nine (1970) by activist priest and poet Daniel Berrigan, Tom Cole's Medal of Honor Rag (1977), LANFORD WILSON's The FIFTH OF JULY (1978), and EMILY MANN's DOCUMENTARY DRAMA Still Life (1980), all found audiences off-Broadway and sometimes on Broadway. A signal example of popular Vietnam War theater was Hair: The American Tribal Love-Rock Musical, which moved from Papp's Public Theater to Broadway in 1968. Hair marked the increasing popularity of the American rock musical, but, more important, reflected the kind of rough, intimate ritual performance that the Living Theatre had been developing for years.

With the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, there was no longer one single issue that uniformly troubled all Americans. Instead, a variety of other concerns presented themselves as dramatic material: continuing questions of racism and the identity of African Americans, Latinos, and other minority groups; U.S. policies in Latin America and other parts of the Third World; large-scale threats to the environment; and issues of personal identity radically defined as women's liberation and gay liberation.

With the emergence of identity politics in the 1970s, the politics of particular theater pieces became more diffuse than during the Vietnam conflict. In New York and San Francisco gay theater makers such as Jack Smith, CHARLES LUDLAM, and George Harris had already embraced what Stefan Brecht would call "queer theatre": outrageously stylized celebrations of homosexual existence drawing upon drag performance traditions and all things "camp" (as Susan Sontag had defined the term in 1964). In 1972 Rosalyn Drexler, MARIA IRENE FORNES, Julie Bovasso, Megan Terry, ROCHELLE OWENS, and Adrienne Kennedy formed the Women's Theater Council, an important step in the developing consciousness of feminist issues in American drama, which continued with those dramatists' plays, as well as in the works of WENDY WASSERSTEIN, NTOZAKE SHANGE, EVE ENSLER, and others.

Another new dramatic form with a strong political element that emerged in the 1970s was solo performance, the development of often autobiographical monologues by SPALDING GRAY, Karen Finley, Eric Bogosian, HOLLY HUGHES, Paul Zaloom, and others connected to the new genre of PERFORMANCE ART. Solo performance sometimes embraced political content, but Gray's approach was typical: in Swimming to Cambodia (1985) he succinctly characterized the debacle of the Vietnam War and its murderous spread into Cambodia, but did so as a footnote to the larger story of his ambivalent participation in Hollywood filmmaking. A political debate emerged in 1990 when the "NEA Four"—solo performers Hughes, Finley, John Fleck, and Tim Miller—were denied funding from the National Endowment for the Arts because of their explicit references to sexuality, but the issues of censorship, "indecentcy," and government funding raised by the controversy lacked the nationwide resonance of the previous decades' struggles over civil rights and Vietnam.

The emergence of HIV/AIDS in the early 1980s sparked another revival of American political theater. The first AIDS drama in New York, William Hoffman's As Is (1985), was co-produced off-Broadway by Circle Repertory Company and a gay theater, the Glines, and then moved to Broadway. Shortly thereafter LARRY KRAMER's The Normal Heart (1985) opened at Joseph Papp's Public Theater. The Normal Heart was a polemic focused on American social, medical, and political establishments that, in Kramer's opinion, were in denial about the AIDS crisis. Other off-Broadway and Broadway AIDS dramas followed, including TONY KUSHNER's ANGELS IN AMERICA, Part One: Millennium Approaches (1991), PAULA VOGEL's THE BALTIMORE WALTZ (1992), and TERRENCE MCNALLY's Love! Valour! Compassion! (1994).

Significant drama about AIDS also took the form of solo performance. Wooster Group performer Ron Vawter created Roy Cohn and Jack Smith (1992) to examine how two idiosyncratic gay men dealt both with AIDS and with their homosexual identity. Tim Miller, Ron Athey, Bill T. Jones, and Ethyl Eichelberger also made noteworthy performances about their personal and political connections to AIDS. But again, as during the Vietnam War years, perhaps the most significant political theater about the subject took place in streets and other public places as ACT UP and other AIDS activists created brilliant interventionist public spectacles that placed AIDS in the middle of American (and worldwide) public discourse.

In the postmodern environment of DECONSTRUCTION and untethered signs, ideological certainties and wholeheartedly felt political positions were suspect; and the celebrated alternative theater makers of the "postmodern" moment—RICHARD FOREMAN, the Wooster Group, ROBERT WILSON—tended to avoid the messiness of outright political, philosophical, and even dramaturgical statements in favor of articulating ambiguity. At the end of the century such uncertainties were countered by Iranian American director Reza Abdoh, whose angry critiques of American culture and intolerant global fundamentalisms, such as Quotations from a Ruined City (1994), incorporated existing avant-garde techniques with a clearly politicized and HIV-positive point of view.

At the beginning of the 21st century, and especially after the destruction of the World Trade Center in 2001, many American theater artists once again decided unequivocally that drama and politics had provocative and inspirational links, and once again their efforts ranged from actors' drama—including Tony Kushner's Homebody Kabul (2001) and Tim Robbins's Embedded (2004)—to such activist organizations as Theaters Against War (THAW, begun in 2002), which by 2004 included over 150 theater groups in New York City alone. However, what is remarkable about American political theater in the 21st century is that it prominently includes the longest-lived theater groups in the United States, which still create theater pieces that reflect the times in which we live. In the summer of 2004 the San Francisco Mime Troupe presented Showdown at Crawford Gulch, a critique of George W. Bush and the Iraq War disguised as a western; the Bread and Puppet Theater created its outdoor spectacle The First World Insurrection Circus and a proscenium-stage show, When the World Was on Fire; and the Living Theatre, as the company put it on its website, performed "street actions in response to the Republican National Convention in New York City."

FURTHER READING

- Brecht, Stefan. Peter Schumann's Bread and Puppet Theatre. 2 vols. New York: Routledge, 1988.
- Cohen-Cruz, Jan, ed. Radical Street Performance: An International Anthology. New York: Routledge, 1998.
- Colleran, Jeanne, and Jenny S. Spencer, eds. Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theater. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1998.
- Elam, Harry J. Taking It to the Streets: The Social Protest Theater of Luis Valdez and Amiri Baraka. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1997.
- Sainer, Arthur. The New Radical Theatre Notebook. New York: Applause, 1997.
- Schumann, Peter. "Puppetry and Politics." American Theatre (November 1986): 32–33.

John Bell

POLLOCK, SHARON (1936–)

As one of CANADA's most prolific playwrights, Sharon Pollock's work has also been performed on television, in radio plays, and in feature films. While she has written numerous plays for stage and radio that have been successfully produced, Pollock is probably best known for her stage plays BLOOD RELATIONS (1981; originally titled My Name Is Lisbeth), a two-act drama that deals with the real-life murder suspect Lizzie Borden, and Doc (1986), a play that explores the difficult relationships between an aging doctor and his family, with the title character based on Pollock's father, physician Everett Chalmers. Often invoking innovative dramatic structure, her plays also frequently interrogate historical subject matter, as with 1976's The Komagata Maru Incident, which is based on the true story of Indian Sikh immigrants in 1914 who are refused permission to Canadian land; similarly her more recent Angel's Trumpet (2001) follows the relationship of real-life figures Zelda and F. Scott Fitzgerald.

Pollock was born Mary Sharon Chalmers in Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1936. She did not begin writing her first play, A Compulsory Option, until she was pregnant with her sixth child. This first play—sometimes known as No! No! No!—went on to win the Alberta Culture playwriting competition in 1971 and was staged the following year at Vancouver's New Play Centre. Since that early theatrical success, Pollock has gone on to win numerous awards and honors, only a few of which include Canada's national literary award, The Governor General's Award, for 1981's Blood Relations and again in 1986 for Doc; 1987's Canada Australian Literary Award; a Japan Foundation Award in 1995; and the Harry and Martha Cohen award in 1999, which resulted from her major contributions to Calgary theater.

Although Pollock attended the University of New Brunswick, in 1954 she left before graduating to marry Ross Pollock, with whom she had five children, and relocated to Toronto. After separating from Pollock, she and her children returned to Fredericton, and she eventually found work at the Playhouse Theatre. There Pollock performed many jobs, including some work as an actor. By 1966, however, she moved again to Calgary with her children and actor Michael Ball. In Calgary she continued ACTING and writing and earned the Dominion Drama Festival award for her performance in THE KNACK, ANN JELICOE's play about the bumpy relationships shared by four young people in the 1960s. In addition to Pollock's prodigious career as a playwright and her work as a performer, she has worked as a playwrighting instructor, screenwriter, film director, and producer. She has also served as the artistic director at both Theatre Calgary (1984) and Theatre New Brunswick (1988). In 1996 Pollock wrote, produced, and directed the feature film Everything Relative. This lesbian comedic drama, dealing with a group of college friends who assemble for a tumultuous weekend reunion, received mixed reviews. For the most part Pollock continues to make Calgary her home base, where she devotes much of her time to supporting Canadian theater and young playwrights.

SELECT PLAYS: A Compulsory Option (1970); Walsh (1972); The Komagata Maru Incident (1976); The Wreck of the National Line Car

(1978); Generations (1980); One Tiger to a Hill (1980); Blood Relations (1981); Doc (1986); Fair Liberty's Call (1993); Angel's Trumpet (2001); End Dream (2003)

FURTHER READING

- Bessai, Diane. "Women Dramatists: Sharon Pollock and Judith Thompson." In Post-Colonial English Drama: Commonwealth Drama Since 1960, ed. by Bruce King. London: Macmillan, 1992. 97–117.
- Grace, Sherrill. "Creating the Girl from God's Country: From Nell Shipman to Sharon Pollock." Canadian Literature 172 (Spring 2002): 92–112.
- Nothof, Anne F., ed. Sharon Pollock: Essays on Her Works. Toronto: Guernica Editions, 2000.
- Zimmerman, Cynthia. Playwriting Women: Female Voices in English Canada. Toronto: Simon & Pierre, 1994.

L. Bailey McDaniel

POLYGRAPH

Polygraph, co-created by Robert Lepage and Marie Brassard, uses the lie detector as a metaphor for the tenuous line between truth and fiction. Several story lines intersect, as David Haussman, a German scientist lecturing on criminology and the use of the polygraph, meets Lucie, a young woman in the metro at the scene of a suicide, and they become romantically involved. Their relationship becomes more complicated when it is revealed that François, Lucie's friend, was investigated for a murder years ago by Haussman. Despite passing the polygraph test, François is still haunted by the memory of his friend's death and the investigation and has come to doubt his own innocence. Lucie, an actress, has been cast in a movie about this incident. As the lives of François, Lucie, and David become more involved, the play blurs the line between fiction and truth, constantly manipulating the audience's perspective by collapsing time, replaying key moments, and drawing on a filmic language to foreground how perception shapes truth. Filmic projections of titles mark each of the scenes. Actors shift positions to indicate a classic "top shot" of the corpse, for example, or speed through a choreographed sequence to indicate the passing of time.

As in all of Lepage's work, the play's meaning is created through a complex interplay of images. Realistic scenes from the different story lines are augmented by poetically choreographed moments that accentuate or finish a scene but do not explain it or offer narrative conclusions. Rather, the audience is left to infer meaning. Language becomes just another device for demonstrating the malleability of form: in the first scene of the play, for example, David's speech on Berlin and Lucie's recitation of an autopsy report are intercut, using some of the same lines, and the parallel between the city and the individual is made clear.

Although the play draws on crime drama for its mood and plot, its implications are larger reaching. The play is a meditation on the ephemeral nature of truth, drawing attention to its own manipulation of the audience as viewing positions constantly shift. The voyeurism of film and the intrusion of technology are pitted against trust and faith as pacts between human beings. As Michael Sidnell (1990) points out, the play both draws attention to and denies the body's materiality, with a constant attention to the actors' engagement with objects. Perhaps this ambiguity is due, in part, to the collaborative and open-ended nature of the process of creation that Lepage and Theatre Repère drew on in creating this piece. Gyllian Raby, translator for the English version, notes that the script was actually written down in English before French and serves, in some ways, as a temporary record of a piece that is continually evolving. In this way, Lepage makes the experience of his plays a co-creation with his audience. James Brunzli (1999) uses the term "décalage" to describe the displacement that is inherent in Lepage's work: the use of other languages (without translation), the disjunctions between scenes, the estrangement achieved by the manipulation of perspective. In these spaces, the audience finds its engagement.

FURTHER READING

- Bunzli, James. "The Geography of Creation: Décalage as Impulse, Process, and Outcome in the Theatre of Robert Lepage." TDR: The Drama Review: A Journal of Performance Studies 43, no. 1 (T161) (Spring 1999): 79–103.
- Charest, Rémy. Robert Lepage: Connecting Flights. Tr. by Wanda Romer Taylor. London: Methuen, 1997.
- Donohoe, Joseph I., and Jane M. Koustas, eds. Theater sans frontières: Essays on the Dramatic Universe of Robert Lepage. East Lansing: Michigan State Univ. Press, 2000.
- Sidnell, Michael. "Polygraph: Somatic Truth and an Art of Presence." Canadian Theatre Review 64 (Fall 1990): 45–48.
- Zirardo, Cristiana. "Lepage's Polygraphie in Italy." Canadian Theatre Review 105 (Winter 2001): 16–19.

Marlene Moser

POMERANCE, BERNARD (1940–)

. . . Many people knew the right better than they knew themselves.
Or any force that moved them silently.
Right eluded them. And came catastrophe.
—Sara Lane, Scene 17, Quantrill in Lawrence

Expatriate playwright and poet Bernard Pomerance was born in New York City on September 23, 1940. After graduating from the University of Chicago, Pomerance, then an aspiring novelist, relocated to ENGLAND to write. Attracted by the political commitment and artistic freedom of London's fringe theater scene of the 1970s, he abandoned the novel for playwriting and, with director Roland Rees, co-founded Foco Novo, a radical theater company that took its name from a fictitious group of South American guerrillas in Pomerance's play of the same name. Rees subsequently produced all of Pomerance's work through The Elephant Man (1977).

In the UNITED STATES, Pomerance has been known primarily for the highly successful 1979 Broadway debut of Elephant Man, which tells the story of John Merrick, a freak show performer in 19th-century London whose body was hideously deformed by neurofibromatosis. Structured in a series of brief episodes, the play traces Merrick's "rescue" from the brutal humiliations of a side show by Dr. Frederick Treves, a rising young London surgeon who provided Merrick with a home at London Hospital, as well as education and entrée into the highest echelons of London society—where Merrick continued to find himself an object of curiosity, study, and revulsion. Under the direction of Jack Hofsis, Elephant Man garnered three Tony Awards in 1979, including Best Play; three Obies; the Drama Desk Award; and the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award. Notoriously media shy, Pomerance flew back to London the night he received the Tony.

While critics have remarked on the apparent influence of BERTOLT BRECHT (whose Man Is Man Pomerance adapted) on The Elephant Man, the body of Pomerance's work runs a stylistic gamut from NATURALISM to EPIC THEATER and poetic drama. The common thread throughout his writing is a pronounced leftist sociopolitical critique.

Pomerance's work following the Elephant Man includes two more historical plays, this time set in the United States. The first of these, Quantrill in Lawrence (1980), fictionalizes a particularly nasty piece of Civil War history—the burning of Lawrence, Kansas, one of the war's many atrocities—to bring to the surface the event's archetypal resonances: its cyclic and self-perpetuating violence and its echoes of Cain and Abel. In the introduction to his Collected Plays (2001), Pomerance wrote that Melons (1985) "was sparked off by reading Geronimo's memoirs and accounts of turmoil instigated on New Mexico pueblos by U.S. authorities, both civil and religious." Concerning the history that underpins Melons, Pomerance wrote simply: "after such knowledge, what forgiveness?" In 1987 he returned to his advocacy for Native American rights in a collection of poems titled We Need to Dream All This Again (1987), a poetic account of Custer, Crazy Horse, and the Battle for the Black Hills.

Pomerance has dubbed his own playwriting "Left-rationalist" and said in a 1979 New York Times interview that "if you point out an error and appeal for the reason, that is a step in the right direction." The function of theater, he suggested, "is some form of social memory. It serves to bring back points that are too volatile, too dangerous to be lived everyday—the skeletons in the closet, the guilt." According to Pomerance, his function as a playwright is to remind the audience of truths known but denied or forgotten: "I'm not bringing hot news. My interest in the audience is to remind them of a common thing, and if only temporarily, they do then become a unity, a community."

PLAYS: High in Vietnam, Hot Damn (1971); Hospital (1971);

Thanksgiving Before Detroit (1971); Foco Novo (1972); Someone Else Is Still Someone (1974); A Man's a Man (adaptation of the play by Bertolt Brecht, 1975); The Elephant Man (1977); Superhighway (1978); Quantrill in Lawrence (1980); Melons (1985); Hands of Light (1989)

FURTHER READING

Honegger, Gitta. "How American It Is: Lessons from the Melon Patch." Theater 19, no. 2 (1988): 58–64.

Larson, Janet L. "The Elephant Man as Dramatic Parable." Modern Drama 26, no. 3 (1983): 335–356.

Owen, Michael. "The Enigmatic Author of the Elephant Man." New York Times (February 4, 1979).

Kathryn Syssoyeva

POOR THEATER

No matter how much theater expands and exploits its mechanical resources, it will remain technologically inferior to film and television. Consequently I propose poverty in the theater. . . . The essential concern is finding the proper spectator-actor relationship.

—Jerzy Grotowski, Towards a Poor Theatre, 1984

Poor theater is the methodological province, chiefly, of the Polish director and theorist Jerzy Grotowski (1933–1998), who coined the term. He was the director of the Teatr 13 Rzedow (later the Polish Theater Laboratorium) from 1959 to 1979 and, at the end of his life, the Grotowski Workcenter. His most famous production, Akropolis (1962), dramatized, through poetry and an extremely physical mise-en-scène, the morbidity and spiritual struggle of Auschwitz inmates.

Caught between the hard line of Stalinism and the recent thaw in church and state relations in Władysław Gomułka's POLAND after Joseph Stalin's death, Grotowski (though trained at Moscow's state theater school) was a controversial artist. Often subjected to censorship, he was relegated to a small provincial theater in Wrocław, in rural Silesia. With the help of Eugenio Barba and Jean Julien, Grotowski attained international renown in 1966 at Barrault's Theater of Nations in Paris, with another poetic and physical production, The Constant Prince. The theory, poor theater, was pronounced in his 1968 book Towards a Poor Theatre. Poor theater refers to the essential arrangement Grotowski believed theater requires: the audience-performer relationship. All other aspects of production can fall away through a process he called via negativa. Theater has no genuine need for costume, scenery, lighting effects, props, music, text, a theater edifice. They are unnecessary unless they contribute to engendering audience participation in the performance on a visceral level. To attain this ideal and to transform this and other theoretical propositions into practice, Grotowski ceased to direct public performances in 1971. His subsequent work in theater was as an advanced pedagogue working on training regimens with professional actors that matured into what he called "actions" and were demonstrated before "witnesses" at the Grotowski Workcenter in Pontederra, ITALY.

He has influenced many contemporary practitioners, notably Eugenio Barba, Peter Brook, ARIANNE MNOUCHKINE, and Richard Schechner. What emerges from the practice of poor theater is the power of the performer's living organism (body and voice) to do the most compelling work in the theater. Text and all nonliving theatrical materials must function as vehicles for an existential depth that transmits from performer to audience. Ideally, Grotowski said, via negativa poor theater allows the actor's body to vanish, making his or her impulses visible to the audience. Much work has been done in the spirit of Grotowski that is not necessarily poor theater but rather a kind of "grotowskianism" in which physicality and voice play a prominent role, but mostly for aesthetic affect. Genuine poor theater is not so conscious of itself and is usually the product of a theater group's exigent circumstances or the product of years of experimentation. Grotowski was often more interested in ritual and folk traditions as manifestations of his theories rather than pursuing any interest in mainstream theater.

[See also Boal, Augusto; Environmental Theater; Guerrilla Theater; Interculturalism]

FURTHER READING

- Barba, Eugenio. The Land of Ashes and Diamonds; My Apprenticeship in Poland. Aberystwyth: Black Mountain Press, 1999.
- Grotowski, Jerzy. Towards a Poor Theatre. Ed. by Eugenio Barba. 1968. Kent: Methuen, 1984.
- Kumiega, Jennifer. The Theater of Jerzy Grotowski. London: Methuen, 1985.
- Richards, Thomas. At Work with Grotowski on Physical Actions. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Wolford, Lisa. Grotowski's Objective Drama Research. Jackson: Univ. of Mississippi Press, 1996.

Seth Baumrin

POPESCU, DUMITRU RADU (1935–)

Born in Păpușa, a village near Oradea, ROMANIA, on August 10, 1935, Dumitru Radu (D. R.) Popescu is considered one of the most prolific and prominent of Romanian writers from the communist era. His literary activity began during the early communist regime and has spanned over four decades and a wide range of genres. His first short story "The Chess Game" ("O partiță de șah," 1954) and his first play The Mother (Mama, 1960), followed by his first film scenario A Smile in the Middle of the Summer (Un surâs în plină vară), established his voice in Romanian dramatic literature. An output of more than forty titles followed. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, his plays achieved widespread success.

In his literary works, Popescu sharply criticizes the transformation of Romanian society under communism of the pre-Ceaușescu era. Many of his plays deal with the cruelly enforced collectivization of private farms during the Stalinist dictatorship of G. Gheorghiu-Dej. Other plays deal with philosophical and existential questions of the human condition.

In his first play, The Mother, a mother, in her dreams, brings her son back from the war, thus restoring the atmosphere of her former harmonious and peaceful family life. In Cat on the New Year's Eve (Pisica în Noaptea Anului Nou, 1970), one of his most controversial plays, Popescu also uses a family setting in which the father, who had disappeared during the great purges, reappears twenty years later as Santa Claus on New Year's Eve. A series of terrible happenings, real or imaginary, punctures the consciousness of the dinner guests, who are forced to reveal their true moral quality. In a complex political-philosophical study, The Dwarf in the Summer Garden (Piticul din grădina de vară, 1971), Maria, the main character, is convicted of subversive political activity and condemned to death. However, since she is pregnant, the punishment is postponed until she gives birth to a baby boy. Popescu uses the nine-month reprieve to analyze the power play between the victim, a fearless antifascist fighter of strong character, and her tormentors.

Heavily indebted to the surrealists and the absurdist style of the 1960s, his DRAMATURGY oscillates between the unreal and the fantastic, though his plays often are set on the border between the real and the imaginary. Drawn from legends and myths, his characters are a mixture of real people and ghosts from another time and place. Deliberately obscure at times, Popescu's plays defy categorization, and he stands as a unique phenomenon in the modern Romanian theater. Above all, his great success despite his open criticism of communism and the aberrations of those in power remains a mystery. He received prestigious prizes for his plays from the Romanian Academy of Letters and remained for many years the president of the Romanian Writers Union.

SELECT PLAYS: The Mother (Mama, 1960); The Summer of Impossible Love (Vara Imposibilei Iubiri, 1966); Dream (Vis, 1968); Those Sad Angels (Acești îngeri triști, 1969); Cat on the New Year's Eve (Pisica în Noaptea Anului Nou, 1970); The Dwarf in the Summer Garden (Piticul din grădina de vară, 1971); The Shakespeare Bird (Pasărea Shakespeare, 1973); The Lame Rabbit (Iepurele șchiop, 1980); The Pelican Reservation (Rezervația de Pelicani, 1983); The Angels' City (Orașul Ingerilor, 1985); A Handkerchief on the Danube (O batistă în Dunăre, 1997)

FURTHER READING

- Iosif, Mira. Teatrul nostru cel de toate serile [Our Theater of Every Morning]. București, România: Editura Eminescu, 1979.
- Micu, Dumitru. Scurtă istorie a literaturii române. IV. Perioada contemporană dramaturgia critică. [Short history of Romanian literature. IV. Contemporary period dramatic criticism]. București, România: Editura Iriana, 1997.
- Popescu, Dumitru Radu. Teatru [Theater]. București, România: Editura Cartea Romanesca, 1974.

Moshe Yassur

POPOVIĆ, ALEKSANDAR (1929–1996)

Aleksandar Popović is one of the most important Serbian dramatists of the second half of the 20th century. Both his biography and the unique features of his works make Popović one of the most interesting and original figures in the history of Serbian drama and theater. With some literary education but no formal qualifications, Popović took up various trades in his youth (which would also be reflected in his works), only to completely devote himself to professional writing for the theater, film, and television in the late 1960s. He was a prolific playwright (considered to have written around forty plays), but as he was a true theater man who wrote plays to be performed onstage, most of his texts have not survived to this day.

When they appeared, in the mid-1960s, the plays of Popović represented a radical change compared to previous trends in Serbian drama. The first thing apparent in them is the break with classical drama: the story is not developed causally, and the characters lack any psychological content. Instead of classical narration, different means of composition are introduced: cyclic events with a semblance of development, sudden and random twists in the plot, and self-sufficient rules of the game.

In terms of genre, Popović's plays can most readily be defined as FARCES (this definition is used by the author himself). The farcical elements in his works are numerous: his portrayal of lower classes of society, situations based on misunderstanding, erotic elements, and fast rhythm. In the view of Mirjana Miočinović, the leading expert on Popović's works, the topics of his farces are not really typical of the genre. Thus, for example, the farce called Ljubinko and Desanka (Ljubinko i Desanka, 1964) is about the futility of waiting; and this kind of seemingly comical treatment of the topic of waiting (and the impossibility of change) creates an association with SAMUEL BECKETT's WAITING FOR GODOT, which had, along with other works of the Theater of the Absurd, an undeniable influence on Popović.

Although Popović's theater is antimimetic, it still sets the outlines of a familiar world. That is the world of Belgrade's pseudo-urban outskirts and its tradesmen, pub owners, and junior clerks. His treatment of this world is not ideologically sharp—all you feel is a very harmless irony. As Slobodan Selenić correctly noted, there were some elements of sharper social criticisms in some later Popović farces; thus, the play The Development of Bora the Tailor (Razvojni put Bore Šnajdera, 1967) illustrates all the shortcomings of socialist economy: the political interests present, incompetence, irresponsibility, disinterest in work.

The most unique and valuable quality in Popović's plays is his language. The language becomes a dramatic element in its own right and, as such, a factor in character buildup. This language is unique: it is the jargon of different guilds of tradesmen from the city outskirts, which is almost unintelligible to ordinary audiences. Apart from the comic effect, this kind of language creates a bit of BERTOLT BRECHT's distancing effect.

This self-sufficient quality of the language, coupled with the already analyzed deviation from classical narration, is what sets Popović's plays apart from REALISM. In the national context, Popović's works are significant precisely for this radical break with realism.

PLAYS: Ljubinko and Desanka (Ljubinko i Desanka, 1964); A 100 Loops (Stocking Čarapa od sto petlji, 1965); The Development of Bora the Tailor (Razvojni put Bore Šnajdera, 1967); Lethal Motorcycle Racing (Smrtonasna motoristika, 1967); The Spawning of Carp (Mreščenje šarana, 1984)

FURTHER READING

- Galonja, Miroslav. "Coffee with Mira: Interview: Aleksandar Popovic, Playwright." Vreme News Digest Agency, no. 132 (April 4, 1994). http://www.scc.rutgers.edu/serbian_digest/132/t132-4.htm.
- Marjanović, Petar. Srpski dramski pisci XX stoleća [The 20th century Serbian playwrights]. Belgrade: Belgrade Drama Faculty, 2000.
- . "The History of Serbian Culture." Serbian Unity Congress. http://www.oea.serbian-church.net/culture/history/Hist_Serb_Culture/chp/The_Theatre.html.
- Miočinović, Mirjana. Foreword to Izabrane drame [Selected drama], by Aleksandar Popović. Belgrade: Nolit, 1987.
- Selenić, Slobodan. Foreword to Antologija savremene srpske drame [Anthology of contemporary Serbian drama]. Belgrade: SKZ, 1977.

Ivan Medenica

PORGY AND BESS

DuBOSE HEYWARD is best known for his libretto and songs for Porgy and Bess. A humorous newspaper clipping about a black man trying to outrace policemen in a goat cart inspired Heyward's "convincing" novel Porgy (1925)—about Charleston's black community in the fictional Catfish Row. DuBose and DOROTHY HEYWARD adapted his novel into the hit play Porgy for the THEATRE GUILD (1927), and with George and Ira Gershwin, he revised this into the now more famous "folk opera" (1935). The novel's phonetic spelling of Gullah dialogue becomes less obtrusive in both scripts. Retaining the story and somewhat stereotypical characters, the dramatizations successively reduce the novelist's somewhat patronizing tone. The folk of Catfish Row grow better without commentary and with fewer condescending black jokes.

Catfish Row comes alive Saturday evening with singing and chatter. Jake and Clara lullaby their baby; God-fearing Serena scolds Robbins not to play craps tonight. The cripple Porgy, returning in his goat cart from begging in town, denies being "soft" on Crown's Bess: "When Gawd make cripple, He mean him to be lonely." The big handsome stevedore Crown arrives with Bess for the craps game and, drunk and belligerent, fights with Robbins, killing him with his cotton-hook. As all flee the courtyard, Crown tells Bess he will be back for her. Patriarchal Maria refuses to harbor the "liquor guzzlin' slut," but Porgy does. An unwelcome Bess arrives in Serena's room the next day with Porgy and contributes to the "saucer" burial fund and to singing the spirituals.

Soon Porgy tells Bess, "You is my woman now" and with Maria persuades her to go along to picnic on Kittiwah Island without him. There Crown draws Bess into the palmettos. A week later Porgy prays and conjures to cure the still feverish, delirious Bess. He promises he will not let Crown "handle" her with his "hot han[ds]." The hurricane bell sounds. Terrified residents gather to withstand the "Judgment Day" storm with "shoutings" and spirituals. Crown knocks like Death and barges in, taunting God and Porgy with nasty humor. Clara, spotting Jake's capsized boat, gives Bess their baby and rushes out. Bess's challenge, "Ain't dere no man here?" sends Crown out after her.

When Crown returns for Bess, Porgy kills him. Summoned to identify Crown, Porgy expects the corpse to bleed in its killer's presence. In novel and play, he tries to flee the police in his goat cart. Later learning that Bess left for New York with Sporting Life, in play and libretto Porgy sets out after her in his pathetic cart.

From the era of blackface COMEDY and few serious roles for black actors, Heyward's large-cast plays of Porgy and Bess portray one vitally primitive community that resists the incursions of a dominant alien society with resilient dignity. While Duke Ellington debunked the "lampblack Negroisms" and questioned the fit of such "grand music and a swell play, (Morrow, 1935)" history has recognized a "masterpiece of American musical theater." Heyward's public sympathy and "understanding" kept pace with and contributed to white America's slow racial progress.

[See also United States]

FURTHER READING

Alpert, Hollis. The Life and Times of Porgy and Bess: The Story of an American Classic. New York: Knopf, 1990.

Hutchisson, James M. DuBose Heyward: A Southern Gentleman and the World of Porgy and Bess. Jackson: Univ. Press of Mississippi, n.d. [c. 2000].

Morrow, Edward. "Duke Ellington on Gershwin's Porgy." New Theater (December 1935): 5–6.

Schiff, David. "The Man Who Breathed Life into 'Porgy and Bess.'" New York Times (March 5, 2000).

Standifer, James. "The Tumultuous Life of 'Porgy and Bess.'" Humanities (November–December 1997): 8–12, 51–54.

John G. Kuhn

POSIBILISMO AND IMPOSIBILISMO

The concepts of posibilismo (possibilism) and imposibilismo (impossibilism) hark back to a polemic emerged around 1960 between the two playwrights who initiated a radical change in the post-civil war Spanish theater: ANTONIO BUERO VALLEJO and ALFONSO SASTRE. The realist aesthetic proved well suited to the desire of these authors to express a imaginary world that is at the same time profoundly realistic, allowing the use of realist language to convey highly artistic and ideological concepts. Right away a controversy arose between the two supporters of the committed realist theater about the way to denounce the unjust situation in post-civil war SPAIN. Buero, the representative of posibilismo, tried in a subtle, indirect way that would take advantage of any oversight by the censors to defend freedom and protest the dictatorship. Sastre, on the other hand, represents imposibilismo because he altogether rejected the strategy of referring to Spanish reality in an indirect way. Sastre imbued some of his plays with Marxist ideals—which, to his mind, made them an instrument of revolutionary action. Thus, his plays attempt to do more than represent life or inspire thought. Sastre's plays aimed to incite action.

Numerous authors abandoned their efforts to fight for a different theater. However, the ones that persevered did so with a passionate critical spirit. The different approaches reflected a polemic about submission or resistance to the rules imposed by the system, a polemic that reached its boiling point in 1960 when Sastre published the article "Teatro imposible y pacto social" (Impossible Theater and Social Pact). In the article, Sastre accuses the playwrights Alfonso Paso and Buero Vallejo of conforming to the rules imposed by the control mechanisms of the regime. Indeed, Alfonso kept himself aligned with the pacto social (social pact of some intellectuals with the regime) and was able to premiere numerous plays. Buero soon replied to Sastre in another article, "Obligada precisión acerca del 'imposibilismo,'" (Forced Precision About "Impossibilism" [1960]), arguing that there is no such thing as an impossible theater because everything is possible, unless there is a concrete physical obstacle to its realization. Buero concludes that Spain, especially at this time, needed a theater of the possible. He advocated a committed, risky form of theater that found its way not only into scripts but also into performances for the public.

The impact of this academic discussion was so great that the debate between posibilismo and imposibilismo has become an intrinsic part of the history of 20th-century Spanish theater. The importance of these different attitudes toward theater is reinforced by the fact that the authors identified above played a major role in changing the outlook of post-civil war Spanish theater and also because 1960 marked the birth of a new generation of playwrights, who were thoroughly affected by this polemic. They would soon embrace the commitment and social protest inherited from their realist predecessors and suffer the consequences when theater houses refused to present their plays because of their realist charged content.

FURTHER READING

Buero Vallejo, Antonio. "Obligada precisión acerca del 'imposibilismo.'" [Forced precision about impossibilism]. Primer Acto 15 (1960): 1–6.

- Delgado, Maria. Spanish Theatre, 1920–1995: Strategies in Protest and Imagination 3. Contemporary Theatre Review. Amsterdam: Harwood Acad. Pubs., 1998.
- Halsey, Martha T. Antonio Buero Vallejo. Twayne's World Authors Series. New York: Twayne, 1973.
- O'Leary, Catherine. The Theatre of Antonio Buero Vallejo: Ideology, Politics and Censorship. Woodbridge: Tamesis, 2005.
- Ruiz Ramón, Francisco. "Testimonio y compromiso: Buero Vallejo y Alfonso Sastre" [Testimony and Commitment: Buero Vallejo and Alfonso Sastre]. Historia del teatro español [History of Spanish Theater. Twentieth Century]. Siglo XX. Madrid: Cátedra, 1975. 337–420.
- Sastre, Alfonso. "Teatro imposible y pacto social" [Impossible theater and social pact]. Primer Acto 14 (1960): 1–3.
- . Anatomía del realismo [Anatomy of realism]. Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1965.
- Schwartz, Kessel. "Posibilismo and Imposibilismo: The Buero Vallejo–Sastre Polemic." Revista Hispánica Moderna 34 (1968): 436–445.

Jorge Herreros and Benito Gómez

POSTMODERNISM

Postmodernism has been theorized as a "condition" that led to various cultural, social, and artistic movements. In the sense that it is a "condition," postmodernism refers to the period of late capitalism directly following modernism. Hence, postmodernism might be thought of as a total rejection of the values of modernism. Postmodernism has sometimes been called "antimodernism."

However, "antimodernism" implies a logical progress to history, and it was Jean-François Lyotard (1984) who signaled the beginning of postmodernism in his rejection of "grand narratives"—sometimes called master narratives—or the teleological progression of history. Lyotard saw the postmodern not as a rejection of modernism but as a deepening of modernism's unanswered questions. His critique of history also exposed the dramaturgical structure involved in the writing of history, particularly in conservative Marxism, which implies an ending point to history—part and parcel of the Enlightenment project.

Instead of an end point to history, postmodernism often sees repetition and reiteration as the only certainty. As Herbert Blau (1992) writes, "If we can believe the history of modernism, we are living in the double bind, the history that always repeats itself." For postmodern playwright SUZAN-LORI PARKS history is condemned to repetition, what she calls in her AMERICA PLAY "the great hole of history." This repetition is often termed pastiche, a form used because "the producers of culture have nowhere to turn but to the past: the imitation of dead styles," according to Frederic Jameson (1991), "or to the radical cannibalization of the past." The Wooster Group's L.S.D. (. . . Just the High Points) (1985) is a clear example of pastiche, in that the piece collided

Timothy Leary's psychoactive drug experiments with ARTHUR MILLER'S THE CRUCIBLE to explore both Leary and John Proctor (the protagonist of The Crucible) as scapegoats of their culture. L.S.D. grew doubly ironic when Miller threatened to sue the Wooster Group for unauthorized use of his play.

In his (re)making project (1992–present), CHARLES MEE uses the repetition of history as a starting point, and he begins with ancient Greek plays and rewrites them to include the language of popular culture. He also does not claim ownership of his plays but invites others to rewrite them by making them available on the Internet. This impulse might derive from Roland Barthes's 1968 essay "The Death of the Author," which he believed signaled "the birth of the reader." The ideology of absolute truth and authorial ownership had been erased.

Postmodern German playwright HEINER MÜLLER embraced this concept in his rewrite of Hamlet, titled HAMLETMACHINE (1977), which climaxes in an actress burning a picture of the author. In her 1983 essay "The Death of Character," Elinor Fuchs points to an American postmodernism that moves away from the psychological REALISM of characters and toward a new space where theater itself becomes self-referential. Postmodernism signals the proliferation of identities, a sense of history as repetition, which is often expressed as pastiche, and a movement away from Enlightenment values into a space where personal experience is valued over cultural hierarchies.

[See also Deconstruction; Foreman, Richard; Identity Theater; Interculturalism; Performance Art; Performance Studies; Philosophy and Drama]

FURTHER READING

- Auslander, Philip. From Acting to Performance: Essays in Modernism and Postmodernism. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Birringer, Johannes. Theatre, Theory, Postmodernism. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1991.
- Blau, Herbert. To All Appearances: Ideology and Performance. New York: Routledge, 1992.
- Fuchs, Elinor. The Death of Character, Perspectives on Theater After Modernism. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1996.
- Jameson, Frederic. Postmodernism, or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism. Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 1991.
- Kaye, Nick. Postmodernism and Performance. London: Macmillan, 1994.
- Lyotard, François. The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge. Tr. by Geoff Bennington and Brian Massumi. Foreword by Frederic Jameson. Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1984.

Kara Reilly

THE POWER OF DARKNESS

The Power of Darkness (Vlast' t'my), a naturalistic play in five acts by LYOV TOLSTOY, was written in 1886 and published the following year; but because of its uncompromising treatment of murder, adultery, and infanticide, it was banned from performance at the insistence of the Procurator of the Holy Synod. The play's premiere was given, in French, by ANDRÉ ANTOINE at his Theatre Libre in Paris on February 2, 1888, and received with acclaim. Its Russian premiere was staged in St. Petersburg in 1895 by the Literary Artistic Circle headed by ANTON CHEKHOV's friend, publisher Aleksei Suvorin. It was originally written at the request of actor P. A. Denisenko, who was planning a journal devoted to the idea of a "People's Theatre," and Tolstoy based it on the actual trial of one Yefrem Koloskov, details of which the Tula regional prosecutor had communicated to him:

This was the case of the murder of a peasant girl's new-born child by its father, a distant relative with whom she lived in the same family and in the same house. The peculiar characteristic of the case, aside from the dramatic setting of the murder itself, was the conduct of the murderer, who, racked by conscience, publicly confessed of his own accord to the crime. Later he craved trial and punishment, and, even though he was convicted and sentenced to hard labor, he was pleased with the penalty, considering it as the expiation of his sin.

The play's subtitle, If the Claw Is Caught—the Whole Bird Is Lost, is a clue to its moral emphasis—the need to avoid dipping even one's toe into the muddy waters of immorality without risking total immersion—in this case, in lust leading to murder. The "darkness" of the title refers not only to abstract notions of evil but also to the fact that the peasants live in the darkness of ignorance and deprivation as a direct consequence of their social position in 19th-century feudal RUSSIA. The play also portrays the power of ruthless women—in this case, of Anisya, second wife to a sickly husband, Pyotr, whom she poisons with the help of her lover's mother, Matryona. Anisya's motive to do away with her husband, a well-to-do peasant, is to get her hands on his money and to have unrestricted access to Nikita, a good-looking farm laborer in their employ, seven years her junior. Following the murder, of which Nikita is ignorant, Anisya marries him, only to be repulsed by him when he discovers the truth about Pyotr's death. He has already impregnated an orphan girl, whom he now abandons, despite his God-fearing father Akim's plea for him to do the decent thing and marry her. He turns his attention, instead, to Pyotr's sixteen-year-old daughter by his first marriage, Akulina, who is both deaf and mentally retarded. She has a child by him, but since she is betrothed to another, Anisya and Matryona conspire to kill the baby and bury it in the cellar. Nikita crushing the baby's skull with a board is one of the most powerful scenes in 19th-century drama. The dénouement occurs at Akulina's wedding when Nikita makes a public confession of his crime and Akim assures him of God's forgiveness.

FURTHER READING

Orwin, Donna Tussing, ed. Cambridge Companion to Tolstoy. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2002.

Simmons, Earnest J. Introduction to Tolstoy's Writings. Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1968.

Tolstoy, L. The Power of Darkness. In Plays, tr. by Louise Maude and Aylmer Maude. 3rd ed. London: Oxford Univ. Press, 1957.

Wilson, A. N. Tolstoy: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1988.

Nick Worrall

THE POWER PLAYS

The Power Plays, by Toronto playwright GEORGE F. WALKER, are a loose trilogy featuring a portly antihero named Tyrone Power. He explains in Filthy Rich that he has a 1940s movie star's name because his mother was a romantic. Unlike his namesake, this Tyrone Power is sloppy, unromantic, unattractive, and only involved in the plot through the machinations of other characters.

Gossip was first produced in 1977, Filthy Rich in 1979, and The Art of War in 1983. Until 1977 Walker's plays were staged almost exclusively at Toronto's Factory Theatre Lab, attracting a cult following but not making an impression on the broader regional or international stage. Gossip indicated the path Walker was to follow in many subsequent plays. The byplay between FARCE, gritty, often violent REALISM, and social commentary established Walker's predominant style for the next two decades.

Gossip, the first in the series, keeps the social commentary to a minimum. The first image is a minimalist art show at which a murder is committed, indicating that the play is at least as concerned with satirizing art making as commenting on social conditions. There is a vague political corruption plot about a conspiracy to run an illegal mine in a Third World nation, but the plot is overshadowed by the comic absurdity of the characters, relationships, and the film-noire style. Power unravels several murder-conspiracy strands in the dénouement of the play in the style of Sam Spade, Charlie Chan, and a dozen other B-movie detectives. The most surprising thing about Gossip is how consistent it is as a mystery, including a satisfying ending for the audience if not for the hero who remains nihilistic and depressive at play's end.

At the beginning of Gossip, Power is a journalist who uses his political column as a vehicle for attacking the establishment until his boss, Baxter, insists that he drop the political beat to investigate the murder of "Bitch Nelson" in the art gallery. The caricature of a callous newspaper magnate would return in a much more frightening form years later in Walker's play Beautiful City, but the Baxter of Gossip is essentially a foil for the hero. Gossip is metatheatrical with actor characters and a running gag that actors will do anything for money and an Actors Equity card. The final scene includes outrageous revelations, Baxter pretending to be hopelessly drunk, and a faked murder.

The second Power Play, Filthy Rich, is substantially more focused than Gossip, in part because it takes place entirely in Power's sleazy office. He has quit his job as a journalist and lives in a derelict neighborhood, trying to write a novel. Once again he is unwillingly drawn into the role of private detective, but this time the motivation comes partly from a new character, Jamie Mclean, a young, working-class man who cleans his office and insinuates himself into Power's life as a "positive force." Power is initially hostile toward Jamie, who interrupts his drunken self-pity.

Filthy Rich strikes a delicate balance between social content and COMEDY. Michael Harrison, a candidate for Mayor, has disappeared, and somehow one of Power's old journalist friends is involved. Power has even more threatening foils than in Gossip, such as twin spider-women, Ann and Susan Scott, a coarse, corrupt policeman called Stackhouse, and "one of those killers who really kill" called "The Pig." Power sums up the machinations of the plot near the end as "the obvious becoming mysterious becoming disastrous."

The comedy takes a dark turn when Power's ex-associate turns up dead while trying to deliver blackmail money to Power. The comedy takes an even darker turn when Jamie apparently gets shot dead by Susan Scott. Power seems to have lost both his old and new friend and decides to throw the half million dollars out the window, yelling to the crowd below: "Don't vote for Michael Harrison!" Jamie turns out to be alive, after all, having put blanks in Susan's gun, and tries to stop Power. Despite Jamie's anger at losing the money, the two characters seem genuinely linked in the end.

The Art of War is by far the most didactic of the series, pitting flabby, liberal idealists against ruthless military fanatics and their Third World allies who are unambiguously described as fascists. The urban, film noir backdrop is dispensed with in favor of rural Nova Scotia. Power is the driving force behind the action rather than a naturally passive, unwilling participant, as in the earlier plays. The play begins with a grisly murder, but Power's character seems to have been genuinely rejuvenated by his relationship with Jamie, established in Filthy Rich.

The Art of War is the least comic of the series, and the relationship between Power and his young partner Jamie is less engaging than in Filthy Rich because Power's transformation seems to be complete. The villain of The Art of War is John Hackman, a retired army general who has been reassigned to the Ministry of Culture. At one point Power and Hackman actually debate culture directly, and Walker treads dangerously close to pendency by allowing his protagonist to step out of character and speak directly for the author. The play's ending is the most depressing in the series because Power's character had seemed to transform into a genuine hero, yet his humanistic scruples are proven inadequate against a villain of Hackman's stature.

As in the end of Filthy Rich there is an ambiguous death scene, but this time it is Jamie who cradles Power in his arms, fearing that Power will die. "I'm tired of losing. It's so depressing" are his final words, and it is difficult not to share his depression. Unlike TRAGEDY in which the death of the hero seems to serve a purpose, Walker avoids pathos by not quite killing Power off, choosing instead to reinforce the futility of his life instead. L. W. Conolly (1987) has praised the tough-mindedness of The Art of War, calling it "an intelligent play that doesn't sit well with the other two," but while The Power Plays do not form a legitimate trilogy, The Art of War would not appear as profound without the perfected farce of its predecessors.

FURTHER READING

Bruckner, D.J.R. "Filthy Rich: A Sleuth Spoof." New York Times (October 8, 1985): 13.

———. "The Art of War." New York Times (April 28, 1987): 13.

Conolly, L. W. "Dramatic Trilogies." Canadian Literature, no. 112 (Spring 1987): 110–112.

Walker, Craig Stewart. "George F. Walker: Postmodern City Comedy." In The Buried Astrolabe: Canadian Dramatic Imagination and Western Tradition. Montreal: McGill Univ. Press, 2001. 264–354.

Walker, George F. Shared Anxiety. Toronto: Coach House Press, 1994.

Donald Cameron McManus

POWER VERSUS LAW

Written by Xing Yixun and premiered in 1979 by the China Youth Art Theater in Beijing, Power Versus Law (Quan yu fa) was an immediate success and remained one of the most influential plays in early post-Mao CHINA that addressed the issue of the Chinese Communist Party corruption right after the end of the Cultural Revolution.

Set in 1978, Power Versus Law recounts how Ding Mu, inspired by the party's campaign to reestablish legal systems after the arrest of the Gang of Four, writes a letter to the press exposing the criminal acts of Cao Da, the deputy secretary of the municipal party committee who embezzled public funds for flood victims in order to build his luxurious house. Confident that his past revolutionary record entitles him to special privileges, Cao Da threatens to arrest Ding Mu on the groundless charge that she murdered her husband during the Cultural Revolution to enhance her chances of winning over another man. Under these circumstances, Luo Fang, the newly appointed secretary of the municipal party committee, wins Ding Mu's trust and encourages her to come forward, and she finally succeeds in exposing Cao Da. Unusually in Chinese theater, the play also depicts a courageous news reporter and editor who dare to publish articles against corruption and media censorship, with Luo Fang's support.

The play, which caused a national sensation, raised the topical issue: do those in power have the right to abuse their power and to take reprisals against those who challenge them? Can socialist China practice law and justice against its own members of the ruling party? Unlike other plays of the period, such as Sha Yexin's If I Were for Real, which was criticized for addressing the issue of corruption and privilege, Power Versus Law was praised as a positive example by depicting Luo Fang, the perfect party official, thus providing people with hope for a bright socialist future. But the play also presents a Cao Da whose real-life counterparts were too obvious to miss. Cao Da did not even back down after Luo Fang's well-known central passage: "Don't forget, in this city you're not the foundation but a pillar. You and I both! If we're crooked, people have the right to knock us down. The same applies to those in still higher positions, even in the Central Committee. If anyone breaks the law as you have done, the people have the right to bash him down. Today [holds up the incriminating material] the people are going to bash you!" (act 3). Such a climactic scene cleverly kills two birds with one stone: it satirizes a scoundrel and celebrates an idealized image of Luo Fang, both in the ruling Communist Party, thus winning acceptance from different sectors of society. Many audiences approved Luo Fang's heroism, which offered hope for a better party after the Cultural Revolution, while others pointed to the scarcity of his counterparts in real life. For officials eager to preserve the status quo, he could be used as a cover for their faults and even help establish their new legitimacy. For those inclined to subversive sentiments, he bolstered their conviction that such a paragon could only be found onstage. The play was promoted by the purveyors of official ideology and was also celebrated for its counterdiscourse, appreciated by some audiences attuned to its dichotomies and ironies.

FURTHER READING

Chen, Xiaomei. Acting the Right Part: Political Theater and Popular Drama in Contemporary China. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 2002.

——, ed. and intro. Reading the Right Texts: An Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama with a Critical Introduction. Honolulu: Univ. of Hawaii Press, 2003.

Xing Yixun. Power Versus Law. Chinese Literature 6 (1980): 31–91.

Yan, Haiping, ed. Literature and Society: Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1998. 123–261.

Xiaomei Chen

PRAGA, MARCO (1852–1929)

Marco Praga was born in Milan in 1852, the son of Emilio Praga, a leading member of the Milanese scapigliatura, a group of self-styled bohemian writers who opposed the materialistic values of ITALY's newly industrialized society. Marco, on the contrary, like GIUSEPPE GIACOSA, Girolamo Rovetta, and fellow Milanese playwrights Camillo Antona-Traversi and ROBERTO BRACCO, embraced bourgeois society, questioning its moral ideals and examining its effects on the family and on its most vulnerable members, its women. Nearly all of Praga's twenty-two plays deal with love triangles and adulterous relationships celebrating his heroines' ambivalent triumphs over morally bleak situations. His best plays treat the status of women in society with psychological insight approaching that of AUGUST STRINDBERG, HENRIK IBSEN, and ANTON CHEKHOV.

In The Virgins (Le vergini), which premiered in 1889, three unmarried sisters are called "virgins" with ironic reference to their independent behavior. The youngest sister, disillusioned with society's values, finds an alternative to marriage in a stage career, joining a company that specializes in light opera. In ONDINE (L'Ondina, 1903), however, a young gentleman who has married a former dancer dies in despair of his choice. (An English translation of this play by Denis St. Cyr is available in typescript in the New York Public Library.)

Praga's successful The Ideal Wife (La moglie ideale) was written for Eleanora Duse, who introduced the play in 1890 in Turin. The play's "ideal wife" simultaneously maintains an affectionate relationship with her husband, who suspects no infidelity, and a passionate affair with her lover. She is the "modern woman," capable of dividing herself between her lover and her home where she enjoys "the emotions, satisfactions, duties and the rights a girl acquires when she becomes wife and mother." The wife's cynical posture is blamed on a society "full of contagious vices, where a woman inhales temptations with the air she breathes, and everything conspires against her humanity." Following the success of The Ideal Wife, the composer Giacomo Puccini asked Praga to write a libretto for a new Manon Lescaut, but after a disagreement over the opera's third act, Praga withdrew from the project.

In 1923 Eleanora Duse brought Praga's Closed Door (La porta chiusa) to America. The play's female protagonist is a woman defined by motherhood. Having given up her lover, the father of her son, in order to raise her child in a respectable home, she must also give up her son, who leaves home when he discovers that his birth was illegitimate. "Children," her priest says, "should belong only to the mother; marriage should be abolished, the mother alone is sacred." Performing an English translation of the play by A. S. MacDonald, Duse alternated Closed Door with plays by Henrik Ibsen, Tomasso Gallerati-Scotti, and GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO at the Century Theatre in New York City. Charlie Chaplin reviewed her Los Angeles performance of Closed Door enthusiastically.

Praga's theatrical life included his tenure as director-manager of the Manzoni Theater of Milan from 1913 to 1917, where he inaugurated LUIGI PIRANDELLO's Others' Reason (Ragione degli altri). He was artistic director of Silentium Film of Milan. From 1896 to 1911 he presided over the Italian Society of Authors and Publishers. An anthology of reviews and commentaries abstracted from ten volumes of Cronache Teatrali (Theater Reports), published from 1919 to 1929, was edited by Ruggero Rimini and published in 1979. Praga died in Varese in 1929.

PLAYS: Encounter (L'Incontro, 1883); The Two Houses (Le Due case, in collaboration with V. Colombo, 1884); The Friend (L'Amico, 1886); Giuliana (1887); Sorrowful Mother (Mater dolorosa, 1889); The Virgins (Le vergini, 1889); The Ideal Wife (La moglie ideale, 1890); The Sweetheart (L'Innamorata, 1891); Hallelujah (Alleluja, 1892); The Spell (L'Incanto, 1892); The Heir (L'Erede, 1893); Fair Apollo (Il Bell'Apollo, 1894); The Mother (La Mamma, 1895); Doubt (Il Dubbio, 1899); The Moral of the Tale (La Morale della favola, 1899); Ondine (L'Ondina, 1903); The Crisis (La Crisi, 1904); The Closed Door (La porta chiusa, 1913); The Divorce (Il Divorzio, 1915); Orestes, Pilade and Pippo (Oreste, Pilade e Pippo, 1932)

FURTHER READING

- Bondanella, Peter, Julia Conaway Bondanella, and Jody Robin Shiffman, eds. Dictionary of Italian Literature. Rev., exp. ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- Enciclopedia dello Spettacolo* [Encyclopedia of theatrical art]. Rome: Maschere, 1954–1962. 7:419–421.
- Pullini, Giorgio. Marco Praga. Bologna: Cappelli, 1960.
- Weaver, William. Duse: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1984.

Nancy Dersoff

THE PRETENDERS

A man may die for the life work of another; but if he lives, he must live for his own.

—Earl Skule, Act 5

HENRIK IBSEN's The Pretenders (Kongs-Emnerne), a historical drama in five acts, was first performed at the Christiania Theater in January 1864 under the direction of Ibsen himself. The Pretenders takes its material from the period of the civil wars in NORWAY in the 13th century, when the monarchic succession was in dispute and a number of pretenders with varying degrees of legitimacy fought for recognition, among them the play's two protagonists, King Håkon Håkonsson and Earl Skule. The conflict between Håkon and Skule constitutes the central thematic axis of the play. It reaches its climax after Skule has let himself be proclaimed king of Norway. During the gathering for his inaugural blessing in the Cathedral of Nidaros, Skule's son Peter, blinded by his father's borrowed grand design, steals the shrine of St. Olaf from the cathedral in order to let Skule be consecrated as king according to Church ritual procedures. As a consequence of this blasphemous deed, Skule's opponents are mobilized and his supporters put to flight, and after a dramatic episode in the monastery of Elgeseter, where Skule and his son have arranged a meeting in order to kill Håkon's son, father and son are persuaded by the women of the family to expiate their crime, to walk unarmed out of the monastery, and to let themselves be slain by Håkon's men.

In Ibsen's play Bishop Nikolas is the very incarnation of a cunning intriguer who, since he himself is neither by virtue of birth nor by power of manhood able to become or suited to becoming king, sees it as his mission in life to set in motion a perpetuum mobile, that is to say, to initiate mechanisms that have the effect that none of the other pretenders can ever gain acceptance as the only rightful heir to the throne. Even on his deathbed, he stages a perpetuation of this uncertainty in a masterly piece of orchestration by letting Skule unknowingly burn the letter that would have settled the question regarding Håkon's right to the throne. In this character Ibsen provided a masterful study in the art of compensation psychology.

The relation between Håkon and Earl Skule implies the conflict between a man with an unfailing belief in himself and his own calling and a man who in spite of his excellent abilities has doubts about his legitimate right in the struggle for the throne. The great difference between Håkon and Skule is that while the former has a grand vision he intends to put into effect, the latter is basically a pure medieval power politician with Machiavellian features. King Håkon is the legitimate heir to the throne because he has a vision to unite Norway as kingdom into becoming one "people," while Earl Skule lacks any such vision and would rather copy that of Håkon.

In The Pretenders Ibsen breaks the classical unities of time and place. The play comes closer to the romantic drama of the kind one finds represented in William Shakespeare and Friedrich Schiller—with great leaps in time and space, with alternation between crowd scenes and individual appearances, frequent changes of scene, and a large cast.

FURTHER READING

- Brynhildsvoll, Knut. "Ibsen's Pretenders and Schiller's Demetrius Fragment. Similarities and Differences Regarding the Concept of Historic Tragedy." In Astrid Ibsen, Tragedy, and the Tragic, ed. by Astrid Sæther. Oslo: Centre for Ibsen Studies, 2003. 73–83.
- Kittang, Atle. "The Pretenders—Historical Vision or Psychological Tragedy?" In Ibsen Yearbook. Oslo: Universitets forlag, 1976. 78–88.

Knut Brynhildsvoll

THE PRICE

ARTHUR MILLER's The Price opened at the Morosco Theatre in New York on February 7, 1968, and ran for 131 performances. It was played without an intermission. Earlier, during the Philadelphia tryout, it had been done in two acts, which is the way it appears, somewhat deceptively, in published editions. In an author's production note, Miller indicates that although the act designations provide for a place to interrupt the play, "an unbroken performance is preferable." Act 2 opens with the stage direction: "The action is continuous."

Another of the many Miller plays about quarreling brothers, The Price brings together Victor and Walter Franz for the first time in sixteen years. They have come to dispose of an attic full of furniture from the house they grew up in—that is, to face their past. In Timebends (1987), Miller tells how he discovered the dining room table that had been the center of activity in his childhood home and that it became a prominent part of the discarded jumble onstage at the Morosco; but he also insisted that the characters were not based on him and his brother Kermit. Victor Franz is in a kind of spiritual stasis, haunted by the suspicion that his life and his marriage to Esther have no meaning and that there must be someone or something to blame for his being a police sergeant instead of a successful scientist, for his having sacrificed his career perhaps unnecessarily to his father, broken by the crash and the Depression. Walter, a fashionable surgeon whose losses—a divorce, estrangement from his children, a nervous breakdown—have made him doubt the value of his success is in need of forgiveness for the wrong that he may or may not have done Victor in letting him assume the burden of caring for their father. In the big confrontation scene between them, the talk that Esther so believes in fails to bring them into each other's arms. Walter storms out in anger, but Victor seems to have found his own way to an acceptance of his life as it is. There is so much talk about talk in the play that it is possible to see it not only as still another Miller example of a man's need to face the consequences of his acts but also as a critique of the efficacy of the American fondness for talk as therapy.

The most interesting talker in the play and one of the best and funniest characters in the Miller canon is Gregory Solomon, the ninety-year-old furniture dealer who has come to bid on the contents of the attic. Beginning as a standard Russian-Jewish stereotype, he turns into a formidable comic character—garrulous, crotchety, apothegmatic—whose long scene with Victor shows talk as a human and humanizing activity and leads the younger man to his self-realization. Gregory is both an embodiment of and the voice of a positive power of life: "it's not that you can't believe nothing, that's not hard—it's that you still got to believe it."

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

Martin, Robert A., ed., Arthur Miller, New Perspectives. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1982.

Miller, Arthur. Timebends: A Life. New York: Grove, 1987.

—. Echoes Down the Corridor, Collected Essays, 1944–2000. Ed. by Steven R. Centola. New York: Viking, 2000.

Gerald Weales

PRIESTLEY, JOHN BOYNTON (1894–1984)

John Boynton (J. B.) Priestley produced a vast and intimidating body of literature as a novelist, critic, essayist, and screenwriter, but his contributions to drama in the 1930s and 1940s overshadow nearly all his other work. Particularly in his "Time Plays," Priestley sought to relax the naturalistic standards of the British theater through experiments in expressionistic staging, the combination of music and dialogue, and a thematic emphasis on the enduring spiritual and supernatural realities that, he believed, undermine the authority of the visible world.

Priestley was born in 1894 in the wool-manufacturing town of Bradford in Yorkshire, ENGLAND, to a progressive Baptist schoolmaster father and an Irish mother who died shortly after his birth. He enlisted in World War I and served in the trenches in FRANCE, where a mortar bomb badly wounded him. The brutality and muddle of the war haunted Priestley throughout his career. Likewise, the prewar England of his childhood became Priestley's standard for a lost Paradise in plays such as When We Are Married (1938) and Summer Day's Dream (1949). After the war, he attended Cambridge University, married the first of his three wives, and moved to London to work as a professional writer.

Priestley established his reputation as a popular literary figure with his bestseller The Good Companions (1929), an amiable picaresque about a theatrical troupe in the 1920s. He adapted the novel for the stage as a musical entertainment with Edward Knoblock in 1931 and followed it with the enormously successful DANGEROUS CORNER (1932), a formulaic whodunit with discussions about the indeterminacy of truth that he later dismissed as a "box of tricks." Priestley continued to make use of conventional stage genres to accommodate his metaphysical and political preoccupations in his subsequent plays. The Time Plays, many of which borrow from the detective genre and include Time and the Conways (1937), I Have Been Here Before (1937), Johnson Over Jordan (1939), and arguably AN INSPECTOR CALLS (1945), exemplify Priestley's lifelong inquiry into the nature of temporal perception. In these plays, Priestley popularizes the thought of contemporary time theorists, specifically Russian mystic P. D. Ouspensky and British mathematician J. W. Dunne, while modifying them to fit his own evolving ideas. For Priestley's characters, philosophical discussions about the illusory nature of time and change offer an intellectual consolation that combats the destructive forces of aging, failure, and disillusionment. Alan Conway, for instance, the ineffective younger brother in Time and the Conways, maintains hope when his more ambitious siblings crumble because he realizes that any single moment in a life is merely a cross section of a transcendent self that cannot be damaged by passing time.

Priestley often matched his metaphysical speculations with deliberately antinaturalistic staging to find new forms of communicating subjective or supernatural material in a primarily realistic medium. In Johnson Over Jordan, a collaboration with Benjamin Britten that incorporates music, masks, and dizzying lighting and set changes, Priestley uncovers the neglected spiritual life of a 20th-century Everyman on the threshold of death. Critics of Priestley's experimental staging have often complained that it seems oddly noncommittal, however, grounded somewhere between NATURALISM and SYMBOLISM. Throughout his career, in fact, Priestley resisted comparisons to AVANT-GARDE theater movements in continental Europe. Priestley's nostalgic regard for Georgian England and its theater mixed uneasily with his calls for artistic, political, and philosophical open-mindedness. Later generations of theatrical reformers typed Priestley as the representative of a complacent, pipe-smoking generation that remained entrenched in the outdated assumptions of the 1930s and 1940s. JOHN OSBORNE levels a particularly aggressive attack at Priestley in LOOK BACK IN ANGER (1956), for instance, when Jimmy Porter characterizes him as "like Daddy—still casting well-fed glances back to the Edwardian twilight from his comfortable disenfranchised wilderness."

His later serious drama is more often concerned with the state of England and the disappearance of a more civilized way of life that flourished before the Cold War and the advent of mass consumer culture. Perhaps his most significant contribution to postwar drama is his theory of "dramatic experience," discussed at length in The Art of the Dramatist (1957). According to Priestley, watching a play does not require suspension of disbelief but rather the simultaneous experience of immersive belief and critical disbelief, the sensation that a theatrical production is at once artifice and existential truth. Theater becomes a metaphor for those moments of heightened awareness when one glimpses the life behind appearances as well as the most reliable avenue to that life.

Priestley died of complications related to pneumonia at Kissington Tree House near Stratford-upon-Avon on August 14, 1984, and was given a memorial service at Westminster Abbey. His ashes are in the graveyard of the church at Hubberholme in the Yorkshire Dales.

SELECT PLAYS: Dangerous Corner (1932); I Have Been Here Before (1937); Time and the Conways (1937); When We Are Married (1938); Johnson Over Jordan (1939); An Inspector Calls (1945); Ever Since Paradise (1947); Summer Day's Dream (1949); Dragon's Mouth (1952); The Glass Cage (1957)

FURTHER READING

- Atkins, John. J. B. Priestley: The Last of the Sages. New York: Riverrun Press, 1981.
- DeVitis, A. A., and Albert E. Kalson. J. B. Priestley. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980.
- Innes, Christopher. "J. B. Priestley: Temporal Dislocation and Transcendence." In Modern British Drama 1890–1990. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1992.
- Klein, Holger. J. B. Priestley's Plays. New York: St. Martin's, 1988.
- Priestley, J. B. The Art of the Dramatist. London: Heinemann, 1957.

Lawrence Switzky

PRINCESS POCAHONTAS AND THE BLUE SPOTS

Written by Monique Mojica with original music by Alejandra Nunez, Princess Pocahontas and the Blue Spots was first fully produced at the Theatre Pass Muraille Backspace in co-production with Nightwood Theatre from February 9 to March 4, 1990. Prior to its formal debut, it was presented as a work in progress at various festivals, including the Groundswell Festival of New York by Women in November 1989. The play received positive reviews at the time of its performance and has since attracted significant academic interest. Excerpts from the play have been included in various anthologies devoted to Native and feminist writing.

The play explores how dominant Western culture has represented the Native women of North and Central America over the past 400 years, from "storybook Pocahontas" to Malinche, interpreter and strategist for Hernando Cortez, to the "cigar store Squaw." The play's parodic performances of "Indianness" unfix the traditional stereotypes of Native women and enable Mojica to present more nuanced images of Native women. Indeed, in an editorial for the Canadian Theatre Review (1991) Mojica addressed the singular importance of Native self-definition: "We must not remain forever the 'other,' either relegated to quaint folklore or elevated to mystic exoticism." With this exhortation in mind, Mojica has iconic figures such as fur-trader woman, mistress, and Indian Princess speak as individuated women. Their stories are set alongside the stories of Contemporary Woman #1 and Contemporary Woman #2 in a way that highlights the connections among women without minimizing the particularity of individual experience. Says Contemporary Woman #1: "I don't want to be mistaken for a crowd of Native women. I am one."

Mojica organized the play into thirteen "transformations, one for each moon in the lunar year." In one of the most affecting scene changes, the satiric humor of the "498th annual Miss North America Beauty Pageant"—won by Princess-Buttered-on-Both-Sides—shifts to the fact-based accounts of murdered American Indian movement activist Anna Mae Aquash and the torture of contemporary Chilean women. The play's two actors each play multiple roles; in the original production, Mojica appeared as Princess Buttered-on-Both-Sides, Pocahontas-Matoaka-Lady Rebecca, and Malinche, while Nunez played such roles as Host, The Blue Spots, Troubadour, Spirit-Sister, and Musician. The set design and costuming also reinforce the play's central theme of transformation. Props start out as one thing but become something else. Costumes and props are left to accumulate onstage to remind the audience of the many narratives told; by the play's end the stage is littered with the remnants of all thirteen transformations. The nonlinear structure, the multiple roles, and the repeated transformations of space, time, and characters collectively resist traditional theatrical closure. The play's final stage directions: "Blind Faith leaps in the dark."

[See also Canada]

FURTHER READING

- Knowles, Ric. "Translators, Traitors, Mistresses, and Whores: Monique Mojica and the Mothers of the Metis Nations." In Sitting the Other: Revisions of Marginality in Australian and English-Canadian Drama, ed. by Marc Maufort and Franca Bellarsi. Brussels: Presses Interuniversitaires Européennes, 2001.
- Mojica, Monique. Princess Pocahontas and the Blue Spots. Toronto: Women's Press, 1991.
- . "Theatrical Diversity on Turtle Island: A Tool Towards the Healing." Canadian Theatre Review 68 (Fall 1991): 3.
- Tompkins, Joanne. "'Spectacular Resistance': Metatheatre in Post-Colonial Drama." Modern Drama 38 (1995): 42–51.

—. "The Story of Rehearsal Never Ends": Rehearsal, Performance, Identity in Settler Culture Drama." Canadian Literature 144 (Spring 1995): 144–161.

Andrea R. Stevens

PRIVATE LIVES

Let's savour the delight of the moment. Come and kiss me darling, before your body rots, and worms pop in and out of your eye sockets.

—Elyot Chase, Act 2

NOËL COWARD's Private Lives (1931) opened to rave reviews for its comic brilliance and effervescent performances of its stellar cast that included Coward, Gertrude Lawrence, and Laurence Olivier. The play was written over four days while Coward was bedridden in Shanghai with the flu. One critic, writing for The Tatler about that original production, wrote that "as a means of topical refreshment it has all the tonic qualities of a first-rate cocktail." Such a description is fitting to describe what is expected of a "Noël Coward play"—acerbic wit, the chaotic upset of good manners, and costumes and sets almost excessive in their expression of wealth and fine taste. Yet Private Lives, within its historical context, is an unexpected play, arriving on the scene when, for example, economic depression is creating much more socially conscious playwrighting across the Atlantic by writers such as CLIFFORD ODETS and ELMER RICE. The English had weathered a rough few decades at the dawning of the 20th century, experiencing a waning empire, a lost generation of young men through military conflict, and vastly changing social roles for men and women. While Coward's play only alludes to this background once (with a remark about the Titanic), Private Lives on one level is about how to respond to things falling apart.

Structurally, the play rejects two central components of drama: plot and closure. Little happens after the end of act 1, when ex-spouses Elyot Chase and Amanda Prynne, after meeting on a shared terrace as each begins their honeymoons with their new partners, Sibyl and Victor, decide to elope together. Act 2 consists of much aimless talk and bickering between Amanda and Elyot in a Paris flat, culminating with the arrival of Sibyl and Victor. The final act is centered on figuring ways out of the "hell of a mess socially" in which the four find themselves, and a proper breakfast slowly deteriorates into argument. Ultimately, Victor and Sibyl explode with rage against one another, neatly mirroring the relationship of their hosts who silently slip out the door together at the end of the play. Rather than maturing Elyot and Amanda, Coward allows their particular brand of passion, alternating between intense lovemaking and equally vituperative quarreling, to become infectious, creating a second pair of loose ends at the play's conclusion.

On the surface, Private Lives reflects the younger, wealthy set's rejection of rigid Victorian codes of morality and gender, rebelling against unnatural standards of acceptability since, as Amanda says to Victor, "very few people are completely normal really, deep down in their private lives." They are part of a generation sure that the values they inherited are worn out but unsure of what should replace them. Elyot repeatedly entreats Amanda to adopt his principle of flippancy, to "enjoy the party as much as we can," to "be superficial and pit the poor philosophers," to savor the delight of the moment" before death. Such ways of thinking and behaving drive the play as the characters, in Jean Cocteau's words, "use their charm as a way of surviving" with "no commitments to anyone but themselves." Some critics have seen Coward's metaphysics as a forerunner for the sensibility of the Theater of the Absurd and his style as laying the foundation for later "serious" playwrights such as SAMUEL BECKETT, HAROLD PINTER, and EDWARD ALBEE.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

FURTHER READING

Kaplan, Joel, and Sheila Stowell, eds. Look Back in Pleasure: Noël Coward Reconsidered. London: Methuen, 2000.

Lahr, John. Coward, the Playwright. London: Methuen, 1982.

Lesley, Cole. Remembered Laughter: The Life of Noël Coward. New York: Knopf, 1976.

Mander, Raymond, and Joe Mitchenson. Theatrical Companion to Coward: A Pictorial Record of the Theatrical Works of Noël Coward. 2d ed. London: Oberon Bks., 2000.

Christopher Wixson

PROBLEM PLAY

The term problem play was coined by Sydney Grundy (says drama critic William Archer) as the English equivalent of the French pièce à thèse, a play with a thesis. Camille, the play by DUMAS FILS, proved to be highly controversial because it pictured a courtesan in a favorable light, sacrificing her own happiness for the sake of her young and ardent lover. Théodore Barrière took a sceptical view of the demimonde in his play Marble Girls (Les filles de marbre, 1853), and two years later, Émile Augier in his Olympe's Marriage went on the offensive, arguing that these high-class prostitutes were infiltrating good society and destroying it. Augier's position was that once they have married into a fine family, there was no getting rid of them, except by the most radical means. His courtesan Olympe is in a position to blackmail her husband and to demand whatever she wants. She brazenly outfaces the aged head of the family, who shoots her before killing himself. This ending was meant to be shocking, and if one wishes to make a distinction between a problem play and a thesis play, this is a thesis play. The problem is not debated; it is solved with a pistol shot.

However, most of the plays that dealt with social issues introduced scenes in which there was some discussion pro and con. Often in the problem play, there would be a character, known as a raisonneur, in a supporting role, a character who represented the viewpoint of the author.

When Dumas fils took up the subject of disreputable women who make a place for themselves in the best families, as in The Demi-Monde (Le Demi-Monde, 1855), he presented what amounted to a debate, but with the scales tipped against the unvirtuous woman. In The Natural Son (Le Fils Naturel, 1858), he dealt with the question of illegitimate sons, arguing that they should be formally recognized as legal heirs in order not to add to the number of uprooted elements in society.

In the preface to the play as published in 1868, he expressed the significance of this new kind of drama. "The old society is collapsing in all respects. All the original laws, all the fundamental institutions, earthly and divine, are being put to the question. Opinions waver and shake, feelings are suspect, the truths of another time tremble before this new wind."

Dumas fils was the true father of the problem play, and from FRANCE it spread to other European nations. In Copenhagen, the young radical critic Georg Brandes in 1871 reprimanded Danish writers for being behind the times, still committed to old religious beliefs and artistic conventions, and he urged them to follow the French example and "submit problems to debate." He had no idea of the impact that simple phrase would have.

In NORWAY, BJØRNSTJERNE BJØRNSON quickly obliged Brandes, producing A BANKRUPTCY (En fallit) in 1875, and HENRIK IBSEN reluctantly fell into step with PILLARS OF SOCIETY (1877). For his first venture into the new genre, Ibsen chose financial speculation as his subject (as in a number of French plays, such as Augier's Maître Guérin). It was an enormous success both in Norway and in GERMANY. Thereupon Ibsen wrote A DOLL'S HOUSE and GHOSTS, the two most famous (and notorious) of all problem plays.

In Germany, GERHARDT HAUPTMANN achieved notoriety with his study of the degeneration of a family, Before Sunrise (Vor Sonnenaufgang, 1889). In ENGLAND, OSCAR WILDE, with AN IDEAL HUSBAND, (1895) and ARTHUR PINERO, with THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY (1892), proved the commercial value of the problem play, when carefully handled. But the true disciple of the problem play in England was GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, who began his playwriting career with a drama about slum landlords, Widowers' Houses (1892). He defined the beginning of modern drama as the discussion scene that ends A Doll's House (in the 1913 edition of The Quintessence of Ibsenism), and he turned increasingly to a form of drama in which debates swallowed up the plots, producing what are more plays of ideas than plays about people.

The problem play was an outgrowth of REALISM and paved the way for NATURALISM. Many early realistic plays were highly entertaining affairs, meant to appeal to the rising bourgeoisie. Dumas fils, however, wanted the theater to be more than entertaining. In his preface to The Natural Son he denounced the apostles of art for art's sake, "three words absolutely devoid of meaning," and called for a useful or utilitarian theater. "Any literature that does not aim at the perfectibility of mankind, at improved morals, at the ideal, in a word, the utilitarian, is a literature stunted and unwholesome, dead at birth."

Problem plays came under attack from two sides. Critics found many of them didactic and inartistic. The characters were often mere stick figures, serving as spokesmen for different positions, and the plays themselves no more than propaganda. Censors condemned many problem plays because they dealt with offensive subjects. To circumvent the government authorities, problem plays were often first performed privately. Such was the case with Before Sunrise (incest and degeneracy), EUGÈNE BRIEUX's Damaged Goods (Les Avariés) (venereal disease), and Shaw's Widowers' Houses (slum landlords). Shaw's MRS. WARREN'S PROFESSION (prostitution) was given a private performance in 1902 but not allowed to be presented publicly in England until 1925.

The term is usually reserved for and associated with plays written in the 1860–1930 period. In the 1930s, the time of the Great Depression in America, the problem play took the form of DOCUMENTARY DRAMA in which plot and character were less important than hard facts. Authored by Arthur Arent, One Third of a Nation dealt with slums in the large cities. An offstage voice calling itself the "Voice of the Living Newspaper" offered much of the factual material and gave the name Living Newspaper to a number of similar productions.

FURTHER READING

- Brandes, Georg. "Inaugural Lecture 1873." In The Theory of the Modern Stage, ed. by Eric Bentley. Baltimore: Penguin, 1968.
- Dumas fils, Alexandre. Préface [Preface] to Le Fils Naturel [The Natural Son]. In Théâtre complet [Complete theater]. Vol. 3. Paris: Calmann Lévy, 1893.
- Henderson, Archibald. "The New Forms." In The Changing Drama. New York: Henry Holt, 1914.
- Shaw, Bernard. "The Problem Play—A Symposium." In Shaw on Theatre, ed. by E. J. West. New York: Hill & Wang, 1958.
- Stuart, Donald Clive. "French Realistic Drama. The Problem Play." In The Development of Dramatic Art. New York: Appleton, 1928.

Evert Sprinchorn

PROCESSIONAL

JOHN HOWARD LAWSON's Processional, subtitled "a jazz symphony of American life," opened on January 12, 1925. Directed by Philip Moeller with scenic design by Mordecai Gorelik, the production ran ninety-six performances.

Processional is a nonrealistic, highly theatrical play set during a labor dispute between West Virginia coal miners and their management. Inspired by JAZZ music and vaudeville, Lawson draws a loose picture of American social concerns in the 1920s. His own Marxist politics are apparent throughout the play, as is his opinion of the bankrupt nature of traditional theater in America: "It is only in the fields of vaudeville and revue," writes Lawson in his preface to the play, "that a native craftsmanship exists."

The play uses theatrical space in unorthodox ways. With the auditorium lights on throughout the show, several characters enter through the audience aisles, including nine musicians, "The Jazz Miners," whose music punctuates the play. Processional's plot structure is episodic and fragmented, based more on an evening of vaudeville entertainment than on a traditional stage play, but nonetheless a story is being told.

Isaac Cohen is a Jewish store keeper in a West Virginia coal mining town. In the midst of a violent labor strike, Cohen's daughter Sadie has a sexual encounter with Dynamite Jim, a young country man who has accidentally murdered a soldier sent to squash the strikers. Jim is captured by the Ku Klux Klan and is taken off to be hanged for the murder. Unbeknownst to everyone, Jim is cut down from his lynching ropes by a farmer. Blinded by the Klan's vicious attack but still alive, Jim flees the town.

Time passes, and Sadie discovers that she is pregnant by Jim, a fact that thrills her even as it enrages Cohen and other members of the community. The Klan attacks Sadie, but her father—hidden among their ranks dressed as a Klansman—rescues her. At this moment, Jim surprises everyone by seemingly returning from the dead. He is married on the spot to Sadie, pleasing Cohen and Jim's mother so much that they contemplate marrying each other as well. Suddenly, the pro-labor fighters arrive to triumphantly announce their victory over management and the Klan. The play ends with a rousing procession, the jazz band leading the actors offstage and out through the auditorium.

Cohen is portrayed as a "vaudeville type of Yiddish figure" with a "lisp that makes his caressing voice a little ridiculous." His dual purpose in the play is to act as authoritative figure in Sadie's story and to represent Jewishness onstage as a foil to the other American character types presented. These other Americans include a socialistic Polish immigrant, a glad-handing politician in a tall silk hat, a deaf Civil War veteran, and a minstrel-style "Negro" character. Lawson's use of stereotypes is interesting because while the characters frequently engage in silly dialogue and stage business reminiscent of vaudeville COMEDY, they sometimes show genuine humanity and believability.

In 1937, Processional was revived by the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT and ran for eighty-one performances.

[See also United States]

FURTHER READING

- Carr, Gary L. The Left Side of Paradise: The Screenwriting of John Howard Lawson. Ann Arbor: UMI Res. Press, 1984.
- Hyman, Colette A. Staging Strikes: Worker's Theatre and the American Labor Movement. Philadelphia: Temple Univ. Press, 1997.
- Mishra, Kshamanidhi. American Leftist Playwrights of the 1930s: A Study of Ideology and Technique in the Plays of Odets, Lawson, and Sherwood. New Delhi: Classical Pub. Co., 1991.

Watson, E. Bradlee. Contemporary Drama: European, English, Irish, and American Plays. New York: Scribner's, 1941.

DeAnna M. Toten Beard

PROFESSOR BERNHARDI

It is really terrible that here in Austria all questions of personnel end in the political sphere.

—Ebenwald, Act 3

Although ARTHUR SCHNITZLER subtitled Professor Bernhardi a "comedy in five acts," there is little occasion to laugh at this sociopolitical satire of turn-of-the-century Vienna. Written in 1912, the play premiered in November of the same year in Berlin, even though the director, OTTO BRAHM, was initially skeptical because, he claimed, the issues were Viennese and not pertinent to Berlin. Indeed, the play is about the very politics that barred it from the Viennese stage until 1918, when censorship was lifted after the collapse of the Habsburg monarchy at the end of World War I. The play's political intrigues are intertwined with the anti-Semitism that led to its prohibition in Vienna and also foreshadow attitudes that impelled Adolf Hitler's rise to power in GERMANY and his popularity in Austria.

The plot is set in motion when Professor Bernhardi, the Jewish director of the Elisabethinum Clinic, forbids a Catholic priest to give last rites to a young woman because she is unaware of her impending death. In a euphoric state after surgery for blood poisoning (following a botched illegal abortion), she vainly waits for her fiancé. Bernhardi considers it more ethical to ease her death with illusions than to frighten her—and thereby speed up her demise—with a priestly visitation. He therefore bars the priest from seeing the patient, even though Sister Ludmilla has already announced him. The very knowledge of his presence does indeed hasten her death, as foreseen by Bernhardi.

Bernhardi acts solely on ethical principle, but owing to envy and anti-Semitic agitation, opportunists and conservatives willfully distort his humanist, principled actions as religious interference, turning them into public, political issues in Catholic Austria. The patrons of the clinic subsequently withdraw their support, forcing Bernhardi's suspension. However, his friends and supporters also misunderstand his motives and want to politicize his standpoint for their own ends. Refusing to play any game, Bernhardi remains true to his values. This leads to a trial, during which anti-Semitic forces foment sentiment against him, and he ends up serving a prison term. After his release, public opinion changes, and Bernhardi unwillingly becomes a hero. But because he only wants to return to the clinic and be of service to his patients, this new twist leaves him cold.

Although Professor Bernhardi initially focuses on a dying young woman who has violated social mores, the play is more specifically about the machinations that dominate turn-of-the-century

Viennese politics. The Jewish Bernhardt inevitably comes into conflict with the conservative, anti-Semitic Catholic forces that dictate social norms. Yet it is clear that the liberal forces also want to manipulate the protagonist. His principles are suspect not only because he is Jewish but also because those principles undeniably point out the jealousy, small-mindedness, stupidity, and ineptitude that surround Bernhardt and make him a scapegoat. The repercussions of the evil enveloping him mean humiliation and degradation, yet Bernhardt refuses to become a martyr. He refuses to be manipulated by the system, even when a cabinet member, his (former) friend Flint, tries to convince him of the political significance (or potential) of his stance. Bernhardt adheres to his principles at all costs.

[See also Austria]

FURTHER READING

Blickle, Peter. "Die Einlösung subversiven Wirkungspotentials: Die Theaterskandale um Arthur Schnitzlers Professor Bernhardt und Rolf Hochhuths Stellvertreter" [Redeeming subversive potential effects: The theater scandals surrounding Arthur Schnitzler's Professor Bernhardt and Rolf Hochhuth's The Deputy]. New German Review 10 (1994): 103–118.

Schnabel, Werner Wilhelm. "Professor Bernhardt und die Wiener Zensur. Zur Rezeptionsgeschichte der Schnitzlerschen Komödie" [Professor Bernhardt and Viennese censorship: On the reception of Schnitzler's comedy]. Jahrbuch der deutschen Schillergesellschaft 28 (1984): 349–383.

Weiss, Robert O. "The 'Hero' in Schnitzler's Comedy Professor Bernhardt." Modern Austrian Literature 2, no. 4 (1969): 30–33.

Elizabeth Ametsbichler

PRZYBYSZEWSKA, STANISŁAWA (1901–1935)

I do not have, I do not want to have a fatherland.

—Stanisława Przybyszewska

The life of Stanisława Przybyszewska, author of three plays about the French Revolution, is a study in dispossession and ALIENATION. Born on October 1, 1901, in Myślenice, POLAND, the illegitimate daughter of Polish modernist novelist and dramatist Stanisław Przybyszewski, she was christened after her father but denied his surname. Given an artistic upbringing in FRANCE and GERMANY by her mother, Aniela Pająk, an impressionist painter who died in 1912, the eleven-year-old Stanisława became a cosmopolitan wanderer, living in Western Europe with friends and relatives.

Back in Poland in 1916, Przybyszewska attended teachers college in Cracow, where she met her internationally famous father whose name she could now adopt. Passionately in search of heroes, she became temporarily infatuated with Przybyszewski but soon grew disillusioned. Her father guided her toward a literary career but played a fatal role by introducing her to morphine, which became an addiction.

In 1922 she moved to Warsaw, where, fluent in German, French, and English, she eked out a living teaching. In 1923, to escape a seemingly predestined isolation, Przybyszewska married a young artist and moved to Danzig, where her husband taught at the Polish high school. She painted and researched the French Revolution, writing her first play, Thermidor (1925), in German. Adopting the principles of neue Sachlichkeit (NEW OBJECTIVITY), which stressed facts, clarity, and coolness in reaction to expressionistic exaggeration, Stanisława demonstrated that self-discipline and hard work could make her a better artist than her self-indulgent, intuitive father.

After her husband's sudden death in 1925 (from an overdose of morphine), Przybyszewska survived by tutoring but gradually gave up her pupils to have time to write Ninety-three (Dziewięćdziesiąty trzeci, 1928) and THE DANTON CASE (Sprawa Dantona, 1929), preferring to beg from friends and relatives for a meager subsistence. By 1928 she was living in one tiny room, without electricity or plumbing, in wooden school barracks. Racked by hunger, cold, and rheumatic pains, she crawled across the floor, like an "animal at bay in the recesses of its hole." Determined to be a writer, Przybyszewska remained convinced of her own genius and ultimate vindication at the hands of posterity.

Danzig, of divided national character, suited her shattered psyche. She disliked her fellow Poles; the great authors constituting her literary heritage, Pierre Corneille and GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, were French and English. As the Nazis came to power, she realized people like her would be exterminated, but she never considered leaving her cell-like refuge, calling it her "grave."

Eulogizing "this ideal, total solitude in which my strength grows invisibly," Przybyszewska desperately needed to share ideas on revolution and her approaching self-extinction. She wrote hundreds of letters, to people both known and unknown to her, in which she describes her artistic vocation, creative struggles, and ceaseless battle for material survival. Written in four languages, sometimes addressed to famous writers, like Thomas Mann, Georges Bernanos, and JEAN COCTEAU, and often unfinished and unsent, Przybyszewska's correspondence (the basis for several stage and television dramatizations of her life) is the autobiography of a mind confronting itself in anguished loneliness and despair, while proudly asserting the cultivation of consciousness as the highest duty. Przybyszewska died of malnutrition and tuberculosis on August 15, 1935, in Danzig, a free city under a League of Nations mandate.

PLAYS: Thermidor (1925); Ninety-three (Dziewięćdziesiąty trzeci, 1928); The Danton Case (Sprawa Dantona, 1929)

FURTHER READING

Kosicka, Jadwiga, and Daniel Gerould. A Life of Solitude. Stanisława Przybyszewska. London: Quartet Bks., 1986.

Jadwiga Kosicka Gerould

PSYCHOANALYSIS

Sigmund Freud, the founder of psychoanalysis, called the unconscious mind “the other showplace,” displaying its drama through symptoms, dreams, and artworks. Freud drew his theory of the Oedipus complex from the ancient drama of Sophocles, finding it also in William Shakespeare’s Hamlet: a universal desire to return to the mother’s primal erotic body by killing off the father figure symbolically or physically. Freud’s theories influenced many modern dramatists, providing common terms for various aspects of the conscious and unconscious mind that are explored in both psychologically realistic and antirealist dramatic movements. The conflicts of ego (self) with the wayward desires of id (unconscious primary processes), through the social pressures of superego (conscience), can be seen in the struggle of HENRIK IBSEN’s heroes with their own destructive idealism, in EUGENE O’NEILL’s characters with their “pipe dreams,” in the distorted scenery and social traumas of expressionist station plays, in the uncanny imagery and mythic associations of surrealist drama, or in WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS’s symbolist figures and AUGUST STRINDBERG’s dream plays. The selective REALISM of American dramatists ARTHUR MILLER and TENNESSEE WILLIAMS also reveals the conflict of ego with superego and id, especially through memories and fantasies arising onstage. More recently, PETER SHAFFER, CHRISTOPHER DURANG, ARTHUR KOPIT, and many other dramatists have made psychotherapy the subject of their plays by placing the analyst-patient relationship onstage or parodying the Oedipus complex.

Freudian theory gave tools to Stanislavskian method ACTING for the “given circumstances” of character analysis and for the actor’s own “emotional recall.” Jungian notions of the collective unconscious and mythic archetypes apply to ANTON CHEKHOV’s investigation of psychological gesture. Yet Freud’s modernization of Aristotelian “catharsis,” from the ancient amphitheater to the therapist’s office, also relates to two dramatists who developed the actor-audience relationship in opposite directions: ANTONIN ARTAUD and BERTOLT BRECHT.

Through his surrealist plays and poetic passions about a “Theater of Cruelty,” Artaud tried to exorcise the madness of human nature (and of his own psychotic illness) by drawing his audience into the psychic terror of the actor’s body onstage, like a martyr “signaling through the flames.” But the key here, as Freud discovered through his experiments in psychoanalytic catharsis, is that the devils of id must be consciously interpreted, not just communally expressed. In a similar vein (though not using Freud directly), Brecht moved beyond his early writing of expressionist drama to develop an “EPIC THEATER” that would challenge audience sympathies at strategic points in the plot, making the familiar strange, and to distance spectators toward critical thought and political change (as ALIENATION EFFECT). Brecht attacked Aristotelian sympathy for and fear of the tragic hero’s inevitable “fate” as producing a submissive, mimetic audience of “little Oedipuses.” While Artaud’s cathartic cruelty would merge actor and audience through onstage violence, clarifying primal drives, and prevent such actions in real life, Brecht wanted to cure social ills, not just individual desires, by alienating spectators at certain “gestic” moments in his drama (revealing social attitudes through the semiotic gestures of performance).

Like Brecht’s extension of theater’s ancient therapeutic power toward modern political change, French psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan expanded Freud’s ideas to engage PHILOSOPHY, linguistics, anthropology, and social science in ways that have influenced much of today’s poststructuralist theory as applied to stage and screen drama. Lacan himself described the “drama” of the mirror stage, when the infant misrecognizes itself through the “desire of the Other” as an illusory whole self in conflict with its uncoordinated body and fantasies of dismemberment. The Oedipal name of the Father (language and law) intervenes in the child’s alienation from its own being through its loss of, yet desire for, the (m)Other, thus bringing the social symbolic order into the family scene—a superego framework for the ego’s imaginary mix of fantasy and reality in its struggle with the real of primal id drives. This theater of Oedipal infancy becomes incorporated in the developing human brain, structuring the unconscious (as “discourse of the Other”) and replaying through psychotic, perverse, obsessional, or hysterical symptoms throughout life. The interplay of Lacan’s symbolic, imaginary, and real orders, revealing the unconscious discourses, desires, and drives of the Other in the Self (as “split subject”), may thus be found in many absurdist, feminist, multicultural, and queer dramas—especially those by SAMUEL BECKETT, EUGÈNE IONESCO, JEAN GENET, HÉLÈNE CIXOUS, CARYL CHURCHILL, ADRIENNE KENNEDY, SUZAN-LORI PARKS, AIMÉ CÉSAIRE, WOLE SOYINKA, MARIA IRENE FERNES, LUIS VALDEZ, DAVID HENRY HWANG, and TONY KUSHNER.

FURTHER READING

- Artaud, Antonin. The Theatre and Its Double. Tr. by Mary Caroline Richards. New York: Grove, 1958.
- Blau, Herbert. The Audience. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 1990.
- Brecht, Bertolt. Brecht on Theatre. Tr. by John Willett. New York: Hill & Wang, 1964.
- Freud, Sigmund. The Interpretation of Dreams. Tr. by James Strachey. New York: Avon, 1965.
- Jung, C. G. Psychological Types. Tr. by H. G. Baynes. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton Univ. Press, 1971.
- Lacan, Jacques. Écrits: A Selection. Tr. by Alan Sheridan. New York: Norton, 1977.
- Pizzato, Mark. Edges of Loss: From Modern Drama to Postmodern Theory. Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1998.
- . Theatres of Human Sacrifice: From Ancient Ritual to Screen Violence. Albany: SUNY Press, 2004.

Mark Pizzato

PUBLIKUMS BESCHIMPFUNG See OFFENDING
THE AUDIENCE

LA PUCE À L'OREILLE See A FLEA IN HER EAR

EL PUENTE See THE BRIDGE

PUERTO RICO

Before the Spanish conquest, the Taino and Arawak Indians did not have a tradition of the performing arts in their culture. Ritual and ceremonial events incorporated music and dance, but performance such as storytelling and oral folklore was not developed in the native cultures. The Spaniards did not establish a resident performing arts company until they founded Teatro Tapia in 1832.

Alejandro Tapia y Rivera, Puerto Rico's first national playwright, criticized slavery and the Spanish monarchy. His plays were censored and restricted by the Spanish colonial government, but audiences reacted favorably to his dramas. Tapia's plays are still performed today. He wrote Roberto D'Evreux, the first authentically Puerto Rican play, in 1856. The popular historical drama moralizes that corrupt ambition is ultimately punished. Vasco Nuñez de Balboa (1872) was his last historical drama. Tapia's works include Cuarterona (1867), an overt criticism of racism. His The Lion's Share (La parte del león, 1878) treats the moral and social inequalities in marriage and the innate hypocrisy in defending another person's honor. The literary critic Menéndez Pelayo considered Bernardo de Palissy (1857) Tapia's best work. This historical and biographical drama focuses on the Parisian uprising, heroism, imprisonment, and death of Palissy. Tapia incorporated romanticized natural elements and a native Puerto Rican atmosphere to plays unrelated to the island's environment or culture.

Salvador Brau was considered among the best poets of the era. His romantic TRAGEDY Hero and Martyr (Héroe y mártir, 1871) is a drama in high verse. The Return Home (La vuelta al hogar) is a romantic COMEDY in verse. His dramatic works were considered second only to those of Tapia. From the Surface to the Depths (De la superficie al fondo, 1874) was a popular comedy. The quality of his verse echoed the Golden Age dramatic masters, although local color identified his plays as distinctively Puerto Rican.

During the 19th century, the popular costumbrista (a slice of Puerto Rican country life) theater depicted common stock characters. Women wrote and produced their own plays, and their works dealt with slavery and female societal roles. Carmen Hernández de Araújo's romantic comedy of mistaken identity is portrayed in her free verse play Ideal Love (Amor ideal). Eugenio Sánchez de Fuentes y Peláez wrote Cousin Basilio (El primo Basilio, 1901) about the choice between defending a lover's honor and forgiveness.

After 1898, the UNITED STATES's occupation and political dominance influenced the state of the arts. Luis Llorens Torres, a national poet, wrote Shout of Lares (Grito de Lares), a protest against U.S. domination. It referred to an 1868 uprising against the Spaniards, but its conflicts and crises parallel the Puerto Rican responses to U.S. occupation.

Manuel Méndez Ballester won first place in the Ateneo Puertorriqueño in 1939 for his play The Clamor of Furrows (El clamor de los surcos). His work dramatized intense social conflict. Hilarión (1943) universalized his tragic protagonist.

In 1940, the Areyto Drama Society was founded by multitalented Emilio Belaval, who served as judge and legislator as well as director and author of diverse genres. Areyto referred to the Taino style of ceremonial and ritualistic music and dance. Belaval founded the theater company to create authentic national drama. The University of Puerto Rico engendered and supported the theater troupes Farándula Universitaria and Teatro Rodante to continue Areyto's legacy.

Areyto performed plays by Manuel Méndez Ballester, Martha Lomar, and Fernando Sierra Berdecia. The University of Puerto Rico banned Puerto Rican plays in 1944. The university performed The Resentful Woman (La Resentida) by Enrique Laguerre. It depicted the peasant unrest against Spanish landowners in 1898. The head of the drama department banned the play, though it was critically acclaimed and well received by audiences. The ban was not lifted until 1956.

José Lacomba and playwright René Marques established the Experimental Theatre in 1951. Playwright Francisco Arriví founded the Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña in 1955. René Marqués wrote The Fanlights (Los soles trancos), and Francisco Arriví wrote Vegi-Giants (Vegigantes) for the institute's annual theater festivals. Their styles reflect NATURALISM and social REALISM as they examine their society in transition. Naturalism and the harsh reality of midcentury Puerto Rican landowners displaced by the U.S. occupation dominate The Cart (La Carreta, 1954). Each act depicts the downfall of the idyllic farm family, from the rural mountains to the San Juan slums to the Bronx. The most popular play by Marqués, it is still performed internationally in translation as well as throughout the Spanish-speaking world.

Revolutionary playwrights changed the national drama scene during the 1960s. Luis Rafael Sánchez, the most renowned contemporary playwright, continues the performance of protest. His works incorporated elements of SYMBOLISM and EXPRESSIONISM. His themes expressed Marxist political positions. The Passion According to Antigona Pérez (La pasión según Antigona Pérez, 1968) exemplified these elements in his retelling of the Antigone myth.

MYRNA CASAS wrote absurdist plays. As a director and playwright, she explored societal roles and sexual identity. She founded Producciones Cisne to produce her plays and international works in translation. Her well-known plays include Broken Glass in Time (Cristal roto en el tiempo, 1961), Absurdities in Solitude (Absurdos en soledad, 1963), Eugenia Victoria Herrera (1964), and Three (Tres, 1974). Her provocative work El gran circo eukraniano (1986) was translated and performed internationally as THE GREAT USKRANIAN CIRCUS. This revolutionary work presents actors conscious of their roles mirroring the cross section of society within each audience. Her disjointed plots and dialogue examined social as well as political upheavals during the colonial transition. Casas approaches her themes with humor and metatheater that demands audience involvement. Her work has inspired other theater companies such as El Grupo Teatro del 60 to develop individual styles and novel approaches to performance.

Teresa Marichal is a DRAMATURG active in the Nueva Dramaturgia Puertorriqueña (New Puerto Rican Dramaturgy) theatrical movement. Her works present the opposing dichotomies of Puerto Rican society in conflict. Her trilogy The Biggest Park in the City (El parque más grande de la ciudad, 1979) explores social inequities. Midnight Love (Amor de medianoche, 1984) and Evening Walk (Paseo al atardecer, 1984) restructure traditional roles and incorporate modern technology to demonstrate how mass media and artificial communication alienate the individual. Marichal experimented with several styles to portray the breakdown of communication in contemporary Puerto Rican culture.

Playwright and director Pedro Santaliz founded El Nuevo Teatro Pobre de América (the New Poor Theatre of America), focusing on the working-class San Juan communities. He inspired innovators like José Marquez and Lydia Milagros González. Another community-oriented theater director, Zora Moreno, established Teatro el Gran Quince in 1967. The legacy of these theater companies is close community involvement in the performing arts.

FURTHER READING

- Arriví, Francisco. Máscara Puertorriqueña [Puerto Rican mask]. Río Piedras, P.R.: Editorial Cultural, 1997.
- Birmingham-Pokorny, Elba, ed. The Demythologization of Language, Gender, and Culture and the Re-Mapping of Latin American Identity in Luis Rafael Sanchez's Works. Miami: Universal, 1999.
- Casas, Myrna. El gran circo eukraniano: The Great USkranian Circus. In Women Writing Women: An Anthology of Spanish-American Theatre of the 1980's, ed. and tr. by Teresa Cajiao Salas and Margarita Vargas. Albany: SUNY Press, 1997.
- Phillips, Jordan B. Contemporary Puerto Rican Drama. Madrid: Editorial Playor, 1973.
- Sáez, Antonia. El teatro en Puerto Rico [The theater of Puerto Rico]. Barcelona: Editorial Universitaria, 1972.

Carole Anne Champagne

A PUPPET SHOW

ALEKSANDR BLOK's A Puppet Show (Balaganchik, 1906) has proven to be one of the key texts of Russian SYMBOLISM and of MODERNIST DRAMA. The play owes its genesis to a group of Petersburg poets, directors, artists, and musicians who frequented the poet Viacheslav Ivanov's "Tower" and decided to collaborate on a miscellany and a theater, both to be called "Torches." They convinced Blok to write the first play, and VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD offered to direct. Although the theater came to naught, Meyerhold took the play with him to the Komissarzhevskaiia Theater and staged it a year later. This production became a landmark in its own right.

In A Puppet Show Blok created a dynamic dramatic language that incorporates theatrical traditions of the past, such as the commedia dell'arte and Greek classical TRAGEDY, but at the same time shapes these traditional elements through devices of estrangement and other modernist techniques that did not become common for decades. Elements of high and low style mix freely, and parody, broadly construed, plays a particularly important role. The play opens with a group of mystics awaiting the arrival of Death, as they might in a play by MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Into their midst stumbles Pierrot, who is looking for his girlfriend Columbine. The mystics treat Pierrot like an idiot; but when Death arrives, her scythe becomes her braid (both words are rendered by kosa in Russian), and Death becomes Columbine. Pierrot's happiness is short-lived as Harlequin barges in and steals Columbine away. A character claiming to be the Author of the play interrupts to complain that he had intended a love story; but he is summarily yanked offstage. Pierrot next appears in the middle of a RICHARD WAGNER set and recounts how Columbine turned to cardboard. In quick succession, three couples follow and declaim about love. A Clown sticks his tongue out at the last couple and receives a knock on the head from a wooden sword for his trouble. He falls over the footlights and cries, "I'm haemorrhaging cranberry juice." Harlequin enters as coryphaeus of a chorus. He soon jumps through the scenery into a void. Death reappears but turns into Columbine at Pierrot's approach. The now jubilant Author tries to unite the lovers and opines that despite all obstacles everything has been made right. However, the scenery flies up, and all the characters, including the now-embarrassed Author, run off. Only Pierrot remains, and he closes the play with a lament about lost love.

Meyerhold matched Blok's innovations and here began to elaborate the THEATER OF THE GROTESQUE. Nikolai Sapunov's set design and the poet Mikhail Kuzmin's musical score contributed importantly to the mood of the piece. Response to the first performance was stormy; however, no one could ignore the production. Blok and Meyerhold had wrought a new theatrical language.

Meyerhold returned to A Puppet Show in 1908 and again in 1914. Like the 1906 production, the 1914 production at the Tenishevsky school proved to be important because it was in this double bill of A Puppet Show and Blok's third lyric drama The Unknown Woman that Meyerhold first began to work out the basic tenets of constructivist theater.

[See also Russia and the Soviet Union]

FURTHER READING

- Blok, Aleksandr. A Puppet Show. In Aleksandr Blok's Trilogy of Lyric Dramas: A Puppet Show, The King on the Square, and The Unknown Woman, ed. and tr. by Timothy C. Westphalen. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Kot, Joanna. "Aleksandr Blok's The Puppet Show." In Distance Manipulation: The Russian Modernist Search for a New Drama. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern Univ. Press, 1999.
- Pyman, Avril. The Life of Aleksandr Blok. Vol. 1, The Distant Thunder 1880–1908. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1979.
- Stelleman, Jenny. "Balanchichik." In Aspects of Dramatic Communication: Action, Non-action, Interaction (A. P. Chekhov, A. Blok, D. Charms). Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1992.
- Westphalen, Timothy C. Lyric Incarnate: The Dramas of Aleksandr Blok. London: Harwood Acad. Pubs., 1998.

Timothy C. Westphalen

PURGATORY

Purgatory, a one-act verse play by W. B. YEATS, was first performed at the Abbey Theatre on August 9, 1938, with sets (a bare tree and a ruined house) designed by his daughter Anne Yeats. It was Yeats's last play during his lifetime at the Abbey, a theater he had been instrumental in establishing in Dublin, IRELAND. There are two characters, an old man and his son, both wanderers, who come at night upon a ruined house. The old man explains his theory that souls in Purgatory come back to familiar spots and relive their transgressions until the consequences of their crimes are at an end. At first bored by all this talk, the uneducated son is intrigued by the old man saying that it was in that house that he was born. His mother had been the lady of the house, and his father was a drunken groom in the stable. It had been a wonderful house, but one night, when the old man was just sixteen, in drunkenness his father had set the house on fire. He confesses that in the burning house, he killed his own father, executed him for the capital crime of destroying a great house. Then, however, a window in the house is lit, and the figure of his mother appears, awaiting her drunken groom, for this is the night, relived again and again, in which he conceived the child who is now an old man witnessing the primal scene. Horrified, he hears the hoof beats of the groom's horse, hears him climb the stair. Caught up in this ghostly drama, the old man does not at first notice that his own boy is sneaking away with his purse. Cold-bloodedly, hoping to end the consequences of his mother's sin, and end her weird Purgatory, he stabs the boy to death, using the knife with which he had long ago killed his father. However, his hope to have purified his mother's soul is dashed, as at the play's end we hear once more the hoof beats of his father's horse, as he rides once more to the bedroom of the big house.

The verse in the play—an unrhymed tetrameter—has the stark simplicity of Yeats's best poetry. It is both Sophoclean and conversational. The subject matter was clear to its first audience: the play was the Protestant poet's protest against the destruction of landlords' "Big Houses" over the previous twenty years all across the Irish Free State. The old gentry were not wanted by the citizens of the new Catholic democracy. Even Coole Park—LADY GREGORY's house and Yeats's summer residence for decades—had had its pictures and furniture sold off by an in-law, and the house itself was demolished as of no interest or value except for its building stones. More horrifyingly, the play puts the blame for the decline of Irish civilization on misalliance, the marriage of aristocrats and common people, and suggests that bad marriages pollute a family and taint the genetic heritage of the "race."

With sex and murder at its heart, and a weirdly deranged but beautifully articulated eschatology for its spine, Purgatory is an astonishingly compact and disturbing verse play. It was admired by, and influential upon, T. S. ELIOT (who imagined it "solved the problem of speech in verse") and SAMUEL BECKETT (who may have found interesting the picture of endless repetitions of the dead in life).

FURTHER READING

- Clark, David R. W. B. Yeats and the Theatre of Desolate Reality. Dublin: Dolmen Press, 1965.
- Foster, R. F. W. B. Yeats, a Life: The Arch-poet, 1915–1939. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 2003.
- Welch, Robert. The Abbey Theatre 1899–1999. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1999.
- Worth, Katharine. The Irish Drama of Europe from Yeats to Beckett. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1978.

Adrian Frazier

PURIMSHPIIL

Purimshpil (plural Purimshpiln) is a play or monologue performed on Purim, the Jewish holiday commemorating the Persian Jews' narrow escape from annihilation at the hands of the vizier Haman, thanks to the efforts of the court Jew Mordecai and his niece Esther, queen to King Ahasuerus. The events are chronicled in the Book of Esther, read annually on Purim; the joyous holiday is also celebrated by festive meals, excessive drinking, and the temporary carnivalesque suspension of certain talmudic prohibitions and prejudices, most notably against theatrical activity.

Though the essence of the Purimshpil may have originated from the ritual degradation of Haman during the reading of the Book of Esther, the term Purimshpil was first used to describe late medieval satiric poetry read during Purim, often during the festive meal. Purimshpiln, in both their poetic and dramatic form, are often parodies of the Book of Esther, but other common themes include the binding of Isaac, the selling of Joseph, the Exodus from Egypt, and David and Goliath, as well as aspects of contemporary Jewish life. The Purimshpil did not develop into a group performance until the birth of humanism and secular theater in Renaissance ITALY. Though the strong anti-Semitic content of medieval mystery plays had provided little for Jews to imitate or admire, the rise of Lutheranism in GERMANY led to a new form of popular secular theater, the Fastnacht play, which provided a more hospitable model, though Jews would still tie their theatrical performance to the traditional holiday.

The first known Jewish play, An Eloquent Marriage Farce (Bedihuta De-Kiddushin), by Jehuda ben Sommo, was performed during Purim in 1531, but its language of composition—Hebrew—was hardly comprehensible to mass Jewish audiences. Soon, Jewish imitations of the Fastnacht plays started to appear in the YIDDISH vernacular, using the same biblical themes as the Fastnacht plays but also weaving in later rabbinic literature. Like the Fastnacht plays, the Purimshpiln were performed in private homes or taverns by students or apprentices, with scant scenery. A prankster figure, called the loufer, shrayber, or payats, introduced the characters, content, and moral; narrated; and asked for reward at the end. The later Staatsaktionnen, popularized in Germany in the 17th century, introduced a jester as an actual character in the drama, who took the role of Mondrish in the Jewish plays. Over time the distinctions between Mordecai and Mondrish became blurred, and all the characters became increasingly grotesque. The Akhashveyrosh-Shpil (about a king named Akhashveyrosh), the most popular Purimshpil of the 18th century, is replete with cursing, sexual innuendo, and scatological humor. In 1708, a manuscript was publicly burned by the Frankfurt elders who banned the genre, to little avail. This vulgarity underscores the fact that the Purimshpil was principally a folk genre.

More formal renditions of Purimshpiln existed, particularly during the Jewish Enlightenment, in which the Purimshpil was “reformed” along with other aspects of traditional Jewish society, yet these plays were still farcical and retained at least one grotesque character, usually representing the traditional Jew in need of or beyond enlightening. Just as other limitations were relaxed during Purim, the Purimshpil gave the player and audience the chance to transgress socially by ridiculing more powerful members of society and created a channel for social criticism. At the most basic level, Purimshpiln gave people ordinarily bound to a strict behavioral code a chance for ritual release, which may account for why the Purimshpil lives on today most vibrantly among Hasidim.

FURTHER READING

- Belkin, Ahuva. Ha-Purim shpil: 'Iyunim ba-te'atron ha-Yehudi ha'amami [The Purimshpil: Studies in Jewish folk theater]. Jerusalem: Bialik Institute, 2002.
- . “The ‘Low’ Culture of the Purimshpil.” In Yiddish Theatre: New Approaches, ed. by Joel Berkowitz. Oxford: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2003.

Zinberg, I. A History of Jewish Literature. Vol. 7. New York: Ktav, 1975. 301–344.

Alyssa Masor

PYGMALION

Pygmalion: A Romance in Five Acts, a play written in 1912 by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, was first performed in GERMANY (in translation) at the Hofburg Theater, Vienna, in 1913, and in ENGLAND at His Majesty's Theatre, London, on April 11 in the following year. The work presents a richly comic version of the classical myth about Pygmalion, who creates a sculpture of a woman of ideal beauty that comes to life. The Pygmalion figure in Shaw's play is Henry Higgins, a voluble professor of phonetics partly modeled on Shaw's friend the Oxford University philologist and phonetician Henry Sweet.

In a wager with his colleague Colonel Pickering, Higgins undertakes to turn a cockney flower girl, Eliza Doolittle, into a plausible replica of a Duchess by teaching her how to speak English in the manner of the upper classes. After a perilous test of Higgins's phonetic indoctrination, which ends with Eliza's sensational lapse into cockney with the expression “not bloody likely,” the experiment reaches a triumphant conclusion at an ambassadorial reception, which occurs offstage in the original play. The cast includes Eliza's father, Alfred Doolittle, who also undergoes a transformation, from dustman to millionaire public speaker, and Freddy Eynesford-Hill, an ardent admirer of Eliza.

The end of the work has been subjected to numerous revisions by Shaw and the adapters of the play for musical COMEDY and film. In the first text of the play published in 1916, the action closes with Eliza's disdainful response to Higgins's casual order to buy him a new tie and gloves: “Buy them yourself.” Higgins is left onstage chuckling and rattling his change in his pockets after confidently telling his mother: “She'll buy em all right enough.” Some passages in the play's dialogue undeniably tend to encourage the presumption of an eventual marriage between Higgins and Eliza. But there are compelling arguments for saying that the ingredients of Cinderella romance are a foil to a tougher line of narrative, the closure of which is represented by Eliza's declaration of defiance. This makes Pygmalion a play not about the growth of love between master and pupil but about the pupil's regaining, through struggle, of her independent IDENTITY, in the same way that the classical sculptor's creation comes to life. In the portrayal of Higgins, Shaw created humorous suggestions of a Victor Frankenstein-like absorption in scientific experiment without proper regard for the consequences, a thematic motif developed in a different key in the chilling sketch of a character actually named Pygmalion, a creator of “synthetic men,” in part 5 of Shaw's later work BACK TO METHUSELAH.

In an Epilogue written in 1915 for the first edition of the play and a revised ending for the 1939 Standard Edition, Shaw attempted to resolve the teasing ambiguities about his portrayal of the tempestuous Higgins-Eliza relation by firm announcements that Eliza's eventual marriage partner was Freddy, rather than the "confirmed bachelor" Higgins. In the highly successful musical comedy based on the play, My Fair Lady (1956), and the 1964 film of that name, the narrative is resolved according to the Cinderella romance formula.

FURTHER READING

- Bauschatz, Paul. "The Uneasy Evolution of My Fair Lady from Pygmalion." Shaw: The Annual of Bernard Shaw Studies 18 (1998): 181–198.
- Bentley, Eric. Bernard Shaw. 2d British ed. London: Methuen, 1967.
- Gibbs, A. M. "The End of Pygmalion." In The Art and Mind of Shaw: Essays in Criticism. London: Macmillan, 1983.

A. M. Gibbs

QUAN YU FA See POWER VERSUS LAW

THE QUARE FELLOW

The Quare Fellow was Irish dramatist BRENDAN BEHAN's first professionally produced play. Set in an Irish prison on the night before an inmate's execution, it draws heavily from Behan's own experiences as a prisoner in Britain and IRELAND.

The play premiered in November 1954 at the Pike Theatre in Dublin but first came to international attention two years later, when Joan Littlewood directed it for Theatre Workshop at Stratford East. It subsequently transferred to the West End and toured widely thereafter. Its success may be explained by the play's powerful condemnation of capital punishment—which was much debated in Britain and Ireland during the 1950s. But audiences also responded positively to its skillful combination of farcical humor with TRAGEDY.

Behan wrote The Quare Fellow in the early 1940s while imprisoned for shooting an Irish detective. His first draft was written in Irish as Casadh Súgáin Eile (The Twisting of Another Rope). This title played on Douglas Hyde's 1901 The Twisting of the Rope (Casadh an t-Súgáin), which was one of the key plays of the Irish Dramatic Revival. It was renamed The Quare Fellow, a Dublin slang expression for an unusual person, shortly before it opened at the Pike.

The opening scenes introduce us to the prisoners and warders and are full of witty dialogue and visual COMEDY, focused mainly on the antics of Dunlavin—one of the only prisoners who is identified by name. This humor gradually gives way to a mounting sense of dread, as the execution approaches. Prisoners and guards are shown interacting, but their dialogue is a mask for their preoccupation with the fate of the condemned man. The audience is not required to focus on plot—very little actually happens onstage—but on the characters' mostly unexpressed feelings about the execution.

The play's focal point is Regan, a disillusioned warder. His cynicism is unsurprising: almost every inmate executed in the prison had asked that Regan guard them for their final night, and this responsibility has gradually eroded his faith in the prison system. Behan uses Regan to suggest that prison has not reformed anyone but that, on the contrary, the dread created by executions, combined with the boredom of prison life, has corrupted warders and prisoners alike. Most of these characters act entirely out of self-interest, and Behan shows brilliantly how the prison system reinforces their amorality.

The Quare Fellow is an interesting mix of tradition and innovation. Behan's use of fast-witted characters, drawn largely from Dublin's working class, owes much to SEAN O'CASEY'S 1920s

Dublin trilogy. But the play is also an example of the absurdist plays that followed World War II: its central character is never named or shown onstage, and the play is, among other things, a dramatization of stultifying boredom. Behan was therefore exploring ground that would later be occupied by SAMUEL BECKETT and others. This makes The Quare Fellow a fascinating bridge between early- and later-20th-century Irish drama.

[See also Absurdism]

FURTHER READING

Kearney, Colbert. The Writings of Brendan Behan. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1977.

Mikhail, E. H., ed. The Art of Brendan Behan. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1979.

Simpson, Alan. Beckett and Behan and a Theatre in Dublin. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1962.

Patrick Lonergan

THE QUEEN AND THE REBELS

In his most compelling plays UGO BETTI dramatizes a quest into the self, projecting onto the stage the "bewildering incongruity between our existence and what it ought to be according to our soul's aspiration." The Queen and the Rebels (La regina e gli insorti, 1949), staged in Rome in 1951 and in New York in 1982, is a telling example of Betti's oeuvre. It has the appearance of a political drama taking place at the end of a successful revolution. Yet if it is viewed as a political play, one should rightfully lament its lack of political REALISM, as Walter Kerr in the New York Times (October 10, 1982) and Brendan Gill in The New Yorker (October 11, 1982) did when reviewing the Broadway production.

Betti rejects realistic depiction: his play is without temporal or geographical specificity, and the revolutionary representatives in it are too rhetorically stylized to be believable. The revolution is only a background to the redemption of Argia, the heroine, who in the extremity of her circumstance is forced to face herself and her life experience. In the play's fourth act the last pronouncements of the rebel Amos speak more of the soul's dark demons than of any aspiration for an improved social order. One should remember, in other words, that The Queen and the Rebels is "set"—as E. Martin Browne indicates in his introduction to Three European Plays (1965)—"in an atmosphere of the mind expressed by a place unlocalized except insofar as the play's story demands."

The drama is shaped according to the classical unities: the confrontation of the protagonist's destiny in one room from dusk to dawn. Naturally, the audience is aware of the SYMBOLISM of the night—the time of the brooding owl and the searching into the shadow—and the dawning light of self-discovery. What is more striking and to the point, however, is that the night is the time of the horrific—of spies, betrayals, executions, and deaths—suggesting a nightmare.

In act 1 the rebels are looking for the wife of the former dictator, the woman known as the Queen, since a counterrevolution could be mounted around her. Were she captured, she would be tortured to reveal the names of the rebels' enemies. Disguised as a peasant woman, she is among some travelers stopped at the frontier; so, too, is Argia, a prostitute, who has led a life of utter abjection.

In act 2 Argia recognizes the Queen and learns that she is not at all the courageous and dignified figure everyone thinks she is. At first Argia is outraged but later, feeling pity for her, helps her escape. By confronting the Queen, Argia has seen herself.

In act 3 Argia is mistaken for the Queen. Amused, she assumes the role and plays it very convincingly. But in act 4, Argia, not being able to prove who she is, in a Pirandellian feat, becomes the Queen. She feels free at last. As she declares before her execution: "I am as I would always have wished to be." She has solved the incongruity between her existence and her soul's aspiration.

[See also Italy]

FURTHER READING

Betti, Ugo. Three Plays by Ugo Betti. Tr. and with foreword by Henry

Read. New York: Grove, 1958.

Browne, E. Martin. Three European Plays. London: Penguin, 1965.

Gatt-Rutter, John. "Ugo Betti: The Whore as Queen." In Writers &

Politics in Modern Italy. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1974. 17–21.

Wadsworth, Frank W. "Ugo Betti and The Queen and the Rebels."

Magnanimous Despair." Drama Survey 1 (1961): 165–177.

Emanuele Licastrò

QUESTA SERA SI RECITA A SOGGETTO

See TONIGHT WE IMPROVISE

RABE, DAVID (1940–)

Choosing to write a play is some kind of surrender. . . . I sit and work and suddenly the door opens and out it comes. I used to be scared of it. And what I've learned over the years is not to try to shape it or control it.

—David Rabe, 1984

David Rabe began his writing career as a journalist, but by the early 1970s he was counted among the most promising young playwrights in America. Rabe was born on March 10, 1940, in Dubuque, Iowa. After receiving a bachelor of arts degree from Loras College in 1962, he enrolled at Villanova University to pursue a master's degree in theater. In 1965 Rabe withdrew from the program and was drafted into the U.S. Army to serve in Vietnam as part of a hospital-support unit. After completing his tour of duty in 1966, he returned to Villanova and earned his master's degree in 1968.

His military experience was the clear inspiration for the plays that first brought him to national attention. The Basic Training of Pavlo Hummel was produced in 1971 by Joseph Papp at the Public Theatre in New York City. It was followed almost immediately at the Public by STICKS AND BONES later the same year. In this play, a family loosely based on characters from the television sitcom The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet (1952–1966) is nearly destroyed when eldest son David returns home after being blinded in Vietnam. The success of Sticks and Bones prompted Papp to risk a production on Broadway, for which Rabe won the 1972 Tony Award for Best Play. The Orphan (1973) was intended to complete his “Vietnam trilogy.” Inspired by the Oresteia of Aeschylus, The Orphan draws parallels between the war and the atrocities of Charles Manson’s “family”; however, critics regard Streamers (New York Drama Critics Award, 1976), in which a soldier awaiting deployment to Vietnam is killed in a dispute over his friend’s sexuality, a better culmination of the trilogy.

Although Rabe eventually departed from military themes, his plays can be characterized by their “population(s) of lost people” (as critic Howard Stein put it), whose failed attempts to integrate often result in the deaths of the individuals themselves, as with Pavlo Hummel, David Nelson (Sticks and Bones), Billy (Streamers), or Phil (Hurlyburly [1984])—Tony Award for Best Play, 1985). Those whom the status quo does not destroy remain existentially adrift, either unaware of, or cynically unconcerned by, the pointlessness of their lives; however, these dark undercurrents are belied by Rabe’s humorous and naturalistic dialogue. In Hurlyburly, for example, which chronicles the drug-fueled debauchery of two West Hollywood casting directors and their associates, the energetic (at times, frenetic) activity with which Rabe fills the stage often froths over into violence, and the misogyny apparent in the speech and actions of some of his male characters has vexed some feminist critics. Nevertheless, Rabe is often compared favorably with EUGENE O’NEILL for having dramatized American life in the second half of the 20th century as effectively as O’Neill dramatized the first half.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

PLAYS: The Basic Training of Pavlo Hummel (1971); Sticks and Bones (1971); The Orphan (1973); In the Boom Boom Room (1973–1974); Burning (1974); Streamers (1976); Hurlyburly (1984); Goose and Tomtom (1986); Those the River Keeps (1994); A Question of Mercy (1997); Corners (1998); The Dog Problem (2001); The Black Monk (2002, based on a novella by Anton Chekhov)

FURTHER READING

McDonough, Carla J. Staging Masculinity: Male Identity in Contemporary American Drama. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1997.

Savran, David. In Their Own Words: Contemporary American Playwrights. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1988.

Schroeder, Eric James. Vietnam, We've All Been There: Interviews with American Writers. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1992.

Zinman, Toby Silverman, ed. David Rabe: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1991.

Bill Conte

RADRIGÁN, JUAN (1937–)

Lucho por la culturalidad, creo que en el campo de la cultura tenemos las armas necesarias para vencer ampliamente.

(I fight for the expansion of culture, I think that in the field of culture we have the necessary weapons with which to overcome broadly.)

—Juan Radrigán

On September 11, 1973, CHILE’s democratic government was overthrown by a brutal military regime. In 1980, the dictatorship institutionalized its political, economic, and cultural models with the passing of a new national constitution. The 1980s were marked by a series of mass rebellions and protests. One of the most creative and effective spaces for mobilization throughout this period was found within the cultural arena. It is within the margins of cultural defiance that Juan Radrigán became one of the most influential playwrights of resistance. Born in Antofagasta and raised in a working-class family, Radrigán never attended school and taught himself how to read and write.

For twenty years he worked in the textile industry, becoming a labor union president and leader. With the abrupt change of government in 1973, Radrigán was blacklisted and was no longer able to find steady work within the textile industry. Radrigán began selling books in Plaza Almagro, publishing poetry and short stories before he fell "inexplicably" into theater at the age of forty-three. Radrigán's first two plays, Testimonies of the Deaths of Sabina (Testimonios de las muertes de Sabina, 1979) and Consummate Deeds (Hechos consumados, 1981), performed by his group Compañía de Teatro Popular El Telón, caused an uproar on the Chilean cultural scene. For many observers, Radrigán's plays demonstrated marginal realities not present in the dictatorship's "official culture." Radrigán's characters and story lines reflected a reality that belied the modernization and false economic stability that the regime pronounced as true. Instead, Radrigán's dramatization of everyday life emphasized the explicit poverty, injustice, and violence that marginal sectors suffered throughout Chile. Using popular dialect, Radrigán's characters transformed the common person into a tragic hero, immersed in an implacable world, where only moments of happiness and hope existed. Consummate Deeds went on to win the Critics' Circle Award for Best Play in 1981 and was presented throughout Chile, Latin America, Europe, and the UNITED STATES.

In 1982 he toured The Bull by Its Horns (El toro por las astas) in Latin America and later at the International Theatre Festival in Nancy, FRANCE; this play also received a Critics' Circle Award for Best Play and the Municipal Award for Theater that same year. In 1986, he presented The Human Dispute (La contienda humana) in Dormont, GERMANY, which was followed by a bilingual Chilean-German co-production of Ballad of Those Condemned to Dream (Balada de los condenados a sonar, 1987) in Munich. In 1997 he was awarded the APES Best Playwright award for Parabola of the Drunk Ghosts (Parábola de los fantasmas borrachos) and later, in 1999, the José Nuez Martín Prize from Universidad Católica. In 2001, Radrigán premiered The Exile of the Naked Woman (El exilio de la mujer desnuda), which critically examined Chile's transition to democracy; this play was given the Municipal Theater Award in 2002. Later that year, the Academy of Fine Arts in Chile honored Radrigán for his dramatic trajectory. In 2003 he finished Panic to Two Voices (Pánico a dos voces), a play about SAMUEL BECKETT and WAITING FOR GODOT.

Currently, Radrigán is a faculty member of the Universidad de La República and Arcis University; he instructs a dramatic workshop on weekends and is working on the most bitter play of his career, Hope (Esperanza), which is about a man who always dreams about but never attains happiness.

SELECT PLAYS: Testimonies of the Deaths of Sabina (Testimonios de las muertes de Sabina, 1979); Consummate Deeds (Hechos consumados, 1981); Mournful Drumroll for Wolves and Lambs (Two Monologues and a Dialogue) (Redoble fúnebre para lobos y corderos [Dos monólogos y un diálogo], 1981); The Bull by Its Horns (El toro por las astas, 1982); The Madman and the Sad Woman (El loco y la triste, 1982); The Human Dispute (La contienda humana, 1986); Ballad of Those Condemned to Dream (Balada de los condenados a sonar, 1987); The Desolate Prince (El príncipe desolado, 1998); Mapuche Medea (Medea Mapuche, 2000); The Exile of the Naked Woman (El exilio de la mujer desnuda, 2001)

FURTHER READING

- El loco y la triste* [Soulmates of the Fringe]. Pinochet Watch 48 (April 17, 2003). <http://www.tni.org/pin-watch/watch48.htm>.
 Muñoz, Diego, et al., eds. Poética de la población marginal: Teatro poblacional Chileno: 1978–1985. Antología crítica. Vol. 3. Minneapolis: Prisma Ins., 1987.
 Pulgar, Leopold. "Juan Radrigán drásticamente valora el teatro nacional" La Tercera (August 6, 2000): 56.
 Vidal, Hernán. Cultural nacional Chilena, crítica literaria y derechos humanos. Minneapolis: Institute for the Study of Ideologies and Literature, 1989.

Lisette Olivares

RAIN FROM HEAVEN

Rain from Heaven by S. N. BEHRMAN debuted December 24, 1934, produced by the THEATRE GUILD, and ran for ninety-nine performances. This play veers closer to politics and darkness than Behrman's others. His theory in a prefatory note is that such a story makes TRAGEDY comprehensible to people, while a famine in Russia that kills three million is not. "The truth is that these vast lapses from civilization are so continuous, so wearisomely repetitious, that they become literally unimaginable and boring." But in this early play on the topic, Behrman tries to make the Jews in concentration camps comprehensible on a human scale by bringing one victim of them to an English country house.

The seemingly conventional high COMEDY is set in Lady Lael Wyngate's living room where Rand Eldridge has returned from six months in Antarctica, intending to propose to her. His brother, wealthy banker Hobart Eldridge, warns Rand against her—not for her private life but for her political life. She is not there to welcome them but has gone to London to collect another refugee. She works for relief of Germany's victims while Hobart is negotiating with Lord Abercrombie to start their own imitation of Hitler Youth Corps with Rand as its figurehead. Adolf Hitler is never mentioned in the play; instead, the fascist is the rich American who thinks Lael and her refugees must be communists—though they are not. At the end of the act, when Rand declares his love, hesitating over a query about her "private life," Lael responds, "I mean your assumption that as long as I'm sexually monogamous, no other foible I might have could matter to you. . . . Your psyche, my dear Rand, is sex-ridden. It's obsessed. It's maggoty with possessive desire."

In the second act, she realizes that Rand is also completely naive about politics; she is conscious of world affairs, refugees, fascism; he looks for the uncharted world and does not even realize how his brother is using his fame. Lael and Hobart discuss her recognition, but she resolves not to tell Rand about his brother. At the end of the act, she and new refugee Hugo Wilens discover their attraction for each other. In the third act, she is wrongly accused of a previous affair with Hugo by Hobart's jealous wife, who in fact was in love with Hugo years before; and Rand jealously explodes with anti-Semitic remarks about Hugo.

But as Lael and Hugo recognize their love for each other, Hugo realizes he had been too much a dilettante. "Behind this decorative curtain I was forced to discover that there is a harsh reality. Well, I must investigate this further." With this recognition he realizes he must give up the comfort of her home and love: "I see now that there is only one thing left: To destroy the inhuman—to discover humanity." Thus setting an early paradigm for all the love and honor conflict plays and movies of World War II, Hugo forsakes love to return to Germany to fight against the Nazis.

[See also United States, 1929–1940]

FURTHER READING

Goldstein, Malcolm. The Political Stage: American Drama and Theater of the Great Depression. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1974.

Rabkin, Gerald. Drama and Commitment. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1964.

David Sauer

RAINIS (1865–1929)

Rainis (the pseudonym for Jānis Pliekšāns) is the dominant figure in the evolution of 20th-century Latvian poetry and drama. His achievement in Latvian literature is often compared to Johann Wolfgang Goethe's accomplishment in German literature.

Born on September 11, 1865, in Varslavāni, a rural district of Dunava, LATVIA, the son of a prosperous tenant of estates, Rainis studied law at the University of Petersburg in RUSSIA. After periods of diverse employment (lawyer, journalist, editor of a social democratically oriented daily), followed by imprisonment and exile, Rainis married the famous Latvian poet and playwright Aspazija (Elza Rozenberga) and turned to literature professionally. In prison he translated Goethe's masterpiece Faust, the translation being highly innovative for the time. It influenced the development of Latvian literary language. Rainis died on September 12, 1929, in Majori near Riga, Latvia.

Rainis revived verse drama in the 20th century. Though largely based on mythology or Latvian history, Rainis's fifteen plays (including the dramatic poem The Daugava) betray his own moral and religious concerns. Rainis's point of departure is the value of the human soul in itself. Human greatness in his plays is measured not only by heroic deeds but also by high moral standards. Ability to make sacrifices and forgive is often inherent in most inconspicuous and worthless individuals—like Antiņš in The Golden Steed (Zelta zirgs, 1909) or Baiba in Blow, Wind! (Pūt, vējiņi!, 1914). In these plays, which abound in motifs of folklore, Rainis endeavors to revive the metrical form diction and structure of Latvia n folk songs.

Formally, Rainis rejected the dominant theatrical REALISM and found precedents in the symbolist drama and fin de siècle neo-ROMANTICISM. His play Fire and Night (Uguns un nakts, 1905) is the most outstanding example of SYMBOLISM and neo-romantic allegory in Latvian literature. Making a periphrase of Lāčplēsis (1888), a Latvian epic by Andrejs Pumpurs, Rainis sets forth the fundamental principle of his poetry: an old song to new tunes. The story in his plays is frequently borrowed from historically or geographically distant contexts: Orpheus and Eurydice in I Played, I Danced (Spēlēju, dancoju, 1915), Romeo and Juliet in Indulis and Ārija (Indulis un Ārija, 1912), and biblical myth in Joseph and His Brothers (Jāzeps un viņa brāļi, 1919). In Fire and Night Rainis joins ancient saga and Latvian history to contemporary issues—national liberation and independence. The protagonist Bearslayer (Lāčplēsis) embodies the mighty power of a cultural hero and fights for the freedom of his beloved Laimdota—a symbol of Latvia. His strivings are threatened by Teutonic invaders and traitors, as well as The Dark Knight who associates with the powers of evil. However, the most innovative character is Spīdola—ever-changing beauty and spiritual activity, which is neither good nor evil, an archetypal character that exemplifies Rainis's idea about the mobility, dynamism, and transformability of symbols.

Joseph and His Brothers is Rainis's most personal play. It presents the irreconcilable conflict between the individual and society in accordance with the Nietzschean conception of the absolute value of individuality and of the individual's loneliness. Although reconciliation and fulfillment are the essence of Rainis's conception of life, in Joseph and His Brothers he finally shows that they belong to the mystical beyond, outside the confines of this life.

Rainis fulfills two of the principal goals of modern theater: the return to myth and ritual and the creation of a total spectacle. His plays have been extensively staged within Latvia.

PLAYS: Half Idealist (Pusideālists, 1903); Fire and Night (Uguns un nakts, 1905); Ģirts Vilks (1907); The Golden Steed (Zelta zirgs, 1909); Indulis and Ārija (Indulis un Ārija, 1912); Blow, Wind! (Pūt, vējiņi!, 1914); I Played, I Danced (Spēlēju, dancoju, 1915); The Daugava (Daugava, 1919); Joseph and His Brothers (Jāzeps un viņa brāļi, 1919); The Little Raven (Krauklītis, 1920); Ilya of Murom (Ilja Muromietis, 1923); The King of Flies (Mušu ķēniņš, 1923); Love Stronger than Death (Mīla stiprāka par nāvi, 1927); The Witch of Riga (Rīgas ragana, 1928); Dog and Cat (Suns un kaķe, 1928)

FURTHER READING

Straumanis, Alfreds, ed. The Golden Steed: Seven Baltic Plays. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1979.

—, ed. "Latvian Drama." In Baltic Drama: A Handbook and Bibliography. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1981.

—, ed. Fire and Night: Five Baltic Plays. Prospect Heights, Ill.: Waveland Press, 1986.

Valda Čakare

A RAISIN IN THE SUN

Mama, it is a play that tells the truth about people, Negroes and life and I think it will help a lot of people to understand how we are just as complicated as they are—and just as mixed up—but above all, that we have among our miserable and downtrodden ranks—people who are the very essence of human dignity.

—Lorraine Hansberry, 1959

LORRAINE HANSBERRY completed her best-known work, A Raisin in the Sun, in 1957. A touchstone for the play was the hostile reception her own family had received when they moved into a “white” Chicago neighborhood in 1938. The play focuses on an economically disadvantaged extended black family’s struggle to emerge both figuratively and literally from their overcrowded and stifling socioeconomic conditions. Following successful performances in New Haven, Philadelphia, and Chicago, the play opened on Broadway on March 11, 1959, at the Ethel Barrymore Theatre to critical acclaim, followed by a run of 538 consecutive performances. It garnered for Hansberry the first Drama Critics’ Circle Award given to a black writer. Directed by Lloyd Richards, the first African American to direct a Broadway play, Raisin featured an ensemble of actors who would all play major roles in African American theater in the years to come: Claudia McNeil as Mama, Sidney Poitier as Walter Lee, Ruby Dee as Ruth, and Diana Sands as Beneatha. Louis Gossett, Ivan Dixon, Glynn Turman, Douglas Turner Ward, and Lonnie Elder III also had roles in the play, and Ossie Davis would eventually replace Poitier as Walter Lee.

Raisin is first and foremost a play about the impact of social injustice and inequality on black family relations, and it ties a black American family’s struggle to African liberation struggles through the character Asagai. The play exposes the bitterness wrought by centuries of deferred dreams, while stressing the celebration of black family unity based on a long-standing tradition of resistance and endurance.

When Raisin opens, Big Walter, the head of the household, has died, and his extended family is awaiting an insurance check from the policy Big Walter had the foresight to take out before his death. Each of the adult family members has ideas about how to spend the $10,000. The son, Walter Lee, wants to start his own business, his wife Ruth longs for better living conditions for her growing family, Walter Lee’s sister Beneatha wants to go to medical school, and Mama Lena wants the money to answer all their dreams. Lena Younger uses part of the money as a downpayment on a house in a white neighborhood, because homes in black neighborhoods cost twice as much. In a gesture of respect, she gives the remainder of the funds to Walter Lee, directing him to deposit part of it for Beneatha’s education. But Walter Lee gives the money to a hustler to invest in a shady business venture. Bilked and disgraced, Walter Lee is tempted to accept the offer of an all-white neighborhood association to move into the Youngers’ new home. However, Walter Lee rejects the offer and claims the Youngers’ right—in the name of his ancestors—to live in the neighborhood of their choosing. The play ends with the family preparing to move into the new home. An alternative followed the Younger family to their new home, where they faced the anger and violence of their white neighbors.

Hansberry’s realistic play represents the African American quest for the American dream and equal economic opportunity access, while capturing the spirit of the civil rights movement of the time. It also deals with black women’s issues, through Ruth’s contemplation of an abortion and Beneatha’s refusal of Asagai’s marriage proposal and her desire to attend medical school. While the Youngers’ unity relates to universal themes of family struggle, their opposition to racial and economic discrimination makes the play more specific to black Americans. Hansberry believed that by dealing with specific stories, one created universal themes.

The play was adapted for a film in 1961 and won a special award at the Cannes Film Festival. In 1974, Robert Nemiroff produced the Tony Award-winning musical version of the play, which he dubbed Raisin, and in 1987 Danny Glover and Esther Rolle starred in an American Playhouse production of A Raisin in the Sun that included material excised from the original production. A 2004 Broadway revival, starring Phylicia Rashad, Audra McDonald, and Sean Combs, earned Rashad a Tony award for Best Actress, making her the first African American to receive that prize. Now considered a classic of American theater, A Raisin in the Sun has been translated into over thirty languages.

[See also United States, 1940–Present]

FURTHER READING

Carter, Steven R. Hansberry’s Drama: Commitment Amid Complexity.

Urbana: Univ. of Illinois Press, 1991.

Cheney, Anne. Lorraine Hansberry. New York: Twayne, 1984.

Kappel, Lawrence, ed. Readings on A Raisin in the Sun. San Diego: Greenhaven, 2001.

“Lorraine Hansberry: Art of Thunder, Vision of Light.” Special issue, Freedomways: A Quarterly Review of the Freedom Movement 19 (1979).

Wilkerson, Margaret B. “A Raisin in the Sun: Anniversary of an American Classic.” In Performing Feminisms: Feminist Critical Theory and Theatre, ed. by Sue-Ellen Case. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 1990.

Lovalerie King

RAKESH, MOHAN (1925–1972)

Madan Mohan Guglani, better known to the literary world as Mohan Rakesh, was born on January 8, 1925, in Amritsar, INDIA, in a lower-middle-class family. Son of a lawyer who left him an orphan at the age of sixteen, brought up by his mother and sister, he was educated in Amritsar and Lahore (now in PAKISTAN). He taught in two colleges and one school, edited a short-story magazine, and finally decided to devote himself fully to writing.

It is difficult to ascertain whether he started writing first in fiction or in drama, but there is no denying the fact that he was one of three leading lights of a radical literary movement Nai Kahani (New Short Story) that completely transformed the character of Hindi short story. Along with Rajendra Yadav and Kamleshwar (very important and significant contemporary fiction writers in Hindi), he brought the make-believe, romantic short story down to earth and made it an expression of life as it is lived and experienced in the immediate present. What he did in short-story writing he did when it came to writing plays. The subjects he chose for his plays were so interwoven with the reality and life of our times that they brought a proverbial fresh breeze to Hindi theater.

Before Rakesh, Hindi drama used the language of literature. It was meant to be read. In other words, as far as theater is concerned, it was a dead language. Rakesh evolved a dramatic language of theater.

Before Rakesh, Hindi plays were pure entertainment, dealing either with mythology or historical romance. They had highly idealistic themes, and their characters were therefore blatantly didactic and unidimensional, completely devoid of any relationship with contemporary reality. There was no attempt to explore the complexity of life. In 1958 Rakesh changed all that with his first play ONE DAY IN ASADH (Asadh Ka Ek Din), which won first prize in a competition organized by the Sangeet Natak Akademi (the National Academy of Music, Dance, and Drama). One Day in Asadh is the first modern Hindi play.

In One Day in Asadh, Rakesh deals with the relationship of the author to his roots and the relationship between state patronage and creativity. Shyamanand Jalan's production of One Day in Asadh for the theater group Anamika (Kolkata) in 1961 and Ebrahim Alkazi's production for the National School of Drama (Delhi) in 1962 established Rakesh's reputation as the first modern Hindi playwright of immense potential and significance. For the first time Jalan was able to direct a play that demanded not a surface treatment but an in-depth study of a complex character. This resulted in a very sensitive and imaginative production whose impact was further enhanced by great ensemble ACTING. Alkazi's production was done environmentally, in a small space in the compound of a house.

Rakesh wrote only three and a half full-length plays. After One Day in Asadh came The Great Swans of the Waves (Lehron Ke Rajhans, 1963; New Version, 1966), HALFWAY HOUSE (Adhe Adhure, 1969), and the incomplete The Ground Beneath One's Feet (Pair Tale Ki Zameen, 1972), which he was working on when he died.

All of Rakesh's plays center around the man-woman relationship, but it is evident that this theme served as a vehicle for larger statements on other aspects of the human condition. For example, in The Great Swans Rakesh also deals with two conflicting worldviews: material and spiritual. Nand, the protagonist of the play, is attracted to his beautiful wife Sundari. But he feels equally the pull of Buddha's PHILOSOPHY. He says that when he is with Sundari, he longs for Buddha, and when he is with Buddha, he pines for Sundari. He is a divided self, unable to belong wholly to either the world of Sundari (material) or the world of Buddha (spiritual). Rakesh's play Halfway House is about the tragic collapse of values in the Indian middle-class world.

Rakesh's oeuvre is small, but his reputation and significance are immense because he revolutionized Hindi theater to such an extent that no other playwright of his status has emerged on the scene even thirty-five years after his death on December 3, 1972, in New Delhi.

PLAYS: One Day in Asadh (Asadh Ka Ek Din, 1958); The Great Swans of the Waves (Lehron Ke Rajhans, 1963); Halfway House (Adhe Adhure, 1969); The Ground Beneath One's Feet (Pair Tale Ki Zameen, 1972, incomplete)

FURTHER READING

Jain, N. C. "Some Recent Significant Plays." Enact 25–26 (January–February 1969).

Nigam, R. L. "Adhe Adhure: A Comment." Enact 32–33 (August–September 1969).

Rakesh, Mohan. "Why Plays?" Enact 13–14 (January–February 1968).

Sethi, J. D. "Rakesh's Adhe Adhure: A Breakthrough." Enact 27 (March 1969).

Shormishtha Panja, Kumar, and N. Nita. "Halfway House: A House Divided." In Many Indias, Many Literatures: New Critical Essays, ed. by Delhi: Worldview Pubs., 1999.

Rajinder Nath

RAMA V (1853–1910)

King Chulalongkorn, known as Rama V, the fifth ruler of the current Chakri Dynasty, had a significant impact on the development of modern drama in THAILAND. He was educated by English teachers like Anna Leonowens and Daniel Beach Bradley and traveled extensively to Europe in 1897 and 1907, where he saw plays, ballets, operas, and even Isadora Duncan. So he understood European theater as well as being fundamentally versed in traditional Thai models that were part of royal life. He was, therefore, able to combine ideas from both in his work, creating new genres that both reflected his straightforward personality and were suited to the needs of the new Thai social environment.

While young he wrote plays and directed his younger brothers in entertainments for the Thai new year in April. His first scripted play was Dance Drama of Talok (Rabam Talok, 1868) a short COMEDY performed by famous comedians. Another play of unknown date is the adaptation of a work by his father, Dance Drama of the Rain (Bot Lakon Jab Rabam), set in the heavens, depicting thunder and lightning to welcome rain. He initiated "spoken drama" (lakon phud), a genre where speech prevails over dance/music, when he wrote the verse play based on The Arabian Nights, Sleep-Awakening (Nitra Chakrit) for New Year's eve in 1879, later adding songs to highlight selected scenes. His 1882 Play of Prince Inao (Bot Jeraja Lakon Inao) was a spoken drama in prose where the dancers delivered set dialogue rather than following the standard practice where performers improvised the text themselves. His satiric Wong Tewarat (1884) was a parody on a traditional play of the same name. Another work, To Bet Not to Be Angry (Panan Ngod Khwam Grot, 1889), has been lost.

His final work Ngo Pa (1906) is his best and breaks with tradition. This love triangle in a Negrito village has ethnographic elements based on the king's knowledge of a tribe in Patalung that he had learned as a child from his Negrito page Kanang. While sick the monarch wrote the play in eight days. His introduction clarifies that he will not follow the rules of traditional theater. Ngo Pa is the cornerstone of modern drama in Thailand.

The play broke traditional constraints in many ways. Despite its comic moments it ends with the death of the three lovers onstage. Death scenes, especially of protagonists onstage, were rare. The leading characters were commoners and from a marginalized group rather than the standard princes and princesses. The costumes and vocabulary reflected the Negrito reality. While the play retained aspects of classical theater, it evoked an earthy tone suited to the story. The delightful play continues to be performed annually on October 23, the anniversary of the author's death in 1910.

In addition to his work as a playwright, the king prompted other members of the royal family to create theater that would serve his social reform as well as mounting traditional works. He began the practice of royalty patronizing public theaters rather than confining viewing to the royal palace. His presence was valued by the public, who flocked to the theater for such events. His innovations were continued by his successors.

PLAYS: Dance Drama of Talok (Rabam Talok, 1868); Dance Drama of the Rain (Bot Lakon Jab Rabam, n.d.); Sleep Awakening (Nitra Chakrit, 1879); Play of Prince Inao (Bot Jeraja Lakon Inao, 1882); Wong Tewarat (1884); To Bet Not to Be Angry (Panan Ngod Khwam Grot, 1889); Ngo Pa (1906)

FURTHER READING

- Rutnin, Matani. Dance, Drama, and Theatre in Thailand: The Process of Development and Modernization. Chiang Mai: Silkwork, 1996.
- Virulrak, Surapone. The Evolution of Thai Performing Arts in Bangkok Period 1782–1934. Bangkok: Chulalongkorn Univ. Press, 2002 [in Thai].
- . Performing Arts in the Reign of King Rama V. Bangkok, Chulalongkorn Univ. Press, 2004 [in Thai].

Surapone Virulrak

RAME, FRANCA (1929–)

By all accounts, Franca Rame has theater in her blood. She made her first stage appearance in her mother's arms when she was eight days old. Rame was born in 1929 to a Northern Italian family who had been itinerant performers for three centuries. Her heritage is rooted in the improvisational comic theater of commedia dell'arte, developed in ITALY in the mid-1500s and characterized by masked figures and stylized characters, like Harlequin and Pulcinella. Rame's family's theatrical repertoire of story lines and other formulas were useful to both Rame and her future husband and theater partner, Nobel laureate DARIO FO. Fo and Rame married in 1954 and have been so indissolubly involved in political activities and theatrical collaborations since then that Dario Fo acknowledged receipt of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1997 on both their behalf.

Rame has devoted her life and theater work to the exposure of corruption and injustice at home and abroad, even at personal risk to herself. Until 1950 she worked in her father's theater company, then in variety shows and revues. By the mid-1950s, she was performing in plays and on television. Rame slowly shed her reputation as a beautiful but vacuous blond actress through her political activities and professional achievements, achieving international recognition in her own right with the 1977 publication of All House, Bed and Church (Tutta casa, letto e chiesa, partially translated in FEMALE PARTS), on the crest of the Italian women's movement of the 1970s.

Drawing from slapstick, popular theater, political satire, and the comic-grotesque literary tradition, the Fo-Rame plays criticize political corruption and religious hypocrisy. From the beginning, their DRAMATURGY demonstrates a Marxist concern with the condition of the proletariat and poor in Italy and abroad. During the feminist movements of the 1970s, their plays also begin to focus on the subaltern condition of women, although Rame did not agree with feminist separatism. Other targets of their theatrical satire are controversial current events and cultural phenomena such as the economic boom, consumerism, and modern capitalism.

Rame and Fo have always refused blind allegiance to any authority or political position. For example, although in 1960 Rame became a member of the Partito Comunista Italiano (PCI, the Italian Communist Party), Rame and Fo soon began to satirize the bureaucracy of the PCI, which resulted in the PCI's withdrawal of support for the team (Behan, 2000). Melding theater and political activism, Rame and Fo took their performances outside of traditional venues into occupied factories and onto the streets during the political struggles of the late 1960s to 1970s. This resulted in intense censorship, arrests, and police presence during their shows. As early as 1962, their television variety show Canzonissima was censored, and the team was kept off the air until 1977, despite their fame throughout Italy.

Such persecution did not hinder Rame, who founded and ran Soccorso Rosso (Red Aid) to aid 10,000 prisoners. In 1973, the persecution culminated in Rame's being kidnapped, tortured, and raped in a van by neofascists supported—according to a 1998, post-Nobel investigation—by the police. She writes of this in her powerful play The Rape (Lo stupro, 1982). She performs this piece often and includes it in Sex? Thanks, Don't Mind If I Do! (Sesso? Grazie, tanto per gradire, 1994). This monologue is coauthored with Fo and their son Jacopo and is based on Jacopo's book on sex education for young people. As recently as 1994, the play was censored, and anyone under eighteen was not permitted to attend.

Although in the mid-1970s Rame's name finally began to appear in co-authorship with Dario Fo, it is difficult to separate their work. The issue of authorship reflects their theater's collaborative modus operandi and Rame's own literary development. The improvisational nature of their comic theater hinges on the contributions, comments, and criticisms of the actors and the response of the audience. Rame has had a central role from the start as Fo's closest critic, who revises, edits, archives, and prepares their plays for publication. Critics point out that Fo's plays would probably not have survived without Rame. Fo himself underscores Rame's importance in the development of the female character. He admits that he would not have been able to write such "solid female characters" without her; in fact, he declares that "they are written with Franca." Most critics consider the one-woman monologues in Female Parts to be primarily of her invention, and some critics also include Heroin (L'Eroina), about drugs, and The Fat Woman (La donna grassa), about human isolation in contemporary times, both in Let's Talk About Women (Parliamo di donne, 1991). In sum, Rame has been called "one of the three best epic actresses in the world." To this we must add Rame's many accomplishments as gifted editor and playwright.

SELECT PLAYS: Female Parts (partial translation of Tutta casa, letto e chiesa, 1981); The Rape (Lo stupro, 1982); Open Couple (Coppia Aperta, 1983); Let's Talk About Women (Parliamo di donne, 1991); Sex? Thanks, Don't Mind If I Do! (Sesso? Grazie, tanto per gradire, 1994)

FURTHER READING

- Behan, Thomas. Dario Fo: Revolutionary Theater. Sterling, Va.: Pluto Press, 2000 [also discusses Rame].
- Farrell, Joseph. Dario Fo and Franca Rame: Harlequins of the Revolution. London: Methuen, 2001.
- Mitchell, Tony. Dario Fo: People's Court Jester. London: Methuen, 1999 [also discusses Rame].
- Montgomery, Angela. "The Theatre of Dario Fo and Franca Rame: Laughing All the Way to the Revolution." In Twentieth-Century European Drama, ed. by Brian Docherty. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.
- Valeri, Walter, ed. Franca Rame: A Woman on Stage. West Lafayette, Ind.: Bordighera, 2000.
- Wood, Sharon. "Parliamo di donne: Feminism and Politics in the Theater of Franca Rame." In Dario Fo: Stage, Text, and Tradition, ed. by Joseph Farrell and Antonio Scuderi. Carbondale: Southern Illinois Univ. Press, 2000.

Tommasina Gabriele

RASGA CORAÇÃO See BREAK THE HEART

RATTIGAN, TERENCE (1911–1977)

As a popular playwright Terence Rattigan dominated the English stage from the mid-1930s to the mid-1950s. An advocate of the well-made play (with a clear beginning, middle, and end), emphasis on character more than plot, and attention to the sensibilities of his audience, Rattigan was a supreme craftsman in both COMEDY and serious drama. The most dramatic moments in his plays are often a triumph of the carefully placed understatement, leading the audience either to laughter or tears. His popularity waned in the 1960s and 1970s, but since his death in 1977 he has come to be acknowledged as one of the finest English-speaking playwrights of the 20th century.

Terence Mervyn Rattigan was born in Kensington, London, on June 9, 1911. Terence's father Frank was a diplomat and spent much time abroad with mother Vera, so Terence and his older brother Brian were raised in large part by their paternal grandmother, Lady Rattigan. Terence attended Hornby's School in Surrey and in 1925 matriculated to Harrow School, Middlesex, on scholarship, where he entered his first of a lifelong series of mostly closeted homosexual relationships. Rattigan read history at Trinity College, Oxford, but never completed his degree, having decided to leave school to attempt to make his way as a professional playwright.

Rattigan's father was not pleased with his son's choice of career but agreed to fund his son with £200 per year for a two-year trial. If by the end of that time Terry had not found sufficient success to make his own way financially as a playwright, the boy would leave playwriting for a more secure profession, such as diplomacy. Rattigan's first play to be produced, First Episode, was written with his current roommate Philip Heimann and earned Rattigan £100 in royalties, but as he had already spent £200 on a preview run, he had to consider it a financial loss. During the following year Rattigan invested much time on an adaptation of A Tale of Two Cities in collaboration with John Gielgud, but the projected production of the play fell through when Gielgud decided not to compete with another adaptation of the novel that was running at that time. As his second year neared a close, Rattigan submitted another script, at that time called Gone Away, to Bronson Alberry, the producer who had intended to produce A Tale of Two Cities, in the hope that the man would consider producing this alternative.

Retitled French Without Tears (1936), in a pun upon the name of the stage director, Harold French, and in reference to the play's setting in a French language-study resort, Gone Away delighted audiences and many critics, running for a record-setting 1,030 performances at the Criterion Theatre. The play deals with the arrival of a predatory female among a crowd of undergraduate men at a resort in FRANCE where they have gone to improve their French-speaking skills and the comedic rivalry for her attentions that follows. The financial success of this play introduced Rattigan to a luxurious standard of living, which became in part an incentive for his future composition of screenplays, although theater always remained his primary love. But Rattigan would never entirely cease to measure his success as a playwright by the size of his royalties, a legacy of his original bargain with Frank Rattigan.

Another measure of success as a playwright for Rattigan was range of genre. Rattigan intended the play following French Without Tears to prove his ability to write serious drama as well as light comedy. After the Dance (1939) deals with an unhappy love triangle, a topic that was always to run through Rattigan's plays. The plot culminates in the suicide of Joan Scott-Fowler, the central female character, upon her realization of how completely she and her husband have misunderstood each other in their attempts to love. In contrast to the extraordinary run of French Without Tears, this play ran for only sixty performances. Weeks after After the Dance closed, war broke out in Britain. Rattigan's next two plays, Follow My Leader (1940), a satire on Adolf Hitler's GERMANY, and Grey Farm (written in collaboration with Hector Bolith, 1940), closed within weeks of their openings, and Rattigan began consulting Dr. Keith Newman, a well-respected psychiatrist, for depression.

Upon the recommendation of Dr. Newman, Rattigan joined the Royal Air Force. Flare Path, produced at the Apollo Theatre in 1942, dramatized the culture Rattigan found in military life and rejuvenated his self-esteem through critical praise and a run nearly two years long. In the play three couples face different challenges in love within the context of the World War II British air force. Once again in this serious drama, the central character Patricia must choose between two loves—an attractive ex who has returned to her life after years of absence and her duller air-fighter husband.

While the Sun Shines (1943) and Love in Idleness (1944) marked a return to comedy for Rattigan. The FARCE of While the Sun Shines centers on three men's attempts to win the affections of beautiful and sensible Elizabeth, a member of the Women's Air Force, and with it Rattigan once again broke records, with a run of 1,154 performances. Love in Idleness starred the famous stage couple Alfred Lunt and Lynne Fontanne.

The Winslow Boy (1946), based upon a famous court case of the Edwardian era, has become the play for which Rattigan has perhaps been best remembered. A boy is wrongly accused of stealing a five-shilling postal note and expelled from the Royal Naval Academy where he is enrolled. His family rallies around him and obtains with some difficulty the services of a famous barrister, and they win the court case that clears the boy's name. The restrained precision with which Rattigan builds the suspense of a court drama, in which not a single scene takes place in court, is masterful. The play ran for more than a year at the Lyric Theatre in London and was followed by two one-acts Rattigan had written with actor John Gielgud in mind for the central characters.

Playbill: The Browning Version and Harlequinade was a production of two of a trilogy of one-acts Rattigan wrote with the intention of attempting a dramatic build in which the interruption of a traditional intermission was unnecessary because of a shorter duration. The third of the plays, High Summer, was discarded as inferior to the others. THE BROWNING VERSION is a terse portrait of a disappointed classics scholar whose dismal life is brightened by a student's presentation to him of a secondhand copy of Robert Browning's translation of the Agamemnon of Aeschylus. Harlequinade parodies the backstage life of a theatrical couple closely resembling Alfred Lunt and Lynne Fontanne.

By this time, to his chagrin, Rattigan had earned a label among critics and other playwrights as a popular writer for entertainment. In a letter to the New Statesman and Nation in 1950, he defended his work and criticized plays of ideas, which he considered propaganda rather than art. He created a fictional audience member, Aunt Edna, whose response to theater must be a measure of its effectiveness, to illustrate his argument. (Rattigan elaborated further upon Aunt Edna, an elderly, proper, middle-class spinster, in the preface to the second volume of his Collected Works published in 1953.) SEAN O'CASEY, GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, CHRISTOPHER FRY, and others responded to his letter with their own contrasting arguments, and Rattigan's reputation as a merely popular playwright grew rather than diminished.

After his exploration of a shorter form in Playbill, Rattigan expanded his repertoire to include the epic form in Adventure Story (1949), based upon the life of Alexander the Great. Another comedy, Who Is Sylvia? (1950), preceded Rattigan's most deeply personal play, THE DEEP BLUE SEA (1952). A response to the suicide of Rattigan's former lover Kenneth Morgan, The Deep Blue Sea opens upon the scene of a woman's suicide—unsuccessful, we learn as the play progresses. In the play Rattigan articulates more clearly and poignantly than he had previously the anguish that contrasting styles of loving can bring to relationships. The rawness and depth of emotion presented in the central character Hester Collyer has led many theater historians to hypothesize that Hester may have been originally written as Hector.

Separate Tables (1954), two one-acts that take place in the same hotel and emphasize different characters from among the guests, marked the height of Rattigan's popularity and the conclusion of his reign upon the stage. Following the 1956 opening of JOHN OSBORNE's LOOK BACK IN ANGER and the advent of the "kitchen sink" drama, Rattigan became relegated to the ranks of old-fashioned playwrights who clung to an outmoded style of writing. His seven future plays would fail to reach the popularity and former acclaim his former plays had enjoyed. He died of bone marrow cancer on November 30, 1977, in Hamilton, Bermuda.

With the contemporary dismissal of plays of ideas and renewed appreciation for virtuosity of form and depth of characterization, since the late 1990s Rattigan has been experiencing a renewed popularity among critics, historians, and audiences.

[See also England]

SELECT PLAYS: First Episode (with Philip Heimann, 1934); French Without Tears (1936); After the Dance (1939); Follow My Leader (1940); Grey Farm (with Hector Bolitho, 1940); Flare Path (1942); While the Sun Shines (1943); Love in Idleness [U.S. title O Mistress Mine] (1944); The Winslow Boy (1946); Playbill: The Browning Version and Harlequinade (1948); Adventure Story (1949); Who Is Sylvia? (1950); The Deep Blue Sea (1952); The Sleeping Prince (1953); Separate Tables (1954); Variation on a Theme (1958); Joie de Vivre (1960); Ross (1960); Man and Boy (1963); A Bequest to the Nation (1970); In Praise of Love (1973); Cause Célèbre (1977)

FURTHER READING

Darlow, Michael, and Gillian Hodson. Terence Rattigan: The Man and His Work. London: Quartet Bks., 1979.
 Rusinko, Susan. Terence Rattigan. Twayne's English Author Series 366. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
 Wansell, Geoffrey. Terence Rattigan. London: Fourth Estate, 1995.
 Young, B. A. The Rattigan Version: The Theatre of Character. New York: Atheneum, 1988.

Antonia Sophia Krueger

RAVENHILL, MARK (1966–)

A graduate in English and drama studies from Bristol University (1987), Mark Ravenhill (born in West Sussex, ENGLAND, in 1966) was catapulted to fame as well as notoriety by his first full-length play, Shopping and Fucking (1996). Controversy was provoked not only by the indecent title but also by the abjectness of his characters, the combination of passionless sex with consumerism and violence, and the seeming total lack of “normal” humanist values. A play that depicted homosexual outcasts, drug addicts, and self-mutilating and masochistic characters was prone to cause a stir, and yet Ravenhill's postmodern urban underworld and his use of timely gadgets such as CCTV and video could lay claim to a “new REALISM” appropriate to the 1990s. In 1997, he became literary director of Paines Plough and also worked on the BBC cult television series This Life.

His next three plays were experimental works with strong, yet playful intertextual tendencies. Faust Is Dead (1997) is a free updating of the Faust myth, turning the saga of an aging scholar who sells his soul to the devil into an episode in the life of a star philosopher (like Michel Foucault), who announces the end of history on television. The existentialist gets wedged between the software heir Pete, who has stolen his father's Chaos program and who observes everything through the lens of his video camera, and the self-mutilating teenage boy Donny, who finally kills himself without managing to overcome the boundaries of his own virtuality: his suicide remains as unreal as any television event.

Sleeping Around (1998), which Ravenhill wrote in teamwork, is a contemporary version of ARTHUR SCHNITZLER's classic REIGEN (La Ronde). It depicts a chain of superficial sexual encounters, pointing out the meaninglessness of commodified love in a busy consumer culture. Handbag (1998) again uses a famous precursor text (OSCAR WILDE's THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST) to examine the incessant but unsuccessful human search for meaning and intimacy in life. The juxtaposition of lesbian spouses who conceive a child with a male couple with Victorian repression and sentimentality highlights the loss of the nurturing instinct in an emotionally stunted and selfish society.

Some Explicit Polaroids (1999), based on ERNST TOLLER's 1927 play Hurrah, This Is Life! (Hoppla, wir leben!), seems to stress a more humanistic tone by representing the world weariness and anger of those deemed “trash” by society. And yet all characters share the same muddled values, the loss of all old certainties of political or moral belief. To enhance their lack of a clearly shaped IDENTITY, the play uses prefabricated language, deploys the phrases and gadgets of contemporary life, from psychobabble and computer language to the idea of the polaroid camera that produces instantly gratifying but short-lived works in a media-oriented culture.

In his black COMEDY with songs, Mother Clap's Molly House (2001), Ravenhill weaves together two times zones: London 1726, showing a haberdashery turned into a transvestite meeting house, and London 2001, showing a present-day gay fetish party. The play originated in Ravenhill's discovery of an 18th-century gay subculture of same-sex clubs and uses songs in the cabaret style of the German socialist revolutionary BERTOLT BRECHT's THE THREEPENNY OPERA. Ravenhill, who is open about being “queer” and HIV positive, celebrates the diversity of a human sexuality that defies classification, but the play also questions the fashionableness of modern gay existence, which has become a lifestyle that suits consumer capitalism.

Totally Over You (2003) is based on Molière's The Invaluable Ridiculous Ones (Les précieuses ridicules), relocating the plot in the context of modern celebrity culture and showing teenage girls dumping their boyfriends for members of a fashionable boy's group—who of course are none other than these former boyfriends. Again this play, geared for teenaged actors and audience, deals with the possibility of intimacy and love in a dehumanized consumer culture where reality and virtuality have become indistinguishable. It remains to be decided whether Ravenhill is merely the enfant terrible purveying a sensationalist Theater of Cruelty or the profoundly moral and socialist playwright who wittily and ironically sums up the zeitgeist and who explores the darker social reality of the homeless, the addicted, and the outcast.

[See also Gay and Lesbian Drama]

PLAYS: Shopping and Fucking (1996); Faust Is Dead (1997); Handbag (1998); Sleeping Around (with Stephen Greenhorn, Hilary Fannin, and Abi Morgan, 1998); Some Explicit Polaroids (1999); Mother Clap's Molly House (2001); Totally Over You (2003); Citizenship (2006); The Cut (2006); Pool (No Water) (2006); Product (2006)

FURTHER READING

- Sierz, Aleks. In-Yer-Face Theatre: British Drama Today. London: Faber, 2001.
- . "In-Yer-Face Theatre: Mark Ravenhill and 1990s Drama." Anglistik & Englischunterricht 64 (2002): 107–121.
- Svich, Caridad. "'Commerce and Morality in the Theatre of Mark Ravenhill.'" Contemporary Theatre Review: An International Journal 13 (2003): 81–95.
- Wandor, Michelene. Post-war British Drama: Looking Back in Gender. London: Routledge, 2001.

Heike Grundmann

RAYSON, HANNIE (1959–)

The early work of Hannie Rayson (born in Melbourne, Victoria, AUSTRALIA, on March 31, 1959) reflects her background both as an actor and as a member of the experimental Theatreworks ensemble. Rayson received a bachelor of arts degree (University of Melbourne, 1977) and diploma in dramatic art (Victoria College of the Arts, 1980). Room to Move (1985) is episodic and antirealist in form and, like Mary (1985), which deals with the experiences of a Greek Australian girl, is the product of an intensely collaborative process.

With Hotel Sorrento (1990), however, Rayson establishes the mode that has come to define her distinctive voice in Australian theater: more conservative in form but richer and broader in scope and squarely focused on the analysis of close relationships in the context of powerful cultural metaphors—of the representation of female experience and of Australia in the context of its colonial past. The play, later made into a film, has the classic realistic plot structure and explores the patterns of enduring love and deep resentment in the feelings of the three sisters. At the same time, though, Rayson invokes a broad canvas of national and class IDENTITY. The humble seaside home at Sorrento suggests an Australia that was past—simpler, gentler, but also insular and constrictive. The disintegration of the family is marked by the death of Wal, the father, and the choice of two of the sisters to live overseas, reflecting the painful loss of connectedness that can accompany a growing sophistication.

Falling from Grace (1994) explores another set of female relationships, this time concerning three friends, and also the effects of liberal feminism on the behavior and attitudes of the men in their lives.

Rayson's subsequent work has added another dimension, an overarching political concern. However, only in the least successful of them, the apocalyptic FARCE on economic rationalism, Competitive Tenderness (1996), does the subject of the controversy dwarf the complex interactions of the human characters caught up in it. Life After George (2000, winner of the Victorian Premier's Literary Award 2001), set in the new "corporatized" university, is less concerned to expose the destructive compromises that academics might be forced to make than to comment on the effects those choices have on the personas they presented and their intimate relationships. Rayson's skill in writing intelligent conversation was critical here, as in Hotel Sorrento, in probing beneath the disguises and self-deceptions of people who can be witty and seem acute about their lives.

The public issue in Inheritance (2003) is the disintegration and impotent rage of rural Australian societies, and its scale of action is appropriately larger with two big families at the center of the conflict, the vastness of the land to be inherited, and in the metaphorical reach of the language. Rayson again represents a culture on the cusp of change and explores, subtly, the psychological responses that this induces. Inheritance offers a parable for contemporary Australia, both in the country's clinging to the shreds of its white colonial past and in its failure to acknowledge fully the darker aspects of that history—the notion that an Aboriginal man might inherit the land once roamed by his own people is incomprehensible to most of the people of the play and encases the action in multiple ironies.

SELECT PLAYS: Mary (1985); Room to Move (1985); Hotel Sorrento (1990); Falling from Grace (1994); Competitive Tenderness (1996); Life After George (2000); Inheritance (2003); Two Brothers (2005)

FURTHER READING

- Fensham, Rachel, and Denise Varney. The Doll's Revolution: Australian Theatre and the Cultural Imagination. With Maryrose Casey and Laura Ginters. Melbourne: Australian Scholarly, 2005.
- Varney, Denise. "The Desire to Affirm and Challenge: An Interview with Hannie Rayson." Australasian Drama Studies 42 (April 2003): 146–160.
- . "Hannie Rayson's Life After George: Theatrical Intervention and Public Intellectual Discourse." Australasian Drama Studies 42 (April 2003): 161–176.

Peter Fitzpatrick

RAZNOVICH, DIANA (1945–)

Diana Raznovich was born in Buenos Aires, ARGENTINA, in 1945. Unlike many of her contemporaries, Raznovich's artistic trajectory is characterized by a strong sense of humor—she occasionally wrote comic strips, as well—and by a particular attention to issues of social norms.

She began her career in Enrique Escobar's theater seminar, working from improvisatory pieces she developed herself. In her early plays Jumping Jack (El buscapíes, 1968) and There's Only One Plaza (Plaza hay una sola, 1968), she began developing some of her favorite dramatic techniques: an inversion of spatial-temporal coordinates, the use of fragmentation and discontinuity, and her unique brand of humor, equally predisposed to bursts of laughter, reflection, pity, and even bitterness.

Forced, like so many of her contemporaries, to flee her native country during the violent political unrest of the 1970s, Raznovich sought refuge in SPAIN. Her play Marcello the Repairman (Marcello el mecánico) premiered in 1978 and was restaged in 1983 as Garden in Autumn (Jardín de otoño). It is the story of two middle-aged spinsters who, fascinated by the protagonist of a soap opera, kidnap the actor, only to discover that the television character is nothing like the pitiful actor who portrays him. Generally assumed to be a simple criticism of mass culture, the play's focus centers on the sexual attraction between the two friends and the need—amidst the prejudices of an authoritarian and chauvinistic society—to suppress their feelings by projecting them onto the television screen.

The first season of OPEN THEATER (Teatro Abierto) saw the premiere of her work Confusion (Desconcierto, 1981). It is a brief monologue given by pianist Irene della Porta, who plays a soundless piano and establishes a sort of pact with her audience avert to "hear" a silent concert. Confusion (the title, Desconcierto, plays on the Spanish word for concert, "concierto") criticizes art that renounces any moral obligations to become a fetishized commodity and is a denunciation of the degradation that women with artistic aspirations suffer in a misogynistic society. The play also expresses indignation toward intellectuals and audience members who are complicit with the censorship, lies, and terror under the military dictatorship of those years.

In later works, Raznovich deepens her criticism to denounce prescribed social norms. Such is the case in The Matriz Household (Casa Matriz, 1988), a virulent but humorous invective against the construction of motherhood as the most sacred role to which a woman should aspire. In Backwards and Forwards (De atrás para adelante, 1996), Raznovich recounts the misfortunes of a well-to-do family that falls on hard times and has to depend on its transsexual son to recover the estate.

Throughout her work, Raznovich strives to deconstruct socially accepted behavior and identities, both sexual and normative. She accomplishes this task through the liberating and unprejudiced force of laughter. In this way, her work aspires to create a society where all individuals can find their place without submitting to normative conventions.

SELECT PLAYS: Jumping Jack (El buscapiés, 1968); There's Only One Plaza (Plaza hay una sola, 1968); El guardagente (1970); Texasina Wheelbarrow (Texas en carretilla, 1971); The Mishap (El contratiempo, 1973); Confusion (Desconcierto, 1981); Garden in Autumn (Jardín de otoño, 1983); Autographs (Autógrafos, 1984); The Matriz Household (Casa Matriz, 1988); Personal Effects (Efectos personales, 1988); Of the Waist Down (De la cintura para abajo, 1993); Backwards and Forwards (De atrás para adelante, 1996); Divine Machines (Máquinas divinas, 1996); Fast-food at Death's Speed (Fast Food a la velocidad de la muerte, 1996)

FURTHER READING

Glickman, Nora. "Parodia y desmitificación del rol femenino en el teatro femenino de Diana Raznovich." Latin American Theatre Review 28, no. 1 (Fall 1994): 89–100.

Taylor, Diana. "Combatiendo el fuego con frivolidad: los actos desafiantes de Diana Raznovich." In Defiant Acts: Four Plays by Diana Raznovich. Ed. by Diana Taylor and Victoria Martinez. Lewisburg, P.A.: Bucknell Univ. Press, 2002.

—. Disappearing Acts: Spectacles of Gender and Nationalism in Argentina's "Dirty War." Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 1997.

—. "The Theater of Diana Raznovich and Percepticide in El Desconcierto." In Latin American Women Dramatists: Theater, Texts, and Theories, ed. by Catherine Larson and Margarita Vargas. Bloomington, I.N.: Indiana Univ. Press, 1998.

—, and Roselyn Constantino, eds. Holy Terrors: Latin American Women Perform. Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 2004.

Norberto Cambiasso (Tr. by Gabriel Milner)

READING HEBRON

JASON SHERMAN's most controversial, and perhaps best, play Reading Hebron premiered at Theatre Factory in Toronto, CANADA, in 1996. A documentary-based examination of Arab-Israeli relations, Reading Hebron brings back Sherman's theatrical stand-in, Nathan Abramowitz (the protagonist of THE LEAGUE OF NATHANS). Nathan is attempting to investigate the Israeli inquest into the murder of thirty Arabs in a mosque by Baruch Goldstein. The play's action alternates between dramatized bits of transcript from the inquest (reminiscent of PETER WEISS's THE INVESTIGATION) and Nathan's encounters along the way with librarians, the Palestinian Information Office, conspiracy theorists, and real-life personalities: in one scene, Nathan invites Noam Chomsky, Hanan Aswari, and Edward Said, along with the 1970s television character Rhoda Morgenstern, to a Passover seder.

The climax of the play is a poem Goldstein wrote as a child, wishing for peaceful reconciliation. Like all of Sherman's best writing, the tone of Reading Hebron can switch from mordant to hilariously funny to tragic, in an instant. Actors morph between characters and levels of reality from line to line. Sherman ultimately seems to skewer all sides for using the conflict to advance personal and political agendas. Michael Healey, who played Nathan in the premiere, described Sherman as "an equal-rights abuser. He attacks soft-thinking liberals, but also soft-thinking rightists. He has no time for the glib, self-satisfied or self-righteous, regardless of political stripe. Jason goes after them, and so does Nathan—and Nathan turns the gun on himself as much as anyone else. The play is about developing a point of view that actually means something to you, that costs you something." The result is one of the most complex, incisive, and theatrically vital examinations of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The play's development reflected Sherman's writing process. Sherman originally set out to write a play about the inquest but became frustrated by the difficulties he encountered in getting access to research materials. Trying to get a handle on the material, he revived back the character of Nathan Abramowitz. He then took the materials he had gathered into a workshop with actors, a director, and a DRAMATURG, discussing the material at the table and creating scenes and characters from those discussions and improvisations. This process is quite similar to the way ENGLAND's JOINT STOCK THEATRE GROUP developed plays, most notably CARYL CHURCHILL's CLOUD NINE, and is a process Sherman uses frequently in his writing.

In Canada, the play has had critically successful productions in both English and French. The Theatre Factory production moved to OFF-BROADWAY, where it received strong national press.

[See also Documentary Drama]

FURTHER READING

Friedlander, Mira. "Reading Hebron." Variety (January 6, 1997).

Lawless, Jill. "Anxiety Meets Absurdity in Hebron Drama."

<http://www.jewishbulletin.ca/archives/Febo4/archives04Feb27-06.html>.

Sherman, Jason. Jason Sherman: The Plays. Toronto, Canada:

Playwrights Canada Press, 2001.

Walter Bilderback

REALISM

In the philosophical sense, realism is the opposite of idealism. Realism meant a denial of the metaphysical world as having any absolute being in and by itself. The realistic drama arose in the first half of the 19th century as a continuation of the romantic opposition to classic art. The latter meant imitating ancient models, which in drama meant Greek TRAGEDY and Latin COMEDY.

The new approach was to turn to life itself for inspiration, not to ancient models or to vague abstractions (ideals). The rise of realism was concurrent with developments in politics, science, and PHILOSOPHY. The term as used in art seems to have been coined by the critic Champfleury in writing about Gustave Courbet's painting The Burial at Ornans in 1850. Courbet called his first one-man exhibit "Le Réalisme" in 1855, and he clearly understood the far-reaching effects of the new movement. "Realism is the negation of the ideal and of everything that follows from it. It is only in that way that one can arrive at the emancipation of reason, the emancipation of the individual, and at last, at democracy."

The romantic view was that somehow the good, the true, and the beautiful were all one and the same. Realism questioned this esthetic trinity and saw the true and the beautiful as often separate. The question was, Does one go to the theater to face the facts of life or to escape them? Why go to the theater to see a workingman's hovel onstage, or an alcoholic in a drunken stupor, when one might be amused by clever remarks in a comedy? The answer was obvious to anyone who was disturbed by prevailing conditions in society. Courbet, who devoted a huge canvas to a painting of a stone mason, opted for the truth: "I am not only a socialist, but also a democrat and a republican, in a word, a partisan of revolution and above all a realist, that is, a sincere friend of the real truth" (letter in 1851). When invited to a Courbet one-man show in 1867, the French statesman and conservative politician Adolphe Thiers responded, "He's too fond of truth; it isn't good to love truth that much."

The best defense of realism against the romantic insistence that a work of art must first of all be beautiful was expressed by Hamlin Garland, American realist novelist, in the 1890s: "The realist: . . . sees life in terms of what it might be, as well as in terms of what it is; but he writes of what is, and, at his best, suggests what is to be, by contrast. . . . He aims to hasten the age of beauty and peace by delineating the ugliness and warfare of the present; but ever the converse of his picture rises in the mind of the reader" (Garland, 1960).

The theater was slower than the other arts to embrace realism, in part because the theater was thought of as primarily a place of escape and fantasy, not as a place of truth, and in part because it was difficult to put realistic sets onstage. Improvements in set design and in stage lighting, especially the introduction of gas lighting, promoted the realistic drama.

It prevailed because of the rise of the middle class. The bourgeoisie wanted to see themselves onstage, and their concerns had more to do with money matters and marriage arrangements than affairs of honor and duels. As the middle class became better educated, they wanted something more challenging than the simplicities of MELODRAMA or the bombast of romantic, poetic drama. They wanted to hear their kind of speech, see their kind of social manners, and watch a story occurring in drawing rooms and salons instead of palaces and wild nature.

Playwrights like DUMAS FILS and Emile Augier in FRANCE promoted the realistic drama by dealing with social problems, such as that of the demimonde, while in ENGLAND the actor-playwright-director T. W. ROBERTSON wrote true-to-life dialogue and made the minutiae of daily life, such as the serving of tea, theatrically interesting. In Scandinavia, BJØRNSTJERNE BJØRNSON scored a success with his realist plays and paved the way for his rival dramatist, HENRIK IBSEN. With the worldwide and lasting triumph of the latter's A Doll's House (1879), in which psychological depth was added to the shallow characters of the French plays, the realistic drama came to dominate the stages of the Western world.

[See also Naturalism; Problem Play; Socialist Realism]

FURTHER READING

Garland, Hamlin. Crumbling Idols. Cambridge: Harvard Univ. Press, 1960.

Stromberg, Roland N., ed. Realism, Naturalism, and Symbolism. London: Macmillan, 1968.

Weber, Eugen, ed. Paths to the Present: Aspects of European Thought from Romanticism to Existentialism. New York: Dodd, 1960.

Evert Sprinchorn

THE REAL THING

Love is loving them at their worst.

—Henry, Act 2

First produced in 1982 in London, published the same year and again in 1983 with revisions, TOM STOPPARD'S COMEDY The Real Thing plumbs the nature of authentic love, finding that, unlike authentic art, the "real thing" in matters of the heart may hinge on a lover's acceptance of impurity and dishonesty. Known for his displays of epigrammatic wit, paradox, and formal daring, Stoppard established with The Real Thing his talent for writing about passion and the tribulations of marital love.

In its first scene, The Real Thing stages a play within a play: Max, a character in The House of Cards, confronts his wife Charlotte with evidence of her adultery. Max behaves with cool, nearly cynical, detachment, and he and his unrepentant wife break up. This scenario in which a husband discovers his wife's adultery will return twice more in The Real Thing, with each occurrence contrasting the torturous consequences of infidelity in real life with its fictionalized portrayal in the glossy, unconvincing The House of Cards. The play within a play allows Stoppard to probe the distinction between "real" and "inauthentic" emotion.

The Real Thing focuses on Henry, who is the author of The House of Cards and the husband of Charlotte (the actress from the play). Henry has an affair with Annie, the wife of Max (the actor from The House of Cards). Finding Henry's handkerchief in Annie's car, Max demands an explanation from his wife. When Annie admits to adultery, Max—quite unlike his poised character in The House of Cards—submits to rage and grief. Divorcing their spouses, Annie and Henry wed. Annie has an affair with Billy, a young actor and her co-star in a Glasgow production of John Ford's 'Tis a Pity She's a Whore. Convinced of Annie's infidelity, Henry challenges her on it. Unlike in the earlier scenes of adultery confronted, the result is not the dissolution of a marriage. Rather, Annie continues her affair. Henry resigns himself to a condition of "dignified cuckoldry." Though the breach of faith shakes him to the core, the authentic love he feels for Annie requires him to tolerate her philandering.

The play's subplot involves Annie's championing of Brodie, a soldier who is imprisoned for six years after he commits arson during an anti-nuclear-missile demonstration. Annie hopes to reawaken public interest in the case and to win Brodie a reduced sentence by producing a play that he has written behind bars. She convinces Henry to rewrite the propagandistic and incompetent play. The subplot investigates the connection between authenticity and craftsmanship in literature, with Henry, in a much-praised speech, comparing a well-wrought play to a cricket bat and Brodie's work to a "lump of wood . . . trying to be a cricket bat."

In 1984, The Real Thing won five Tony Awards, including Best Play, and in 2000 garnered the Tony for best revival.

[See also England, 1980–Present]

FURTHER READING

- Jenkins, Anthony, ed. Critical Essays on Tom Stoppard. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.
- Nadel, Ira Bruce. Tom Stoppard: A Life. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Nikolai Slywka

REANEY, JAMES (1926–)

James Reaney was born in Stratford, Ontario, CANADA, in 1926. He graduated from Stratford Collegiate Institute (where he acted in plays) in 1944 and completed his undergraduate work at the University of Toronto, where he wrote poems and short stories and studied under the famed critic Northrop Frye, whose theories of SYMBOLISM and language were to be a great influence. Reaney received a doctorate from Toronto in 1958, completing a thesis (directed by Frye) that explores the influence of Edmund Spenser on W. B. YEATS. (He later wrote about the university's history in his play The Dismissal [1978].) Reaney attained literary fame early, winning the Governor General's Award for poetry with The Red Heart in 1949. He married the poet Colleen Thibodeau in 1951. Reaney turned to theater in the 1950s.

The most successful of Reaney's early plays was The Killdeer (1962), set, like most of Reaney's work, in a small Ontario town. Harry must circumvent several obstacles, including his own self-doubt, to demonstrate his love for Rebecca, who is the titular "killdeer"—a bird that both augurs a storm and deliberately attracts a predator so as to distract that predator from her young. Rebecca is accused of murdering Clifford, the dark manipulator of the developmentally retarded Eli Fay, the man who Rebecca unwillingly marries. Harry, in a detective subplot, must exonerate Rebecca of Clifford's murder and bring about their fulfilled love. The play, with a complicated and symbolically laden plot, has had an inconsistent stage history, but its strengths—a strongly felt rural setting and an imaginative, original plot—established Reaney as a preeminent Canadian dramatist.

In midcareer, Reaney wrote the ambitious trilogy The Donnelly's. Extending across several generations of an Irish-Canadian family living near London, Ontario, from 1834 to 1974, The Donnelly's is a saga of family secrets and unexpected violence. The trilogy, published as a complete unit in 1983, is composed of Sticks and Stones (1975), The St. Nicholas Hotel, Wm. Donnelly, Prop. (1976), and Handcuffs (1977). The Donnelly's are brought down by fate, injustice, and antagonisms they have themselves provoked. Told through a combination of foreshadowing and flashbacks, the trilogy uses elemental interactions to provide a sense of primordial fear and stunted yearning.

Given his extensive literary background, Reaney's drama is strikingly lacking in verbosity or linguistic flamboyance; rather, his plays depend on a sense of ritual and litanylike repetition. In addition to the plays for which he is widely recognized, Reaney has written plays for children as well as opera libretti. The Story of the Gentle Rain Food Co-op (1997) is a COMEDY gently satirizing environmental and ecological movements. Although differing in tone from Reaney's other works, it resembles them in the ways in which language, generated by interpersonal situations, is the ground of dramatic meaning.

Reaney has taught English at the University of Western Ontario and the University of Manitoba. In 1966 he established a workshop for theatrical experiments in London, Ontario, and from 1969 to 1979 he edited and printed Alphabet: The Iconography of the Imagination. In addition to experimental COLLAGES for radio, he has coauthored (with Jon Beckwith) three operas, Night Blooming Cereus (1960), The Shivaree (1982) and Crazy to Kill (1988).

SELECT PLAYS: The Killdeer (1960); Night Blooming Cereus (opera, with Jon Beckwith, 1960); One-Man Masque (1960); Colours In the Dark (1969); Listen To The Wind (1972); Apple Butter (1973); Sticks and Stones (1975); Balloon (with C. H. Gervais, 1976); The St. Nicholas Hotel, Wm. Donnelly, Prop. (1976); Handcuffs (1977); The Dismissal (1978); Th Shivaree (opera, with Jon Beckwith, 1978); Crazy To Kill (opera, with Jon Beckwith, 1989); The Story of the Gentle Rain Food Co-op (1997)

FURTHER READING

Dragland, Stan. "James Reaney's 'Pulsating Dance in and Out of Forms.'" In The Human Elements: Critical Essays, ed. by David Helwig. Ottawa: Oberon Press, 1978.

Grandy, Karen. "Playing with Time: James Reaney's The Donnelly's as Spatial Form Drama." Modern Drama 38, no. 4 (Winter 1995): 462–474.

Nicholas Birns

LA REGINA E GLI INSORTI See THE QUEEN AND THE REBELS

REIGEN

I'm also working now at times—ten dialogues, a colorful series; but never has there been something this unperformable.

—Arthur Schnitzler, 1897

Reigen (La Ronde), a cycle of ten erotic dialogues written in 1896–1897, permanently propelled ARTHUR SCHNITZLER onto the "scandalous," but also prominent, stage of fin de siècle European theater. Schnitzler was doubtful about how Reigen would be received, so he published it in a private edition in 1900 for friends only. In 1903 three of the dialogues (fourth, fifth, and sixth) were performed in Munich, but the whole cycle did not premiere until 1920 in Berlin. The ensuing trial against the play in 1921 justified Schnitzler's initial skepticism; and hoping to avoid further scandal, accusations of pornography, and anti-Semitic harassment, the playwright withdrew permission to have the drama performed in 1922, a ban that kept Reigen off German-speaking stages until 1982.

This best known of Schnitzler's plays functions as a social COMEDY and presents a paradigm for the gender relationships seen throughout his works. The ten scenes depict a round dance of sexuality that encompasses Vienna's social spectrum and is reminiscent of the medieval dance of death. The cycle begins with the prostitute and a soldier, continues with the soldier and a parlor maid, the parlor maid and a young gentleman, the young gentleman and a young wife, the young wife and her husband, the husband and a "süßes Mädel" (sweet young thing), the "süßes Mädel" and a poet, the poet and an actress, the actress and a count; and the last scene completes the round dance with the count and the prostitute. In every scene except the last, the dialogue between the couple frames their sexual intercourse, which is indicated in the text by a series of dashes. Reflecting the transitory nature of love and life and the universality of sexuality, each couple in Reigen pursues a fleeting union. No one takes the relationship seriously, as is evident by the changing couple constellations of each scene. Each character is involved in the tantalizing pursuit of the moment, and the dialogues reveal the diverse intentions, desires, and mores of each partner. The verbal exchanges constitute the action of the play, while they unmask social practice and formalities, just as the young wife unveils her face or the partners disrobe as they violate social convention. Schnitzler thus exposes the hypocrisy, deception, lies, lust, and superficiality permeating all social classes.

Seemingly, social boundaries are crossed in the pursuit of this elusive intimacy. Yet there is a noticeable difference in each character's behavior between the "before" and "after" intercourse dialogue, which undeniably reflects the social status of those involved. Each character—identified only by "type" and no name—plays a role befitting his or her social station: from crude seduction to naive yielding to pedantic fulfillment of duty to intellectualizing "love" to feigned sensuality to jadedness; from unconscious instinct, through desire for adventure, to game and seduction—to insensibility. The social order that determines the progression of the play necessarily establishes as well as reflects its intellectual and psychological structure. The scandal caused by Reigen undeniably reveals just how acutely Schnitzler touched the core (or raw nerve) of his society—and certainly confirms his reservations about making the play accessible to the general public.

FURTHER READING

Otis, Laura. "The Language of Infection: Disease and Identity in Schnitzler's Reigen." The Germanic Review 70, no. 2 (1995): 65–75.

Pfoser, Alfred, Kristina Pfoser-Schweig, and Gerhard Renner, eds. Schnitzlers Reigen. Zehn Dialoge und ihre Skandalgeschichte [Schnitzler's Reigen: Ten dialogues and their scandalous history]. Vol. 1, Der Skandal. Analysen und Dokumente [The scandal: Analyses and documents]. Vol. 2, Die Prozesse: Analyse und Dokumente [The trials: Analysis and documents]. Frankfurt: Fischer, 1993.

Schneider, Gerd K. "The Reception of Arthur Schnitzler's Reigen in the Old Country and the New World: A Study in Cultural Differences." Modern Austrian Literature 19, nos. 3–4 (1986): 75–89.

Elizabeth Ametsbichler

REINHARDT, MAX (1873–1943)

One of the most prolific, versatile, and influential directors of the 20th century, Max Reinhardt was among the first to realize RICHARD WAGNER's (1813–1883) vision of Gesamtkunstwerk ("total artwork") through his integration of drama, music, and spectacle in immense productions employing modern scenic and lighting technology. One ready measure of Reinhardt's impact lies in the number of his productions—over 500—and the more than thirty theaters and theater companies he oversaw.

Born Max Goldmann on September 9, 1873, in Baden, AUSTRIA, Reinhardt began his career as an actor, joining the Deutsches Theater in Berlin under the direction of OTTO BRAHM in 1894. After eight years of Brahm's NATURALISM, the playful and poetic Reinhardt was eager to break away. He founded a cabaret, "Schall und Rauch" (Sound and Smoke), in 1901 and by 1903 was simultaneously directing the Kleines Theater and the Neues Theater, thus instituting the now universal practice of dividing a company's season between large and small spaces.

His first major directorial success came in the Neues Theater in 1905 with A Midsummer Night's Dream, a production that discarded the "heavily pictorial" approach of the 19th century. Reinhardt went on to direct twenty-two plays by William Shakespeare in productions marked by free-flowing action and a symbolist approach to scenery, creating "the characteristic style of Shakespearian performance for the twentieth century" (Styan, 1982). In 1906 Reinhardt bought the Deutsches Theater as well as the Kammerspiele, a chamber theater next door. There he directed a season of modern plays, notably HENRIK IBSEN's GHOSTS with sets by the expressionist painter Edvard Munch (1863–1944). In 1910, Reinhardt staged two events that would establish his reputation for theatrical spectacle: Sumurun, a pantomime based on Tales from the Arabian Nights, and a massive production in the Circus Busch of Oedipus Rex. The latter was an early version of Reinhardt's idea of the "Theater of the Five Thousand," performances of civic and religious drama for large audiences that would recapture the spirit of the Greeks and the Middle Ages. Reinhardt further developed this idea in 1911 with circus productions of The Oresteia and Everyman and later with the creation of the Großes Schauspielhaus in Berlin. Also in 1911 he directed The Miracle by Karl Vollmoeller (1878–1948), a pseudomedieval religious spectacle with a company of 1,800 artists and technicians that premiered in London and was produced throughout the world for the next twenty years.

In 1920, Reinhardt moved from Berlin to Austria where, with Richard Strauss (1864–1949), Bruno Walter (1876–1962), and HUGO VON HOFMANNSTHAL, he inaugurated the Salzburg Festival. Reinhardt staged Hofmannsthal's Everyman on the steps of the Salzburg cathedral and Johann Wolfgang Goethe's Faust in the riding academy of the old imperial army. Meanwhile, he continued to mount intimate productions of smaller plays by classical and contemporary dramatists.

Born a Jew, Reinhardt was forced out of German-speaking Europe by the Nazis. He settled in the UNITED STATES, dividing his time between Hollywood and New York. Reinhardt also staged a number of plays in New York where, shortly after his seventieth birthday, on October 31, 1943, he died in New York City.

[See also Germany]

FURTHER READING

Braun, Edward. The Director and the Stage: From Naturalism to Grotowski.

New York: Holmes & Meier, 1982.

Leiter, Samuel L. From Stanislavsky to Barrault: Representative Directors of the European Stage. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Sayler, Oliver M., ed. Max Reinhardt and His Theatre. Tr. by Mariele S.

Gudernatsch et al. New York: Brentano's, 1926.

Styan, J. L. Max Reinhardt. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1982.

Martin Andrucki

RELIGION AND DRAMA

Drama has intimate historic links with religious rites and sanctified celebratory events for cultures East and West, so "religious drama" could be considered redundant. However, considering the period since 1870, the phrase has acquired a distinct, if malleable, meaning deriving both from subject matter and from intended effect.

Two voices are outstanding in the emergence and continuing vitality of this theater tradition. Søren Kierkegaard, monumental theologian for modern consciousness, in Purity of Heart (1948) refers to the prompter, the actor, and the audience as theater roles with significance for both drama and worship. He insists the preacher or play/playwright—not God—is the prompter; the actor is each member of the congregation. Observing each role player on eternity's stage in the role of audience is God. Thus the effect of the work on each onlooker is essential to the designation of a drama as religious and worship as relevant.

That assumption is underscored by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW as pioneer genius of religious drama. "My conscience is the genuine pulpit article; it annoys me to see people comfortable when they ought to be uncomfortable; and I insist on making them think in order to bring them to a conviction of sin. If you don't like my preaching you must lump it. I really cannot help it."

THE INFLUENCE OF SOCIAL GOSPEL

The resurgence of religious drama that began in the late 19th century in America and ENGLAND emerged primarily as part of what came to be known as the "social gospel" in Western Christian history rather than emphasis on classic dramatic heritage linking theater with appeasement of the gods.

Up to the middecades of the 20th century, the revival of interest in liturgy and medieval mystery plays, the emergence of the ecumenical movement after decades of denominational tensions in international missions, and the early reluctance of organized religion to tackle difficult intellectual problems over the Bible or religion "versus" science together created a turbulent new climate for believers of all persuasions.

With respect to theater, the atmosphere was hospitable for plays whose "message" was vindication of the lonely, pious, or dedicated conscience in conflict with authority, allegiance, or duty to established cultural norms. One respected theater producer-scholar observed: "For the man who finds no solace in the church, its metaphors become meaningless, and he must search elsewhere for satisfaction. Then the theatre moves back into providing alternative ritualistic experience."

In other words, religious drama incarnates a dramatic, even sacred "demilitarized zone" between two authorities or opposing powers. One is the institutional source of traditional rituals such as the established or majority religion or state law and custom. The other varies. Cultural crises such as economic injustice, racism, and changing sexual mores are examples. Subjective psychosocial tensions such as anxiety or the quest "to find who I am" vie with objective political issues such as unjust war, restricted civil liberties, and exploited and disenfranchised minorities.

While the form could still be described as propaganda, broadly defined, it is definitely not restricted to iconic revival and reenactment of saintly lives or historic holy myths. Indeed, it is questionable whether the subjection of sacred text and histories to the implicitly positivist process of literalistic modern staging and performing is not subversive to understanding and experiencing faith as an authentic alternative within scientific consciousness.

To be sure, staging the quest for divine inspiration and celebration of eternal truths present significant theatrical challenges, with audience reactions more often cerebral than heartfelt. Nevertheless, religious drama shares valiant, occasionally moving witness to the value and virtue of human rites as well as humane rights. Even though worldly powers almost invariably win the day, conscience has its say, and audiences may nurture an embattled faith in values that transcend authoritarian materialism.

One seminal stimulus for the rising tide of religious drama is arguably a still astonishingly popular novelistic parable by a South Dakota farmer-preacher's son with a flair for journalism. After New England college and seminary training, Charles M. Sheldon, embarking on a lifetime pastorate at Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kansas, preached and then published in 1896 a series of sermons that ranks with Uncle Tom's Cabin as catalyst of public enthusiasm for what became known as "social Christianity."

Sheldon's In His Steps: What Would Jesus Do? has doubtless surpassed its mid-20th-century record of thirty million copies in every language. Though adapted for film and repeatedly for the stage, Sheldon originally penned lively dialogue and action to punctuate the imaginative, naive tract featuring varied heroes, villains, romances, and martyrdoms in serial format. The work, widely reprinted in the UNITED STATES and abroad after a copyright flaw released it into the public domain, triggered a deluge of melodramatic social mission fiction challenging Gilded Age verities, such as If Christ Came to Chicago, by British journalistic crusader William T. Stead, and The Inside of the Cup, by respected British novelist Winston Churchill.

The sentimental, soul-stirring morality tale is relevant not only because it remains a bestseller amid myriad popular propaganda focused on social unrest. More important, it clearly highlights the definitive characteristics of religious drama.

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS DRAMA

The dominant thrust is evangelistic prophetic fervor to challenge, if not reform, superpersonal powers and institutions. The prevailing motif is pietistic emphasis on individual conversion and consecration in the face of near-hopeless odds. The justifying message is communication of the experience of redemption that transcends injustice and counters evil. Overall the motivating energy for the production is to deliberately blur the distinction between audience and congregation, to convert onlookers into an informal group of pilgrims sharing hopeful belief, skeptical faith, pessimistic irony—if only for a profoundly artistic and apocryphal theatrical moment.

Among the more than forty works by Shaw, at least five set standards that could exemplify prophetic, pietistic, or apocryphal religious dramas. Furthermore, in comic spirit and clever insight, which brighten all his plays, he represents what CHRISTOPHER FRY (in THE LADY'S NOT FOR BURNING) illuminates as a factor that might draw any COMEDY into the domain of religious drama.

For God's sake, shall we laugh? . . . For the reason of laughter, since laughter is surely the surest touch of genius in creation. . . . If you had been making man, stuffing him full of such hopping greed and passions that he has to blow himself to pieces as often as he conveniently can manage it, would it also have occurred to you to make him burst himself with such a phenomenon? That same laughter is an irrelevancy which almost amounts to revelation.

ARMS AND THE MAN and MAJOR BARBARA illustrate prophetic religious drama with endearing characters who confront war and culturally pervasive war-support resources. SAINT JOAN and Androcles and the Lion, notwithstanding their insightful and authoritative introductions, exemplify the imaginative, if not inspirational, models to which pietistic religious drama legitimately aspires.

As for apocryphal religious drama, Shaw the irrepressible iconoclast himself proclaimed his Utopian Ring-like cycle of five plays in one, BACK TO METHUSELAH, a "world classic." Shaw noted: "There is no real hope in impossible Utopias. I had to resort to a power which, as it exists and is in daily operation, can easily be conceived as capable of evolutionary intensification. This power is called Awe." His Utopians court catastrophe by stifling hope with the despair through which awe operates, all but wrecking civilization in the hurry to mend it.

Shaw never failed to suggest some new alternative panacea for the icons his plays wittily demolished. In this case, he summarized his redemptive vision: "The history of modern thought now teaches us that when we are forced to give up the creeds by their childishness and their conflicts with science, we must either embrace Creative Evolution or fall into the bottomless pit of an utterly discouraging pessimism."

But it is less that quaint evolutionary faith that justifies calling the work apocryphal than the sweeping scope of the play, Shaw's convicted refusal "to abandon all hope in a world of angry apes and perish in despair," and significant production footnotes. Professional manager Sir Barry Jackson felt enough audience rapport and support at his Birmingham Repertory Theatre presentation to exult in a modestly profitable subsequent London run and ultimately to initiate festival formats by founding one in 1929 at Malvern, largely to produce Shaw.

From the viewpoint of his lofty plays (and prefaces) opens a horizon with an abundance of prophetic, pietistic, and more recently, apocryphal works—a realm of religious drama bursting the narrow bounds of didactic, moralistic, pageantary propaganda illustrating holy books and sacred visionaries.

Two volumes of anthologies, introduced by Marvin Halverson, former head of the now-defunct Department of Worship and the Arts of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., include several examples of the prophetic (volume 1) and of the pietistic (volume 3). The publication of the series included in volume 2 more than twenty samples of medieval mystery cycles and constituted (along with an academic program of lectures and productions at New York City's Union Theological Seminary) a high point of the religious drama landscape in the mid-20th century.

Prominent landmarks among prophetic works are HENRY ARTHUR JONES's Saints and Sinners; BERTOLT BRECHT's THE LIFE OF GALILEO and Lamp Unto My Feet by Barrie Stavis about the same subject; HENRIK IBSEN's ENEMY OF THE PEOPLE; T. S. ELIOT's The Rock and MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL; ARTHUR MILLER's ALL MY SONS and THE CRUCIBLE; Inherit the Wind by JEROME LAWRENCE AND ROBERT E. LEE; and JAMES BALDWIN's Blues for Mister Charlie. What John Mason Brown called the "indignant" tone of Hallie Flanagan's innovative "living newspaper" theater appropriately characterizes all these works and merits reference in this context to those experimental plays exploring social, economic, and political dislocation. As social ethics challenged a theology of individualized personal piety, so these socially conscious works stirred controversy and helped extend the boundaries of issues and plays that could be called religious.

A genre of dramatic presentations focused on alcoholism, drug addiction, family abuse, or other dislocating social problems and presented to target audiences under those threats or at religious institutions by the nonprofit body "Plays for Living" stems from this source. They as well as far more popular, less widely known presentations are related as much to morality plays as to television sitcoms.

Radicalized art in the streets, part of strident Black Power social reform energy in the 1960s, helped galvanize what in the 1920s had become known as the Chitlin Circuit of entertainers for a segregated target audience: southern and midwestern U.S. blacks. The vigorous successor to that varied roster of actors, comics, and musicians now features broadly played MELODRAMAS laced with gospel songs and comic caricature that highlights for urban black audiences everyday ghetto problems—gang violence, drug culture, disintegrating families, offspring unwanted and deserted.

Almost exclusively publicized through church bulletins or radio talk and financed in cash by often shady sources, these productions flourish largely outside the domain of culturally mixed audiences, dramatizing on- and offstage preacher/pusher conflict in the still strongly churchgoing black communities that make these productions outstandingly profitable. Righteous fury to move souls fuels playwrights and performers; hearty audience call and response in voice and gesture recalls the enthusiasm of congregations as a holy communion deeply moved. The exuberance of a playgoing experience so poignant, prophetic, and hilarious, as well as so insistent on the indomitable power of prayerful will in one dedicated soul, justifies reference to Adrian Williamson's My Grandmother Prayed for Me, a notably popular example of this circuit.

In not just glorifying the masses but actually appealing to them—as Henry Louis Gates Jr. eloquently noted about circuit shows—such productions vividly demonstrate how theater can buoy and rededicate racially and ethnically varied minority target audiences. Aesthetic reservations notwithstanding, such works sanctify their tribulations and hallow their dogged commitment to keep the faith and keep on keepin' on. Aesthetic reservations notwithstanding, finally this visceral sanctity is what sometimes compromises but absolutely marks all forms of religious drama.

Unquestionably the hardest and most prolific is the pietistic form with its emphasis on individual conscience, conversion, and conviction in the context of historic conflicts with and martyrs to the status quo as well as shadowed soul treks defiantly hopeful, if often bleak or doomed. Resonant with medieval miracle, mystery, and morality play traditions, the effect of these works is to strengthen individual commitment by reaffirming faith and events that witness to divine presence in human history. The more artistically satisfying and durable create characters out of which all-too-familiar scenarios and myths spring afresh.

The Passing of the Third Floor Back by Jerome Jerome, John Edward Masefield's Coming of Christ, Charles Rann Kennedy's The Terrible Meek, and Dorothy L. Sayers's radio play for the BBC The Man Born to Be King all focus on the historical Jesus, his associated friends or enemies, and their latter-day reflections in terms calculated to engage audiences and foster personal faith in the war-torn decades before the mid-20th century. Saint Mark's Gospel, a one-actor performance, originally conceived by Alec McCowen in the mid-1970s, was a stunning reminder that in the hands of an accomplished performer unadorned religious texts and saintly characters can enthrall an audience, recalling the simplest hearthside theater compact of lively narrator and rapt listeners.

The legendary, unprecedented MAX REINHARDT production of The Miracle demonstrated early in the 20th century on international tour scale the validity of that assumption. It surely underlies the attraction for generations of tourists for the hoary pageantary enactment of Jesus' life at Oberammergau (notwithstanding objections to anti-Semitism) and accounts for the popularity of the Bible as a resource for contemporary professional storytellers.

Certain works in the musical theater tradition that are updated translations of religious texts and traditions such as Joseph and His Technicolor Dreamcoat, Godspell, Jesus Christ Superstar, and Your Arms Too Short to Box with God are also examples of spectacles more theatrically sophisticated than pageants but still reflecting the liturgical assumption of music and parable messages delivered to a largely passive body of individual observers whose response remains personal and private.

AUGUST STRINDBERG's To Damascus, J. M. BARRIE's The Boy David, T. S. Eliot's The Family Reunion, MARC CONNOLLY's The Green Pastures, EUGENE O'NEILL's Lazarus Laughed, Fry's A Sleep of Prisoners and The Lady's Not for Burning, ARCHIBALD MACLEISH's J. B., and ROBERT BOLT's A Man for All Seasons are among soul-searching works that fire the conscience and refresh the visionary. TERRENCE McNALLY's Love! Valour! Compassion! and A Perfect Ganesh and DAVID HARE's Racing Demon are funny, acid, post-Christian summons for loners to brave the culture war zones girded in street smarts, fired with spirit to share, chastened by sorrow and loss. These works evoke the potency of personal conversion and the embrace of uncertain destiny as a dynamic scenario to stir the soul, whether in settings of theater, religious revival arenas, or political conventions.

SOUL SEARCHING IN THE 21ST CENTURY

It is a fascination as unlikely as awe to lose its power and charm. Even amid 21st-century globalism marked by interfaith dialogue as well as transnational scientific agnosticism, appealing dramatic conflict still lies in the instinct to imitate a lonely quest for a less selfish soul, whether through self-denial and service or through self-critical embrace of the success ethic. The different drummer is assured of a leading role as long as aggressive individualism remains a civilized priority.

Surely symptomatic of multiple cataclysmic threats that plague human civilization particularly since the advent of nuclear power, a third form of play springs from social-ethical and theological sources and yet is distinctive enough from most earlier 20th-century religious drama to be called apocryphal.

Primarily it is the effectively blurred contrast between audience and congregation that sets these works apart. However much both seek to be enlightened, audiences want to be amused, touched, seduced from their disbelief, whereas congregations want to be absolved, healed, helped to restrain their unbelief. If audiences have stars in their eyes, congregations have souls on their sleeves.

Despite these polarities, both bodies of onlookers welcome inspiration, even if it discomforts them. And who can deny the evangelical dimensions of engaging theatergoers by choral recitation of the Lord's Prayer, gospel choir music, or startling and liturgically resonant stage effects experienced (approvingly or pessimistically) at SAMUEL BECKETT's Waiting for Godot, BRIAN FRIEL's Dancing at Lughnasa, JEAN ANOUILH's The Lark, Fr. Daniel Berrigan's Trial of the Catonsville Nine, Lee Breuer's Gospel at Colonus, and TONY KUSHNER's Angels in America?

The latter work, epochal in its treatment of AIDS and related homosexual themes also brutally exposed in BENT and Daniel Kramer's various works, accentuates the priority of rededicating as well as challenging the audience. A glimpse of the sublime through and beyond conflict, agony, death, and despair is the apocryphal goal to which these plays aspire.

If their authors lack Shaw's confidence that he achieved it, they at least shy away from solutions all too quickly antiquated and irrelevant. With determination as wry as it is exuberant, they prefer faithful, comradely resolution in the face of imponderables. In the process the audience of onlookers in the darkened auditorium is called to see and feel new light, a primarily collective rather than private individual vision incarnating hope against hope for reconciliation, if not redemption.

Though none of these aspire to the majestic sweep of Peter Brook's works about religion and power glimpsed through fiction and legend as well as holy books and characters of diverse world faiths, they share the conviction that the line between public and performer, between objective plot and communal ritual, should at least be obscured, even if it can never quite disappear. Only perhaps THORNTON WILDER's Our Town (which according to one critic belied comment as much as the Twenty-third Psalm) hauntingly provokes such audience soul stirring.

Yet its still, small voice, in contrast to The Maharabata or Peter Brook's three latest plays based on Islam, Hinduism and Christianity (Tierno Bokar, The Death of Krishna, and The Grand Inquisitor), shares the perspective of Brook's Sufi mystic character Bokar in his reply to a pupil's question, "What is God?" That answer suggests the paradox that ensures the survival of religious drama in the face of believers and skeptics alike: "God is an embarrassment to human intelligence. Because if you affirm

His existence, you cannot prove it. But if you deny His existence, you deny your own existence.”

[See also Philosophy and Drama]

FURTHER READING

- Eversole, Finley, ed. Christian Faith and the Contemporary Arts. Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon, 1957.
- Houghton, Norris. The Exploding Stage Introduction to Twentieth Century Drama. New York: Weybright & Talley, 1971.
- Religious Drama 1: Five Plays. Intro. by Marvin Halverson. New York: Meridian Bks., 1957.
- Religious Drama 2: Twenty-one Medieval Mystery and Morality Plays. Intro. by E. Martin Browne. New York: Meridian Bks., 1958.
- Religious Drama 3: An Anthology of Modern Morality Plays. Intro. by Marvin Halverson. Cleveland: World Pub., 1959.
- Speaight, Robert. The Christian Theatre. New York: Hawthorn Bks., 1960.

Frank Lloyd Dent

RENDRA (1935–)

Indonesian playwright, director, actor, and poet, Rendra is the most influential figure in Indonesian modern theater and the most recognized literary and artistic personality in contemporary INDONESIA. Born on November 7, 1935, in Solo, Central Java, Rendra's Catholic parents christened him Willibrordus Surendra Rendra, which he shortened to W. S. Rendra in the 1950s. In 1970 he converted to Islam, changing his name to Wahyu Sulaiman before dropping the “W. S.” altogether. He is now known only as Rendra.

During the repressive years of President Haji Mohammad Suharto's New Order (1966–1998), Rendra was the most overtly political theater artist. He was jailed, placed under house arrest, banned, stoned, and bombed. He had to struggle to obtain permission to perform. Well read, articulate, and even mystical in his private life, Rendra's public persona is flamboyant and charismatic. His overriding concern has been maintaining his personal beliefs.

After studying Western literature in Yogyakarta, and at Harvard and New York University in the early 1960s, he entered the American Academy of Dramatic Art in New York in 1964. Rendra returned to Yogyakarta in 1967, establishing his communal Bengkel Teater (literally Theater Workshop or Garage). There he introduced a new method of actor training to Indonesia—a workshop headed by a playwright/director/actor/“guru” who concentrates on process-oriented approaches to theater rather than the Western REALISM taught by Indonesia's national theater academies.

Rendra's Mini Word plays (Bip Bop, Rambat, Rate Rata, and Piiipppp, 1968) were groundbreaking movement pieces based on dialogue-free, improvisatory exercises called Beautiful Movements. At their core, these were pieces protesting social conditions and conventional theater practice. Rendra drew upon indigenous theatrical elements that, until that time, had been kept separate from modern theater. His numerous adaptations of Western classical and modern plays—including Oedipus Rex (1969, 1987), WAITING FOR GODOT (1970), Macbeth (1970, 1976), Hamlet (1971, 1975, 1976, 1994), Lysistrata (1974, 1976, 1979, 1991), and Antigone (1974)—are significant. Rendra recontextualizes these works to mirror local social conditions.

Rendra became known internationally after he was banned from mounting plays in Yogyakarta following The Mastodon and the Condors (Mastodon dan burung kondor, 1973), which told the story of an idealistic young student poet (played by Rendra) entangled in an uprising for educational reform against a repressive dictator. Rendra continued his “pamphlet theatre” in Jakarta with THE STRUGGLE OF THE NAGA TRIBE (Kisah perjuangan suku Naga, 1975). Using the structure of a traditional wayang (shadow puppet) play, this script depicts a village under threat due to a foreign mining project. In 1975, the same year he was banned from performing in Central Java, Rendra was awarded the Jakarta Academy Arts Award. In 1978, following a reading of protest poetry where two ammonia bombs were thrown into the crowd, Rendra was placed under house arrest for three months. He was banned from performing anywhere from 1978 until 1986, when he staged his spectacular seven-hour Prince Reso (Panembahan Reso) in Jakarta.

SELECT PLAYS: Bip Bop (1968); Aswar's World (Dunia Aswar, 1971); The Mastodon and the Condors (Mastodon dan burung kondor, 1973); The Struggle of the Naga Tribe (Kisah perjuangan suku Naga, 1975); The District Secretary (Sekda, 1977); Prince Reso (Panembahan Reso, 1986); The Ritual of Solomon's Children (Selamatan anak cucu Sulaiman, 1988)

FURTHER READING

- Gillitt, Cobina. “Challenging Conventions and Crossing Boundaries: A New Tradition of Indonesian Theatre from 1968–1978.” Ph.D. diss., New York Univ., 2001.
- Gillitt Asmara, Cobina. “Tradisi Baru: A New Tradition of Indonesian Theatre.” Asian Theatre Journal 12, no.1 (Spring 1995): 164–174.
- Morgan, Anne-Marie. “Three Approaches to Modern Theatre in Jakarta in the 1990s: Rendra, Putu Wijaya and Ratna Sarumpaet.” Australasian Drama Studies 27 (1995): 70–85.
- Verburgt, Ron. “‘I Am Because You Are; You Are Because I Am’: An Interview with Rendra.” Australasian Drama Studies 25 (October 1994): 6–16.

Cobina Gillitt

RENDRA, W. S. See RENDRA

RENÉE (1929–)

Renée (born on July 19, 1929, in Napier, NEW ZEALAND) has written a large number of plays that, through a variety of forms, address the oppressions of gender in conjunction with class and even race (she has Maori ancestry: Ngati Kahungunu and Scots).

She worked for many years as an actor and director of community theater.

Her first play, Setting the Table (1982), broadcast on radio before being staged at Auckland's Mercury Theatre in 1982, placed her in the vanguard of feminist theater in New Zealand. Set in the kitchen of some women who help at a refuge for victims of domestic and sexual abuse, Setting the Table examines the use of violence by women, after an angry husband follows one of the workers home. Interwoven in the action are rehearsals for a satirical feminist revue.

Renée is best known for her trilogy about the women in a working-class family between the 1870s and the 1950s. Resilient and resourceful, Renée's heroines exemplify the contribution women have made to the development of New Zealand. Wednesday to Come (1984) concerns the crisis faced by four generations of women when the family breadwinner commits suicide in a relief camp during the 1930s Depression.

In Pass It On (1986), the two adolescents of Wednesday to Come, Jeannie and Cliff, have grown up, and the play focuses on the role of women in the 1951 Waterfront Dispute. In contrast to the NATURALISM of the earlier play, Pass It On has a documentary style: it is episodic and more didactic. The final play, Jeannie Once (1990), steps back in time, to present Granna of Wednesday to Come as a young woman, recently arrived from IRELAND and newly widowed, working to establish herself as a dressmaker in Victorian Dunedin. Among the other women struggling to create a life in the colonial outpost are an oppressed wife of a Presbyterian minister, her Maori servant, and an Irish music hall singer and former male impersonator. As well as the world of music hall, the play evokes the MELODRAMA characteristic of the theater of the period.

Renée's other plays include Breaking Out (1982), about efforts to establish a women's center; Groundwork (1985), a didactic piece about lesbian visibility and the effects of the 1981 Springbok rugby tour on five women; Secrets: Three Short Plays for Two Women (1982); Belle's Place (1987), a lesbian play; Touch of the Sun (1990), a COMEDY about two middle-aged sisters sorting through their dead mother's wardrobe; Missionary Position (1991), about Greta Garbo, Marilyn Monroe, and Marlene Dietrich, three bag ladies seeking refuge in a fantasy film-star world; and Tē Pouaka Karaoke: The Glass Box (1992), her most overt exploration of Maori identity. She has also written for television but since 1993 has devoted herself primarily to writing novels.

PLAYS: Breaking Out (1982); Secrets: Three Short Plays for Two Women (1982); Setting the Table (1982); What did you do in the war, Mummy? (1982); Asking for It (1983); Wednesday to Come (1984); Groundwork (1985); Pass It On (1986); Belle's Place (1987); Born to Clean (1987); Form (1990); Jeannie Once (1990); Touch of the Sun (1990); Missionary Position (1991); Pink Spots and Mountain Spots (1992); Tē Pouaka Karaoke: The Glass Box (1992); Tiggy Tiggy Touch Wood (1992); Heroines, Hussies and High High Flyers (1993)

FURTHER READING

- Beatson, Peter. "Passing It On" [interview with Renée]. Sites 16 (Autumn 1988): 24–36.
- Black, Sebastian. "Renée, Wednesday to Come and Pass It On." Australasian Drama Studies 12–13 (1988): 190–195.
- McCurdy, Claire-Louise. "Feminist Writer Renée: All Plays Are Political." Women's Studies Journal 1, no. 2 (April 1984): 61–72.
- Payne-Heckenberg, Pamela, and Tony Mitchell. "Interview: Renée." Australasian Drama Studies 10 (April 1987): 21–28.
- Tompkins, Joanne. "What We Want and What We Get: Renée's Jeannie Once." Hecate 20, no. 2. (1994): 243–250.
- Warrington, Lisa. "A Life Long Affair: Renée Writing for the Theatre. Commentary/Interview." Australasian Drama Studies 18 (April 1991): 70–90.

Stuart Young

RESINO, CARMEN (1941–)

Born in Madrid on November 25, 1941, Carmen Resino stands out as one of SPAIN's most prolific and innovative playwrights and novelists with a career that spans forty years of uninterrupted productivity. The President (El presidente, 1968) heads her literary credits that today include over two dozen dramatic works and nine novels. Resino is an active scholar, teacher, and writer with degrees in history and dramatic arts as well as a founding member and first elected president (1986) of the Spanish Women Playwrights' Guild. Although her theater has been widely published and has attracted national and international critical acclaim, few of her plays have been staged in Spain owing to the endemic lack of financial support and theater space accessible to contemporary dramatists, particularly women.

Resino's theater is original and defies simple classification. Through a prismatic aesthetic approach, Resino integrates elements pertaining to the school of REALISM or of the absurd in order to create a multidimensional reality that is tangible and elusive, critical and philosophical, realistic and bizarre. Oftentimes, the dramatist includes music and dance as integral facets of the drama, thus blurring the conventional parameters between straight and musical theater. Although she rejects the feminist label, the majority of her works reveal a feminist critical underpinning that is reflected both in her strong women characters and in the selection of controversial themes. Among her many considerations, Resino underscores the abuse and imbalance of power between the social classes and the sexes, which have defined the course of history and have caused immeasurable suffering and damage to the dynamic of personal relationships.

Given the author's predilection for history, it is not surprising that so many of her plays center on a particular historic or legendary character or anecdote set in Spain or abroad. The dramatist is less concerned with historical precision of facts, however, and more interested in restoring vitality, sensuality, and immediacy to a particular moment of the past. Her characters are well defined and generally avoid stereotypes or idealizations. Even so, they bear a close resemblance in colloquial language, gestures, and attitudes to the ancestral national picares that populated Spain's most authentic and popular literary genre. They live in a reality fraught with injustice and cruelty that often demands the sacrifice of ideals for the privilege of survival. Regardless of whether they are among the survivors or the defeated, these characters embody a wide spectrum of human nature's flaws, virtues, and contradictions that have not changed over time. Frequently, their individual destinies are differentiated by little more than fortuitous circumstance or varying degrees of success or failure. Nevertheless, they are resourceful and clever and undaunted by the challenge to etch out an identity and reclaim independence from the whims of dispassionate gods.

Herein lies the essence of Resino's theater: it is defined not so much by the heroic or tragic outcomes of conflicts as by the revelations of universal truths about the human condition and experience. Resino's theater is provocative and unsettling, but it provides powerful lessons that transcend time and national boundaries.

SELECT PLAYS: The President (El presidente, 1968); The Thirst (La sed, 1980); Mother, the Child Isn't Crying! (¡Mamá, el niño no llora! 1982); Ulysses Is Not Returning (Ulises no vuelve, 1983); There Are No More Waltzes (Ya no hay valses, 1985); New History of the Princess and the Dragon (Nueva historia de la princesa y el dragon, 1988); Personal and Not Transferable (Personal e intransferible, 1988); The Actress (La actriz, 1990); Auditorium (Auditorio, 1990); Formula Three (Fórmula tres, 1990); Impossible dialogues (Diálogos imposibles, 1990); Margarita, the Beautiful (La bella Margarita, 1990); Professor Schneider's Secret Enemy (El oculto enemigo del profesor Schneider, 1990); The Beauty Merchants (Los mercaderes de la belleza, 1992); The Erotic Dreams of Elizabeth Tudor (Los eróticos sueños de Isabel Tudor, 1992); Pop and French Fries (Pop y patatas fritas, 1992); Under Suspicion (Bajo sospecha, 1995); The Girls from Saint Ildefonso (Las niñas de San Ildefonso, 1996); Spanish West (1996); The Reception (La recepción, 1997); It's the Others (Son los otros, 2001); The Orchestra (Orquesta, 2002)

FURTHER READING

- Budel, Barbara Foley. "Rewriting Herstory in Carmen Resino's Los eróticos sueños de Isabel Tudor: When Fiction Is 'Truer' than 'History.'" West Virginia Philological Papers 46 (2000): 77–83.
- Gabriele, John. "Estrategias feministas en el teatro breve de Carmen Resino." Letras Femeninas 21, no. 1 (Summer 1995): 85–95.
- Lamartina-Lens, Iride. "A New Look at Familiar Faces: Carmen Resino's Ulises no vuelve and María José Ragué-Arias' Clitemnestra." Romance Languages Annual 1 (1990): 495–499.
- . "Introducción al teatro de Carmen Resino." In Testimonios del Teatro Español: 1950–2000. Vol. 1, ed. by Candyce Leonard and Iride Lamartina-Lens. Ottawa: Girol Bks., 2002. 141–142.
- Leonard, Candyce. "Re-writing/Re-presenting Textual/Sexual Gender Roles in Twentieth-Century Female-Authored Spanish Drama." In Un Escenario Propio/A Stage of Their Own, ed. by Kirsten Nigro and Phyllis Zatlin. Ottawa: Girol Bks., 1998. 27–35.

Iride Lamartina-Lens

THE RESISTIBLE RISE OF ARTURO UI

The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui (Der aufhaltsame Aufstieg des Arturo Ui, 1941), published in the critical edition of BERTOLT BRECHT's (1898–1956) works under the revised title The Rise of Arturo Ui (Der Aufstieg des Arturo Ui), was one of several projects undertaken in exile by Brecht as resistance against the Nazi dictatorship. The common purpose of these projects was to educate people, especially Americans who could not draw upon direct experiences, about the true nature of fascism, while at the same time giving encouragement to those who were fighting to defeat the Nazis. As things turned out, The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui was not to be performed until its premiere in Stuttgart in November 1958.

The play is a political allegory, with obvious correspondences: Arturo Ui=Adolf Hitler (1889–1945); Dogsborough=Paul von Hindenburg (1847–1934); gangsters=fascists; Chicago=GERMANY. In the guise of telling the story of how the mob boss Arturo Ui exploits a cauliflower monopoly as the springboard to power, Brecht presents the history of Hitler's rise in the 1920s through to the annexation of Austria. No one can fail to decode the allegory because at the end of each scene the historical event is glossed explicitly through signboards, a device Brecht often used to prod the audience into critical reflection.

The name Arturo Ui goes back to Brecht's notes as early as 1934 for a satire on the "Life and Deeds of Giaocoma Ui from Padua," set in the Italian Renaissance. But the concept of analyzing the politics of capitalism from the perspective of the gangster underworld had attracted Brecht even earlier, when he adapted John Gay's (1685–1732) The Beggar's Opera (1728) into THE THREEPENNY OPERA (Die Dreigroschenoper, 1928). There are evident parallels between the rise of Arturo Ui and the reign of Mack the Knife, from their tendency to pathos to their cold cunning when it comes to money and power. However, the main point of both plays is to show that the participants are actors in, not directors of, the historical process. Those who are really in charge are no more visible onstage than in real life. As Arturo Ui himself succinctly states: "Might belongs to those who pay."

The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui is the work of a mature playwright in full command of his techniques. The dialogue in verse echoes and reworks classical dramas (William Shakespeare, Friedrich Schiller, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe) in a brilliant language adequate to contemporary needs. The bombast of political rhetoric is disarmed by moments in which individuals express an awareness of their lives with poignant simplicity. The last line of Roma's monologue—"No one will hear you. No one heard me"—indicts not just Ui but all tyrants. The fact that Ui could not help having become the boss signals that the political allegory rests on the foundations of a TRAGEDY.

FURTHER READING

- Atkins, Robert. "‘Und Es Ist Kein Gott Außer Adolf Hitler’: The Biblical Motifs in Brecht’s Arturo Ui and Related Works as Political Counter-Propaganda." Modern Language Review 85 (1990): 373–387.
- Bathrick, David. "A One-Sided History: Brecht’s Hitler Plays." In Literature and History, ed. by Leonard Schulze and Walter Wetzels. Lanham, Md.: Univ. Press of America, 1983. 181–196.
- Grenville, Anthony. "Idealism Versus Materialism in the Representation of History in Literature: The Dictator Figure in Thomas Mann’s ‘Mario und der Zauberer’ and Brecht’s ‘Der aufhaltsame Aufstieg des Arturo Ui.’" Journal of European Studies 17 (1987): 77–105.
- Humble, M. E. "The Stylisticisation of History in Bertolt Brecht’s Der aufhaltsame Aufstieg des Arturo Ui." Forum for Modern Language Studies 16 (1980): 154–171.
- Schürer, Ernst. "Revolution from the Right: Bertolt Brecht’s American Gangster Play The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui." In Critical Essays on Bertolt Brecht, ed. by Siegfried Mews. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989. 138–154.

Arnd Böhm

RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL

The second full-length play by St. John Hankin (Edward Charles) is an ironic updating of the prodigal son parable that reflects the incompatibility of Christian charity with Edwardian materialism. Eustace Jackson, the titular prodigal, having run through the £1,000 with which he was sent off to AUSTRALIA several years earlier, is found prostrate on the doorstep of his home in the village of Chedleigh. His reappearance jeopardizes the ambitions of the parvenu Jacksons, most of which involve keeping up appearances for the upcoming parliamentary elections, in which his father, Samuel, will stand as a Conservative, and for the Faringfords, impoverished aristocrats with a daughter whom his brother, Henry, hopes to marry. Much of the play’s conflict centers on Eustace’s unwillingness and inability to work and the challenge this poses to his family’s cherished middle-class beliefs, particularly that industriousness is the chief measure of social worth. Samuel is outraged when Eustace demands an allowance to support him for the rest of his life, but he capitulates when Eustace threatens to go to a workhouse, which would endanger his father’s reputation, or to drown himself, which would quash his brother’s chances for marriage. The prodigal departs with the guarantee of £250 a year and a promise never to return.

The Return of the Prodigal is, in part, a response to Hall Caine’s The Prodigal Son, a Drury Lane MELODRAMA (adapted from Caine’s novel) that also had its first production in 1905. Hankin eschews Caine’s facile sentimentality by parodying the conventions of the parable: his prodigal is unrepentant, his father unforgiving, while the “fatted calf” becomes a tepid and impersonal breakfast and the clothing of the prodigal a tailor’s bill for Eustace’s suits that Samuel refuses to pay. The play is also an occasion for satirical jabs at the outmoded conventions of Edwardian life, from the mystification of the middle classes by a titled nobility that lacks money, property, and influence to the boredom induced by postprandial musicales. Hankin reserves his last two acts, however, for an extended and discomfiting examination of predatory capitalism and its human costs from the prodigal’s outsider perspective. Eustace delivers several set-piece speeches on the logical outcomes of a “survival of the fittest” market, in which the weak (and poor) are leeches on the success of the strong and wealthy and, as Eustace cynically posits, ought to be slaughtered wholesale by the government for the health of ENGLAND. The play is littered with stories of bad speculations, failed business ventures, and widowed wives without any means of supporting themselves; through these secondhand accounts, Hankin suggests that the suffering that attends failure in a competitive society is not limited to one character or family. Hankin also rejects the possibility that individuals can reform themselves to fit the demands of their environment. The play’s epigraph from Heraclitus, “Character is Fate,” is echoed in a late speech by Eustace, “The real tragedy is what one is. Because one can’t escape from that.” His constitutional unsuitability for work forces Eustace into the predatory position of blackmailing his own family, much as the Faringfords prey on the Eustaces for wealth, the Eustaces on the Faringfords for status, and Samuel and Henry on other mills to stay in business. In 1905, this overtly Darwinian critique was unusual in a stage play and unheard of in a “COMEDY.”

The Return of the Prodigal opened the second season of the Royal Court Theatre in 1905, and it embodies many of the philosophies of the “New Drama” that premiered there: an emphasis on stage NATURALISM, an “open-endedness” that neither resolves the central conflicts nor allows audience sympathy to rest with one character or position, a brief investigation of the role of women in modern society, and a dedication to exposing the unrealistic conventions of the West End theater and the middle-class audiences that attended it. Unlike many of his fellow playwrights, however, Hankin refuses to identify a program that might address the problems he documents; his play is not as much special pleading for outcast prodigals as it is an unflinching look at the consequences of economic Darwinism. It has only enjoyed a modest success on the British stage, and critics of the play, then and now, have faulted it for didactic exposition that occasionally breaks character, though it has been praised for its bitter humor and trenchant social commentary. The Return of the Prodigal returned to the Royal Court in 1907, and there was a revival in 1948 at the Globe Theatre with John Gielgud in the title role. Although it has never received a major production in the UNITED STATES, it was a popular and critical success at the Shaw Festival in repertory during the 2001 and 2002 seasons.

[See also England]

FURTHER READING

Andrews, Alan. "Unhappy Endings: An Essay on The Return of the Prodigal."

In Shaw and His Contemporaries: Four Plays, ed. by Denis Johnston.

Oakville: Mosaic Press and the Academy of the Shaw Festival, 2001.

McDonald, Jan. The "New Drama" 1900–1914: Harley Granville Barker, John Galsworthy, St. John Hankin, John Masefield. London: Macmillan, 1986.

Phillips, William H. St. John Hankin: Edwardian Mephistopheles.

Cranbury: Associated Univ. Presses, 1979.

Lawrence Switzky

REZA, YASMINA (1959–)

When "ART" ("Art," 1994) opened at Wyndham's Theatre in London in 1995, Yasmina Reza became the first French author to play a West End commercial theater in forty years. "Art" had already played in fifty continental theaters, forty of them German. It would soon be translated into many languages and play in venues around the world. Audiences everywhere reacted to the play's spare, razor-sharp dialogue and its unusual focus on the friendship of three heterosexual males, a friendship plunged into crisis when one of them buys a minimalist painting.

Born in 1959, Reza credits her background as an actress (she trained at the Jacques Lecoq school) with giving her the sensitivity to write actor-friendly plays: "Most writers don't know that actors are never better than in the pauses or in the subtext. They give the actors too many words. In a play, words are parentheses to the silences. They're useful for the actors, but only that; they aren't the whole story."

Playgoers who saw her first play, Conversations After a Burial (Conversations après un enterrement, 1987), were treated to a study in subtly modulating moods. At rise, mourners are gathered stiffly around an open grave: a father's death after a long illness leaves his adult children choked with grief. Over the course of the play the audience comes to understand that the children have been choking on something else for many years, an inchoate mass of resentments they can neither swallow nor reject but must work through.

Reza set her second play, Winter Crossing (La Traversée de l'hiver, 1989), on a hotel terrace in the Alps in autumn. Under a guise of easy sociability, the few guests staying at the hotel make subtle emotional demands on each other. Their need is not so much to communicate as to commune, to be part of something. When caught in the fact of need, they cover themselves by pointing out that they are only on vacation; they will soon be off to someplace else.

Conversations and Winter Crossing each have six characters and are modeled on chamber music—specific string quintets are even mentioned in the dialog. Reza's third play, The Unexpected Man (L'homme du hasard, 1992, though first produced after "Art" in 1995), used a radically different arrangement: two characters, no entrances, no exits—two inner monologues that resonate in a closed railway compartment. One belongs to a prominent novelist pushing sixty, an acrid man sensing the wane of his creative abilities yet still possessed of a reckless imagination. Opposite him is a handsome widow of about fifty. In the first twenty-seven pages of the published text, the lines are not spoken in the compartment but voiced to the audience directly from the characters' minds. Long before the novelist, the audience discovers (1) that the woman has recognized him, (2) that he is her favorite author, and (3) that she has got his latest novel in her handbag. The play follows the serpentine path of their mutual self-introductions.

After the enormous success of "Art", Reza hesitated before returning to the theater; she wrote two novels and a book of memoirs. Her fifth play, Life X 3 (Trois versions de la vie, 2000), cycles through three variations on a botched dinner party to show how a change in attitude can provoke a change of fortune. An astrophysicist has invited a senior colleague and his wife to dinner. The night before, he and his wife are putting their offstage child to bed and planning what to serve when the doorbell rings: the other couple has come a day early. The evening goes rapidly downhill as all four characters fall to insulting each other. In the second version, the senior colleague and the astrophysicist's wife are having an affair. In the third version, the astrophysicist is more in control of himself (and his situation) and more optimistic. The improvised evening goes much better, though the play stops short of declaring that attitude is destiny.

The restlessness of some of Reza's characters is prefigured in her family history; her paternal ancestors were forced from SPAIN when, as Jews, they declined to become Catholic. They later had to leave Persia when they refused to become Muslim.

PLAYS: Conversations After a Burial (Conversations après un enterrement, 1987); Winter Crossing (La Traversée de l'hiver, 1989); The Unexpected Man (L'homme du hasard, 1992); "Art" (1994); Life X 3 (Trois versions de la vie, 2000); A Spanish Play (Une pièce espagnole, 2004)

FURTHER READING

Reza, Yasmina. Hammerklavier [Memoirs and reflections]. Tr. by Carol Cosman and Geraldine Touzeau-Patrick. New York: Braziller, 2000.

Riding, Alan. "If 'Art' Is for Art's Sake, It's Also a Career Lift for Its French Creator." New York Times (November 28, 1996): C11.

Schneider, Robert. "Yasmina Reza: Writing in a Major Key" [interview]. American Theatre (November 1998).

Robert Schneider

RIANTIARNO, NANO (1949–)

Nakula Riantiarno (Nano) was born in Cirebon, West Java, on June 6, 1949, the fifth of seven children, whose father was a railway clerk. His first stage experience occurred in 1966 when performing in CALIGULA produced by a group in Cirebon.

In 1968 Nano entered the National Theatre Academy of INDONESIA (ATNI) in Jakarta. At ATNI he studied with Teguh Karya. ATNI taught the theory of Western theater based on KONSTANTIN STANISLAVKY's principles of REALISM; Nano studied books on ARTHUR MILLER and BERTOLT BRECHT. Teguh selected Nano for an ACTING course he unofficially opened on the campus. ATNI later prohibited the course; its activities were moved to Jakarta's Hotel Indonesia, where Teguh, with Nano and other students, established Teater Populer (Popular Theater) in 1968. His wife Ratna Riantiarno became a major actress for the group and responsible for managing aspects of business and production.

During the period with Teguh (1968–1975), Nano acted in plays and began playwriting and directing while acquiring acumen in theater management. In 1975 he traveled around Indonesia for six months, seeking inspiration from the traditional (wayang) and popular (ludruk and ketoprak) performing arts. Nano aspired to a theater alternative to realism offering art, PHILOSOPHY, politics, and entertainment. On March 1, 1977, Nano established Teater Koma (Coma Theater).

Most plays written by Nano during the Haji Mohammad Suharto administration were subjected to authoritarian dictates. Performances were monitored by intelligent agencies, censored, shut down, and Nano was constantly interrogated, but not one play was banned outright. After the performance in 1985 of THE COCKROACH OPERA (Opera Kecoa), every play required special permission before it was staged. Themes of plays are often infused with issues of corruption, collusion, and nepotism within a repressed society plagued by poverty rendering it powerless to confront authoritarian rule.

Chinese IDENTITY was suppressed in Nano's play Sampek Engtay (1988), based on a Chinese story. Chinese symbols onstage were forbidden; the appearance of the traditional Chinese lion dance (barongsai) was banned. Nano was interrogated in 1990 while performances of Succession (Suksesi) proceeded; the play was eventually closed. Set in a fictitious kingdom, Suksesi, one of the king's five children, had ambitions for the throne. The play reflected on the issues of President Suharto's succession and his nepotism.

After the Suharto regime fell in October 1998, Nano maintained a political stance with The Constipation Opera (Opera Sembilit), the story of a nation restricted by overbloated leadership. The nation's politics in 2001 are the subject of The Republic of Bagong (Republik Bagong), set in the context of the wayang shadow play, satirizing the ineptness of leadership coupled with the proliferation of new political parties. Nano often returns to plays in the repertoire, believing theater is a journey without periods but filled with commas—hence the name Teater Koma.

SELECT PLAYS: House of Paper (Rumah Kertas, 1977); Time Bomb (Bomb Waktu, 1982); The Cockroach Opera (Opera Kecoa, 1985); Julini's Opera (Opera Julini, 1986); Buriswara Conglomerate (Konglomerat Buriswara, 1987); Sampek Engtay (1988); Transvestites Accuse (Banci Gugat, 1989); Succession (Suksesi, 1990); The Primadonna Opera (Opera Primadona, 1993); The White Snake Opera (Opera Ular Putih, 1994); Semar Accuses (Semar Gugat, 1995); Greedy Love (Cinta yang Serakah, 1996); The Constipation Opera (Opera Sembilit, 1998); President of the Birds (Presiden Burung, 2001); The Republic of Bagong (Republik Bagong, 2001)

FURTHER READING

- Junarto, Herry Gendut. Teater Koma: A Portrait of Indonesian Tragedy and Comedy [Potret tragedi dan komedi manusia Indonesia]. Jakarta: Grasindo, 1997.
- Schwarz, Adam. A Nation in Waiting: Indonesia in the 1990's. Sydney, Australia: Allen & Unwin, 1994. 167–168.
- Vatikiotis, Michael R. J. Indonesian Politics Under Suharto. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Zurbuchen, Mary. "Images of Culture and National Development in Indonesia: The Cockroach Opera." Asian Theatre Journal 7, no. 2 (1990): 127–149.

Ian Jarvis Brown

RICE, ELMER (1892–1967)

Born Elmer Leopold Reizenstein on September 28, 1892, in New York City, Elmer Rice was once ranked second only to EUGENE O'NEILL in importance to the American theater. A prolific writer, he is best remembered today for just two of his plays—THE ADDING MACHINE (1923) and STREET SCENE (1929)—each demonstrating radically different theatrical styles.

Rice studied at the New York Law School, but while working as a law clerk, he became interested in writing plays. His first produced work, The Passing of Chow-Chow, won a dramatic writing competition at Columbia University in 1913.

Rice's first real success as a playwright came with On Trial (1914). Murder trial witnesses testify as their memories are dramatized before the audience in what would now be called flashbacks. In the earliest use of what is now a standard dramatic technique in film and television, the memory scenes take the audience further and further back into the events that led to the murder.

The Adding Machine is a landmark of American EXPRESSIONISM, reflecting the growing interest in this highly subjective and nonrealistic form of modern drama. Rice's style of expressionism was influenced by Eugene O'Neill's THE HAIRY APE; both authors draw heavily upon American urban stereotypes in character and dialect. Yet O'Neill shows his expressionistic hero, Yank, to be a fundamentally decent man who has become unbalanced by a conflict between his sense of IDENTITY in mechanized society and how he is perceived by others, while Rice depicts his protagonist, Mr. Zero, as the epitome of all human vulgarity in the modernized world. Unlike O'Neill, Rice's brand of expressionism is comic. The Adding Machine and The Hairy Ape share anxiety about the soul of the modern working man, a central theme of expressionist theater.

The Adding Machine also displays the American expressionist use of exaggeration and grotesqueness in speech, characterization, sound, and visual presentation. The THEATRE GUILD produced the play with designs by the innovative scenographer Lee Simonson, who created a nightmarish larger-than-life adding machine that the protagonist worked with his entire body, an element not called for in Rice's text.

Rice collaborated with Hatcher Hughes, of the Morningside Players, to write Wake Up Jonathan (1921), an unmemorable MELODRAMA that starred Minnie Maddern Fiske. He later collaborated with Dorothy Parker on Close Harmony (1924), a satiric COMEDY of manners, and with PHILIP BARRY on Cock Robin (1928), a comic mystery. These plays found a larger audience in the growing amateur and little theater market than on Broadway.

Street Scene is set on the front stoop and adjacent sidewalk of a New York City tenement; the play features dozens of characters who drift in and out to create slice-of-life NATURALISM. To heighten the local color, Rice's characters use a variety of immigrant and working-class dialects. The play is an excellent example of tastes and trends of American drama in the period. Like the plays of the highly successful naturalistic theater of director-playwright DAVID BELASCO, Street Scene is tinged with melodrama; there is a love triangle and sensationalized crime of passion. Yet, like SIDNEY HOWARD'S THEY KNEW WHAT THEY WANTED, the play ends unromantically. Furthermore, the play emphasizes social reality and portrays sympathetic New York Jewish characters, both suggesting a kinship between Rice and CLIFFORD ODETS.

Street Scene explores themes of brutality and sympathy, and violence and nurturing, all in the style of naturalism. The central theme is much the same as in The Adding Machine—the detachment caused by overmechanized urban living. However, Street Scene suggests greater optimism for humanity, offering more glimpses of tenderness and genuine affection.

Rice himself directed Street Scene, which ran for over six hundred performances. In his autobiography, the playwright described the opening:

At the final curtain there were cheers. The curtain went up and down so many times that I lost count. . . . As the demonstration continued, there were cries of "Author!" I did not want to appear, for I think a play should speak for itself. But, as the cries and the urgings of the actors became more insistent, I went on and said a few words in praise of the cast. The curtain came down, the house lights went up; it was over at last. (Rice, 1963)

The play won the Pulitzer Prize that year and was made into a successful movie in 1931; Rice later collaborated with Kurt Weill and LANGSTON HUGHES on the musical version.

In the early 1930s, Rice wrote and produced a string of unsuccessful shows, including We, the People (1933), Judgment Day (1934), and Between Two Worlds (1934). In 1934, he announced his retirement from the theater. He soon became interested, however, in creating a theater organization he called the Theatre Alliance, which helped inspire the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT. In 1935, Rice briefly served as head of the New York regional Federal Theatre Project but resigned in protest of the censorship of Ethiopia, a Living Newspaper performance.

In 1938, Rice again abandoned semiretirement for a recently begun New York theatrical venture, The Playwrights' Company. Founded in 1937 by ROBERT SHERWOOD, MAXWELL ANDERSON, SIDNEY HOWARD, and S. N. BEHRMAN, the organization's purpose was to foster growth in the work of American playwrights. This was not a repertory theater with a company of resident actors but a commercial theater dedicated to the work of its playwrights, and it produced five new Rice plays in ten years. Flight to the West (1940) was a commentary on totalitarian government. Set on board an airplane carrying a variety of World War II refugees and a Nazi diplomat, the play's dialogue and action are highly dialectical and propagandistic, reflecting Rice's strong political views. Predictably, the play pleased audiences and critics who shared Rice's perspective but alienated others.

In the early 1940s, Rice worked for the Hollywood film industry, most notably writing the screenplay for Holiday Inn (1942), starring Bing Crosby and Fred Astaire. His last few plays met with only moderate success on Broadway. Rice died on May 8, 1967, in Southampton, ENGLAND.

[See also United States]

PLAYS: On Trial (1914); The Passing of Chow-Chow (1916); The House of the Free (one-act, 1917); For the Defense (1919); Wake Up Jonathan (with Hatcher Hughes, 1921); The Adding Machine (1923); Close Harmony (with Dorothy Parker, 1924); Cock Robin (with Philip Barry, 1928); See Naples and Die (1929); Street Scene (1929); The Subway (1929); Counsellor-at-Law (1931); The Left Bank (1931); Black Sheep (1932); The House in Blind Alley (1932); We, the People (1933); Between Two Worlds (1934); The Home of the Free (one-act, 1934); Judgment Day (1934); Not for Children (1936); American Landscape (1938); Flight to the West (1940); Two on an Island (1940); A New Life (1943); Dream Girl (1945); Street Scene (musical version, with Kurt Weill and Langston Hughes, 1947); The Grand Tour (1951); The Winner (1954); Cue for Passion (1958); Love Among the Ruins (1963)

FURTHER READING

- Durham, Frank. Elmer Rice. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- Hogan, Robert. The Independence of Elmer Rice. Carbondale: Southern Illinois Univ. Press, 1965.
- Palmieri, Anthony F. R. Elmer Rice: A Playwright's Vision of America. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson Univ. Press, 1980.
- Rice, Elmer. Minority Report: An Autobiography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1963.
- Vanden Heuvel, Michael. Elmer Rice: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Wixson, Christopher. "Everyman and Superman: Assimilation, Ethnic Identity, and Elmer Rice's Counsellor-at-Law." American Drama 8, no. 1 (Fall 1998): 59–74.

DeAnna M. Toten Beard

RICHARDSON, JACK (1935–)

For my part, I find most theatre dreadful. It is full of totems, taboos, and rituals that should have passed with the Paleolithic Age. It has served as an outlet for man's most sentimental estimates of himself.

—Jack Richardson, 1962

In the early 1960s Jack Richardson was hailed as one of America's most promising young playwrights, attracting critical notice for plays that mirrored the cynicism and disaffection of his generation. His works are notable for their intellectual exploration of philosophical issues, logical construction, and Shavian dialogue.

Richardson was born on February 18, 1935, and raised in New York City. Following a brief stint in summer stock and a three-month course in ACTING at the American Theatre Wing, Richardson enlisted in the army. Serving from 1951 to 1954, he was stationed in Korea, Frankfurt, and Paris (where he briefly attended the University of Paris). Following his discharge from the army, Richardson completed a philosophy degree at Columbia University, then returned to Europe to pursue graduate work at the University of Munich on an Adenauer Fellowship in Germanic Studies.

When Richardson returned to the UNITED STATES in 1958, he turned his attention to the theater. When his first play The Prodigal debuted at the OFF-BROADWAY Downtown Theatre on February 11, 1960, twenty-four-year-old Richardson became a critical sensation. Termed "the most brilliantly written new play to come out since the end of World War II" by critic George Wallerth, The Prodigal is an existentialist rendering of the story of Orestes. Richardson depicts his young protagonist as a reluctant hero, forced by societal expectations to avenge the murder of his father Agamemnon. Winner of an Obie Award and a Drama Desk Award, the play's success spurred reviewers to herald Richardson, alongside EDWARD ALBEE, ARTHUR KOPIT, and JACK GELBER, as one of the bright new stars of the American theater.

Gallows Humor (1961), Richardson's second off-Broadway production, pairs two short plays that share a common theme. In them, Richardson returned to the theme of man at the mercy of social institutions. A TRAGICOMIC indictment of capital punishment, the play solidified Richardson's reputation as a philosophical commentator in the vein of FRIEDRICH DÜRRENMATT and JEAN-PAUL SARTRE.

Richardson's subsequent plays failed to attract the critical success of his early efforts. In Lorenzo (1963) Richardson again explored the theme of the futility and destructiveness of war, this time during the Italian Renaissance. Opening on Broadway at the Plymouth Theatre on February 14, 1963, the production ran for only four performances. Xmas in Las Vegas (1965), a darkly comic play about a compulsive gambler, also had a brief and unsuccessful Broadway production. An unpublished play, As Happy as Kings, attracted little notice when it was produced by New Theatre Workshop in 1968.

As the American theater became increasingly experimental and politically vocal in the late 1960s, the abstract rhetoricism of Richardson's plays failed to satisfy public tastes or producers' commercial aims. Following the disappointing reception of his Broadway productions, Richardson turned his focus to critical writing and fiction. A screenplay, Juan Feldman, was published in 1968. His novels include The Prison Life of Harris Filmore (1965) and Memoirs of a Compulsive Gambler (1980), an autobiographical exploration of Richardson's private obsession with gambling. His dramatic criticism and essays have been regularly featured in many national publications, including the New York Times, Esquire, and Commentary magazine.

[See also England, 1940–Present]

SELECT PLAYS: The Prodigal (1960); Gallows Humor (1961); Lorenzo (1963); Xmas in Las Vegas (1965); As Happy as Kings (1968)

FURTHER READING

Callens, Johan. Double Binds: Existentialist Inspiration and Generic Experimentation in the Early Work of Jack Richardson. Amsterdam:

Rodopi, 1993.

Lumley, Frederick. New Trends in 20th Century Drama. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1967.

Richardson, Jack. "Jack's First Tape: A Self Interview." Theatre Arts 46 (March 1962): 64–65, 73–77.

—. "On Reviewing Plays." Commentary (September 1966).

Wellwarth, George. The Theater of Protest and Paradox. New York: New York Univ. Press, 1964.

Debra Charlton

RIDERS TO THE SEA

Riders to the Sea, a TRAGEDY uniquely in one-act by J. M. SYNGE, was first performed at Molesworth Hall, Dublin, on February 25, 1904, by the Irish National Theatre Society, with Honor Lavelle in the role of Maurya (it was later played by Sara Allgood) and W. G. Fay as her last son Bartley, the only man in her family of a husband and six sons not yet lost to the sea, though he would be drowned as well by the end of this short play. The play is the only one by Synge that is set on the Aran islands, where his long stays had given him plots, a feeling of kinship with the people, and an ear for poetic peasant speech that influenced all his dramatic work. The great line with which Maurya, bereaved a seventh time, ends the play—"No man at all can be living forever, and we must be satisfied"—was translated by Synge from a letter in Irish sent him by a friend on the island. The language of the play is less capricious and imaginative than that of Synge's other plays. The action is simple, doom-laden, and devastating. As one son's body is being identified by knit of the sweater on his back, and boards are being gathered for his coffin (painfully, there are no nails to be found on the island, so his burial must wait), the last son—taking a pig for sale to the mainland—refuses his mother's pleading not to leave, because of a bad omen she has noticed, and goes off to his death.

Upon hearing the manuscript play read out by Synge, W. B. YEATS cried out, "Sophocles! No, Aeschylus!" The sense of a primal world of humans nobly living in relation to nature and family, and accepting fate and human limitation, makes the comparison with Aeschylus apt, in spite of the play's brevity and precise localization. Among one-act plays in the English language, it is a classic. Its performance in Dublin humbled Synge's critics, who found much to criticize in the rest of his plays.

[See also Ireland]

FURTHER READING

- Paulin, Tom. "Riders to the Sea: A Revisionist Tragedy?" In Interpreting Synge, ed. by Nicholas Grene. Dublin: Lilliput, 2000.
- Thornton, Weldon. J. M. Synge and the Western mind. Gerrards Cross, Bucks.: Colin Smythe, 1979.
- Watson, George J. Irish Identity and the Literary Revival: Synge, Yeats, Joyce and O'Casey. London: Croom Helm; New York: Barnes & Noble, 1979.

Adrian Frazier

RIGHT YOU ARE

Right You Are (Così è, se vi pare), a play in three acts written by LUIGI PIRANDELLO in 1917, premiered in Milan (ITALY) at the Olympia Theater on June 18, 1917, and is based on Pirandello's short story "Mrs. Frola and Mr. Ponza, her son-in-law." In Right You Are, speech, more than actions, constitutes the essence of this play that inaugurated the so-called cerebralism of the Sicilian playwright's works.

On the outskirts of an unidentified provincial town, in contemporary Italy, a married civil servant, Mr. Ponza, rents a small apartment. He also rents an apartment for his mother-in-law in a downtown building where Mr. Agazzi, Mr. Ponza's head clerk, lives with his wife, Amalia, and daughter, Dina. The gossip in the building is that not only does Mr. Ponza never allow his wife out; he also prohibits her from seeing her mother. The Agazzis, Lamberto Laudisi (Amalia's brother), and other friends, demand an explanation. They rule out the possibility of a relationship between Mrs. Frola and her son-in-law, and later she justifies Mr. Ponza's actions, saying that he wants to be the sole recipient of his wife's love. This explanation is invalidated by Mr. Ponza's statement that Mrs. Frola's daughter, his first wife, died four years before, causing Mrs. Frola's craziness. According to Mr. Ponza, Mrs. Frola believed she saw her daughter when she saw him with his new wife, and out of consideration for his mother-in-law's mental health, he decided to let her believe it. Again Mrs. Frola undermines Mr. Ponza's credibility, saying that he no longer recognized his wife when she returned from a forced temporary separation that was caused by his brutal physical love. Attempts to attain truth through official documents are foiled by an earthquake that took place years before in the Ponzas' hometown. Ultimately the Prefect, the highest state representative in the city, orders Mr. Ponza, his subordinate, to bring Mrs. Ponza. She enters the room, her face heavily veiled, and says she is Mr. Ponza's second wife, the daughter of Mrs. Frola, no one to herself: she is who others want her to be.

Laudisi's comments remind readers of the pointless quest for one-dimensional facts. While it is excessive to identify him as the voice of the author, Laudisi's words insert a theme crucial to Pirandello: the impossibility of identifying truth. The poignant description of Mr. Ponza as a brute, prey to instincts, who loved his wife too ardently, might suggest, besides Mr. Ponza's sanity or insanity, that the puzzling intellectual game Pirandello is accused of setting up is not his goal. In fact, Pirandello's characters err when they rely too much on intellect. Theories about Mrs. Ponza's identity produce opinions that contradict themselves, trapping the inquisitors in a sterile logic to which anti-intellectualism could provide an escape.

Since 1922 Right You Are was among the first of Pirandello's plays considered for production in the UNITED STATES. It was eventually performed in December 1926 at Cornell University. It then opened in New York on February 23, 1927, with Edward G. Robinson and Morris Carnovsky and thereafter enjoyed continuous success. The play immediately became a trademark of Pirandello's style.

FURTHER READING

- Dombroski, Robert S. "Laudisi's Laughter and the Social Dimension of Right You Are (If You Think So)." Modern Drama 16 (1973): 337–346.
- Kroha, Lucienne. "Behind the Veil: A Freudian Reading of Pirandello's Così è (se vi pare)." Yearbook of the Society for Pirandello Studies 12 (1992): 1–23.

Stefano Giannini

RINGWOOD, GWEN PHARIS (1910–1984)

To read The Collected Plays of Gwen Pharis (1982) is to be impressed by the variety and scale of this seminal Canadian dramatist's achievements. The collection contains naturalistic, one-act pieces, epic, large-cast, full-length productions, historical musicals, and children's plays. Ringwood also published a novel, Younger Brother (1959; another novel, Pascal, remains unpublished), and numerous critical articles, poems, and short stories.

Ringwood was born in Anaton, Washington, on August 13, 1910. In 1913 her family moved north from Washington State to Lethbridge, Alberta; later they moved close to Magrath. Ringwood's father was an agriculturalist; her mother was a schoolteacher; her three brothers died early—two of them in World War II. Gwen attended schools in Calgary, Edmonton, and Montana and studied at the Universities of Montana, Alberta, and North Carolina, excelling in dramatic study. Ringwood began to write in the 1930s. At the University of Alberta, she wrote thirteen Sheila Marriot-directed radio plays. Having worked for Sterling Haynes, who was promoting Albertan theater, Ringwood had been inspired to begin a productive career.

Geraldine Anthony, Ringwood's biographer and primary supporter, organizes her dramatic canon into three sections: early prairie plays, Alberta folklore plays, and dramas of social protest. The early, one-act prairie play STILL STANDS THE HOUSE (1938) is regarded as Ringwood's triumph—unlike her other plays, most of which are forgotten, Still Stands the House continues to be performed regularly. The play is fraught with images and instances of death, as the inhabitants of a rural house battle with extreme weather, environmental pressures, and conflicting personal motivations. This play, like other, generically similar works, including One Man's House (1938) and Pasque Flower (1939), was produced in the late 1930s, under the patronage of Frederick Koch of the Playmakers School, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Ringwood returned to Alberta in 1939—the year of her marriage to medical practitioner John Brian Ringwood—and wrote plays concerning that region's folklore. These plays vary from gentle COMEDIES to raucous FARCES. Many of these 1940s and 1950s plays represent immigrant communities: French and Ukrainian settlers mingle with established Canadians. The Court-ing of Marie Jenurin (1941), about a canny, much-coveted girl, the rodeo-based Stampede (1945), and Widger's Way (1952), which follows the adventures of a diffident Albertan farmer, are examples of these entertainments.

The Ringwoods moved to Williams Lake, British Columbia, in 1953. Ringwood became preoccupied with social injustices, concerns that are articulated through her drama. Her concern for native people's welfare is evident in Maya (1959), The Stranger (1971, a rewrite of Medea), The Lodge (1976), and The Furies (1980), all of which feature Indian protagonists wronged by whites. Ringwood's last plays focus on the challenges facing elderly people. In The Lodge, the aging Jasmine surveys with horror her family's scramble to inherit her wealth. Ringwood had known for some time that her cancer was incurable (she died in Williams Lake, British Columbia, on May 24, 1984); it is small wonder, then, that her final plays, such as Garage Sale (1981), are haunted by anxieties about old age, physical decline, and the loss of mental control. With plays involving the elderly as well as youngsters, and those neither young nor old, Ringwood's drama communicates to every age range.

[See also Canada]

SELECT PLAYS: The Dragons of Kent (1935); Blacksmith (1938); Still Stands the House (1938); Pasque Flower (1939); The Courting of Marie Jenurin (1941); The Jack and the Joker (1944); The Drowning of Wasyl

Nemichuk or A Fine Colored Easter Egg (1948); Widger's Way (1952); Lament for Harmonica or Maya (1959); The Road Runs North (1967); The Deep Has Many Voices (1968); The Stranger (1971); The Lodge (1975); A Remembrance of Miracles (1975); Mirage (1979); The Furies (1980); The Garage Sale (1981)

FURTHER READING

- Anthony, Geraldine. Gwen Pharis Ringwood. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.
 Benson, Eugene. "Gwen (dolyn Margaret) Pharis Ringwood." In International Dictionary of Theatre-2: Playwrights, ed. by Mark Hawkins-Day. Detroit: St. James Press, 1994. 806–808.
 Lister, Rota Herzberg. "Gwen Pharis Ringwood." In The Oxford Companion to Canadian Theatre, ed. by Eugene Benson and L. W. Connolly. Toronto: Oxford Univ. Press, 1989. 486–489.
 Ringwood, Gwen Pharis. The Collected Plays of Gwen Pharis Ringwood. Ed. by Enid Rutland. Ottawa: Borealis Press, 1982.
 "Ringwood Talks About Her Life and Work." In Stage Voices, ed. by Geraldine Anthony. New York: Doubleday, 1978. 90–110.
 University of Calgary Libraries. Special Collections Division. The Gwen Pharis Ringwood Papers: An Inventory of the Archive at the University of Calgary Libraries. Compiled by Marlys Chevrefils, Shirley A. Onn, and Apollonia Steele. Ed. by Jean M. Moore and Jean F. Tener. Calgary: Univ. of Calgary Press, 1987.
 Wagner, Anton. "Gwen Pharis Ringwood Rediscovered." Canadian Theatre Review 5 (1975): 63–69.

Kevin De Ornellas

RIP VAN WINKLE

Are we so soon forgot when we are gone.

—Rip Van Winkle

In the summer of 1860, the 19th-century American comic star Joseph Jefferson revised several old versions of Washington Irving's Rip Van Winkle and premiered it in Washington, D.C., on November 5. He subsequently commissioned the playwright and actor DIONYSIUS BOUCICAULT to produce a new version, which opened in London on September 4, 1865, and in New York on September 3, 1866. Jefferson continued to perform and "improve" the Boucicault version until his retirement in 1904. The resulting text is a collaborative work among Jefferson, his predecessors in the role, and Boucicault.

Rip Van Winkle begins in the village of Falling Waters, New York, "set amid . . . unmistakable Hudson River scenery." Rip, once a prosperous man, has wasted his fortune on drink. Derrick von Beekman, to whom Rip has mortgaged his lands, was once the suitor of Rip's wife, Gretchen. Derrick hopes to win Gretchen again and to get Rip to sign a deed conveying the property to him. Rip enters, surrounded by children. Derrick reads an incomplete version of the deed to the illiterate Rip. Later, however, Rip tests whether Meenie's playmate Hendrick can read, discovers the deceit, and does not sign the deed.

In the second act, the shrewish Gretchen throws Rip out of the house into a storm. The third act—Jefferson's greatest contribution is to the play—consists of a monologue in which Rip meets the spirits of Hendrick Hudson and his crew, drinks their magic liquor, and falls asleep for twenty years.

In the fourth act, Rip awakens, an aged man, and returns to Falling Waters, where he barely recognizes the town he left, now transformed by the American Revolution. Gretchen is married to Derrick, who is also attempting to get Meenie to give up hoping that Hendrick, now a sailor, will return and trying to force her to marry his ne'er-do-well nephew Cockles.

Because no one recognizes Rip, Jefferson was able to deliver one of his most famous poignant lines: "Are we so soon forgot when we are gone." Just as the mob is about to drive the old man from the village, Hendrick reappears to save him. Rip meets his daughter Meenie, and when she does not know him, he delivers yet another of his "hits": "My child looks in my face, and don't know whom I am!" Meenie, however, rushes into his arms, shouting, "I do! Father!" Hendrick proves that Derrick von Beekman is a fraud, Rip's property is restored, Meenie and Hendrick are united, and Gretchen goes back to Rip and even offers him a drink. Jefferson ended the play with Rip's famous toast: "I'll drink your good health, and your families, and may they all live long and prosper."

Rip's foibles disguise his inner goodness so that when he is punished for drinking by sleeping through twenty years of his life, the late-19th-century audience sympathized with an old man in a new world, his sense of bewilderment and nostalgia marching their own discomfort in the rapid industrialization of post-Civil War America.

[See also United States]

FURTHER READING

Bloom, Arthur. Joseph Jefferson, Dean of the American Theatre. Savannah, Ga.: Frederic C. Beil, 2000.

Jeffersoth, Joseph. The Autobiography of Joseph Jefferson. New York: Century, 1889.

Johnson, Stephen. "Joseph Jefferson's Rip Van Winkle." The Drama Review 26 (Spring 1982): 4–20.

Arthur W. Bloom

THE RISE OF ARTURO UI See THE RESISTIBLE RISE OF ARTURO UI

RIVERA, JOSÉ (1955–)

Transactions between the mundane and the extraordinary are not merely a literary technique, but a mirror of intractable reality.

—Michiko Kakutani

A Puerto Rican-born playwright noted for reflecting daily reality through poetry and dreams, Jose Rivera, born in San Juan in 1955, moved to the UNITED STATES when he was four years old and for many years was part of the only Hispanic family in his neighborhood. While his family's lack of money and education made him intensely conscious of issues of IDENTITY and belonging, the rich culture he received at home offered him a way to articulate and reconcile such problems.

Writing predominantly in the Latin American style of magic REALISM, Rivera notes that his faith in the supernatural was passed down through generations of a rural family who had little education in the formal sense and who traditionally explained life's dramas through superstition and magic. The family stories about their ancestors that he heard while growing up made no distinction between fantasy and reality. One of his favorite memories is his grandfather's tale of a conquistador in full armor, astride a white horse, bursting out of a tree that the old man had climbed as a boy. Rivera uses this tradition to mirror the challenges of being Hispanic in the United States. His journey as a playwright has been an endeavor to reconcile the contradictions of being caught between two cultures.

Early plays, The Promise (1988) and Each Day Dies with Sleep (1989), were written in reaction to the negative portrayals of Latinos in popular American culture. Rather than following the tendency to articulate the Puerto Rican experience through harsh realism and urban drug culture, Rivera's plays merged imagination and reality to offer a subjective focus on Latino culture in a small, semirural environment, with an emphasis on family, sexuality, spirituality, and the occult.

Rivera's later plays continue to offer a subconscious interweaving of people and episodes close to his own life but attempt to present a broader vision. The Obie Award-winning Marisol (1992) expands on the interior nightmare of the Latino experience to express the chaos caused by the breakdown of social interaction. Marisol ("Mary-alone") tells the story of a young middle-class Puerto Rican woman left alone in the Bronx when her guardian angel sheds her wings to wage war against a senile God. Without spiritual protection, the world disintegrates into an apocalyptic nightmare. The disappearance of the moon, ecological disasters in Ohio, and Nazi skinheads torching tramps in parks provide surreal reflections of anxieties such as loneliness and loss of compassion that Rivera believes plague modern life. Other notable plays, Cloud Tectonics (1995) and References to Salvador Dalí Make Me Hot (2000), also expose the stark truths of life through extreme hallucinatory metaphors. Influenced by the Columbian novelist Gabriel García Márquez, Cloud Tectonics examines the way love seems to make time stand still when a man rescues a beautiful young hitchhiker from the rain. The woman claims she is fifty-four and has been pregnant for two years.

Although Rivera has spent much of his career working in film and television, he continues to write for the stage. His recently produced work Adoration of the Old Woman (2002) is perhaps his most political to date, blending Latin magic realism with straightforward Western realist drama to directly tackle the question of Puerto Rican independence.

[See also Puerto Rico]

PLAYS: The House of Ramon Iglesia (1983); The Promise (1988); Each Day Dies with Sleep (1989); Marisol (1992); The Crooked Cross (1994); Flowers (1994); Gas (1994); Tape (1994); A Tiger in Central Park (1994); The Winged Man (1994); Cloud Tectonics (1995); The Street of the Sun (1996); Maricela de la Luz Lights the World (1997); Sueño (1998); References to Salvador Dalí Make Me Hot (2000); Sonnets for an Old Century (2000); Adoration of the Old Woman (2002); Massacre (Sing to Your Children) (2004); School of the Americas (2004); Six Billion Devils (2004)

FURTHER READING

- "José Rivera." In Dictionary of Literary Biography. Vol. 249, Twentieth-Century American Dramatists, 3d series, ed. by Christopher Wheatley. Detroit: Gale, 2002.
- Rivera, José. Marisol and Other Plays. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1997.
- . References to Salvador Dalí Make Me Hot and Other Plays. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2003.
- Simons, Tad. "José Rivera: We All Think Magically in Our Sleep." American Theatre 10 (July 1993).
- Svich, Caridad. "'An Urgent Voice for Our Times.' An Interview with José Rivera." Contemporary Theatre Review 14, no. 4 (November 2004): 83–89.

Olivia Turnbull

ROAD

Road, JIM CARTWRIGHT'S first play, was premiered at London's Royal Court Upstairs and was such an immediate success that it transferred first to the main house, then later into the West End, and was subsequently toured nationally. The play's structure is episodic, a tour during one night of a street in a run-down northern town, with a guide called Scullery linking the mostly self-contained scenes, sometimes with other characters encountered on the street. The play's opening features a variety of characters preparing for their night out; aggression and poverty are the keynotes. But this is not straight reportage; the first two scenes end with characters directly ("blankly") addressing the audience: "Fucking long life in' it?" The first half of the play also features monologues from Molly, a baby-talking, nostalgic old lady; the "Professor," whose "anthropological study of 'Road'" has led to his losing everything; Skin Lad, a reformed skinhead who tells of how he found the dharma; and Jerry, a nostalgic middle-aged man who "can't see how that time could turn into this time." The half ends with Joey and Clare, two young lovers who starve themselves to death.

Many productions immediately vary the tone with Cartwright's interval material, which features Scullery singing karaoke in the theater bar, and the "Beatoven" disco playing for the "Erotic clutch" (Sheena, Tina, and Maureen), until one of them injures her back. The second half begins after the pubs shut. Helen brings a nearly unconscious soldier back to her place, where he is sick. Valerie's monologue tells of the disintegration of her marriage under the pressure of unemployment. Brian and Marion's drunken flirting turns sour when they are interrupted by his daughter Linda; as Brian storms out, she tells the audience, "POOR LITTLE ME!" The play ends with a good-bye from Scullery after four passionate monologues building to a communal chant, after "you drink, you listen to Otis, you get to the bottom of things and you let rip."

Focusing on Road as a "state of the nation" play, besides reducing the necessity to engage with its staging dispossession and loss two decades on, runs the risk of missing the demotic power of Cartwright's language, the emotional charge of his shifts into and out of direct address, and his gifts in rapidly establishing situation and character, particularly in monologue. Critics write of the generosity of Cartwright's vision as much as its grimness. This fusion shows most clearly in the characters' mordant wit and in the play's use of music. Molly is given a pathetically child-like soliloquy; but the action later stops when she "sings a beautiful old Lancashire folk tune." If the play's opening to the sound of Judy Garland's "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" is quickly revealed to be grimly ironic, its cathartic conclusion is built upon the directness and power of Otis Redding's "Tenderness."

[See also England]

FURTHER READING

- Cohn, Ruby. Retreats from Realism in Recent English Drama. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1991.
- Peacock, D. Keith. Thatcher's Theatre: British Theatre and Drama in the Eighties. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Sadler, Geoff. "Road." In Contemporary British Dramatists. London: St. James, 1994.

Stephen Longstaffe

ROBERTO ZUCCO

BERNARD-MARIE KOLTÈS'S last play, Roberto Zucco (1989), completed shortly before his death, is based on the life and death of Italian serial killer Roberto Succo. Escaping from an Italian prison, where he was serving a life sentence for killing his parents, Succo remained at large in FRANCE for several years, committing more murders, including a French police officer, and evading French and Italian authorities. Finally captured in 1988, he attempted to escape by climbing on the roof of the Treviso prison, where he spent hours throwing bricks at the guards and screaming at the journalists assembled with television cameras. Koltès, whose interest in Succo began when he saw a "wanted" poster with a series of photographs in the Parisian subway, watched the live television broadcast of Succo's standoff and said in an interview with Le Monde on September 26, 1988: "His trajectory is unbelievable; he is an exemplary killer. . . . A mythic creature, a hero, like Samson and Goliath."

Koltès's play transforms the figure of the serial killer away from its violent and sensational excess toward a mode of representation that pays special attention to the dilemma of a dehumanized hero trapped in the gaze of a society that constructs him according to its fantasies of aggression. Confronted with his imminent death, Zucco reaches a certain lucidity from knowing that, like Sisyphus, he is condemned to be “the futile laborer of the underworld,” the voice that needs to articulate a certain ineffable metaphysics of despair. But, as ALBERT CAMUS said of Sisyphus, “if this myth is tragic, that is because its hero is conscious”; it is such mortal knowledge that makes Zucco dramatize the world around him.

Borrowing from a film noir editing style, the play is divided into fifteen sequences that end in a mythical image of a sublime ascension toward the sun. Zucco becomes an actor who stages four spectacular murders: the mother (strangled), the father (thrown from a window), the police officer (stabbed with a knife), and the innocent child (shot with a revolver). His antihero's histrionics are a way for Koltès to expose the absurdity of the human condition and the perversity of rebelling against it. The play reveals the contradictions inherent in the representation of elemental evil: extreme brutality is often accompanied by a sense of absence and loss, and in Koltès's world, a bloody killer can be as charmingly lyrical as a young poet. The spectator or reader is moreover denied the satisfaction of knowing the psychological motivations behind the crimes, thus thwarting realist desires to draw causal links between childhood pathology and adult monstrosity.

Roberto Zucco combines Albert Camus's existential angst with the violence of JEAN GENET's theater and a Brechtian sense of ALIENATION and distancing. However, it carries the particular signature of the author: the combination of witty parody with poetic virtuosity. Roberto Zucco premiered in 1990, directed by Peter Stein at Berlin's Schaubühne a year after its author's death. The first French production was at Théâtre National Populaire of Villeurbanne, directed by Bruno Boeglin in 1991.

FURTHER READING

Crimp, Martin, tr. Roberto Zucco, by Bernard-Marie Koltès. London: Methuen, 1997.

Koltès, Bernard-Marie. Une part de ma vie, entretiens, 1983–1989 [A Part of My Life, Interviews, 1983–1989]. Paris: Les Editions de Minuit, 1999.

Nash-Siedlecki, Robert Eoin. “Review of Robert Zucco [New Federal Theatre, New York, N.Y.].” American Theatre (April 1995).

Ubersfeld, Anne. Bernard-Marie Koltès. Arles: Actes Sud, 2001.

Donia Mounsef

ROBERTSON, THOMAS WILLIAM (1829–1871)

You see, there is one capital thing in being a dramatist. There is no competition. Nowadays there are no dramatic authors—so they say.

—Jack Randall, Act 1, Birth

Thomas William Robertson's plays are often referred to as “cup-and-saucer” drama, and he was one of the earliest British playwrights to represent the middle-class lifestyle realistically on the Victorian stage. Although to later generations his plays seem melodramatic, making use of types, asides, and soliloquies, these plays mark a distinct change in the staging practices of the theater and a definite move toward visual REALISM and social awareness. He paved the way for the late-19th-century social dramas like those of ARTHUR PINERO and GEORGE BERNARD SHAW. He was born into an acting family in 1829 in Newark-on Trent, Notts, ENGLAND, and was on the stage in early childhood. Because he began his career as an actor, his plays hinge heavily on characterization, staging, and settings. He created his characters from his observations of people and their everyday lives.

Robertson's early writing career comprised many adaptations and translations of French plays that influenced his playwriting. He was thoroughly familiar with the form of the well-made play, and this structure influenced the development of his later writing. While adapting and translating, he worked as drama critic for the Illustrated Times, and in 1864 he successfully staged David Garrick, another adaptation from the French.

Robertson's most important works came out of the time he spent working with the Marie and Squire Bancroft in London in the 1860s. They were devoted to maintaining a small and intimate theater that shunned the star system, and he was set on creating a domestic drama that was an honest representation of his world. Their 1860s productions were characterized by modern costuming, working sets, and the use of real furniture and props. In 1865 they produced Society, rejected by many London theaters, thereby setting the tone for the rest of the decade. While still including shallow stereotypes and contrived plotlines, this COMEDY of the goings-on at a gentlemen's club and the newly rich trying to break into the upper social classes represented a move away from the sentimentality of the MELODRAMA and a true picture of modern life.

He followed Society with Ours in 1866. Written specifically for the Bancrofts, this play marked the first time he was to write a play with a venue and company in mind. By the time he wrote his best-known play CASTE in 1867, Robertson was familiar enough with the group of actors that he was able to write parts with specific actors in mind. The play is constructed on the characters and situation as opposed to the plot. His characters moved away from the stock characters in melodramas to more complex and multifaceted creations reflecting contemporary life. Robertson included specific directions not just for the staging of the play but also for the characters' movements, gestures, and expressions. Caste shows the audience characters as they go through the simple routines of everyday life. These mundane actions coupled with the naturalness of conversations delivered as if the characters were speaking to each other rather than for the benefit of an audience together characterize the six plays Robertson wrote for the Bancrofts. It is on these three plays and Play (1868) School (1869), and The M.P. (1870) that his reputation rests.

Robertson died in 1871 in South Hampstead, England, at the age of forty-two. His death left a vacuum in British drama that would not be filled until the 1890s. The social dramas of the last decade of the century are the natural extension of the changes he effected in a small theater in London. His use of real working stage properties—windows with glass, doors with locks, food, and drink—were an early step toward stage realism.

[See also England, 1860–1940]

SELECT PLAYS: Faust and Marguerite (1854); The Half Caste; or, The Poisoned Pearl (1856); Peace at Any Price! (1856); David Garrick (1864); Constance (1865); Society (1865); Ours (1866); Caste (1867); For Love (1867); Play (1868); Home (1869); School (1869); Birth (1870); The M.P. (1870); War (1871)

FURTHER READING

- Barrett, Daniel. T. W. Robertson and the Prince of Wales's Theatre. New York: P. Lang, 1995.
- Pemberton, T. E. The Life and Writings of T. W. Robertson. London: R. Bentley & Son, 1893.
- Robertson, T. W., and Thomas W. S. Robertson. The Principal Dramatic Works of Thomas William Robertson with Memoir by his Son. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle & Rivington, Samuel French, 1889.
- Savin, Maynard. Thomas William Robertson: His Plays and Stagecraft. Providence, R.I.: Brown Univ. Press, 1950.

Angela Courtney

ROBINS, ELIZABETH (1862–1952)

I am conscious that in talking and writing to my nearest and most trusted friends I sometimes suppress and I sometimes embroider.

—Elizabeth Robins

Elizabeth Robins was born on August 6, 1862, in Louisville, Kentucky. She grew up in Zanesville, Ohio, after her mother was committed to a psychiatric institution. Elizabeth went to Vassar to study medicine but in 1880 moved to New York City and became a member of the Boston Museum Company, James O'Neill's traveling company.

In 1885 Robins married George Richmond Parks, an actor. In 1887, Parks committed suicide by jumping into the Charles River, using theatrical armor to weigh himself down. He wrote Robins, saying, "I will not stand in your light any longer" and signed, "Yours in death."

In 1888 Robins traveled to ENGLAND, which she soon adopted as her permanent residence. She played many roles, such as Claire de Cintre in HENRY JAMES's The American, but by the 1890s she had discovered HENRIK IBSEN. Her interest in naturalistic theater led to her involvement in producing because she found the actor-manager system confining. Robins produced and acted in several of Ibsen's plays, including Hedda in HEDDA GABLER, Nora in A Doll's House, and Hilda Wangel in THE MASTER BUILDER.

In 1896 she organized the Henrik Ibsen-José Echegaray subscription series to raise money for the productions of LITTLE EVOLF and Echegaray's Mariana. In the following year, William Archer joined her in forming the New Century Theatre to sponsor nonprofit productions such as JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN and PEER GYNT. During the 1890s, while Robins was active in theater, she began a new career as a writer. Under the pseudonym C. B. Raimond, she saw four of her novels published. She also collaborated with Florence Bell on the play Alan's Wife, and after her successful novel The Open Question (1898), Robins's pen name became widely known.

In 1900, Robins went to Alaska in search of her brother, who had joined the gold rush. The journey was an important event in her life as she wrote two novels, The Magnetic North (1904) and Come and Find Me (1908), and several short stories based on her experiences. In November 1902, she made her final appearance as an actress in Mrs. Humphrey Ward's Eleanor. She devoted more time to writing and to her growing interest in issues of women's equality. In 1907 a new play by Robins, Votes for Women, opened in London, and shortly thereafter, her novelization of it, The Convert (1907), was published. She wrote many articles in support of women's suffrage, and the 1913 publication of Way Stations brought together a collection of her articles and speeches about suffrage.

In 1908 Robins met Octavia Wilberforce, who became her lifelong companion. Robins's interest in feminism continued throughout the 1920s. In 1924, she published Ancilla's Share, a collection of essays on sexism that also addressed the problem of racism and the possibilities for pacifism. Robins died on May 8, 1952, in Brighton, England.

PLAYS: Alan's Wife (with Florence Bell, 1893); Votes for Women; A Play in Three Acts (1907)

FURTHER READING

- Gates, Joanne E. Elizabeth Robins, 1862–1952: Actress, Novelist, Feminist. Tuscaloosa: Univ. of Alabama Press, 1994.
- Gates, Joanna E., and Victoria J. Moessner, eds. Alaska-Klondike Diary of Elizabeth Robins, 1900. Anchorage: Univ. of Alaska Press, 1999.
- John, Angela V. Elizabeth Robins; Staging a Life. London: Routledge, 1995.

Brian Sajo

ROBINSON, LENNOX (1886–1958)

I've felt for so many years like a bad actor cast for a part far too heroic for his talents, I haven't had technique enough for it, I haven't in any way been big enough for it, the audience has realized at last what I realized years ago.

—The Big House, Scene 4

I think I'd like it better if they [Irish Catholics] hated us [Irish Protestant landowners]. That at least would make me feel that we had power, that we counted for something; it's very hard to forgive toleration.

—The Big House, Scene 2

Esmé Stuart Lennox Robinson, playwright and Abbey Theatre manager, was born on October 4, 1886, in Douglas, County, Cork, IRELAND, the son of a stockbroker who had become a Protestant clergyman in middle age. Robinson was a sickly child unable to attend school regularly but was naturally bookish. At twenty-one, he attended an Irish National Theatre Society production of CATHLEEN NI HOULIHAN at the Cork Opera House, an event that turned him toward Irish nationalism and playwriting. His first play, The Clancy Name, appeared the following year, 1908, at the Abbey Theatre. Thereafter, he consistently produced well-constructed, realistic, and mildly satirical plays about town life in rural Ireland, a dramatic model imitated by T. C. Murray and R. J. Ray, which came to be known as “Cork REALISM.” This style dominated the Abbey repertoire up to the arrival of SEAN O’CASEY’s work.

After the death of J. M. SYNGE, W. B. YEATS named Robinson as director of the Abbey Theatre in 1909. Robinson spent a season attending plays and shadowing HARLEY GRANVILLE-BARKER at London’s Royal Court Theatre and then took over play direction at the Abbey from 1910 to 1914, and from 1918 to the mid-1930s.

Robinson’s output as a playwright was not limited to the realistic well-made play. He wrote a number of effective “state of the nation” dramas in the revolutionary second decade of the century. Patriots (1912) concerns the diminishment of the Irish republican movement in the midst of growing middle-class prosperity; The Lost Leader (1918) laments the absence of a figure like Charles Stewart Parnell in the postrevolutionary chaos of Irish politics. Robinson’s whimsical COMEDIES, like The White-headed Boy (1916) and Drama at Inish (1933), pleased audiences at the time and continue to be revived, especially by the amateur theater movement in Ireland, which Robinson did much to organize. The driving force behind the Dublin Drama League (1919–1929), founded in order to bring non-Irish experimental plays to the Abbey stage, Robinson himself benefited by the work of LUIGI PIRANDELLO and ANTON CHEKHOV. The Big House (1926) resembles THE CHERRY ORCHARD in its beautiful rendering of the end of an aristocracy. Robinson put into this play his own sadness as a Protestant Irish patriot marginalized after the triumph of that national cause he had himself promoted.

While Yeats’s hope that Lennox Robinson would fill the shoes of Synge were never to be fulfilled, Robinson served Yeats, LADY GREGORY, and the Abbey Theatre faithfully. He trained other playwrights, tended to the theatrical and cultural health of Ireland, and wound up being the custodian of the history of the Irish dramatic revival. He edited Lady Gregory’s Journals (1946) and wrote Ireland’s Abbey Theatre, 1899–1951 (1951), modestly assigning greatness everywhere but to himself. Robinson died on October 14, 1958, in Dublin, Ireland.

SELECT PLAYS: The Clancy Name (1908); The Cross Roads (1909); Harvest (1910); Patriots (1912); The Dreamers (1915); The Lost Leader (1918); Crabbed Youth and Age (1922); The Round Table (1922); Never the

Time and the Place (1924); Portrait (1925); The Big House (1926); The Far-Off Hills (1928); Ever the Twain (1929); All’s Over Then (1932); Drama at Inish (1933); Church Street (1934); Killycreggs in Twilight (1937)

FURTHER READING

- Clarke, Brenna Katz, and Harold Ferrar. The Dublin Drama League 1918–1941. The Irish Theatre Series. Dublin: Dolmen Press, 1979.
- Murray, Christopher. Selected Plays of Lennox Robinson. Washington, D.C.: Catholic Univ. of America Press, 1982.
- O’Neill, Michael J. Lennox Robinson. New York: Twayne, 1964.
- . Twentieth-Century Irish Drama: Mirror Up to Nation. Manchester: Manchester Univ. Press, 1997.

Adrian Frazier

RODRIGUES, NELSON (1912–1980)

Brazilian playwright Nelson Rodrigues was born in Recife, BRAZIL, and raised in Rio de Janeiro, where he initiated a life-long career as a journalist. When his first play, The Woman Without Sin (A mulher sem pecado), premiered in 1942, Brazilian theater was extremely conservative, limited mostly to COMEDY of manners and vaudeville. The Woman Without Sin introduced new dramatic procedures and themes that the author would develop along a total of seventeen plays. Such dramatic output would establish the modernization of Brazilian theater.

The great novelty of the play was the presentation of the life of the mind, as the delusions of its demented protagonist were concretely enacted onstage. In his second work, WEDDING GOWN (Vestido de noiva, 1943), Rodrigues would carry such innovation much further. Most of the action takes place within the traumatized mind of the heroine, who agonizes in a hospital. The script establishes three planes: memory, hallucination, and reality. Through the meanderings of thoughts, reminiscence, and dreams framed in a dry, stark context of external reality, we watch the gradual emerging of a story of emotional violence and bitter social commentary.

Wedding Gown took Brazilian theater by storm. It was produced by an amateur company, Os Comediantes, and staged by Polish director Zbigniew Ziembinski, one of many European theater professionals escaped from the war who brought Brazilian theater up to date with the trends of contemporary AVANT-GARDE.

Despite the overwhelming acclaim of Wedding Gown, Rodrigues was to be subsequently execrated by audiences and critics and banned by the official censorship. His next plays Family Album (Álbun de família, 1946), Black Angel (Anjo negro, 1947), Lady of the Drowned (Senhora dos afogados, 1947), and Dorotéia (1949) dealt with explosive themes such as incest and family crime as an attempt to explore the mythic realms of the collective unconscious. The style totally departed from strict REALISM, favoring instead anti-illusionistic devices, poetic atmosphere, the absurd, and the grotesque. The author himself called it teatro desagradável (unpleasant theater), for, in his own words, these were “pestilent fetid works, capable of themselves of producing typhus and malaria in the audience.”

After a brief return to the investigation of the stream of consciousness in the monologue Waltz Number 6 (Valsa número 6, 1951), The Deceased (A falecida, 1953) marks a total veering in Rodrigues's dramatic style. From then on he would write mostly in the realistic mode, developing an acute observation of the social milieu—the Rio society, its human types and mores—with a focus on the impoverished suburban areas.

As a consequence of his new phase Rodrigues was reconciled with the general public and the intelligentsia. Yet he continued to innovate with dramatic narrative, rejecting superficial NATURALISM and experimenting with daring theatrical procedures that enhanced his illustration of social reality. His themes and subjects did not become more palatable as he insisted on taboo topics, sensational and provocative situations, aberration, degeneration, and extreme violence.

In his social dramas, Rodrigues, although avoiding direct political commentary, was undoubtedly intent on denouncing the hypocrisy and corruption of bourgeois society. Through his slices of life, Rodrigues sought to meditate on the misery of the human condition. Eventually he became Brazil's most important and influential playwright.

PLAYS: The Woman Without Sin (A mulher sem pecado, 1942); Wedding Gown (Vestido de noiva, 1943); Family Album (Álbum de família, 1945); Black Angel (Anjo negro, 1946); Lady of the Drowned (Senhora dos afogados, 1947); Dorotéia (1949); Waltz Number 6 (Valsa número 6, 1951); The Deceased (A falecida, 1953); Forgive Me for You Betraying Me (Perdoa-me por me traíres, 1957); Widow yet Virtuous (Viúva, porém honesta, 1957); The Seven Kittens (Os sete gatinhos, 1958); Golden Mouth (Boca de ouro, 1959); Kiss on the Pavement (Beijo no asfalto, 1960); Cute but a Tramp (Bonitinha, mas ordinária, 1962); All Nudity Shall Be Punished (Toda nudez será castigada, 1965); Anti-Nelson Rodrigues (Anti-Nelson Rodrigues, 1973); The Serpent (A serpente, 1978)

FURTHER READING

- Clark, Fred M. Impermanent Structures: Semiotic Readings of Nelson Rodrigues' Vestido de Noiva, Album de Família, and Anjo Negro. Chapel Hill: Univ. of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- George, David Sanderson. The Modern Brazilian Stage. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1992.
- . “Nelson Rodrigues: Life and Works.” In Latin American Writers: Supplement I, ed. by Carlos A. Solé. New York: Scribner, 2002.
- Rohter, Larry. “Reawakening the Giant of Brazil.” New York Times (December 17, 2000). <http://www.stanford.edu/group/brazil/html/dorarticle.html>.
- Souto, Carla. Nelson “Trágico” Rodrigues. Rio de Janeiro: Editora de Ilha, 2001.

Luiz Arthur Ferreira Freire Nunes

RODRÍGUEZ, JESUSA (1957–)

Jesusa Rodríguez, born in Mexico City in 1957, one of MEXICO's most well known artists and activists, prefers existence on the margins of official cultural production. Director, actress, performance artist, scenic designer, entrepreneur, and committed activist feminist, this “chameleon” moves seemingly effortlessly across the spectrum of cultural forms. Rodríguez's espectáculos (as both spectacles and shows) challenge traditional classification, crossing boundaries with ease: from elite to popular to mass, from Greek TRAGEDY to cabaret, from pre-Columbian cosmology to opera, from revue, sketch, and “CARPA” to performative acts within political projects.

On the stage, Rodríguez draws from numerous performance traditions, many indigenous to Mexico. Constant in her productions are humor, satire, parody, and linguistic play. Her work regularly features gender bending and interaction with spectators. She chooses forms that render corporeal and thus visible the tensions among the ideological, religious, social, political, and economic discourses operating on and through the individual and collective human body.

Rodríguez trained professionally with director Julio Castillo (1978–1980) at a time when, in Mexican mainstream theater, a director ruled as ultimate authoritative voice over the written and performative text. She adopted Castillo's collaborative and cooperative style that engages the participation of the production team—actors, playwright, director, designers, and technicians. Rodríguez established, with her partner collaborator, Argentine-born composer, musician, and vocalist Liliana Felipe, her own creative space in Mexico City, first in 1980, El Cuervo, then in 1990, El Hábito and the adjacent theater La Capilla.

Evidencing her boundless energy, from 1990 to 1997 Rodríguez and Las Divas (a theater collective she founded, 1983) produced some 200 shows including sixty-eight FARCES, seventy-five “musicals,” and innumerable cabaret shows. In many works, Rodríguez performs the constructed nature of master narratives, often by placing center stage women of history and myth whose images and symbolic value embody the battle to control meaning, knowledge, and truth: among them are Aztec goddess Coatlicue; 17th-century nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; Frida Kahlo; La Malinche (translator/partner of conquistador Hernán Cortés); Evita Perón; Marilyn Monroe; Madonna—Mother of God and pop-culture superstar; and Barbie.

Rodríguez collaborates internationally, most recently on the award-winning A Book of Hours (1999) with Ruth Maleczek and New York-based Mabou Mines—for which she and Felipe received an Obie for Best Actor. A Book of Hours draws parallels between women's confinement and repression in colonial Catholic reformatories, their abuse in maquila factories, and the murder and disappearance of almost 300 young women since the early 1990s in Juárez, Mexico. In 1997 she received a Rockefeller Fellowship to complete her film adaptation of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Così fan tutte.

An outspoken feminist, her playscripts, song lyrics, caricatures, and open letters appear regularly in debatefeminista, one of Latin America's most important feminist journals. She protests against the many faces of institutionalized corruption in Mexico. She promotes the human rights of gays, women, children, prostitutes, indigenous, and other disenfranchised groups and AIDS awareness in the face of the pope's reiteration of the sinfulness of condoms. Her theater bar El Hábito frequently hosts nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), the Zapatistas from Chiapas, feminists, and environmental groups. Rodríguez speaks publicly and rallies activism through emails and speeches and placards that make it into Mexico City's newspapers. Despite several apprehensions and trips to the police station, Rodríguez remains unwavering in her commitment to orchestrating civic participation.

Rodríguez's "ten commandments" include mandates to battle the Catholic Church and ignorance in its myriad manifestations, to mock capitalism's excesses and their effects on a consumption-driven society, and to fight censorship imposed from without and within the individual. She renders corporeal the sociopolitical systems and discourses that operate on real bodies and generate real violence. Rodríguez's energy is amazing and her commitment nonnegotiable, always interrogating the nature, site, and motive of the politics of representation.

SELECT PLAYS: How's the Night Going, Macbeth? (¿Cómo va la noche, Macbeth? 1981); Don Giovanna (adaptation of opera by Mozart, 1983–1987); The Council of Love (El concilio de amor, an adaptation of Oskar Panizza, 1988, 1995); Crime (Crimen, an adaptation of Marguerite Yourcenar, 1989, 1992); La Malinche on God TV (La Malinche en Dios TV, 1991); The Sky Down Below. Pre-Hispanic Cabaret (Cielo de abajo. Cabaret prehispánico, 1992); Goddess Diana, Housewife (La Diana casadera, 1993); Victims of Neoliberal Sin (Víctimas del pecado neoliberal, 1994); Sor Juana in Almaloya Prison (Sor Juana en Almaloya, 1995); Barbie and the Devil (1996); The Count of Orgasm (El conde del orgasmo, 1996); Las horas de Belén: A Book of Hours (with Liliana Felipe, Ruth Maleczech, and New York-based Mabou Mines, 1999)

FURTHER READING

Costantino, Roselyn. "Jesusa Rodríguez: An Inconvenient Woman." Women and Performance. A Journal of Feminist Theory 11, no. 2 (2000): 183–212.

Costantino, Roselyn, and Diana Taylor, eds. Holy Terrors: Latin American Women Perform. Durham, N.C.: Duke Univ. Press, 2003.

Roselyn Costantino

ROMAINS, JULES (1885–1972)

Born Louis Farigoule on August 26, 1885, in Saint-Julien-Chapteuil, FRANCE, Jules Romain began using his nom de plume at age nineteen and legally adopted it in 1953. A prolific, successful, and prominent poet, playwright, novelist, and essayist, Romain is best remembered today for his novel cycle Men of Good Will (twenty-seven volumes in French, published between 1932 and 1946) and his dark COMEDY Dr. Knock, or the Triumph of Medicine (Knock ou Letriomphe de la médecine, 1924). Despite his election to the Académie Française in 1946, his reputation declined in the years following World War II because of his political and literary conservatism. He espoused Franco-German rapprochement in the face of Adolf Hitler and publicly championed European civilization as the only hope for the world in the epic poem The White Man (1937). As a result, many contemporary readers' only encounter with Romain may be the excerpts used by AIMÉ CÉS-AIRE in his Discourse on Colonialism, where he is used as an example of well-meaning French racism.

As a dramatist, Romain worked predominantly with directors from the Vieux-Colombier school, and he looked to ÉMILE ZOLA and Victor Hugo as models. His stage works tended to fill the adventurous end of Boulevard theater, and in the 1920s he had a string of hits, of which only Dr. Knock has retained its theatrical vigor. In North America, it was very popular in university and small theater settings into the 1970s, and it remains a standard school text in France. Romain died on August 14, 1972, in Paris.

Dr. Knock gets its energy from its ideas and from the opportunities the title role offers an actor. Dr. Knock, a quack, agrees to buy the provincial practice of Dr. Parpalaid in quarterly installments. In the first act, he discovers that the locals rarely receive medical attention and only pay their bills at Michaelmas, which has just past. He realizes he has been conned but accepts the challenge. The second act shows him rebuilding the practice: he hires the town crier to announce that he will offer free medical consultations. Through skillful questioning and ambiguous responses, he convinces the townspeople that they are suffering a variety of severe diseases; the wealthier the person, the more expensive the course of treatment. In the third act, Parpalaid returns for his first payment to find the town transformed. Knock's reputation has spread to the extent that the town's only hotel has been converted into a hospital for out-of-town patients. By the end of the play, even the skeptical Parpalaid has been convinced that he needs treatment.

The theme of medical quackery puts Dr. Knock within a long tradition of French playwriting, dating back to Molière. But most critics agree that medicine is merely a pretext. Many explanations of the play's true theme have been put forth, including the notion that Knock's triumph presaged the rise of European fascism. (The Nazis banned productions in GERMANY.) But it is hard to see Knock as wholly villainous: as Louis Jouvet suggested in an essay honoring the twenty-fifth anniversary of the play's premiere, Dr. Knock "demonstrates and lays bare the manufacture of new needs" (1956). Knock capitalizes on the frustrations and vanity of the townspeople, but he in turn generates and shares a great deal of income with them. Today, the play retains its satiric potential in an age when the notion of therapy is dominant.

SELECT PLAYS: The Army in the Town (L'armée dans la ville, 1911); Donogoo-Tonka, or the Miracles of Science (Donogoo-Tonka ou Les miracles de la science, 1920); Old Cromodeyre (Cromedeyre-le-Vieil, 1920); Dr. Knock, or the Triumph of Medicine (Knock ou Le triomphe de la médecine, 1924); Mr. Trouhadec (Monsieur le Trouhadec, 1924); Le Trouhadec's Wedding (Le mariage de Le Trouhadec, 1924); The Dictator (Le dictateur, 1926); Jean le Malfranc (1926, revised as Musse, or the School for Hypocrisy [Musse ou l'école de l'hypocrisie, 1930]); Volpone (1928, adaptation of German adaptation by Stefan Zweig); The Moroccan Lunch (Le déjeuner marocain, 1929); Boen, or the Possession of Goods (Boen ou La possession des biens, 1930); The Disguised King (Le roi masqué, 1930); Barbazouk (published 1963)

FURTHER READING

- Boak, Denis. Jules Romains. New York: Twayne, 1974.
- Dunning, A. J. "Knock or the Triumph of Medicine." European Community Quality of Life Programme Project: Science, Fiction, and Science-Fiction (November 4, 2003). <http://www.fictionethics.org/aps/Paper/2>.
- Jouvet, Louis. "Director's Preface to Dr. Knock." In From the Modern Repertoire: Series Three, ed. by Eric Bentley. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1956.
- Knapp, Bettina. Louis Jouvet: Man of the Theatre. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1957.
- Romains, Jules. Dr. Knock. English version by Harley Granville-Barker. In From the Modern Repertoire: Series Three, ed. by Eric Bentley. Bloomington: Indiana Univ. Press, 1956.

Walter Bilderback

ROMANIA

Archeological excavations and early documents attest to proto-theatrical cults, rituals, and ceremonies practiced by the ancient Dacians as early as the 5th century B.C. Herodotus, in Book Four, describes the cult of the god Zalmoxis in which a messenger is appointed to ask favor of the god in the name of the community. In his journeys, the Greek historian Xenophon, around the year 399 B.C., mentions war dances with magical significance performed during royal banquets, including the miming of conquest over the enemy. The king himself participated in some of these dance rituals.

To this very day one can see in rural areas remnants of ancient rituals, such as the Paparude, the rain dance, performed in times of drought. Groups of youths, decked in branches, walk through the fields, splashing water all over their bodies, loudly invoking the heavens to bring down rain. At Christmas, one can still see in marketplaces and the outskirts of the big cities the dance of the Capra. A group of men, dressed in bear skins, is led by a disguised young man, dressed up with a wooden goat head whose jaw he claps in the rhythm of the accompanying music band. Of the same ancient origin is the Calusari dance popular in the province of Moldavia. Once a year, players gather dressed in women's clothes, wearing cloth masks over their faces and crowns of twigs on their heads, talking like women while carrying wooden swords.

Literary Romanian drama arrived on the cultural scene relatively late, though the Romanian language is rooted in antiquity. The Romanian language developed from a fusion between indigenous Dacian elements, Roman colonial importations, and later Slavic and Turkish influences. However, the dominant component of Romanian is Latin. Dacia, approximately the area of present-day Romania, was overtaken by the Romans under Emperor Trajan, between A.D. 101 and A.D. 106 as one of the last Roman colonies. The Roman occupation lasted until A.D. 275, during which time, at least at the outset, Geto-Dacian and Latin languages seemed to coexist, the latter emerging eventually as the dominant language. After the Roman occupation and during the following 600 years of the great migrations, this area suffered the invasions of numerous tribes, such as the Avars, Vandals, Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Huns, Slavs, and others. Despite all these influences and the long period of Ottoman rule, the Romanian language maintained its Latin character. Throughout the centuries, including the 18th century, Romanian survived as the language of common intercourse but lacked status. Greek was the prevailing language among the elite and in the schools for the children of the boyars, while Slavonic was the prevailing liturgical language.

The relatively late acceptance of Romanian as a vehicle for artistic expression among the cultural elite might explain the late appearance of Romanian drama as a literary genre. It was not until around 1840, when a group of young writers and poets emerged and responded to the call for the creation of a national literature, that the Romanian language attained its legitimate place in the people's consciousness. Writers such as Vasile Alecsandri (1818–1890), Costache Negruzzi (1808–1868), Gheorghe Asachi (1788–1869), and I. Eliade Radulescu (1802–1872) and the poet Mihai Eminescu (1850–1889), to name only a few, were imbued with the romantic ideas of nationhood. Inspired by the revolutionary fervor of the 1848 Pan-European nationalistic aspirations, they began to write plays aiming to satisfy the demand for a repertory with which to establish a national theater. The first Romanian newspapers had already begun to appear, such as the Curierul Romanesc and Albina Romaneasca (1829). The establishment of The Philharmonic Society in 1833 and training conservatories in the main cities, such as in Bucharest (1834) and in Iassi (1836), paved the way toward the development of fledgling theatrical endeavors. Visiting theater and opera companies from ITALY, FRANCE, GERMANY, and RUSSIA influenced and inspired local talents. The actors Costache Caragiale and Matei Millo were emboldened to take the stage and play in Romanian, provoking the opposition of the aristocracy and upper classes disdainful of the national language and preferring to speak Greek or French.

It is against this status quo that Vasile Alecsandri aimed his criticism. In Chirita in Provincie and Iassi in Carnaval, to name only two of his many plays, he pokes fun at the affectations and social mores of the landowners and upper classes. The establishment of the first National Theater in Bucharest (1852), followed by the National Theatre in Iasi, enabled the further development of dramatic literature and encouraged the production of original plays. Writers now began to see writing for the stage as a national duty; Gheorghe Asachi and the actors Matei Millo and Costache Caragiale were the most notable. However, Alecsandri captured the tone of his time best and ushered in the appearance on the Romanian stage of ION LUCA CARAGIALE (1850–1912), the playwright belonging to a venerable theatrical dynasty. Although he wrote only six plays, with his efforts the Romanian stage reached a pinnacle of Romanian dramatic literature. Caragiale, like Alecsandri before him, lampooned social and political mores with poignant sarcasm in his satires. Plays such as The Lost Letter and A Stormy Night aroused the ire of the political powers against him. He died in self-imposed exile in Berlin. Today, the National Theatre in Bucharest bears his name, and his plays are a staple in the repertoire of every Romanian theater.

After Caragiale and continuing into the 20th century, including the period between the two world wars, the Romanian theater and drama developed a strong basis in Romanian culture. In major cities, such as Iassi, Timisoara, and Cluj, government-supported National Theaters with a permanent staff presented a steady repertoire of original plays and translations from the best of the world dramatic literature. In many smaller cities, municipal repertory theaters played a major part in the cultural life of the city. It is during this period that Romanian original drama and Romanian playwrights gained recognition. Bucharest became an acknowledged European theatrical capital.

After independence in 1877 from Turkish rule and the consolidation of the Romanian principalities into a monarchy, professional theater companies offered a repertoire in languages other than Romanian for other ethnic populations, such as Hungarians and Germans. In 1876 the beginnings of the YIDDISH THEATER were established under AVROM GOLDFADEN (1840–1908) in Iassi, Moldavia. This theater became an important cultural and educational venue for the Jewish community that survived World War II. As the Teatrul Evreiesc de Stat (Jewish State Theatre), it has remained an almost continuous presence in Bucharest; it is one of several government-supported theaters for ethnic minorities.

After World War I, theater and dramatic literature experienced an intensive surge of activity. Modeled on the French, German, and Russian drama, the Romanian repertoire began to modernize. Interaction of intellectuals with Western culture became more intense. For example, Tristan Tzara (1896–1963), the founder of DADAISM, made his name beyond the borders of Romania. In the words of Marian Popescu, a contemporary scholar and drama critic, “The 1930s is one of the most interesting periods of modern Romanian theater. It is the time of open confrontation between a growing nationalism and a strong cosmopolitan movement towards European values of the day. Camil Petrescu (1894–1957), a major playwright and essayist, Haig Acterian (1904–1943), director and organizer, a younger friend of Gordon Craig, are important for their effort to modernize Romanian theater in terms of structure, artistic profile and repertory.” It is also a time when a long list of playwrights—among them Mihail Sorbul (1885–1966), Victor Ion Popa (1895–1946), Victor Eftimiu (1889–1972), Lucian Blaga (1895–1961)—experimented with modern techniques of expression and staging. Sorbul caused quite a stir already in 1916 with his tragic COMEDY The Red Passion (Patima Rosie), due to its subject and new writing technique. A play about a fatal love triangle, the scenes follow each other in a volley of rapid succession without any psychological ratiocination. Influenced by EDMOND ROSTAND and MAURICE MAETERLINK, Eftimiu spins in his Spinning Tales (Insir'te margarite) a fairy tale about an emperor and a princess in search of true love who run away from under the wedding canopy, in search of Fat Frumos, the handsome rider on the white horse.

With the appearance in 1938 of Michael Sebastian (1907–1945), playwright, writer, essayist, Romanian dramatic literature reached another pinnacle in terms of style and dramatic structure. In his plays, only four in number—he was killed in a road accident after the war, at the height of his popularity—Sebastian, like ANTON CHEKHOV, describes the ennui of provincial life and the machinations of politics and the press. In his first play, Vacation Games (Jocul De-a Vacanta, 1938), the protagonist, vacationing in a mountain resort, tries to block the obnoxious daily routines and petty squabbles among the other vacationers—without success. His second play, A Star Without a Name (Steaua Fara Nume), opened in 1944 under the assumed name Victor Mincu to hide Sebastian's Jewish identity. Mona, a beautiful woman, fed up with her way of easy life and gambling, runs away from the gambling table at the casino and from her lover. She finds herself in a forsaken little town, where she spends the night with the local astronomy teacher, who had discovered a new star, whereas she discovers a new love. However, the next morning brings her back to reality. Her lover finds her, and she leaves with him in his luxurious car because “no star ever strayed from its path”; the teacher is left to continue his stargazing. Both plays were successes in their own time. Today, hardly a season passes without one of his plays produced in at least one theater in the country.

Like Tristan Tzara before him, EUGÈNE IONESCO, too, left Romania for Paris before World War II and wrote in French. His roots are in Romanian literature as well, particularly that of Caragiale and Romanian surrealists such as Urmuz (1883–1923), B. Fundoianu-Fondane (1898–1944), and dadaist Tristan Tzara (1896–1963).

After the communist takeover of Romania in 1947, the theater was enlisted to serve the propaganda machine. More than forty theater companies were established throughout the country on the model of the Soviet theater system. Six of these theaters attained the level of national theaters. Yet plays were censored, many productions banned, and the writers kept under scrutiny.

Major playwrights, such as DUMITRU RADU POPESCU (1935–), Theodor Mazilu (1930–1980), Dumitru Solomon (1932–2003), IOSIF NAGHIU (1932–) and MARIN SORESCU (1936–1997), though abiding under pressure to the canon of SOCIALIST REALISM, found ways to circumvent the harsh censorship. Playwrights, in the best tradition of SURREALISM, succeeded in creating a kind of language that was understood only by the public, while the authorities did not or pretended not to understand. A tacit complicity between the authors and the censorship evolved that enabled many important productions to see the light on the stage. Otherwise, the permission and subsequent success of a play like Iona, by Marin Sorescu, would be hard to explain. The play, portraying a fisher trapped in the belly of the fish, is a transparent allegory of the nation caught in a reality from which the only escape is suicide.

Since the fall of communism in 1989, Romanian dramatic literature has undergone a renaissance. Enjoying the new freedom from censorship and closer contact with the West, a young generation of playwrights is experimenting with post-absurd-surrealist modes of expression. Among the best known are Horia Garbea (1962–), Radu Macrinici (1964–), Alina Mungiu-Pippidi (1964–), Alina Nelega (1960–), Saviana Stanescu (1967–), and Vlad Zografi (1960–); Matei Visniec (1956–), who left Romania before the Revolution, lives in Paris and writes in French. The new Romanian Theatre Union (UNITER) is also encouraging new playwrights through its yearly “Best Play” competition and the publication of winning plays. Yearly festivals in major cities give playwrights more venues to present their work. Despite present economic hardships, theaters have public funding from the central government as well as the municipalities; private theater enterprises are emerging; and dramatic writing finds an appreciative public.

[See also Tragicomedy]

FURTHER READING

- Alterescu, Simion, Redactor responsabil, et al. Istoria Teatrului în România. De la Începuturi Pînă La 1848. Vol. I. Bucharest: Editura Academiei Republicii Socialiste România, 1965.
- Calinescu, George. Istoria Literaturii Române. Compendiu. Bucharest: Editura Pentru Literatura, 1968.
- Cazaban, Ion. “Romanian Theatre: Brief History.” Institute for Cultural Memory, Bucharest. http://www.cimec.ro/Teatre/cazaban_eng.htm.
- Micu, Dumitru. Scurta Istorie A Literaturii Române IV. Perioada Contemporană Dramaturgia Critică. Bucharest: Editura Iriana, 1997.
- Popescu, Marian. Oglinda Sparta: Teatrul Românesc După 1989. Bucharest: Editura Unitext, 1997.
- . The Stage and the Carnival: Romanian Theatre After Censorship. Bucharest: Colectia Mediana Collection, Editura Paralela 45, 2000.
- Stefanova, Kalina, ed. Eastern European Theatre after the Iron Curtain. New York: Routledge, 2000.

ROMANTICISM

The arts in general, and not theater alone, have been swamped a number of times by waves rolled forward by the romantic imagination—in reaction to previous overdoses of classicism. The romantic movement that began around the 1830s and remained influential until nearly the end of the century could count on some of FRANCE’s most gifted younger authors. Victor Hugo made a large dent in French awareness with his preface to Cromwell (but not with the play itself) in 1827 when he was twenty-five—and a larger dent in 1830 with Hernani—in this case, outstandingly with the play itself; Alexandre Dumas père won deep appreciation with Henri III and His Court when he was twenty-seven; Alfred de Musset with a run of proverbes dramatiques between 1835 and 1843, from the ages of twenty-five to thirty-three; and Alfred de Vigny remained prominent as a poet even after he wrote plays, one of which, Chatterton, told of the brief, sad life of British poet Thomas Chatterton, who committed suicide when he was only seventeen. The oldest member of this unofficial club of romantics, Alphonse Lamartine, composed some narrative poems for reading aloud rather than staging, but not until the ripe age of forty-six. George Sand joined the theater romantics relatively late in her astoundingly fruitful career—her works amounted to a collected edition of 105 volumes. Honoré de Balzac also came to the drama relatively late, at the age of forty, but after a parade of some of the finest longer fiction of the century, including The Human Comedy (La Comédie humaine), a gathering of novels that continues to amaze readers and inspire other writers. These seven names wrote at the heart of 19th-century romanticism, though their works still win reprintings in a score of languages.

Not that the old distinctions between classical and romantic hold up any longer. Hugo helped drive them out of separated existence. In our contemporary theater, the makers (who include writers, directors, actors, and spectators alike) prefer their plays in mixed forms. Hugo’s preface to Cromwell sets forth improvements he intended to bring about by mixing opposites. “The modern muse will look at things with greater breadth of vision. . . . everything in creation is not beautiful from the standpoint of mankind, the ugly exists beside the beautiful, the misshapen beside the graceful, the grotesque beside the sublime, evil with good, darkness with light.” Hugo does not pretend he has invented a new literature. He draws on instances of mixed sublime and grotesque from William Shakespeare, Euripides, and other ancients, and despite their reputations as classicists, he shows that funny and serious have long been interwoven by literary masters.

The romanticism practiced by the seven names above and their imitators sometimes drew on pastoral COMEDY for some of their creative thinking: flirtations between lusty but easily heart-broken shepherds and coy shepherdesses, all of whom may have stopped maturing mentally long before they reached juvenility, on the understanding that children and, even more, childishness represent an innocence suited to a rural landscape. If a titled gentleman came within attacking range of the very young women's charms, he was liable to be won over by several at once, not unlike the Indian Bharata Natyam dancers in their roles of nubile maidens and in their pursuit of the god Shiva—or like the two rural demoiselles who eat up the dishonest vows articulated by Molière's Don Juan. The authors reinvented historical backgrounds and populated them with political leaders and rebels. They equipped the men with extravagant emotions and speeches, like those of Hernani and Ruy Blas borrowed in their fervor from earlier periods of romanticism. Since women in public life at that time were rarely associated with political leadership, the female roles were, as a rule, vapid compared with Shakespeare's, Friedrich Schiller's, HENRIK IBSEN's, GEORGE BERNARD SHAW's, Pierre Corneille's, Jean Racine's, Molière's, and even those of the most colorful romantic playwright of the following French generation, EDMOND ROSTAND's in The Romanesques (1894), CYRANO DE BERGERAC (1897), and The Young Eagle (L'Aiglon, 1900).

How can one interpret the word romanticism today? Does it have any connection with Rome? Any affiliation with Romanesque architecture's half- semicircular arches and portals? Any hint of Romanies, offensively called gypsies? Or Romania from where the Romanies are said to have initially arrived in the West? What about that mushy word romance? All these nouns appear to have had some bearing on what the word means and what it implies. Even one of the extended derivatives, romanesque, has at least one valid denotation, a classification of buildings constructed after the Roman Empire dominated Europe but before the gothic style took over. But the double syllable romance, apart from its Tin Pan Alley and Hollywood soundings, has too many hopelessly untraceable, often contradictory meanings, from “fantasy” to “spoken in Provence” or “sort of Catholic.” It has come down to a word both too thin and too plump to be trusted. But since Victor Hugo tried to unite two warring factions, the blur of romanticism has served more literary purposes than most critics who recruited it could have guessed at. To look up the entry “romanticism” in the index of nearly any book of criticism, either a personal bill of gripes or a collection of assembled essays, is to end up admiring the word for its versatility.

FURTHER READING

- Frye, Northrop, ed. Romanticism Reconsidered. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1963.
- Gleckner, Robert, and Gerald Enscoe, eds. Romanticism: Points of View. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1962.
- Praz, Mario. The Romantic Agony. London: Oxford Univ. Press, 1933.

Albert Bermel

ROMERIL, JOHN (1945–)

John Romeril, born in Melbourne, Victoria, AUSTRALIA, on October 26, 1945, has been one of Australia's most prolific playwrights since 1969, having written alone or in collaboration more than forty-five works for the theater. He rose to prominence with the New Wave drama of nationalistic and political fervor in Melbourne, his first plays revealing stylistic and thematic trends that were to interest him for many years. I Don't Know Who to Feel Sorry For (produced 1969) and Mrs. Thally F (1971) portray struggling working-class characters, while Chicago Chicago (1969–1970) and He Can Swagger Sitting Down (produced 1972) are vigorous satires on American politics. Meanwhile, Romeril contributed a string of AGITATION-PROPAGANDA (agit-prop) street theater pieces for the Australian Performing Group (APG), ranging from protest pieces against censorship and the Vietnam War to purpose-made didactic plays for performances in workplaces.

He remained the APG's principal playwright until 1980. Among his most significant works for the APG were: Marvellous Melbourne (with Jack Hibberd, 1970), a pastiche of a Victorian MELODRAMA blending historical events with present-day satire and songs; Bastardy (produced 1972), a play about racism; Carboni (1980), a MONODRAMA retelling one of Australia's formative early political events through the voice of its contemporary chronicler; and The Floating World (produced 1974). The latter deals with ex-prisoner of World War II, Les Harding, who accompanies his wife on a cruise to JAPAN (the land of his brutal captors) many years later. In short scenes, stand-up comedy routines, increasingly horrific flashbacks, and hallucinatory monologues, Harding deteriorates to the point of madness in a graphic illustration of Australians' xenophobic attitudes toward Asia.

Romeril is a much more versatile playwright than the tag “political playwright” might suggest; he has written plays, on commission, across the full spectrum of Australian theater. He has written about many aspects of Australian life and about different regions for various state theater companies, including Top End and Lost Weekend (both produced 1989) and many plays for major young people's theaters. Plays for students have dealt with the aspirations of youth, environmental concerns, and the notorious outlaw-hero Ned Kelly in The Kelly Dance, a participatory promenade play in the form of a bush dance for Flinders University in 1984.

Music-theater has been another of his ongoing interests. He wrote: Jonah (produced 1985) with composer Alan John, a play with songs about an early-20th-century Sydney identity; History of Australia—The Musical (with several others), an ambitious attempt to render historian Manning Clark's six-volume history of Australia in commercial musical form in 1988; and later Black Cargo (produced 1991) with composer Irine Vela, a chamber opera about a historical incident on the Melbourne docks. He has also turned his hand to writing for puppetry, notably with Love Suicides (produced 1997), an accomplished modern adaptation from 18th-century Japanese playwright Chikamatsu Monzaemon for Company Skylark and Playbox Theatre Company after living in Japan in the early 1990s on an Australia Council Creative Fellowship.

Romeril continues to support emerging artists and groups with dramaturgical assistance.

[See also Australia, New Wave Drama]

SELECT PLAYS: I Don't Know Who to Feel Sorry For (1969); Chicago (1969–1970); Marvellous Melbourne (with Jack Hibberd, 1970); Mrs Thally F (1971); Bastardy (1972); He Can Swagger Sitting Down (1972); The Floating World (1974); The Hills Family Show (with Jack Hibberd and Bill Hannan, 1975); The Dudders (with John Timlin, 1976); Mickey's Moomba (1979); Carboni (1980); The Kelly Dance (1984); Jonah (with Alan John, 1985); History of Australia—The Musical (1988); Lost Weekend (1989); Top End (1989); Black Cargo (with Irine Vela, 1991); Reading Boy (1991); Doing the Block (1994); Love Suicides (1997); Kate 'n' Shiner (1998); Miss Tanaka (2001)

FURTHER READING

Griffiths, Gareth, ed. John Romeril. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1993.
Harrison, Wayne. "John Romeril." In Companion to Theatre in Australia, ed. by Philip Parsons and Victoria Chance. Sydney: Currency Press, 1995.
Hutchinson, Garrie. "The Floating World: Unruly Masterpiece." In Contemporary Australian Drama, ed. by Peter Holloway. Rev. ed. Sydney: Currency Press, 1987.

Geoffrey Milne

LA RONDE See REIGEN

ROSENCRANTZ AND GUILDENSTERN ARE DEAD

Wheels have been set in motion, and they have their own pace, to which we . . . condemned. Each move is dictated by the previous one—that is the meaning of order.

—Guildenstern, Act 2

When TOM STOPPARD's serious COMEDY Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead first was performed in August 1966 as part of the Edinburgh Festival fringe, the theater world took immediate notice. Initial reviews sparked eager interest, and within eight months Rosencrantz and Guildenstern was staged by the prestigious National Theatre in London. Stoppard was just shy of thirty years old.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern puzzled and intrigued London audiences. Critics recognized the play's uniqueness, honoring it with the John Whiting and Evening Standard Drama Awards. With little delay the play transferred to New York that autumn, gaining more enthusiastic reaction. It received eight 1968 Tony nominations and won four awards, including for Best Play. Since coming on the scene, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern has been revived countless times, a favorite of amateurs and professional groups alike.

Central to the work are the two title characters—Guildenstern and Rosencrantz—who play minor roles in William Shakespeare's famous Hamlet. Most action involves events only tangentially connected to Shakespeare's drama, while Stoppard's duo protagonists carry on unclear, ambiguous lives as escapees from Hamlet. A costume drama, the play is placed in a quasi-Elizabethan setting. The protagonists are discovered on a country road on their way to respond to an unspecified summoning. Spectators familiar with Hamlet realize it is Claudius who has sent for the two young men who are friends of Hamlet. But Guildenstern and Rosencrantz are oblivious to the host story from which they have been derived.

Action takes the form of a physical and psychic pilgrimage for the two. On the surface level, they follow clues leading them to Elsinore, where they encounter Claudius, Gertrude, and Hamlet. On a deeper level, however, they are grasping for clarifying facts to fill in their blank life histories. On their journey the two several times meet up with a band of traveling players—also retained from Hamlet. The actors are traveling to the palace to entertain and hence perhaps have firmer knowledge concerning events around them. But whereas Rosencrantz and Guildenstern yearn for some certitude in their dilemma—that is, roaming the countryside in search of their identities—the players have learned to live without absolutes. As the lead player tells them, "Uncertainty is the normal state. You're nobody special."

The lives of the two questing courtiers intersect several times with the murderous events in Shakespeare's source play, including a final scene on a boat sailing them to ENGLAND and their prescribed doom. The play concludes with the two pilgrims apparently killed off but enjoying no greater knowledge about themselves than at the beginning.

Most commentary points to absurdist drama as inspiration for Stoppard's play. The absence of background concerning the protagonists' lives and the lack of clarity regarding the meaning of events parallel the plays of SAMUEL BECKETT, key representative of absurdist theater—a type of contemporary theater defined in Martin Esslin's 1961 book Theatre of the Absurd. Moreover, Stoppard was a confessed admirer of Beckett.

In 1990 Stoppard completed a film of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, which he wrote and directed. It earned the Golden Lion at the Venice Film Festival that year.

[See also Absurdism]

FURTHER READING

Berlin, Normand. "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead: Theatre of Criticism." Modern Drama 16, no. 3 (September 1973): 269–277.
Delaney, Paul. Tom Stoppard: The Moral Vision of the Major Plays. London: Macmillan, 1990.
Gianakaris, C. J. "Absurdism Altered: Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead." Drama Survey 7 (1968–1969): 52–58.
Gussow, Mel. Conversations with Stoppard. New York: Grove, 1996.
Innes, Christopher. Modern British Drama: The Twentieth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2001.

Kelly, Katherine E., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Tom Stoppard.
Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2001.

C. J. Gianakaris

ROSMERSHOLM

It's joy that enobles the mind, Rebecca.

—Johannes Rosmer, Act 2

HENRIK IBSEN's Rosmersholm, called White Horses in the first draft, was published in Copenhagen, DENMARK, on November 23, 1886. Immediate reviews censured it for being not so fascinating to read and not so dramatic to stage. However, the play was performed in Bergen, Kristiania, Gothenburg, Stockholm, and Berlin within six months of its publication. Ibsen saw its German performance, which took place on April 6, 1886.

Ibsen had traveled to NORWAY in the summer of 1885 in the heat of a sociopolitical change in the parliamentary system. While he believed that the recent reforms in Norway were inadequate and immature, he also confessed to Georg Brandes that the experiences of his journey, the impressions he received, and the observations he had made had had a disturbing effect on him. Therefore, he decided to sculpt these contradictory experiences into Rosmersholm. Thus the play may be considered as an arena for debate about the pragmatic demands of the public, on the one hand, and the idealistic world of intellectuals, on the other.

John Rosmer, the only heir to Rosmersholm, has left his position as a pastor, and after the tragic death of his wife Beate, he continues to live chastely with Rebecca West, a bohemian woman from Finnmark in the far north who has had a sexual relationship with her stepfather. Rebecca supports Rosmer in his program of bestowing nobility of character on people. We learn later in the play that Rebecca had charmed Beate into believing that Rosmer and she had an affair. To avoid any future scandals for her husband, Beate had drowned herself in the mill-race. This house of tradition is visited by two local political activists, the conservative Kroll and the radical Mortensgaard. Both of them turn out to be opportunists, however, who want to have Rosmer on their sides as a means to furthering their own purposes. Rosmer gives up his Enlightenment program as he discovers himself entangled in a web of deceit. Rebecca, on the other hand, who is now close to achieving her aim, which is to become Rosmer's wife, discovers that she cannot go any further because Rosmersholm's lethargic impact on life has killed desire in her. Torn between love and remorse and lured by Brendel, Rosmer's former teacher and now an itinerant tramp, the former pastor and Rebecca choose to go the same way Beate went.

The play's dramatic force is enhanced by the uncanny presences of Brendel as well as the balance created between realistic and symbolic levels, an example of which is the subtle parallel between Rebecca's white shawl and the idea of the white horse.

The venerable mansion of Rosmersholm is an arena where the old values affect the mentality of those who dwell there. Apparently a MELODRAMA of love and intrigue against the background of serious sociopolitical changes, the play highlights the polemics of new energies: free love, sexual and political dominance, atheism, opportunism, attitudes that do not recognize moral and cultural inhibitions. Thus the play may be read as Ibsen's confirmation of the need for reshuffling of values crucial for a new age.

FURTHER READING

Beyer, Edvard. "Social Themes and Issues in Ghosts, Rosmersholm and John Gabriel Borkman." In Ibsen Year Book. Oslo: Univ. Press, 1978. 9–13.

Van Laan, Thomas F. "Art and Structure in Rosmersholm." Modern Drama 6 (1963): 150–163.

Wells, Marie. "Ghosts and White Horses: Ibsen's Gengangere and Rosmersholm Revisited." Scandinavica 37, no. 2 (1998): 197–214.

Astrid Sæther

ROSS, CREE IAN (1968–)

Cree Ian Ross was born in McCreary, Manitoba, CANADA, in 1968. His Aboriginal ties stem from both his Saulteaux mother and his Metis father, and it is from this heritage that his writing finds both strength and meaning. Reared in the Metis community of Kinosota and the Saulteaux reserves of Fairford and Winnipeg, Ross learned early in life that poverty was not always a choice.

Originally a science student at the University of Manitoba, Ross graduated with a bachelor of arts degree with a major in film. He worked numerous odd jobs including delivering newspapers, pumping gas, and selling clothes before first finding success with commentaries raising issues reflecting current sociopolitical conditions affecting First Nations. Whether the issue involved poverty, racism, substance abuse, corruption, or self-government, his often humorous addresses encouraged understanding to the largely misunderstood world of the Aboriginal. He used humor as a vehicle of change to expose serious issues, to entice individual intellectual response, and to encourage the formation of new perspectives to old stereotypes.

His plays, likewise, present characters with Everyman qualities exploring and criticizing not simply First Nation issues but issues relatable universally when examined in the larger, global context. Winning the Governor General's Literary Award for Drama in 1997, Ross achieved Canada's highest literary honor for his play fareWel, garnering the distinction as the only Nations writer to have received the prestigious award.

The plot of fareWel centers on how the absence of welfare checks affects a native reserve. While Ross clearly offers a critique of self-government, he is also offering a demonstration on separate ways to go about change. He encourages the non-Aboriginal to see this story not as an underlying rejection of self-government simply because the idea of self-government dissolves once the welfare checks turn up again. Instead, Ross offers to both the Aboriginal and the non-Aboriginal a demonstration that change will only come about when change occurs as a community.

His plays reflect settings and characters deeply steeped in Aboriginal culture, yet Ross lightly treads upon the spiritual distinctions of Aboriginal writing. His occasional touch upon the presence of another reality or spirit world serves only as a peripheral device, thus allowing his unique voice and native perspective to provide the opportunity to entertain, to unify, and to educate.

SELECT PLAYS: fareWel (1996); The Gap (2001); The Illustrated History of the Anishnawbe People (2001)

FURTHER READING

Lutz, Hartmut. Contemporary Challenges: Conversations with Canadian Native Authors. Saskatoon: Fifth House, 1991.

Roberts, David. "Native Drama 'Hits Close to Home.'" Globe and Mail (October 21, 1998): A16.

Taylor, Drew. "Story-telling to Stage: The Growth of Native Theatre in Canada." Drama Review 41, no. 3 (1997): 140–152.

Christine Marie Hilger

ROSSUM'S UNIVERSAL ROBOTS See R.U.R.

ROSTAND, EDMOND (1868–1918)

Edmond Rostand, born on April 1, 1868, in Marseille, FRANCE, a playwright, poet, and man of letters, sought to revive the spirit of ROMANTICISM that characterized the French theater of the 1830s and 1840s as exemplified by the work of Victor Hugo. During Rostand's youth, NATURALISM and REALISM in the novel and the theater (in the hands of, among others, ÉMILE ZOLA in France) had come to the foreground of European intellectual and artistic life. For Rostand, this scientific and sociological focus was unduly confining; his sensibility (like Hugo's, a romantic one but also connecting back to the glory days of 17th-century French neoclassical theater) led him to create verse dramas of considerable wit, scope, and ambition.

His first major theatrical success was a fanciful tale of young love, The Romancers (Les Romanesques, 1894), most famous today as the inspiration for the long-running OFF-BROADWAY musical The Fantasticks. In 1897, Rostand wrote the play that secured his reputation, and which has come to typify his quest to revive the spirit of romantic, poetic drama: CYRANO DE BERGERAC. The title role of the long-nosed philosopher-swordsman-poet was written for Constant Coquelin, one of the leading actors of the day; the setting, Paris in the mid-17th century, allowed Rostand to link his work with Pierre Corneille, Jean Racine, and Molière, each representing a different apotheosis of French verse drama. The stylistic range of Cyrano, veering from mordant satire to exuberant COMEDY to high romance to near-tragic pathos, thoroughly repudiates the clinical tonality of which naturalism was accused by those who did not favor it.

Rostand's next major play, The Eaglet (L'aiglon, 1900), treated the life of Napoleon's son and allowed the great actress Sarah Bernhardt to continue an association with the playwright's work that she had begun some five years earlier in The Faraway Princess (La princesse lointaine, 1895). After the success of The Eaglet, in 1901 Rostand became the youngest member ever elected to the prestigious Académie Française. In somewhat fragile health and unable, as a reigning celebrity, to find quiet or privacy in Paris, he moved to a country estate in Cambon. There he had the opportunity to observe the social organization of farm animals and wrote what many consider his last masterpiece, Chanticleer (Chantecler, 1910), epitomized by the title character's boast: "I stagger, / Dazzled to behold myself all drenched in red / And at having, by myself, the rooster, made the sun get out of bed." Although Chanticleer and The Eaglet have not achieved the permanence of Cyrano de Bergerac in the theatrical repertoire, they are esteemed, especially in the Francophone world, for the beauty of their verse and the amplitude of their sentiments.

During his final years, his fame secure and his health less so, Rostand wrote nothing else for the theater that was produced in his lifetime, though during the war he composed patriotic verse. The enigmatic Don Juan's Last Night (La dernière nuit de Don Juan) was produced and published posthumously and was not embraced enthusiastically. Rostand died on December 2, 1918, in Paris during—and quite possibly because of—the worldwide flu epidemic.

SELECT PLAYS: The Romancers (Les Romanesques, 1894); The Faraway Princess (La princesse lointaine, 1895); Cyrano de Bergerac (1897); The Good Samaritan (La Samaritaine, 1897); The Eaglet (L'aiglon, 1900); Chanticleer, (Chantecler, 1910); Don Juan's Last Night (La dernière nuit de Don Juan, published posthumously in 1921)

FURTHER READING

Amoia, Alba. Edmond Rostand. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1978.

Lloyd, Sue. The Man Who Was Cyrano: A Life of Edmond Rostand, Creator of Cyrano de Bergerac. London: Unlimited Pub., 2003.

Rostand, Edmond. Cyrano de Bergerac. Tr. and adapted for the modern stage by Anthony Burgess. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Bks., 1996.

Rick Davis

ROUTES AND ESCAPE ROUTES

In this play I have tried to delve deep into the issues raised by, and within, the Dalit movement. For me the most important thing is to reach out to people with what I feel about the Dalit movement and Dalit issues. . . . May be I am less of a playwright [than an activist]. But people are not interested in listening to speeches.

That is why I chose this path—writing plays. I might be derided as a didactic writer. But that doesn't affect me in the least.

—Datta Bhagat

Routes and Escape Routes (Wata Palwata, 1986) is the third major play by DATTA BHAGAT. It was written in a workshop organized by Theatre Academy, Pune, INDIA, in 1972 and was first performed in December 1987 at the Tilak Smarak Mandir, Pune, in a production directed by Sudhir Mungi. It became a milestone in both Marathi theater and Dalit theater because of its thought-provoking and mature treatment of the Dalit / upper-caste conflict and because this conflict was presented on the established Marathi stage for the first time.

Routes and Escape Routes dramatizes the conflict between three characters that represent different positions within the Dalit movement, represented by three generations, each articulating their vision of the future of the Dalit movement. The oldest generation is represented by Kaka, a staunch Ambedkarite who represents the old guards, uneducated but devoted followers of Babasaheb Ambedkar. Satish, his nephew and a college professor, represents the post-Ambedkar generation of Dalit intellectuals who are “assimilated” in the mainstream logic of rationality and the rule of law. Arjun, a radical student leader, personifies and articulates the most contemporary phase of the Dalit movement; for him the IDENTITY politics of his community is more important than larger issues of the politics for social transformation or ethics and morality. The play revolves around the issue of distribution of houses built by the government for flood-affected people. When Kaka and Arjun realize that the houses are illegally being claimed by upper-caste people, they decide to forcibly occupy them for people of their particular Dalit community who have no roof on their head. There is police oppression, innocent deaths, and utter devastation, and the fiery young Dalit leader resorts to unethical practices that erode the very foundation of the struggle. What he has claimed as an “all-out war, even greater than the two world wars” ends as a whimper, a subservience to corruption. The revolutionary act ends up as the poor fighting the poor, and the ruthless political establishment project themselves as a benevolent agency.

Routes and Escape Routes asks: What is the future of the Dalit movement? What kind of movement is it becoming? What does it stand for? What are its methods of achieving success? Structurally, the play is a series of discussions among the three men—very little actually happens onstage. Bhagat focuses on the intellectual transformation of the characters. He focuses—both structurally and thematically—on the importance of listening to another person and of being able to hear and acknowledge another person's point of view. Consequently, Bhagat does not want the mise-en-scène to overwhelm the production and interfere with an audience's ability to listen to the characters.

The play also raises questions about savage caste politics and language. Satish's wife Hema, born Brahmin but married to a Mahar, asks: “If you call someone a Mahar, that's an insult! And what if you call someone a Brahmin? Is that supposed to be an honour?”

FURTHER READING

Bhagat, Datta. Routes and Escape Routes. In DramaContemporary:India, ed. by Erin B. Mee. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 2001.
 “Marathi Theatre.” Mumbai Theatre Guide.com.
http://www.mumbaiheatreguide.com/dramas/features/marathi_theatre1.asp.

Maya Pandit

ROWLANDS, IAN (1964–)

Ian Rowlands was born in 1964 in Porth, Rhondda Cynon Taf, Wales. He grew up in the predominantly English-speaking Rhondda Valley, but he was educated through the medium of Welsh. He trained as an actor at the Royal Welsh College of Music and Drama in Cardiff. He is the artistic director of the English-language company Theatr y Byd and artistic coordinator of the Welsh-language company Theatr Bara Caws. Rowlands has also written extensively for radio and television, including A Light in the Valley, which won the Royal Television Society Award for Best Regional Drama in 1999. Other writings include programs for British Broadcast Corporation Radio Education.

As a writer, Rowlands is concerned with what he calls a “theatre of ideas.” Indebted to commedia dell'arte, Rowlands is more interested in a drama that discusses issues and generates debate than in a naturalist representation of character development. Therefore, his drama has consistently been antirealist, and he is known for his verbal ingenuity. Although his themes often seem whimsical, Rowlands has been consistently political in his writing. His caustic wit is leveled against certain self-denigrating and defeatist tendencies in Wales. The two main characters in Love in Plastic (1996), Man and Woman, illustrate this: Woman, an actress, has perfected lying about her background because she is ashamed of her Welsh upbringing, and Man has taken morbid introspection to its logical conclusion and laminated his house in plastic, only leaving it occasionally in a space suit. The play is set in a Swansea restaurant in which the waiter tries to capitalize on an invented Welsh tradition, which, however, fails to bring in the crowds. Love in Plastic was specifically written to be staged within an art installation created by Tim Davies at the Glynn Vivian Art Gallery in Swansea, thus illustrating Rowlands's ongoing interest in exploring the synergies between different art forms.

Glissando on an Empty Harp (1994) plays on well-worn Welsh stereotypes: two tramps live on the Thames embankment in an image that illustrates the postcolonial relationship between the metropolis and Wales. Emrys is the romantic, effusive Welshman who can come up with complicated Welsh verse at the drop of a hat, and Eric is the English-language, working-class writer who is identified with South Walian industrial culture and literature. Both try but fail to take advantage of Dora, who gives birth to a (Pan) Dora's box of possibilities.

Blue Heron in the Womb (1998) criticizes a stultifying, old-fashioned Welsh nationalism through a discussion of gender relations. Marriage of Convenience (1997), a hastily written autobiographical play, which was originally booked in ten community venues but which has since had over a hundred performances and won the Angel Award at the Edinburgh Festival and The Dublin Dry Gin Award for Best Production at the Dublin Festival, is a MONODRAMA that skillfully interweaves the deeply meaningful symbology of mountain and valley with the development of the character, who slowly learns to accept the bicultural nature of himself and his bilingual country. Together with EDWARD THOMAS, Rowlands has been influential in shaping the cultural climate of postdevolution Wales.

SELECT PLAYS: The Sin-Eaters (1992); Solomon's Glory (1993); Glissando on an Empty Harp (1994); The Ogpu Men (1994, radio play); Love in Plastic (1996); Marriage of Convenience (1997); Blue Heron in the Womb (1998); New South Wales (1999); Mor Tawel / Pacific (2001); Butterfly (2006)

FURTHER READING

Davies, Hazel Walford. "Theatre as Exorcism" [interview]. New Welsh Review 44 (Spring 1999): 70–75.

Rowlands, Ian. "Marriage of Convenience." One Man, One Voice. Ed.

David Adams. Cardiff: Parthian, 2001.

—. "The Ogpu Men." Act One Wales: Thirteen One Act Plays. Ed. Phil Clark. Bridgend: Seren, 1997.

—. A Trilogy of Appropriation: Three Plays (Blue Heron in the Womb, Love in Plastic, Glissando on an Empty Harp). Cardiff: Parthian, 1999.

Theatre in Wales [contains information on Rowlands and Welsh theater]. <http://www.theatre-wales.co.uk/>.

Alyce von Rothkirch

ROYAL GUESTS

Mexican author LUISA JOSEFINA HERNÁNDEZ has produced or published some 100 plays and novels. Her most famous dramas Fallen Fruit (Los frutos caídos, 1955) and Royal Guests (Los huéspedes reales, 1958) delve into the psyches of two educated women who sacrifice their happiness to the machista mentality of older relatives. In Fallen Fruit the antagonist is an uncle; in Royal Guests it is the mother. Despite aggressive campaigns to assert their autonomy, the heroines ultimately yield. Stymied by their internalized patriarchal values, they become accomplices in their own oppression. Ironically, these limits also diminish men and in Royal Guests even have the power to annihilate.

Royal Guests begins as Cecilia, the protagonist, faces a forced marriage. Jealous of the relationship between her husband and daughter, the mother, Elena, arranges to marry her off to Juan Manuel, a shameless chauvinist. Cecilia detests her fiancé even before discovering his infidelity but fails to perceive her desire for Ernesto, her father. Their banter about "impossible love" and mutual address as "señor" and "señora" voice forbidden passions, the Electra Complex. Delusional about becoming her father's wife, Cecilia rejects the overtures of another young suitor. Instead she begs Ernesto to keep her with him; her language and gestures are charged with sexual innuendo. Shamed by his depravity and emasculated by his wife, Ernesto refuses to intercede. On Cecilia's wedding night, Elena makes sexual advances toward Ernesto, confident that she has eliminated her rival. Tension mounts as Ernesto slaps his wife to repel her. Predictably the new marriage fails. After a disastrous honeymoon, Juan Manuel returns Cecilia to her family. In the final confrontation Cecilia admits to her father that her dream may be a fraud but fantasizes about their future. Desperate about his loss of dignity and impotent to control his daughter's advances, Ernesto runs out and shoots himself, forcing mother and daughter to share their hatred and loss forever.

Structurally, Royal Guests has ten scenes composed of escalating confrontations between characters driven by irrational passions. As in classical drama, they are unconscious of their tragic flaws. Cecilia resembles Electra: a woman who loves her father deeply and loathes her mother. Irony foreshadows the denouement. The threatened suicide of Juan Manuel's jilted lover, who comes to the nuptial ceremony, prefigures the suicide of the father who does not attend. When Ernesto talks about an illness that contaminates him, Cecilia thinks about Elena, not about their own polluted relationship. Isabel's warnings (Cecilia's confidante) echo the counsel for moderation of the Greek chorus. Obeisance to destructive cultural values—arranged marriages—warps society. By nature a good person, Cecilia's hatred and hopelessness debase her; she derives perverse pleasure in her misery and certain defeat. Her references to the red carnation by each place setting at the wedding banquet suggests that the "royal guests" of the title will witness her blood sacrifice.

Like the Electra myth, Royal Guests acts out an appalling reality: incest. This triangle of forbidden passions and petty rivalries exposes the noxious results of honoring unjust traditions. Ernesto's suicide casts off those irrational emotions. A social system that imposes abnegation, tolerates hypocrisy, and ignores incest perverts all of society. In MEXICO, Hernández implies, the powerlessness of women and the double standard of sexual morality for men and women exacerbate these morbid timeless relationships.

FURTHER READING

Dauster, Frank. "The Ritual Feast: A Study in Dramatic Forms." Latin American Theatre Review 9, no. 1 (Fall 1975): 5–9.

de Valdés, María Elena. The Shattered Mirror: Representations of Women in Mexican Literature. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1998.

Fox-Lockert, Lucía. "Luisa Josefina Hernández." In Women Novelists in Spain and Spanish America. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1979. 241–259.

Krugh, Janis Lynne. "Solitude and Solidarity: Major Themes and Techniques in the Theater of Luisa Josefina Hernández." Ph.D. diss., Univ. of Pittsburgh, 1986.

Magnarelli, Sharon. "Una entrevista con Luisa Josefina Hernández."

Alba de América (July 1989): 395–404.

—. "Sub/In/Di-Verting the Oedipus Syndrome in Luisa Josefina's Los huéspedes reales." Inti: Revista de Literatura Hispánica 40–41 (Fall 1994–Spring 1995): 93–112.

Wilma Feliciano

RÓŻEWICZ, TADEUSZ (1921–)

These are almost trivial details, but it is out of trivial details that our life is constituted.

—Tadeusz Różewicz

Poet, short-story writer, and playwright, Tadeusz Różewicz deals with controversial moral and social issues in experimental dramatic form. He has created an "open DRAMATURGY" that offers play text as work in progress to be completed by actors and director.

Born on September 10, 1921, in Radomsk, POLAND, he was the son of a minor court official. Różewicz edited a school magazine where his first poems appeared. During the German occupation he worked as messenger, clerk, and carpenter's apprentice. A member of the noncommunist resistance (Home Army), in 1943–1944 he served in a partisan unit, editing an underground journal. His elder brother was executed by the Gestapo. After the war he completed his secondary education and studied art history in Cracow. With the publication of Faces of Anxiety (1947) and other volumes of verse, Różewicz became established as a major poet.

His first performed play, The Card Index (Kartoteka, 1960), introduced an innovative fragmented structure that expressed postwar sensibility. His anonymous antihero's experiences of ALIENATION and loss were communicated through a radical new aesthetic that took Auschwitz as its basic premise and repudiated ideology, moral judgment, and intellectual speculation as empty abstractions. Abandoning beauty, noble sentiments, and high-flown language, Różewicz affirmed the bare facts of human existence as the only truth in a universe devoid of the absolute or transcendent. A memory play of startling discontinuities, Card Index mixes the farcically grotesque and the lyrical in a montage of shards and shreds, combining citations from classics with advertisements, news items, and nursery rhymes.

Subsequent dramas explore social maladjustment and marginality, disintegration of community, and artists' ludicrous position in a world of kitsch. Satirical repetition of clichés in The Laocoon Group (Grupa Laokoona, 1961) exposes the inauthenticity of art in an age of mechanical reproduction and mass culture. "The scenario of a play," The Funny Old Man (Śmieszny staruszek, 1964) consists of a rambling speech of self-defense by a lonely old man accused of child molestation. Incapable of producing anything new (even aided by a poodle named Mephisto), the great "poet laureate" in On All Fours (Na czworakach, 1971) spends his days crawling on the floor accompanied by admirers, interpreters, and biographers.

Faced with increasing difficulty in writing plays, Różewicz has devised a new kind of script (half treatise and polemic with his predecessors) in which extended stage directions serve as commentary interrupting action and disintegrating dramatic form. The Interrupted Act (Akt przerywany, 1964)—coitus, artistic creation, section of a drama?—cannot be completed; conflict looms between the idea of the play and impossibility of its stage realization. Set amidst the rubble of civilization where life goes on after the apocalypse, The Old Woman Broods (Stara kobieta wysiaduje, 1968) is an open score for theater that invites collaboration by theater artists.

Różewicz's "poetic REALISM" reaches its high point in White Marriage (Białe małżeństwo, 1974), a body-centered parody of fin-de-siècle sexual obsession seen through the eyes of two pubescent girls, and The Trap (Pułapka, 1982), a study of Franz Kafka's sexual and familial entanglements viewed from a Holocaust perspective. Following a path leading from ANTON CHEKHOV through Kafka to SAMUEL BECKETT, Różewicz has sought out those empty spaces between events where interior dramas are played out.

SELECT PLAYS: The Card Index (Kartoteka, 1960); The Laocoon Group (Grupa Laokoona, 1961); The Witnesses, or Our Little Stabilization (Świadkowie albo nasza mała stabilizacja, 1963); The Funny Old Man (Śmieszny staruszek, 1964); The Interrupted Act (Akt przerywany, 1964); Gone Out (Wyszedł z domu, 1965); Spaghetti and the Sword (Spaghetti i miecz, 1967); Birth Rate (Przyrost naturalny, 1968); The Old Woman Broods (Stara kobieta wysiaduje, 1968); On All Fours (Na czworakach, 1971); Dead and Buried (Do piachu, 1972); A Funeral Polish Style (Pogrzeb po polsku, 1972); White Marriage (Białe małżeństwo, 1974); The Departure of the Hunger Artist (Odejście głodomora, 1976); Theatre of Inconsistencies (Teatr niekonsekwencji, 1979); The Trap (Pułapka, 1982)

FURTHER READING

Filipowicz, Halina. A Laboratory of Impure Forms: The Plays of Tadeusz Różewicz. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Kott, Jan. "A Very Polish Card Index." In Theatre Notebook 1947–1967. Tr. by Bolesław Taborski. Garden City, N.J.: Doubleday, 1968. 131–134.

Vogler, Henryk. Różewicz. Warsaw: Author's Agency, 1976 [in English].

Jadwiga Kosicka Gerould

RUDALI

Although the final script is credited to USHA GANGULI, Rudali was developed in workshops with several other Bengali playwrights and screenwriters and the occasional input of Mahasweta Devi, who wrote the novel from which the play is adapted. Ganguli took the several Bengali scripts that emerged from the workshops and compiled them into one play.

Mahasweta Devi's novel centers on Sanichari, a poor, exploited, low-caste village woman struggling to survive in a rich-eat-poor world. The novel is a critique of the nexus between the socioeconomic and religious systems in place in Sanichari's village. One by one, Sanichari's relatives die, and she is unable to cry. She is so worried about the cost of the rituals surrounding death that she does not have the time or energy to mourn: she cannot afford to mourn. In Sanichari's village, when a member of a wealthy family dies and there are not enough women in the family to mourn, mourners are hired—the more rudalis (hired mourners), the greater the family's prestige. Grief and mourning are commodified. Sanichari goes into business as a rudali, and the novel ends with a triumphantly subversive act: she arrives at a funeral with so many rudalis in tow that the heirs know nothing will be left of their inheritance. Sanichari has not only given employment to every woman she can find; she has bankrupted a rich family.

Ganguli's play shifts the emphasis slightly from class to gender; Sanichari represents not an oppressed class but an oppressed woman. Ganguli says her play is about "all" of us and that Sanichari represents "women in general." Anjum Katyal (who translated the play into English) notes that in Mahasweta Devi's novel the upper classes exploit the lower classes, whereas in Ganguli's play men exploit women. Nonetheless, Ganguli's play retains Devi's economic critique. Ganguli sees the biggest difference between the novel and the play in the ending: she feels that Devi's ending is too optimistic and therefore untruthful. "Truth has to be bitter and uncompromising," she says. "So was my end." At the end of Ganguli's play, Sanichari is alone onstage: she clearly misses her only real friend, Bikhni, who is now dead. In spite of her sorrow, she resolutely decides to go on.

Rudali opened in Kolkata on December 29, 1992, with Ganguli directing and playing the role of Sanichari. It played for months to packed houses.

[See also India]

FURTHER READING

Ganguli, Usha. Rudali. Kolkata: Seagull, 1997.

Katyal, Anjum. "The Metamorphosis of Rudali." Seagull Theatre Quarterly 1 (1994): 5–11.

———. "The Metamorphosis of Rudali." In Muffled Voices: Women in Modern Indian Theatre. Delhi: Shakti Bks., 2002.

Mee, Erin, ed. DramaContemporary: India. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 2001.

"Rudali: Questions of Language and Audience." Seagull Theatre Quarterly 1 (1994): 12–24.

"Rudali: The Making of a Production." Seagull Theatre Quarterly 1 (1994): 25–34.

Erin B. Mee

RUGYENDO, MUKOTANI (1949–)

Mukotani Rugyendo, a poet, playwright, and journalist, was born in Kigezi, southwest of Uganda, in 1949 and attended the University of Dar es Salaam, graduating with a bachelor of arts degree, honors, in literature and theater arts in 1973. He later received a diploma in journalism after attending the International Institute for Journalism in Berlin, GERMANY.

Rugyendo has worked mainly as a newspaper and magazine editor, rising to the rank of the group managing editor at the Madhvani Group—which publishes New Vision, Uganda's leading daily newspaper. He has also worked as a book-publishing editor. Currently Rugyendo is a senior media and communication adviser for the Uganda Debt Network—an activist consortium of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) advocating the reduction of Uganda's international debt.

Rugyendo's artistic work includes poetry published in anthologies including Singing with the Night (1977) and An Introduction to East African Poetry (1974), both anthologies published by Heinemann in London. As a dramatist Rugyendo has published a collection of plays under the title The Barbed Wire and Other Plays, published by Heinemann in 1977 in the African Writers Series.

Rugyendo's drama is experimental in the sense that it attempts to grapple with the realities of postcoloniality soon after the exit of the occupying colonial empire, issues of land redistribution, ethnic animosity, and political upheavals caused by or resulting in military takeover. In the same way, the experimentation of Rugyendo's drama fits within the paradigm of manifest searches of African popular theater in the 1960s and 1970s. In his play The Contest (1977), Rugyendo indeed reminds his readers or performers that the play is an experiment that is supposed to encourage the participation of the audience, as he argues participation is what makes African theater popular. The play employs as its artistic technique "heroic recitation," a performance form found among the tradition of ethnic communities in western Uganda.

The Contest's deceptively simple plot of two characters vying to win over a girl is enhanced by songs and dances well known to the audience, which encourages audience participation. The two main characters, Hero 1 and Hero 2, display their performance prowess through song and dance but, most important, through their mastery of oral presentation. Their speeches are enlivened by well-selected proverbs, imagery, metaphor, and storytelling. As Rugyendo has said in the "Production Notes" to the play, the play "attempts to exploit"—with a good measure of success—"the concentrated rhythm and magic which are part and parcel of the theatre in traditional African conditions."

PLAYS: The Barbed Wire (1977); The Contest (1977)

FURTHER READING

Gikandi, Simon. Encyclopedia of African Literature. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Rugyendo, Mukotani. Barbed Wire and Other Plays. Oxford: Heinemann, 1997.

Bantu Ndung'u

R.U.R.

KAREL ČAPEK completed R.U.R. (Rossum's Universal Robots) in the spring of 1920, and the play was published in the fall of that year. It was first performed by an amateur group in a provincial Czechoslovakian theater on January 2, 1921. Its official premiere in Prague's National Theatre occurred on January 25, 1921, directed by Vojta Novak and designed by Bedřich Feuerstein. It was a great success, and within little more than a year it was being performed throughout Europe and in the UNITED STATES, the first Czech play to receive such acclaim.

The story involves a corporate enterprise based on the biochemical manufacture of humanlike beings to relieve humanity of all labor. The Robots are without feeling, reason, or the ability to reproduce but perform all tasks with minimal supervision. With thousands being shipped internationally every day, this utopian project succeeds beyond expectations until several unforeseen developments occur: People no longer have to work; they no longer seem to produce offspring; and therefore humanity seems in danger of extinction. Moreover, acting on a compassionate impulse, the daughter of the firm's president persuades the chief scientist of the project to alter the critical formula of the manufacturing process in order to make the Robots more human, which inexorably leads to their agitation, organization, and revolt. They proceed to destroy all humans except the original creators of the project, who barricade themselves in their headquarters in a final stand, hoping to negotiate with the Robots by selling them the secret formula of their manufacture, which is critical for the Robots' own survival. In the meantime, however, Helena, who wanted to make the Robots more human, has destroyed the formula. All the remaining humans except one, a philosophic member of the production team, are wiped out, and he is unable to solve the Robots' crisis of survival. Then he becomes aware that two of the Robots, male and female, are not only drawn to each other but are willing to sacrifice themselves for each other. In their love he sees a new Adam and Eve, as the play ends.

Despite dramaturgical and logical flaws, the play has not only a provocative premise but also lively, theatrically suspenseful action, and sharply drawn characters. Moreover, the play's philosophic issues have maintained their viability and relevance. The idea that man's greatest achievements may have the power to destroy him is a challenging one. Similarly, the confrontation of various points of view in the play regarding technology, industrialism, and capitalist commerce has an almost Shavian quality. Čapek himself found the heart of the play in the scenes of the besieged human survivors: "a handful of people await their end with heads erect; human heroism is my beloved ideal and indeed it's what attracted me to this material. . . . I wasn't concerned with Robots but with people." By the same token, the miracle of the two Robots who are to start a new human race was intended to illustrate the sheer will to live, "that creative will . . . that great endurance, that optimistic foundation of the human race."

[See also Czechoslovakia]

FURTHER READING

Bradbrook, Bohuslava R. Karel Čapek: In Pursuit of Truth, Tolerance, and Trust. Portland, Oregon: Sussex Acad. Press, 1998.

Harkins, William E. Karel Čapek. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1962.

Jarka M. Burian

RUSSELL, WILLY (1947–)

Playwright, composer, and lyricist Willy (William Martin) Russell was born in Whiston near Liverpool, ENGLAND, on August 3, 1947. One of the most performed English dramatists of the 20th century, his success is remarkable considering his background.

The son of a factory worker, Russell spent his initial school years in the English educational system's D-stream. While still at school, though, he realized that he wanted to be a writer, a desire he initially suppressed as impractical. He left school at fifteen, and to avoid working in a factory, he trained, at his mother's suggestion, to be a ladies' hairdresser.

He pursued this career for six years with little enjoyment, though it helped him to develop an ear for the speech of working-class Liverpoolian people, particularly women. His ability to create authentic-sounding dialogue and his eye for detail are characteristic features in his work.

In order to secure a career that would allow him time to write, Russell returned to school at the age of twenty. In 1970 he started training as a teacher. While at St. Katharine's College of Higher Education in Liverpool, he studied drama and started writing plays. On the strength of his early works the Liverpool Everyman Theatre commissioned him to rewrite a documentary on the Beatles. Russell agreed to the project but on condition that he could write his own piece.

The result was his first major success, the musical John, Paul, George, Ringo . . . and Bert. It ran for a year in London's West End and won two awards for the best musical of 1974. Its success allowed Russell to give up teaching and concentrate on writing full-time.

Russell's biggest success Educating Rita—a modern-day Pygmalion story about a hairdresser who wants to further her education—came in 1980. Commissioned by the Royal Shakespeare Company, the play ran for three years in the West End to rave reviews. It was named best COMEDY of 1980 by the Society of West End Theatre and by 1983 was the fourth most popular play on the British stage. In 1983 it was turned into a film that earned three Oscar nominations and the British Academy's top award.

The year 1983 also saw the reappearance of his reworked musical Blood Brothers. A Liverpoolian West Side Story, Blood Brothers was voted the best musical of 1983. It has subsequently become one of London's longest-running musicals.

Russell struck gold again in 1986 with Shirley Valentine. The story of a frustrated housewife seeking self-fulfilment, this one-woman play enjoyed a long run in both the West End and on Broadway, with Pauline Collins winning both the Society of West End Theatres (SWET) and Tony Awards for Best Actress. The play was turned into a movie in 1989.

Russell's plays draw on his personal experiences, and this gives authority to the voice of the British working class that features so strongly in his work. His plays celebrate the goodness of man and compassionately reflect the aspirations of ordinary people struggling against injustice, their surroundings, and shattered dreams.

SELECT PLAYS: Keep Your Eyes Down (1971); Playground (1972); Sam O' Shanker (1972); When the Reds (1973, adaptation of Alan Plater's play, The Tigers Are Coming—O.K.?); John, Paul, George, Ringo . . . and Bert (1974); Breezeblock Park (1975); One for the Road (1976); Our Day Out (1976); Stags and Hens (1978); Educating Rita (1980); Blood Brothers (1981); One Summer (1983); Shirley Valentine (1986)

FURTHER READING

- Anon. "Willy Russell." BBC—Books. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/arts/books/author/russellw/>.
- Gill, John. Willy Russell and His Plays: Including an Exclusive 70 Page Interview with Willy Russell. Merseyside, England: Countywise Ltd., 1996.
- Goodey, Jan. "Blood Brother." The Insight.co.uk (July 2001). http://www.nigelberman.co.uk/feature2_july.htm.
- Jones, Chris. "Willy Russell." In British Playwrights, 1956–1995: A Research and Production Sourcebook, ed. by William W. Demastes. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- McClellan, Mel. "John, Paul, George, Ringo . . . and Bert Lloyd? Willy Russell's Folk Credentials." BBC—Radio 2. http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio2/folk/features/feat_willyrussell.shtml.

Gregory Hacksley

RUSSIA AND THE SOVIET UNION

Drama developed more slowly in Russia than in other major cultures. The first original plays appeared in the mid-1700s when Aleksandr Sumarokov and others began imitating neo classical TRAGEDY, William Shakespeare, and Molière. Modern COMEDY dates to Denis Fonvizin (The Brigadier, 1769, produced 1780; and The Minor, 1782), while the inception of modern drama and tragedy may be attributed to Aleksandr Pushkin (Boris Godunov, 1825, produced 1870; and the four Little Tragedies, 1823–1830). But the popularity of theater encouraged furious activity among writers even if most were epigones of fashionable Europeans. Several seminal works established the tradition: Aleksandr Griboyedov's caustic comedy Woe from Wit (1824), Nikolai Gogol's satirical comedy The Inspector General (1836), Mikhail Lermontov's tragedy The Masquerade (1836, produced uncensored 1862), and Ivan Turgenev's drama A MONTH IN THE COUNTRY (1850, produced 1872). Despite the hindrance of censorship (Boris Godunov, The Masquerade, and A Month in the Country were performed in their entirety only after long delays), by midcentury Russia could boast of a dynamic ACTING and performance tradition whose repertoire included a handful of major plays.

REINFORCING THE TRADITION, 1860–1898

Aleksandr II came to power as a reformer in 1855 and between 1858 and 1862 loosened bans on theater criticism (see the discussion of Russian and Soviet dramatic criticism below) and independent theatrical organizations, although the Third Department, or political police, retained far-reaching powers, and theater remained a state monopoly. By freeing the serfs in 1861, he drastically altered the social structure and fueled growing populist convictions among the educated classes. Several plays appeared reinforcing the endemic Russian styles of grotesque satire and realistic drama, one of whose tasks was to be critical of social, if not political, tendencies. These included works by writers best known as novelists: Aleksei Pisemsky's drama A Bitter Fate (1859, produced 1863), Mikhail Saltykov-Shchedrin's acrid satires The Death of Pazukhin (1857, produced 1889) and Shadows (c. 1862–1865, produced 1914), and LYOV TOLSTOY's anti-emancipation and antinihilist satire A Contaminated Family (written for the Maly Theater 1864, not produced). Aleksandr Sukhovo-Kobylin's trilogy of grotesque satires—Krechinsky's Wedding (1855), The Case (1861, produced 1882), and The Death of Tarelkin (1869, produced 1900)—was of major importance. This unique trio of works exploring corruption and the unstable nature of human IDENTITY significantly darkened the comic genre that Gogol had developed before him and that would transform in new directions in the 20th century. Since many of this era's plays were under complete or partial bans, their full impact was felt only later. This was especially true of Sukhovo-Kobylin, whose works were staged relatively freely for a short time in the 1920s and then again, aside from a few productions in the mid-20th century, only after the late 1980s.

Many of this era's works can be attributed to the "liberal" or "democratic" tendency in drama, also called "critical REALISM," which emerged in the 1860s and 1870s and held sway beyond the end of the century. It grew stronger following the assassination of Aleksandr II on March 13, 1881, by the extremist Will of the People political group. Although the quantity of plays produced on progressive themes was large, relatively few survived their own era. Leaving even less trace for posterity, though enjoying some popularity, were conservative plays rebutting liberal tendencies. In this period Russian drama and theater became a key platform for the public discussion of ethics and social ills. Some of the most productive writers were Viktor Dyachenko, who wrote a few plays in the 1830s but blossomed as the author of socially aware MELODRAMAS in the 1860s; Aleksei Potekhin, who excelled in comedies and dramas about peasants and lowly clerks; the prolific Viktor Krylov, whose comedies and dramas observed contemporary urban and village life; and Pisemsky, whose dramas, comedies, and historical plays exhibited a strong social conscience.

Historical drama had been a part of Russian theater from the start, but it enjoyed a resurgence in the 1860s. Forty new historical plays were staged between 1862 and 1881, among which the works of Nikolai Chayev and Dmitry Averkiyev were especially successful though soon forgotten. The genre's finest proponent was the poet Aleksei Konstantinovich Tolstoy (not a relative of Lyov Tolstoy and commonly known by his initials A. K.), whose trilogy—The Death of Ioann the Terrible (1867), Tsar Fyodor Ioannovich (1868, produced 1898), and Tsar Boris (1870, produced 1881)—is still popular. Tolstoy followed the lead of Pushkin in Boris Godunov, writing primarily in lucid, modern language and shunning direct parallels with contemporary affairs in favor of exploring the origins of historical events. Tolstoy, whose Don Juan (1862) is also still performed, was famous for creating, with his cousins Aleksei, Aleksandr, and Vladimir Zhemchuzhnikov, the fictitious figure Kozma Prutkov, the "author" of humorous verses, sayings, and short plays. These eccentric parodies, though seldom performed, left a mark that was reflected in the development of 20th-century drama.

ALEKSANDR OSTROVSKY, who wrote his first play in 1846 and wrote prolifically until his death in 1886, overshadowed his contemporaries and most who have followed with the scope and quality of his work. His family chronicles and dramas, tragedies, folklore-based dramas, comedies from the Moscow merchant milieu, and comedies from the theatrical world established the standard of excellence in most genres. He wrote historical dramas that were popular in their time, although they were eclipsed subsequently by his dramas and comedies. In the social drama A Profitable Post (1857), the provincial tragedy The Storm (1859), the social satire Enough Simplicity for Every Wiseman (often rendered in English as The Diary of a Scoundrel, 1868), and the so-called backstage comedies THE FOREST (1871), Talents and Admirers (1882), and Guilty Without Guilt (1884), the secret of his success was evident: his extraordinary ear for language, his precise understanding of the Russian mentality, and his unsurpassed ability to create compelling characters. With his insightful portrayals of women struggling with social constraints, he created more great roles for women than any Russian dramatist before or since. An advocate of writer's and actor's rights, and a co-founder of one of Moscow's first private theater circles in 1865, he helped hasten the repeal of the state monopoly in theater in 1882.

The 1880s and 1890s formed an era of growing disillusionment with a stagnant political and social culture—sometimes called "the time out of joint"—although the reflection of that in drama remained relatively tame. Some of the top dramatists were Ippolit Shpazhinsky, the author of social melodramas and historical plays; Yevtkhy Karpov, who explored life in the villages and factories; Pyotr Boborykin, who had begun writing on timely social themes in 1858 and remained popular to the end of the century; Pyotr Nevezhin, who began writing plays with Ostrovsky in 1880 and whose most successful was the melodrama Second Youth (1887), about a family torn apart when the husband tries to leave his wife for his mistress; and Pyotr Gnedich, who debuted in 1881 with In a Village and had a string of successes lasting to 1912 with some forty plays including Lackeys (1907), revealing submerged intrigues in an aristocratic household. Also prominent was Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko, the future co-founder of the MOSCOW ART THEATRE, who wrote his first play in 1881 but had his greatest impact as a writer in the 1890s following the success of A New Business (1890), a comedy about a man who spends fortunes establishing enterprises that invariably fail. Dramatists now were often perceived more as craftsmen than artists, and actors often wrote plays themselves. Significant among these were the St. Petersburg actor Aleksandr Trofimov (real name: Ivanov), whose plays combining satire and NATURALISM were staged often in the 1880s, and the great romantic actor of Moscow's Maly Theater Aleksandr Sumbatov-Yuzhin, whose prolific writing career spanned six decades from 1877 to his death in 1926.

The plays of Lyov Tolstoy may be seen as the culmination of the "critical realism" of the second half of the 19th century and the first major example of psychological realism that subsequently became one of the great strengths of Russian drama and theater. They embodied a depth of purpose and skill of craft that were surpassed among his immediate predecessors only by Ostrovsky. Months after finishing the first of several short didactic plays he wrote over the years, he completed his first major drama, THE POWER OF DARKNESS, in 1886 (produced in FRANCE in 1888, in Russia in 1895). This harrowing tale of the deadening, hopeless world of the peasant, in which murder leads to repentance, raised the drama of morality, PHILOSOPHY, and social criticism to new heights. The comedy The Fruits of Enlightenment (1889), contrasted the natural and useful wisdom of the peasants with the faulty knowledge of the nobility, while the drama The Living Corpse (1900, produced 1911) explored the excruciating spiritual journey of a man who could not live by society's rules. Tolstoy worked on his fourth, unfinished, major drama The Light Shines in the Darkness, another dark exposé of a spiritually inclined man besieged by a bankrupt social order and a nagging wife, from 1884 into the first decade of the 20th century (produced 1918). Although most of these plays were not accessible to the public for some time due to censorship, they were known in artistic circles and exerted considerable influence. Tolstoy's moralistic style can seem tendentious today, but its role in the development of Russian psychological drama cannot be overstated, and his plays continue to be staged regularly.

FERMENT AND CHANGE, 1898–1917

ANTON CHEKHOV began writing PLATONOV, his first dramatic work, in 1878; he wrote ten comic one-act plays between 1884 and 1891; and his first major play, THE SEAGULL, was produced, unsuccessfully, in 1896. But in truth this seminal figure of world drama belongs to the 20th century. It was the revival of The Seagull in 1898 by KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY at the newly founded Moscow Art Theatre that both signaled the true discovery of Chekhov as a playwright and established the style of subtle, realistic drama that would dominate much of world theater for the next century. Three more masterworks followed: UNCLE VANYA (1899), THE THREE SISTERS (1901), and THE CHERRY ORCHARD (1904). Set in the countryside and illuminating the intertwining lives of extended groups of family, friends, and neighbors united primarily by their alienation, these plays unmistakably owed a debt to Turgenev's A Month in the Country. From the beginning, controversy attended the Stanislavsky productions, which established Chekhov's reputation as the bard of melancholy and resignation. Chekhov adamantly rejected this, although he confused matters as much as he clarified them by attaching the designation of "comedy" to The Cherry Orchard, a work that ends with a dying servant trapped in a locked house on a formerly splendid estate that was squandered by its ineffectual owner. Chekhov had proven in his stories and novellas that he was a writer of sublime understatement and psychological acumen, but he was also a master of irony, undercutting pathos and solemnity at every turn. These qualities, along with his formal innovations, are what gave him such a strikingly modern sensibility when compared even to such contemporaries as Tolstoy or MAKSIM GORKY. Formally, Chekhov brought stage speech closer to its natural counterpart by employing pauses, half phrases, and non sequiturs in a way that made the actor's intonation and behavior as important in carrying meaning as the words themselves. It is a trademark of Chekhov's drama that characters often hide their true thoughts behind the words they speak.

Gorky is frequently mentioned alongside Chekhov, by whom he was influenced and with whose plays his own were produced at the Moscow Art Theatre. But his drama is closer to the more didactic works of Tolstoy and, on a lower level, to the formulaic socially oriented plays of the 1860s to 1880s. His best-known play THE LOWER DEPTHS (1902)—about lowlives in a flophouse—is characteristic of his output for its moralizing, sentimentality, and characters who are less human portraits than patent functions. His best play arguably is SUMMERFOLK (1904), an effective Chekhovian facsimile about aimless people passing time at a country dacha. In time, his plays came to resemble Ostrovsky's studies of despotic families dominated by patriarchs or matriarchs. These included Vassa Zheleznova (first version 1910, second version 1936), The Zykovs (1918), Yegor Bulychyov and Others (1932), and Dostigayev and Others (1933). None, however, shared Ostrovsky's wit, insight, and craft.

The mood and themes of many plays in the first years of the new century were heavily colored by political developments—strikes, demonstrations, student unrest, the assassination of two ministers of the interior (1902 and 1904) and of the Grand Duke Sergei (1905). Semyon Yushkevich, Yevgeny Chirikov, David Aizman, Sergei Naidonov, and LEONID ANDREEV, though not unified stylistically, belonged to a group of writers published by the Znaniye (Knowledge) publishing house, which was headed by Gorky. Chirikov (The Jews, 1904), Yushkevich (The King, 1906), and Aizman (The Thorn Bush, produced in France in 1906) touched on themes combining problems facing Jews and the acute political turmoil gripping the country. With Gorky's help, Chirikov's Ivan Mironych (1905), a Chekhovian tale of a man trapped in his own private world, and Yushkevich's Miserere (1910), a symbolist-tinged work reflecting the despairing outlook of that era, were produced at the Moscow Art Theatre, and both men continued to write with marginal success until the Revolution of 1917. Naidonov's Vanyushin's Children (1901), one of the most celebrated plays of its time and still produced today, was a wicked exposé of a despotic, self-destructive family that echoed the national crisis. The aborted Revolution of 1905 drastically altered the atmosphere in all of the arts. Some writers, like Yushkevich, became more bitter, while Naidonov was among those who abruptly began writing escapist material such as the comedy The Pretty Girl (1907). He continued writing plays until his death in 1922, eventually returning to civically minded topics, although he never again matched his early success.

Pessimism and decadence were prominent in the early 20th century, as evidenced in the plays of Andreev and the neonaturalist Mikhail Artsybashev, who gained fame with lurid stories and novels (especially Sanin, 1907) depicting rape, lechery, and cynicism. His drama Jealousy (1913) exposed the brutish underpinnings of cultured society, while War (1914), The Life of the Savage (1915), and Enemies (1916) served cocktails of sex, hysteria, and murder. The fuzzy topics of free love, debauchery, and disillusionment were developed to varying degrees by Osip Dymov in Nue (1909), Ilya Surguchyov in The Business Firm (1913), and Nikolai Grigoryev-Istomin in The Kedrov Sisters (1914). Olga Kotlyova, under the pseudonym of O. Mirtov, wrote female responses to this type of play in The Small Woman (1915) and The Predator (1916). Andreev stood at the pinnacle of the writers toiling in this field in part because his work exceeded the limits of shock or scandal. In the unreal, philosophical dramas THE LIFE OF MAN (1907) and Anathema (1909), he showed his debt to the symbolists. In Anfisa (1910) and Yekaterina Ivanovna (1912), he directed a coldly abstract gaze at the sordid details of family and conjugal life. In the circus-based melodrama HE WHO GETS SLAPPED (1915), which enjoyed success in Europe and the UNITED STATES, he examined the illusory nature of reality. Staged at most major theaters and by most major directors, including Stanislavsky and VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD, Andreev was arguably the most popular playwright of the 1910s.

The rapid capitalization and industrialization of Russia in the 1880s and 1890s had created the conditions for a public seeking tame, palatable fare. This niche was filled in part by veterans such as Ippolit Shpazhinsky, Alexander Yuzhin-Sumbatov, Petr Boborykin, Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko, and Nikolai Gnedich, although Ignaty Potapenko, who debuted as a dramatist in 1893, was the standard bearer of this era's mainstream dramatic entertainment. His numerous plays in the first decade of the new century offered affirmative drama and comedy mixing optimism and didacticism in equal measure. Natalya Persyaninova was a pioneering female dramatist who enjoyed success with such FARCES as The Lady Philanthropist (1901) and The Barren Flower (1903). Other writers with box-office hits were Viktor Ryshkov, Vladimir Aleksandrov, Lev Urvantsov, whose Vera Mirtsev (1915) was a rip-roaring detective story, and Yury Belyayev, whose comedies Confusion, or the Year of 1840 (1905), The Red Tavern (1911), and The Lady from Torzhok (1912) were ironic stylizations of Russian life in the 18th and 19th centuries. Also working with stylizations of the past, but with more aesthetic pretension, was NIKOLAI EVREINOV. A champion of paradox, parody, and mystification, he was an enemy of all things realistic who admitted a debt to the parodies of Kozma Prutkov. He staged many of his own short plays (Backstage of the Soul, also known as The Theatre of the Soul, 1912; The Kitchen of Laughter, 1914; The Fourth Wall, 1915) at the Crooked Mirror cabaret in Petersburg. His A Merry Death (1909) and The Main Thing (1921), borrowing heavily from the commedia dell'arte, enjoyed success in France, ITALY, and the United States, paving the way for him to immigrate to Paris in 1925. Aleksei Tolstoy, a distant relative of Lyov Tolstoy, and who is best known as a historical novelist, updated the traditions of Gogol and Ostrovsky with comedies in the 1910s, turning to historical themes after the Revolution. Boris Zaitsev in Fidelity (1909), The Lanin Estate (1914), and Ariadne (1916) employed an elegiac, Chekhovian sensibility lacking in action and distinct heroes.

A unique feature of the early 20th century, commonly known as the Silver Age and dominated in Russia, as elsewhere, by modernism, was the number of major poets who wrote verse dramas; ALEKSANDR BLOK, Nikolai Gumilyov, VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY, Velimir Khlebnikov, Marina Tsvetayeva, and Mikhail Kuzmin among them. These writers, to quote Chekhov's Treplev in The Seagull, were seeking "new forms" with which to counteract the naturalism of the Moscow Art Theatre. The most methodical were the Russian symbolists (see the discussion of Russian symbolist drama below) who wrote not only plays but criticism and theory. Of them, Blok was the central figure, the founder of Russian lyrical drama and the author of THE PUPPET SHOW (also known in English as The Fairground Booth, 1906), an influential revolt against realistic theater and a self-referential play in which the Author is thrown out of his own work by the commedia dell'arte characters, and The Unknown Woman (1914), which grew out of one of Blok's short poems. Both were among the important early productions of Meyerhold, who staged many of the symbolists. This alliance also was important for the development of Russian stage design, which, along with writers and directors, began to break loose of realistic forms (see the discussion of Russian and Soviet theater design below). As Michael Green (1986) has noted, the symbolists had no intention of writing Lesedramen; their plays were "highly theatrical creations in a new style that demanded a new style of production." This held true for poets from other groupings as well and explains why, Meyerhold notwithstanding, their production histories are so meager. Of the Acmeist Gumilyov's eight major plays drawn from exotic ancient cultures, only Don Juan in Egypt (1913), Gondla (1917, produced 1920) and The Child of Allah (unfinished production 1916) were staged in semi-amateur theaters. (Gumilyov was shot by the Soviets in 1919.) Mikhail Kuzmin had many of his nearly forty sketches, ballets, pantomimes, and plays produced in clubs and cabarets between 1910 and the 1920s, but few were performed in large venues and fewer still were produced a second time. This author of exquisite verse was the first open homosexual in Russian letters, which may have contributed to the fact that his fascinating The Comedy of Alexis, Man of God (1908, produced 1914) and Venetian Madcaps (1914) have been ignored. Marina Tsvetayeva, influenced like Gumilyov by Pushkin's economy, was the author of eight extant, finely tuned plays written between 1918 and 1927, none of which was staged before she committed suicide in 1941. Her six "romantic" plays, including The Adventure (1919), based on the figure of Casanova, were set in the 16th to 18th centuries. Her tragedies Ariadne (1924, published 1927) and Phaedra (1928) were drawn from antiquity. The futurist Mayakovsky reimagined biography as theater in A Tragedy (1913), which was performed on a double-bill with the extravagant futurist opera Victory Over the Sun by the poet Aleksei Kruchenykh, and wrote the first play reflecting the impact of the October Revolution in the satirical MYSTERY-BOUFFE (1918, revised 1921). The sometime futurist and always experimental Velimir Khlebnikov wrote about two dozen, often brief, dramas, including the ironic Marquise Dezes (c. 1909–1911), observing a gathering of decadent sophisticates; Death's Mistake (1915), in which Death is defeated at a comically grim ball; and Nocturnal Search, reproducing the random speech of a police search in the dark (1921). The Hag's Children (c. 1911–1913), an epic work combining prose and poetry, reflected the creation of the world and its knowledge. None of these works violating the tenets of realism and built on neologisms and word and sound play, were produced; few were published. Also leaving plays of note were several novelists and poets associated with the symbolists: Innokenty Annensky's Thamyris Kitharodos (1906, produced posthumously 1916) was based on a theme from Sophocles; Zinaida Gippius, author of four plays, wrote Sacred Blood (1901), a symbolist reworking of Hans Christian Andersen, and the once-popular melodrama The Green Ring (1915); Vyacheslav Ivanov wrote the tragedies Tantal (1905) and Prometheus (1919); Aleksei Remizov wrote The Devil's Comedy (1907), The Tragedy of Judas, Prince of Iscariot (1908), and others; Fyodor Sologub wrote The Triumph of Death (1907) and some dozen others; Dmitry Merezhkovsky contributed the historical tragedies Pavel I (1908), Tsarevich Aleksei (1920), and others.

EARLY SOVIET DRAMA, 1917–1930

Mayakovsky's Mystery-Bouffé ushered in the revolutionary age, although, in reality, it was a false start for the new era in drama because the political, economic, and social chaos of the civil war (1918–1921) following the Revolution marginalized the arts. This was a time when the task of finding food and shelter overshadowed everything else: one year after Blok died of malnutrition, Khebnikov died of starvation in June 1922 even as his so-called transrational supernovella Zangezi, an epic drama about a poet encountering nature and the gods before dying, was published. It was performed once in a Petrograd museum in 1923 (with the constructivist artist Vladimir Tatlin in the title role), then ignored until produced in the United States in 1986 and Russia in 1992. Another poet whose verse dramas were disregarded was Sergei Yesenin, author of Pugachyov (1921, produced 1965) and The Land of Scoundrels (1925, produced in POLAND 1967). Theaters in the immediate postrevolutionary period relied on the established repertoire with rare exception.

Vladimir Ilich Lenin's colleague in exile ANATOLY LUNACHARSKY was named the first Soviet People's Commissar of Education immediately after the Revolution. This erudite critic and competent playwright set the tone for cultural activity until removed from his post in 1929. Early in Lunacharsky's term, Lenin established the New Economic Policy (NEP, 1921–1928), a liberalization of private enterprise that facilitated the emergence of new theaters, clubs, and cabarets, a public with expendable income to frequent them, and therefore, a market for new texts. NIKOLAI ERDMAN, whose dark comedies The Warrant (1925) and THE SUICIDE (c. 1929–1930, produced in SWEDEN 1969) portended the crisis of the individual in Soviet society, honed his skills in this milieu where satire and topicality were kings. It gave rise to a nebulous, short-lived phenomenon known as NEP satire in which shady characters and petty crooks were alternately heroes and objects of scorn. The leading NEP satires were Boris Romashov's The Soufflé (1925), about a wheeler-dealer whose grandiose money-making scheme caves in; MIKHAIL BULGAKOV's Zoya's Apartment (1926), about a brothel masquerading as a dress shop; and Mayakovsky's THE BEDBUG (1929) and THE BATHHOUSE (1929). Plays of various styles reflected the complex forces affecting Soviet society in the 1920s. Bulgakov's drama THE DAYS OF THE TURBINS (1926) treated the story of a family aligned with the White Army; Aleksei Faiko's Yeugraf, Seeker of Adventures (1926) followed a lyrical, melancholy barber as he encountered the strange goings-on of NEP-time Moscow; Valentin Katayev's vaudeville

The Squaring of the Circle (1928) spoofed the new notion of communal apartments in which multiple families shared tight living quarters; Aleksandr Bezymensky's verse comedy The Shot (1929) satirized the excesses of bureaucracy. The pathos of the new Soviet hero was explored in Vladimir Bill-Belotserkovsky's civil war drama The Storm (1923); Lyudmila Seyfulina's Virineya (1925), about revolutionaries in Siberia; Konstantin Trenyov's Lyubov Yarovaya (1926), portraying a female communist who abandons her counterrevolutionary husband; Boris Lavrenyov's The Break (1927), about the revolutionary coming of age of a sailor and an officer; and Vsevolod Ivanov's Armored Train No. 14–69 (1927), in which a White Army officer is prevented from running his train through Red Army territory.

A parallel development was the constellation of plays examining the increasingly complicated social role of intellectuals and professionals. Among these were Aleksei Faiko's melodrama Man with Portfolio (1927), in which a professor commits suicide when he realizes he is out of step with his age; two by YURY OLESHA, A CONSPIRACY OF FEELINGS (1929), depicting a clash between people of practical and poetic natures, and A List of Assets (1931), in which an actress seeks creative freedom abroad; and two by Aleksandr Afinogenov, The Oddball (1929), a lyrical treatment of a factory administrator seeking to increase productivity, and Fear (1931), a response to Man with Portfolio, in which a professor opposing communist rule changes his mind.

After Joseph Stalin consolidated power in 1927, the relative freedoms of the previous half-decade began fading. Thus this era is characterized by the appearance of many talented writers whose plays were banned and whose careers and/or lives were crippled or cut short: Mayakovsky committed suicide in 1930; Erdman wrote no major plays after 1930; Olesha completed no major plays after 1931; Bulgakov faced increasing problems with the censor when a ban was placed on his tragic farce FLIGHT (1928, produced 1957), about White Russians fleeing the country. Isaac Babel, the great short-story writer, had some success with Sunset (1928), his comedy about the Jewish community in Odessa, but his only other play Maria (1935), about the dying out of the aristocracy, was not produced for decades. He was executed in prison in 1941. SERGEI TRETYAKOV, who often wrote lively, openly didactic plays about foreign revolutionaries, had varying levels of success with Are You Listening, Moscow? (1923), Gas Masks (1924), and especially, Roar China! (1926), about two Chinese coolies who were executed by the captain of an English gunboat for a murder they did not commit. His I Want a Child, a communist treatment of positive eugenics in which a young woman sets herself the goal of having a healthy, intelligent baby fathered by a worker, was rehearsed by Meyerhold in 1928 but produced in GERMANY only in 1980. He committed suicide in prison in 1939. Yevgeny Zamyatin, the famous author of the anti-utopian novel We, wrote eight plays, including The Fires of St. Dominic (1922, not produced) and The Flea (1925), a dramatization of "Lefty," Nikolai Leskov's story about an artisan of miraculous talent that remains popular today. He immigrated to France in 1931. Emigration in the fifteen years following the Revolution deprived Russian theater of many noteworthy playwrights, including Dymov, Yushkevich, Chirikov, Surguchyov, Zaitsev, Evreinov, and Vyacheslav Ivanov. Vladimir Nabokov, who immigrated to Europe in 1919, published nine plays between 1923 and 1938, although their production histories are scant.

Some nonconformist writers associated with important literary movements—the Serapion Brothers and the Obyedineniye Realnogo Isskustva (OBERIU)—composed plays whose historical value still overshadows their impact in theater. Lev Lunts, the prime theoretician for the Serapions, wrote four plays before his untimely death at the age of twenty-three in 1924: the philosophical tragedy Outside the Law (1921); a fantastic treatment of the revolution called The Apes Are Coming! (1923); the neo-romantic tragedy Bertrand de Born (1923); and The City of Truth (1924), which is defined by Harold B. Segel as “the most unequivocally anti-utopian play of the 1920s” (Segel, 1993). Outside the Law was produced a handful of times in Europe, but the proper discovery of Lunts has yet to occur. Better known is DANIIL KHARMS, a founding member of OBERIU, which brought together a small group of writers whose works were steeped in irony and incongruity. Their preference for brevity and nonsense revealed a kinship with the dramatic jokes of Kozma Prutkov and form the basis of what is known today as the Russian absurd. Kharm’s Yelizaveta Bam (1928) was rediscovered by Russian theaters in the 1990s, as were plays by Aleksandr Vvedensky, most notably Christmas at the Ivanovs’ (1938), a cheerfully eccentric tale of a family of children aged one to eighty-two who die around the Christmas tree after one of them is beheaded by their nanny. The debut of the OBERIU occurred with a poetry reading on January 24, 1928, and its last meeting was a reading at a Leningrad University dormitory in spring 1930, after which it was attacked in the press. Kharm’s and Vvedensky died in prison.

THE AGE OF STALIN, 1930–1953

The period between 1928 and 1930 was characterized by fierce competition among such literary groups as the Constructivists, LEF (Left Front of Art), OBERIU, Pereval (Mountain Pass), and especially, RAPP (Russian Association of Proletarian Writers), the most militant of them all and the one most closely aligned with the Communist Party. By 1930 RAPP effectively had achieved the dissolution of all competitors, although by 1932 it, too, was perceived with suspicion in the Communist Party and was disbanded itself. In its place, the Party moved to establish an official Writers Union, and throughout 1932 and 1933 a new term, SOCIALIST REALISM, began to appear in discussions of art. When the First Congress of the Writers Union of the U.S.S.R. was held in 1934, socialist realism—a nebulous concept that meant in practice that artists were expected to represent Soviet life as communist authorities wished to see it—was proclaimed the official style of all literary activity. The Great Purges of 1936–1937 decimated the Soviet Union’s ranks of intellectuals and professionals, striking deeply at every aspect of society, from the military to the arts. The sum of these events not only drastically altered the topics writers could explore but radically affected who would do the writing.

Many of the era’s best playwrights fell silent by choice or by force. It is telling that Boris Pasternak spent much time from the late 1930s to the early 1950s translating Johann Wolfgang Goethe’s Faust and the plays of Shakespeare, while a play he began writing in 1942 was left unfinished. The prose stylist Andrei Platonov, the satirist Mikhail Zoshchenko, and the unjustly forgotten Aleksandr Kopkov wrote plays but were ignored. Platonov, the author of nearly a dozen dramas, had only a handful of children’s plays produced from 1936 to 1941. His major satires (The Organ Grinder, c. 1929–1931; High Voltage, 1932; Fourteen Red Huts, c. 1931–1938) were not produced in his lifetime. Zoshchenko wrote some sixteen one-act and full-length plays, but only Respected Citizen (1930), the wicked spoof of an odious Party hack who falls from grace, was produced briefly. Kopkov, the author of four known plays, was produced in his lifetime only with Tsar Potap (1939), a family drama in the style of Gorky or Lyov Tolstoy about a severe patriarch. His highly respected satires Get Him! (1931, published 1993), lampooning inept bureaucrats in the cultural sphere, and Elephant (1932, produced 1967), a send-up of a collective farm, only appeared long after he died in 1942 at age thirty-five during the Leningrad Blockade. ALEKSEI ARBUZOV emerged as an exception to the rule. He wrote some plays of note in the first half of the 1930s, then soared to stardom in 1939 with Tanya, a simple tale about a young woman whose world falls apart when she subordinates her life to that of her husband. His heartfelt dramas about people making hard personal choices and living with the consequences made him one of the most important Soviet playwrights from the 1930s to the 1980s.

The 1930s were perceived officially as a heroic age, and dramatists reflected that in their work. Vsevolod Vishnevsky’s AN OPTIMISTIC TRAGEDY (1933) was significant for its pathos-laden story of a female commissar taking charge of anarchist sailors and organizing them into a Red Army unit before dying of battle wounds. Other plays by Vishnevsky employing epic heroism to illustrate aspects of the Revolution were The First Cavalry Army (1930), The Final Decisive Battle (1931), Battle in the West (1933), depicting the communist struggle in Germany, and Unforgettable 1919 (1949). The poet Ilya Selvinsky, who wrote nearly a dozen tragedies, comedies, and historical plays between 1929 and 1957, had his most important success with his self-styled tragedy The Second Army Commander (1929), a Civil War drama that for the first time showed conflict among communists as opposed to between the Reds and the Whites. Also appealing to patriotism and displaying political consciousness were Nikolai Pogodin, Vladimir Kirshon, Vsevolod Ivanov, Leonid Leonov, and Boris Lavrenyov, most of whom began writing in the 1920s and continued prolifically through the 1950s and into the 1960s. Pogodin was a founder of the so-called industrial drama with Tempo (1929), dramatizing the fast pace of work in a factory; Aristocrats (1934), about the positive effects of forced labor on the White Sea Canal; and Kremlin Chimes (1942), where an avuncular Lenin convinces a reticent engineer to apply his talents to the building of the Soviet state. Kirshon, executed in prison in 1938, was a Party bureaucrat whose The Rails Are Humming (1928) was among the first plays to feature workers and whose Grain (1930) explored the conflict between two competing Party bureaucrats in a rural setting. Ivanov and Leonov, best known as novelists, plumbed the revolutionary theme in dramatizations of their own prose.

The start of World War II (called the Great Patriotic War in Russia) on June 22, 1941, ushered in a decade of changes in dramatic styles, although little of the era's output, like that of the preceding period, was of lasting artistic value. The grand heroism of the previous decade was maintained in the numerous plays written to bolster morale at home and at the front, although the "optimistically tragic" inclination was now replaced by a homespun simplicity in the characters and their manner of resolving problems. Following the war, which ended on May 9, 1945, many plays sought to illuminate the problems of the rapidly escalating Cold War. Joining the list of prominent active writers from the 1930s were Konstantin Simonov, Aleksandr Kron, Aleksandr Shtein, and The Brothers Tur (collective pseudonym of Leonid Tubelsky and Pyotr Ryzhei), often in collaboration with Lev Sheinin. Simonov, a poet, novelist, war journalist, and Communist Party functionary, was central among them. His wartime dramas The Russian People (1942), Wait for Me (1943) and So Shall It Be (1944) mixed the themes of national heroism and individual cares, while his postwar play The Russian Question (1946), about an honest American journalist who cannot find a publisher for his sympathetic book about the Soviet Union, was a prime example of drama giving voice to Party viewpoints. Leonov's The Invasion (1942) was another of the most celebrated plays of the war period.

By the late 1940s, state policies had nearly destroyed Russian drama. This was acknowledged tacitly in a Party resolution, "On the Repertory of Dramatic Theaters and on Measures for its Improvement," issued August 26, 1946. It included the requirements that theaters stage no less than two new Soviet plays each season, that they limit the number of "foreign bourgeois" plays produced, and that they encourage writers to explore politically expedient topics. By the early 1950s a cautious debate had begun about the "theory of conflictlessness"—that is, under socialist realism as enforced by Party bureaucrats there theoretically could be no conflict between positive representatives of Soviet society, while the introduction of negative characters was all but forbidden. This naturally had an especially detrimental effect on comedies, of which remarkably few were produced throughout the 1930s and 1940s. Valentin Katayev had several successes with frothy comedies, as did Vasily Shkvarkin in Child of Another (1933), his most famous work about a budding actress who breaks with her family and boyfriend when they suspect her of being pregnant; Spring Review (1937), a comedy about student life; and A Simple Girl (1937), the love story of a housemaid in a communal apartment. His satirical The Terrible Trial (1939) features a crooked-mirror gallery of bribe-takers, crooks, and bureaucrats that shows the faint influence of Alexander Sukhovo-Kobylin, which may explain why it did not do well in this "heroic" age. The most distinctive comic dramatist to emerge in these years was YEVGENY SHVARTS, who evolved his own form of fantastic, fairy-tale satire. However, his three major works—The Naked King (1934, produced 1960), The Shadow (1940), and The Dragon (1944), all of which revile people wielding power—were produced freely only after 1960.

THAW, STAGNATION, AND PERESTROIKA, 1953–1991

The death of Stalin on March 5, 1953, engendered sweeping changes in Soviet society. The ensuing period, commonly known as the Thaw (otpetel'), takes its name from a novel published in 1954 by Ilya Erenburg. Nikita Khrushchev's so-called secret speech denouncing Stalin on February 25, 1956, at the 20th Communist Party conference further encouraged liberalization in the arts, which not only triggered a rise in the quality of new works but facilitated the tentative "rehabilitation" of reputations that had been destroyed over the previous twenty years. Parallel to this liberalization process was a slow reaction among hard-line conservatives that eventually led to the sacking of Khrushchev as general secretary of the Communist Party in 1964, a signal that the advances of the Thaw were in danger. On August 20, 1968, the Soviet army invaded CZECHOSLOVAKIA to stop growing calls for change in that communist satellite state. The Thaw now was over, and a new era, subsequently known as the Period of Stagnation (zastoi), began under the leadership of Leonid Brezhnev.

The 1950s saw the return of the personal element to dramatic literature, giving rise to what the scholar Konstantin Rudnitsky (2000) called "honest, but modest realism" and what the critic Mark Shcheglov called "plays of life." Where the pathos of the last two decades had concentrated on the needs and demands of society and its institutions, some writers now focused on the individual, occasionally in exposés of dishonest communist authorities, and the problems facing youth. Viktor Rozov, Leonid Zorin, and Aleksandr Volodin led this trend. Rozov, the author of over twenty plays, had a string of hits that were instrumental in defining the outlook and moral tone of the era: Good Luck! (1954) explored teenagers unwilling to live by the tenets of their parents; In Search of Happiness (1957) showed young people rejecting materialism in favor of spirituality; The Unfair Fight (1960) pitted a hopeful husband and bride-to-be against harping parents; The Social Director (1964) examined a man whose life was broken when he left Moscow to escape arrest; The Reunion (1966) showed former schoolmates who have not lived up to their youthful ideals. Rozov's lyrical and deeply moving Alive Forever (written 1943 as The Serebriisky Family, produced 1956 and filmed 1957 as The Cranes Are Flying) treated the theme of honor, honesty, and duty among young soldiers during World War II and was one of the single most important works of its time. His late play Hoffmann (1991, produced 1995) was a dramatization of prose by E. T. A. Hoffmann.

Zorin, who debuted with Youth (1952), nearly became the first casualty of the Thaw when his anticorruption drama The Guests (banned 1954, revived 1988) was attacked vehemently. This had a residual effect on his reputation for most of the Soviet period, as he frequently clashed with the censor while enjoying success with audiences. The author of over forty plays and still active in the early 21st century, he worked in the genres of comedy, lyrical drama, and historical drama: The Good-Natured Ones (1958), a melancholy comedy, was an exposé of second-rate scientists; Friends and Years (1961), spanning the years 1934 to 1961, uncovered the moral compromises of a generation; The Decembrists (1967) and The Tsar's Hunt (1974) reconsidered elements of Russian history; and Pokrovskiy Gates (1974) observed the teeming life in a Moscow apartment house. Zorin's most famous work, A Warsaw Melody (1967), showed the adverse effect of politics on personal lives when a Polish woman cannot marry the Russian man she loves. His sequel Aftertaste (1998) revisited the pair fifty years later and revealed a common quality of his work, the primacy of ideas over believable drama.

Volodin, who wrote over a dozen plays, may have been the best playwright to emerge in the 1950s. More than most, he experimented with form, using cinematic effects of close-ups and scene shifts and, in some parable plays, developing a fairy-tale atmosphere. Factory Girl (1955) showed a young woman who ran afoul of the Komsomol, or Communist Youth League; Five Evenings (1959), his most enduring drama, focuses on a middle-age pair renewing a relationship after surviving many hardships; The Lizard (1969) portrayed prehistoric tribes that ostensibly do not understand each other; Dulcinea of Toboso (1970) modernized the Don Quixote myth, a crucial one in Russian culture, by positing Aldonza Lorenzo and Alonso Quijano as common people ready and willing to take on the responsibility of becoming myths.

Also of note in the 1950s was Aleksandr Galich, who achieved popularity with several youth-oriented works between 1954 and 1959 before he abandoned drama and was forced to emigrate in 1974 because of the popular, straight-talking songs he wrote throughout the 1960s. His Sailor's Silence (c. 1945–1956, produced 1988), touching on the Jewish theme in a provincial town, caused his first serious clash with the authorities.

Although the Period of Stagnation was hard on art—Vasily Aksyonov called the 1970s “the iron decade”—a grim stubbornness could be discerned in the way the best playwrights clung to challenging topics and sought to avoid copying set dramatic formulas. They transformed the Soviet models and wrote some of the best drama since the 1920s. Edvard Radzinsky gained fame in the West in the 1990s with books popularizing Russian history, although his lasting reputation will rest on his plays. He debuted with the first of several youth-oriented plays in 1958, but his penetrating explorations of women, 104 Pages About Love (1964) and A Little Bit About a Woman (1968), established his importance. A Film Is Shot (1965) was his first of many plays to treat the problem of the artist and society. On the threshold of the 1970s he began writing parables using historical or literary sources: The Seducer Kolobashkin (1968) took off from the Faust myth; Don Juan Continued (1978) revealed Leporello usurping his master's place after spending 3,000 years as a servant; Conversations with Socrates (1975), Lunin, or the Death of Jacques, Written in the Presence of the Master (1986), and the tragic farce Theater in the Times of Nero and Seneca (1986) showed the symbiotic relationship of jailers and the jailed. The Last Night of the Last Tsar (1996) was closer in spirit to the popular prose of the 1990s than the philosophical plays of the 1970s and 1980s.

Aleksandr Vampilov, who drowned in 1972 in an accident on Lake Baikal two days short of his thirty-fifth birthday, left a handful of the best plays of the Soviet period. Farewell in June (1966, reworked 1972) told of a student who must choose between love and a university career; The Elder Son (1969) was a comedy with deep dramatic undertones about a young hooligan pretending to be a middle-aged man's long-lost son; Duck Hunting (1967, produced 1976) was a dark drama about an aimless, bitter man of no principles; and Last Summer in Chulimsk (1971, produced 1973) observed a teenage girl whose hopes of romantic love go awry. Of his approximately dozen one-act plays or short scenes, most of which are known collectively as Provincial Anecdotes, the most frequently produced are An Incident with a Paginator and Twenty Minutes with an Angel (produced 1972). Although Vampilov drew inspiration from the Russian realistic and comic traditions, he has his own unique diction, and his plays “cannot be treated as warmed-over Chekhov or Gogol” as Alma Law has noted in her preface to Aleksandr Vampilov: The Major Plays (1996).

Aksyonov, a novelist who has lived primarily in the United States since being forced into emigration in 1980, is the author of five plays employing satire, grotesque, and fantasy of which Always for Sale (1965) alone was produced in the Soviet Union. The intriguing, unorthodox nature of such plays as Your Murderer (1964), an “anti-alcoholic comedy” set in the tropics, and Aristophaniana with Frogs (1968), bringing together Dionysius, Pushkin, Shakespeare, and a poet of the 30th century, suggest their production histories may yet be written. According to Daniel Gerould, in the preface to his translation of Your Murderer (2000), Aksyonov's drama reestablished contact with “the great line of Russian and early Soviet satirists, starting with Gogol, Sukhovo-Kobylin, and Saltykov-Shchedrin and continuing through Mayakovsky, Erdman and Bulgakov.” Also remaining within the literary tradition, but outside of the theatrical process, were Andrei Amalrik, the author of several, OBERIU-style, absurdist plays written between 1963 and 1975, and the poet Joseph Brodsky, whose verse drama Marble was published in the West in 1984. Brodsky was "allowed" to emigrate in 1972; Amalrik in 1976.

Arbuzov continued writing quality plays, including It Happened in Irkutsk (1959) and My Poor Marat (1965), vastly different dramas about the redemption of two men through their love of a single woman; The Choice (1971), whose two acts explore possible divergent outcomes in a man's life based on choices he could have made in his youth; and Cruel Games (1978), about twenty-somethings finding a purpose in life.

Mikhail Roshchin contributed several plays of resonance: The Old New Year (1967, produced 1973), a comedy about two neighboring families, one on the way up, the other not; Valentin and Valentina (1971), a melodrama about two teenagers engaged to be married; A Husband and Wife Rent an Apartment (1976), in which a married couple battle the obstacles of Soviet life; The Remodeling Job (1975), in which the renovation of an apartment stands as a metaphor for the renewal of human souls; and The Echelon (1975), about women being evacuated from Moscow in 1941. His Pearly Zinaida (c. 1976, produced 1986), a satire about a novelist whose wife will not leave him in peace to write, and The Silver Age (2001), a drama about young and old intellectuals in 1949, did not match earlier successes.

Grigory Gorin, showing the influence of Shvarts, created fantastic, satirical parables, often based on other works or well-known historical topics: Til (1970), drawn from the Till Eulenspiegel tale; Forget Herostratus (1972), based on the Greek arsonist; The House that Swift Built (1980), based on the English satirist; and others. His popular Memorial Prayer (1989) was a reworking of Shalom Aleichem's stories with a nod to Fiddler on the Roof.

Viktor Slavkin, the author of some well-crafted absurdist one-act plays, made his mark in large part thanks to Anatoly Vasilyev, a legendary director in the making, who staged the full-length, hyperrealistic A Young Man's Grown-Up Daughter (1979), which brings together old schoolmates who loved jazz and American culture and are bound by former conflicts and attachments, and Cerseau (1985), in which friends spend time at a dacha with mixed results. The closer Slavkin's characters clung to the minutiae of life, the farther they were distanced from meaning, satisfaction, and happiness. All of these writers' plays revealed glimpses of a society in the process of slow disintegration.

Parallel to this tendency were writers preserving the established Soviet model in dramatizations of moral, social, or political issues, although they, too, had their share of censorship problems. Mikhail Shatrov debuted in 1954 with plays about students and workers but is best known for his revisionist historical dramas: The Bolsheviks (1967), Thus Shall We Win! (1981), The Dictatorship of Conscience (1986), and The Peace at Brest-Litovsk (1987). The journalist Genrikh Borovik stirred passions with politically charged chronicles such as Interview in Buenos Aires (1975), on the events in Chile. Aleksandr Gelman, working in the genre of "industrial drama," had impact with Protocol of a Conference (1975), Back Channels (1977), and We, the Undersigned (1979).

Plays didactically exploring conflicts of ideology and conscience taking place in factories or at construction sites were the specialty of Afanasy Salynsky, Aleksandr Misharin, Ignaty Dvoretzky, Gennady Bokarev, Nikolai Miroshnichenko, and others. Significant sociologically, few had lasting artistic value. As a reaction, top directors such as Georgy Tovstonogov, YURY LYUBIMOV, Anatoly Efros, Lev Dodin, and Kama Ginkas often ignored traditional plays, staging instead dramatizations of prose and poetry. In his memoirs (Le feu sacré [Crowned Fire], 1985), Lyubimov explained he had "no intention of staging contemporary plays by authors who were distinguished above all by their mediocrity and their profound ignorance of the reality of the stage."

Perestroika, meaning "restructuring," entered the international vocabulary shortly after Mikhail Gorbachev ascended to power in 1985. His efforts to instigate social and political reform began slowly but eventually unleashed a demand for change that, in 1991, swept away Gorbachev, the Communist Party, and the Soviet Union as a nation. A turning point for the arts was the period of 1988–1989, when the censorship directives ceased to be enforced. As the upheavals of perestroika, with its policy of glasnost, or "openness," gripped Russia, Aleksei Shipenko became a cult figure by writing plays laced with irreverent cynicism and sexual and lexical freedom. Rock 'n' roll, which had been a semi-illegal, mostly underground activity, was treated in his The Observer (1981), The Death of Van Halen (1987), and Octopus's Garden (1990). Natural Governance in Shambala (1989) and From the Life of Kamikaze (1991) revealed an interest in Buddhism and experimental form. Shipenko became a prominent dramatist in Germany to which he immigrated in 1991, although his work has been neglected in Russia since then.

Venedikt Yerofeyev was a cult figure of the Period of Stagnation, famous for Moscow-Petushki, a philosophical prose poem about drunken rides on a commuter train that was dramatized with great success in the West as Moscow Stations in the 1990s. His wicked tragedy Walpurgis Night, or, the Steps of the Commodore (1985, produced 1989) depicted an asylum in which all of the inmates die.

A trio of women, Lyudmila Petrushevskaya, Lyudmila Razumovskaya, and Nina Sadur, bridged the gap dividing the Period of Stagnation from the new independent Russia that emerged after Boris Yeltsin became the first Russian president in 1991. Petrushevskaya, a short-story writer who had trouble being published, wrote some of the most resonant plays—often in one act—of the 1970s and 1980s: Music Lessons (1973, produced 1978), Cinzano (1973, produced 1978), Love (1974, produced 1981), and Three Girls in Blue (1980, produced 1985), among them. Harsh, if not cynical, in her plots dissecting the trivia of daily life and usually focusing on the plight of women, she employed a natural diction that prompted admirers to call her a poet of authenticity, while detractors accused her of recording conversations overheard in public toilets.

Razumovskaya was almost merciless in her exploration of women whose escape routes were cut. Dear Yelena Sergeyevna (1980), about a schoolteacher driven to suicide by corrupt students, her relentless modern version of Medea (1981, produced 1989), and Your Sister and Captive (1990, produced in FINLAND 1994), a reconsideration of the duel between Mary, Queen of Scots and Elizabeth I, were compelling modern tragedies. St. Vladimir Square (1994), the rocky love story of two aging, forgotten people, and Homeward (1995), about dark and light angels among eight children, moved away from the classical catharsis of her earlier work.

Sadur's short plays delved into mystical worlds inhabited by weirdos, fiends, and lowlifes: The Eccentric Woman (1982, produced 1987) observes two crotchety hags in a potato field; Ride On (1983, produced 1987) pits a suicidal man against an abusive train engineer who will not run his train over him; The Power of Hair (1984) records the conversations of a man's individual strands of hair as they observe his every move. Increasingly, Sadur wrote full-length original plays based on classical Russian sources, usually including evil spirits as key characters. These included Devilish Delights (also known as Pannochka, 1986), based on Gogol's "Viy," a supernatural tale of witches and demons in a church; Cathedral Folk (1992), based loosely on Nikolai Leskov's chronicle about the flawed inhabitants of a religious community; and Brother Chichikov (1996), a reworking of Gogol's Dead Souls that posits Chichikov as a Russian immigrant encouraged by a she-devil to return home to a country she assures him has changed.

NEW RUSSIAN DRAMA, 1991–PRESENT

The collapse of the Soviet infrastructure in the late 1980s and early 1990s, followed by unprecedented historical disclosures and rapid social change, briefly eclipsed the power of art to shock or entertain. People stayed home from theaters in droves to watch the high drama of history unfolding on television while the country's economic system ground to a halt. Meanwhile, paralysis set in among playwrights and critics of the older generation, most of whom had dreamed of freedom but did not know how to respond when it arrived. Some, like Gelman and Roshchin, ceased writing for years. Petrushevskaya returned to writing prose, now that she could be published. Shipenko emigrated. This situation was exacerbated as theaters raced to rediscover a century of neglected drama and patently ignored contemporary writers. Thus arose the great myth of the post-Soviet period, repeated obtusely into the early 21st century, that no one was writing plays of value.

In fact, many new writers appeared in the late 1980s, many more in the 1990s. Some, such as Nikolai Kolyada, Mikhail Ugarev, Yelena Gremina, Olga Mukhina, and Maksim Kurochkin, were destined to have substantial impact. Before that happened, several plays entered the public consciousness from various sources. Two of Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's four plays written between 1951 and 1960 debuted onstage: The Love-Girl and the Innocent (later titled The Republic of Labor, 1954, produced 1991) and The Victors' Feast (1951, produced 1995), a "comedy" about anti-Stalin sentiment in the army during World War II. The novelist and screenwriter Friedrich Gorenstein, living as an immigrant in Germany from 1980 to his death in 2002, contributed Infanticide (1985, produced 1991), a historical drama about Peter the Great's murder of his son. Sergei Kokovkin, an actor whose Five Corners (1981) established his reputation, had success with Come to Me (1989), a mystical drama about a mother whose daughter died at birth, and The Simpleton (1968, produced 1994), a parable about power, fear, deception, and freedom set in a theater. A pair of writers in their twenties debuted with two of the biggest hits of the time: Daniil Gink's Bald/Brunet (1991) observed the battles of an aging musician with his scornful, inner voice; Aleksei Burykin's Nijinsky (1993) offered a poetic meditation on the nature of genius and art.

By mid-decade, the gap between those writing and those claiming nothing was being written had grown enormous. Aleksandr Galin, who had huge success with Retro (1981), about lonely aging people, and Stars in the Morning Sky (1987), about prostitutes during the 1980 Moscow Olympic Games, updated the traditional genre of Soviet social drama with comedies depicting the clash of Russian and foreign cultures. Sorry (1992) brought a middle-aged man back to his former sweetheart in Moscow from emigration in Israel; The Title (1993) depicted a gold-digging Russian girl who marries an unsuspecting Italian; Anomaly (1997) examined puppeteers encountering Russian mafiosi who are propped up by foreigners; The Competition (1999) described a contest for Russian girls hoping to work in Singapore. Kolyada, a former actor who wrote his first play in 1986, had written thirty-seven by 1994 (sixty-eight by the year 2000), by which time he was famous not only in Russia but in Europe. In Murlin Murlo (1990), We are Riding, Riding, Riding to Distant Lands (1996), and Go Away, Go Away (1999), he explored people struggling with poverty, loneliness, and disillusionment. Within that atmospheric field he was among the first Russian playwrights to deal with homosexuality in The Slingshot (1993), about a war veteran abandoned by his mother, and The Oginski Polonaise (1994), in which a woman returns to visit Russia after immigrating to the United States. A tireless editor and educator, Kolyada has conducted an influential playwriting course in his hometown of Yekaterinburg since 1994. Several of his students have achieved international acclaim, including Oleg Bogayev with The Russian National Postal Service (1997), about a lonely pensioner hallucinating about meetings with historical figures, and Vasily Sigarev, whose Plasticene (2001), examining the violence and homosexuality a schoolboy encounters, and Black Milk (2002), portraying a bickering pair of con artists at a commuter train station, have had success in ENGLAND.

Nadezhda Ptushkina had written some fifty plays before her first, By the Light of Others' Candles (1995), a tightly woven TRAGICOMEDY pitting an aging literary critic against a carefree young woman, was produced. Her treatment of the biblical Rachel-Leah story, The Little Lamb (1996), catapulted her to stardom, which she has maintained with slick, titillating melodramas about the difficulties women face. Her As She Lay Dying (1998), a comedy of errors about a lonely middle-aged woman and her cantankerous old mother, was performed in over fifty Russian theaters in 2001. Others striking a nerve were Stepan Lobozyorov, whose comedy Family Portrait with Stranger (1992), about strife breaking out in a home when a stranger enters it, ran in forty-five Russian theaters in 1997; Aleksei Slapovsky, whose The Little Cherry Orchard (1993) spoofed the Russian underworld with a nod to Chekhov; and Pyotr Gladilin, whose plays invariably employ the fantastic, as in the tragicomic The Moth (2003), where a teenage soldier turns into a woman in order to avoid combat.

Gremina, who wrote her first play in 1984, broke through with Behind the Mirror (1994), a study of Catherine the Great falling in love with a young man at the age of fifty, and The Sakhalin Wife (1996), the account of prisoners on Sakhalin Island before a visit by Chekhov. Ugarov is the author of sensitive, witty plays that show a deep love for words and are often set in the past. Doves (1988, produced 1997) examined a young monk who became one of the False Dmitrys in the 17th century; The Newspaper "Russian Invalid," Dated July 18 . . . (1994) portrayed a man in prerevolutionary times who preferred not to leave his apartment; Deadbeat (1995) was an opaque, lyrical piece revealing secrets about a constellation of people; The Green Cheeks of April (1994, produced 1999) comically observed Lenin in the Swiss countryside before the Revolution. Ugarov's breakthrough was Oblomov (2002), an original play reinterpreting the 19th-century novel by Ivan Goncharov. In 2000, the husband and wife Gremina and Ugarov opened Teatr.doc, a playhouse that showcases the genre of verbatim or DOCUMENTARY DRAMA. Its first significant success was Ivan Vyrypaev's Oxygen (2002), a male-female dialogue about people seeking breathing room in the modern world, which quickly attracted attention throughout Europe.

In the late 1990s, the gap between popular and critical acceptance began closing. Instrumental in that development were Mukhina, Yevgeny Grishkovets, and Kurochkin. Mukhina's Tanya-Tanya (1996), a poetic, dreamy piece about loneliness and sexual energy running amok at a countryside dacha, was a watershed for marking the debut of a major writer and generating a groundswell of opinion refuting the myth that no one was writing plays. Her next work, YoU (1997), whose title punned on the Russian letter "yu" and the English personal pronoun, confirmed the presence of a significant new talent. This ambitious, enigmatic work observed the interaction of several generations of urban dwellers as an unidentified war raged around them. Grishkovets's How I Ate a Dog (1997), a monologue about a man's service in the navy, quickly made him something of a pop star.

Subsequent monologues about inept, adorable young men, including Simultaneously (1998) and Dreadnoughts (2001), about a man's fascination with battleships, developed his self-proclaimed genre of "new sentimentalism." He wrote The Notes of a Russian Traveler (1999), Winter (2000), about two lonely soldiers sent on a mission into the woods, and Planet (2001), about a man who cannot make contact with the woman he loves, for two-actor casts. Kurochkin, a native of Kiev who lives in Moscow and writes in Russian, burst onto the scene with Stalowa Wola (1998, produced 2001), the winner of the prestigious Russian Anti-Booker award for experimental drama in 1998. This unorthodox play, set near the Polish location of the title, identified Kurochkin's key characteristics: experimentation with anachronisms and cross-cultural themes in the form of epic myths. His Kitchen (2000), a poetic, phantasmagoric, and complex historical stew joining modern Russians and the heroes of the Nibelungenlied, was the most hotly debated drama of the post-Soviet period. Author of over a dozen plays, he has creatively adapted works by others: Imago (2002) recast GEORGE BERNARD SHAW's PYGMALION as a tale of a dump-dwelling woman overwhelming a pompous professor; In the Retina (2002) transformed a story by Sigizmund Khrzhizhanovsky about a man who becomes lost in the retina of his sweetheart's eye.

The opening of the Playwright and Director Center with Yelena Isayeva's biblical-based verse tragedy Judith (1998) marked a turning point, for now there was a venue dedicated to developing new writing. Run by veterans Roshchin and Aleksei Kazantsev, who established his reputation with the youth and family dramas Old Home (1978) and Anton and Others (1982), the Center helped launch many noteworthy playwrights, Sigarev, Kurochkin, and Ugarov among them. A production here of MARK RAVENHILL's Shopping and Fucking was of major importance. Others occasionally associated with the Center were Kseniya Dragunskaya, whose The Latest News in Menswear (1998), The Sensation of a Beard (2002), and The Apple Thief (2003) were atmospheric looks at women's experiences; and the Presnyakov Brothers, Oleg and Vladimir, whose Terrorism (2002), about the source of violence in society, and Captive Spirits (2003), an ironic comedy about the poets Aleksandr Blok and Andrei Bely, signaled the appearance of a new dramatic voice.

Several noteworthy writers remained outside the mainstream. Mikhail Volokhov, a Paris resident since the 1980s, delved into homosexuality, AIDS, drugs, and cannibalism in texts replete with obscenities, one of the last taboos in Russian artistic culture. His Playing Dead Man's Bluff (1988, produced 1994) and The Great Comforter (1996) were staged in Russia. The novelist Vladimir Sorokin plumbed similar territory in Dismorphomania (1995), a Romeo and Juliet takeoff set in an asylum, and Dostoevsky-Trip (1999), in which addicts pop pills named after Russian writers and have hallucinations based on their works. His Pel'meny (1990) was one of several works forming the basis for Lev Dodin's famous production Claustrophobia (1994).

Viktor Korkiya revived the rich tradition of verse plays based on historical or literary myths in The Mystery Man, or, I Am Poor Soso Dzhughashvili (1988), a farce about Stalin and his chief of the secret police Lavrenty Beria, and the lyrical Don Quixote and Sancho Panza on the Island of Taganrog (2001), observing mutations of Miguel de Cervantes's characters in Chekhov's hometown. The AVANT-GARDE director Klim (pseudonym of Vladimir Klimenko) imaginatively reworked Romeo and Juliet as Juliet and Her Romeo (1999) and the fictions of Carlos Castaneda as a searing hymn to the transformational powers of theater in The Active Side of Endlessness (2001).

[See also Futurism, Russian]

FURTHER READING

- Freedman, John. Moscow Performances: The New Russian Theater 1991–1996. Amsterdam: Harwood Acad. Pub., 1997.
- Green, Michael. The Russian Symbolist Theatre. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1986.
- Kasack, Wolfgang. Dictionary of Russian Literature Since 1917. Tr. by Maria Carlson and Jan T. Hedges. Bibliographical Revision by Rebecca Attack. New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1988.
- Law, Alma H., and C. Peter Goslett, eds. Soviet Plays in Translation. An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Graduate School and University Center of the City Univ. of New York, 1981.
- Leach, Robert, and Victor Borovsky, eds. A History of Russian Theatre. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.
- Rudnitsky, Konstantin. Russian and Soviet Theatre: Tradition and the Avant-Garde. Tr. by Roxane Permar. Ed. by Lesley Milne. London: Thames & Hudson, 2000.
- Russell, Robert. Russian Drama of the Revolutionary Period. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble, 1988.
- Segel, Harol B. Twentieth-Century Russian Drama from Gorky to the Present. Rev. ed. New York: Performing Arts Journal Pubs., 1993.
- Slonim, Marc. Russian Theater from the Empire to the Soviets. New York: Collier, 1961.
- Terras, Victor, ed. Handbook of Russian Literature. New Haven, Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1990.
- Varneke, B. V. History of the Russian Theatre, Seventeenth Through Nineteenth Century. Tr. by Boris Brasol. Rev. and ed. by Belle Martin. 1951. New York: Hafner, 1971.
- Zelinsky, Bodo, ed. Das russische Drama [The Russian drama]. Dusseldorf: Bagel, 1986.

John Freedman

DRAMATIC CRITICISM

There was little in the way of dramatic criticism in Russia before the late 19th century. The abolition of the Imperial Theatre Monopoly in 1882 gave rise to a proliferation of independent theaters and drama productions, one consequence of which was the appearance of the specialized theatrical journal. The late 19th century also saw the arrival of the professional drama critic, the way being led, during the 1880s, by Aleksandr Bazhenov and Apollon Grigor'ev, the latter editing the first magazine devoted exclusively to the theater, Antrakt (Intermission). Another leading figure was Sergei Flyorov, who led an assault on the old repertoire of the Imperial Maly Theatre and spoke out for the new naturalist drama. In this he was supported by Nikolai Efros, who published monographs on productions of ANTON CHEKHOV and MAKSIM GORKY at the MOSCOW ART THEATRE. Another important figure at the beginning of the 20th century was Aleksandr Kugel, who edited the magazine Teatr i iskusstvo (Theatre and Art) and who championed the symbolist drama, which was displacing the NATURALISM of dramatists such as Gorky.

After the revolution, the Communist Party took the theater and the role of the dramatic critic very seriously. It organized theatrical "sections" within government-controlled artistic organizations such as NARKOMPROS (an acronym for the People's Commissariat of Enlightenment), which was headed by ANATOLI LUNACHARSKY, himself no mean drama critic. Theater research faculties were established within artistic institutions in both Moscow and Leningrad in the comparatively liberal climate of the 1920s, but critical responses to productions were carefully monitored by the Party. Freedom of critical expression was gradually eroded during the late 1920s and 1930s, culminating in the foundation, in 1937, of the theatrical organ of the Soviet Ministry of Culture, Teatr (Theater), which published the opinions of officialdom on matters dramatic and theatrical.

The heyday of Soviet dramatic criticism was undoubtedly the 1920s, and outstanding among Moscow-based critics was Pavel Markov, who doubled as literary manager of the Moscow Art Theatre, and Boris Alpers, literary manager of the Theatre of the Revolution from 1921 to 1924. Markov published influential work on Soviet drama, the Moscow Art Theatre, and as late as the 1970s, four volumes of dramatic criticism. Alpers produced a groundbreaking study of VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD's theater, Teatr sotsialnoi maski (The Theatre of the Social Mask) in 1931 and wrote widely on 19th- and 20th-century Russian drama. The Petrograd (later Leningrad) branch of drama criticism was spearheaded by Aleksei Gvozdev, who specialized in the Western European repertoire and encouraged Soviet dramatists to learn from their non-Soviet counterparts. Another important critic based in Leningrad was Adrian Piotrovsky, a powerful advocate of nonprofessional theater who came into conflict with authority. If these critics were creative, the destructive power of the dramatic critic was apparent in the role played by Platon Kerzhentsev, a leading light of the Proletarian Culture (Proletkult) movement, who hounded suspect practitioners even to extinction.

Leading critics of the 1930s and 1940s included Grigory Boiadzhiyev, an expert on French drama, and Iosif Yuzovsky, who published important work on Gorky and socialist realist drama of a kind that caused him to fall foul of authority. Soviet productions of William Shakespeare were chronicled by Mikhail Morozov from the 1930s to the 1950s, his mantle descending to Aleksandr Anikst and, subsequently, to Aleksei Bartoshevich, who also wrote about English productions of Shakespeare for a Soviet readership.

Konstantin Rudnitsky was the outstanding drama critic of the postwar period, which also saw an unprecedented number of female practitioners enter the ranks, including Tat'yana Bachelis (his wife). Rudnitsky wrote a pioneering study in 1969 of the stage productions of Vsevolod Meyerhold, who had been rehabilitated in 1955, and he subsequently published several volumes of criticism on Soviet drama and practice. Among leading female critics of the period were Inna Solov'yova, Marianna Stroyeva, Yelena Polyakova, Anna Obraztsova (who also published studies of GEORGE BERNARD SHAW and OSCAR WILDE), and Natalya Krymova. More recently, Marina Dmitrievskaya founded the Peterburgsky teatral'ny zhurnal (Petersburg Theatrical Journal) in 1992, the thirty-second issue of which appeared during 2003. Her counterpart in Moscow, Valery Semenovskiy, established the journal Moskovskiy nablyudatel' (Moscow Observer), which survived from 1991 to 1998. In the year 2000 he also revived the journal Teatr, which had suspended publication during the 1990s.

Other recent influential figures have been Vladimir Frolov, whose The Falming Muse of Satire (Muza plamennoi satiry, 1988) rediscovered the work of DANIIL KHARMS, NIKOLAI ERDMAN, Andrei Platonov, and others; and Anatoly Smelyansky, who inherited Markov's post as literary manager of the Moscow Art Theatre and some of whose critical writings, like those of Rudnitsky, have appeared in English.

FURTHER READING

Khaichenko, G. A., ed. Istoriya sovyetskogo teatrovedeniya 1917–1941 [History of Soviet theatre studies 1917–1941]. Moscow: Nauka, 1981.

Markov, Pavel. The Soviet Theatre. London: Gollancz, 1934.

Morozov, Mikhail M. Shakespeare on the Soviet Stage. Tr. by David Magarshack, with an intro. by J. Dover Wilson. London: Soviet News, 1947.

Rudnitsky, Konstantin. Russian and Soviet Theatre: Tradition and the Avant-Garde. Ed. by Lesley Milne. Tr. by Roxanne Permar. London: Thames & Hudson, 1988.

Smeliansky, Anatoly. The Russian Theatre After Stalin. Tr. by Patrick Miles, with a foreword by Laurence Senelick. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.

Solov'yova, Inna. "The Theatre and Socialist Realism." In A History of the Russian Theatre. Ed. by Robert Leach and Victor Borovsky. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1999.

Nick Worrall

SET DESIGN

The 20th-century in Russia saw a revolution in stage design, perhaps unparalleled worldwide and inspired in its early decades by the antirealist experiments of European AVANT-GARDE artists, by the theories of Georg Fuchs, Adolphe Appia, and RICHARD WAGNER, by a renewed interest in the theaters of classical Greece, medieval Europe, and William Shakespeare, and by a rediscovery of popular performance techniques. But first and foremost, modern design represented a rejection of the standard 19th-century practice of reusing stock set pieces in favor of conceiving productions from scratch.

That idea was central to the work Viktor Simov, who between 1898 and 1906 designed every production at the MOSCOW ART THEATRE and was crucial to the evolution of its early style. Working in close collaboration with KONSTANTIN STANISLAVSKY, he pioneered stage NATURALISM in Russia, seeking by meticulous research and expeditions to make sketches and to collect authentic materials to create a faithful illusion of reality. He greatly advanced the conception of a setting as a lived-in space, though frequently suggesting the world beyond, and developed lighting to marry three-dimensional structures and painted features. But his designs for MAKSIM GORKY'S THE LOWER DEPTHS (1902) and for the works of ANTON CHEKHOV (1898–1904) were criticized for having swamped their content with excessive detail, and his attempts to recreate reality were soon at odds with both modernist trends in Europe and in Russia, with the aspirations of the World of Art Group, whose members (like Mstislav Dobuzhinsky and Aleksandr Golovin) sought to realize in the theater their ideals of life-made-art.

Dobuzhinsky's sets for A MONTH IN THE COUNTRY (1909), in which Stanislavsky first implemented his famous ACTING "system," stressed symmetry and balance in reflecting a central theme—man's desire to master nature—and, by creating a sense of containment, accorded with the director's desire to minimize movement and gesture and focus on inner emotions. For VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD'S production of Molière's Don Juan (1910), Golovin covered the orchestra pit with a semicircular apron, decorated a false proscenium with ornate borders in the motifs and colors of the fully illuminated auditorium, and by these means, enveloped the audience in the splendor of Louis XIV's Versailles. He similarly united stage and spectators for Mikhail Lermontov's Masquerade (1917), also directed by Meyerhold. The silent movement of exquisitely decorated drops, revealing lavish settings for each of ten episodes, suggested a remorseless progress toward death and delirium—a central theme of a production interpreted by some as a requiem for the Romanovs—and thus wedded form to meaning.

In the postrevolutionary era, when political fervor and governmental support for theater encouraged further experimentation, a similar fusion of form, space, structure, and rhythm was variously achieved by the Constructivists, like Aleksandra Ekster, Lyubov Popova, Varvara Stepanova, Aleksandr Vesnin, and the brothers Georgii and Vladimir Stenberg. Constructivism, inspired by industrial design and architecture, and by notions of a socialist world transformed by mechanization, marked a decisive shift from artist-painter to artist-builder.

For Aleksandr Tairov's production of OSCAR WILDE's Salomé (1917), Ekster created a complex cubist landscape, whose sculptural lines, like the varied textures, fabrics, and painted decorations of her costumes, harmonized rhythmically with the actors' movements. Mobile lighting and fluid red and blue drapes set the mood of each scene, reflecting Salomé's vacillating emotions. Her set for his Romeo and Juliet (1921)—a fractured structure of bridges, balconies, and cascading and fan-shaped steps—accentuated the swirling motions of actors, whose sumptuous, multilayered costumes were reflected in tin-foil mirrors. Popova, incorporating ladders, slides, and wind-mill sails in her freestanding, skeletal set, for Meyerhold's The Magnanimous Cuckold (1922), made space dynamic. Wheels turning at different speeds enhanced the acrobatic movement of actors, trained in his "biomechanics," and dressed in identical blue uniforms (prozodezhda). In his Tarelkin's Death (1922), Stepanova gave them uniforms decorated with lines and dots, which in their various groupings created living, rhythmic patterns. Her setting included mobile and portable pieces, a wheeled structure—part cage, part mincing machine—and furniture that produced unpredictable effects: a table that collapsed and sprang back, a stool that fired pistol shots. These "performing" props, at once comic and disturbing, underlined the theme of police torture and the overall effect of a terrifying circus.

In 1923 for Tairov's production of Phaedra Vesnin broke the stage floor into three steeply raked planes; crimson and gold drapes suggested the sails and rigging of a ship riding between sea and sky. Layered costumes, trailing capes, huge headdresses, and high-heeled cothurni complemented their wearers' statuesque movement, broad gestures, and exaggerated style. By contrast, in The Man Who Was Thursday (1923) he filled the whole proscenium opening with a multileveled structure, incorporating moving walkways, elevators, and flashing neon signs that accompanied the frenzied pace of the chase sequences. The Stenbergs' sets for Tairov's "EUGENE O'NEILL cycle" indicated locations sparsely but precisely, combining geometric outlines with realist detail. In THE HAIRY APE (1926) an oceanliner shown in cross section facilitated political critique by contrasting the elegance of the upper decks with the hell endured by stokers below. In DESIRE UNDER THE ELMS (1926), Abbie's petty, tragic life was contained by heavy pillars, in gloomy low-ceilinged rooms, and in ALL GOD'S CHILLUN GOT WINGS (1929) geometric shapes created dark, towering buildings at a crossroads between black and white ghettos.

Throughout Joseph Stalin's rule, such experimentation was discouraged and REALISM promoted as the model; the suppression of artistic freedom led to monotony and stagnation. Innovation reappeared, however, in the 1950s and 1960s. Valentin Lalevich, Nikolai Sasunov, Viktor Durgin, and Valerii Levental' defied the sacrosanct style of staging Chekhov in Anatolii Efros's controversial productions of THE SEAGULL (1966), THE THREE SISTERS (1967), and THE CHERRY ORCHARD (1975), and David Borovsky's work became a vital cog in YURY LYUBIMOV's theatrical machine at the Taganka. Incorporating central metaphors, his designs were at once simple and ingeniously multifunctional. Key props acquired the status of living beings: the now-legendary flying pendulum for Jerzy Stawinski's Rush Hour (1969), the moving curtain for Hamlet (1971), and the hallucinatory moving door for Crime and Punishment (1979).

Russian set design since has remained consistently innovative. Successive generations continue to experiment in the dual tradition of naturalism and overt THEATRICALITY, often acknowledging their debts by scenic "quotations."

FURTHER READING

- Aronson, Arnold. "The Scenography of Chekhov." In The Cambridge Companion to Chekhov, ed. by Vera Gottlieb and Paul Allain. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 2000. 134–148.
- Bowlit, John E. "Constructivism on the Russian Stage." Performance Arts Journal 1, no. 3 (Winter 1977): 62–84.
- . Russian Stage Design: Scenic Innovation 1900–1930. Jackson: Mississippi Museum of Modern Art, 1982.
- Gray, Camilla. The Russian Experiment in Art 1863–1922. Rev. ed. London: Thames & Hudson, 2000.
- Rudnitsky, Konstantin. Russian and Soviet Theatre: Tradition and the Avant-Garde. London: Thames & Hudson, 1988.
- Van Norman Baer, Nancy, ed. The Art of Enchantment: Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, 1909–1929. San Francisco: Fine Arts Museum of San Francisco, 1989.
- , ed. Theatre in Revolution: Russian Avant-Garde Stage Design 1913–1935. London: Thames & Hudson, 1991.

Ros Dixon

RUSSIAN SYMBOLIST DRAMA

Although Russian symbolist drama owes a debt to the earlier French and Belgian symbolist tradition of the lesedrama—plays primarily intended to be read rather than staged—it developed independently and exerted an enormous influence on both MODERNIST DRAMA and theater.

Russian symbolist drama may be said to begin in earnest with Valerii Briusov's article "Unnecessary Truth" (1902), in which the poet attacks the verisimilitude of realist and realistic theater, arguing instead for stylization. The plays that followed Briusov's manifesto betray an acquaintance with NATURALISM and also with HENRIK IBSEN, AUGUST STRINDBERG, GERHART HAUPTMANN, HUGO VON HOFMANNSTHAL, STANISŁAWA PRZYBYŚZEWSKA, and FRANK WEDEKIND, with the French symbolists, particularly Stéphane Mallarmé and Auguste Villiers d'Isle Adam, and with the Belgian MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Nonetheless, native Russian dramatic traditions, especially the humorous play (shutochnaia p'sa), proved more formative. Such playwrights as Vladimir Solov'ev and Koz'ma Prutkov (the latter being the fictional creation of Aleksei Tolstoy and the brothers Zhemchuzhnikov) employed devices later identified by the formalists as defamiliarization or estrangement (ostranenie), which revealed to the symbolists a more complex dramatic discourse. Whereas the discourse of European symbolist plays tends toward the monologic, Solov'ev and Prutkov demonstrated how boundaries between playwright, actor, and audience could be broken down.

The implications of this approach became apparent in the productions that the great director VSEVOLOD MEYERHOLD staged at the Komissarzhevskaja Theater in St. Petersburg and that included key symbolist plays, such as ALEKSANDR BLOK's A PUPPET SHOW (1906) and Fyodor Sologub's Triumph of Death (1907). The early plays are notable for their dualism, their grotesque admixture of high and low styles, and their incorporation of elements of various theatrical traditions, such as Greek TRAGEDY and the Italian commedia dell'arte. Harlequinades proved durable as evidenced by such works as Blok's The Unknown Woman (1906) and Mikhail Kuzmin's The Venetian Madcaps (1915).

Other symbolists approached drama from a different direction and sought the renewal of theater in the cathartic art of Greek classical tragedy and drama. Viacheslav Ivanov, in his plays Tantalus (1905) and Prometheus (1916), sought a renewal of Dionysian drama. The poet Innokenti Annenskii drew largely on the tradition of satyr plays for such lyrical dramas as Thamyros Kitharodos (1913). Others found inspiration in folk sources and in religious traditions, such as hagiography. Of particular note are Kuzmin's On Alexis, Man of God (1907) and Aleksei Remizov's Devil's Comedy (1907) and The Tragedy of Judas, Prince of Iscariot (1908).

Over time, many of the symbolists moved toward what Blok called "healthy REALISM," which often expressed itself in quasi-historical subjects. In such plays as Blok's Song of Fate (1908) and The Rose and the Cross (1913), Sologub's The Gift of the Wise Bees (1907), Vanka the Steward and Jehan the Page (1908), and Hostages of Life (1912), and Zinaida Hippus's The Green Ring (1914), the playwrights sought to make their plays work on a realistic plane as well as on a symbolic one.

The influence of Russian symbolist drama proved to be immense and affected a wide range of later playwrights, including YEVGENY SHVARTS and Marina Tsvetaeva and futurists including VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY. In their use of intimate forms, the symbolists paved the way for DANIIL KHARMS and the OBERIU (Association for Real Art, founded 1927). Although symbolist dramas themselves have exerted only a limited influence abroad, many of their techniques have become an integral part of the modernist vocabulary, thanks to the spread of Meyerhold's practices.

[See also Symbolism]

FURTHER READING

Clayton, J. Douglas. Pierrot in Petrograd: Commedia dell'Arte/Balagan in Twentieth-Century Russian Theatre and Drama. Montreal: McGill-Queen's Univ. Press, 1993.

- Gerould, Daniel. Symbolist Drama: An International Collection. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, 1985.
- Green, Michael, ed. and tr. The Russian Symbolist Theatre: An Anthology of Plays and Critical Texts. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1986.
- Kalbous, George. The Plays of the Russian Symbolists. East Lansing, Mich.: Russian Language Journal, 1982.
- Moeller-Sally, Betsy F. "The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904–1909." Slavic Review 57, no. 2 (Summer 1998): 350–371.
- Pyman, Avril. A History of Russian Symbolism. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1994.
- West, James D. Russian Symbolism: A Study of Vyacheslav Ivanov and the Russian Symbolist Aesthetic. London: Methuen, 1970.

Timothy C. Westphalen

RUTHERFORD AND SON

GITHA SOWERBY's three-act play Rutherford and Son premiered at a Court Theatre matinée in January 1912 and then transferred to two further London theaters, achieving 133 performances. Its American premiere was at Little Theatre, New York, in 1912. Following its broadcast on BBC radio in 1952, the drama was rediscovered in the 1980s and revived at the Royal National Theatre, London, in June 1994, in a production directed by Katie Mitchell and starring Bob Peck. It thus became one of the most successful plays of the historic decade of feminist theater interrupted by World War I. Like its predecessor at the Court, ELIZABETH ROBINS's play Votes for Women!, Sowerby's play featured "New Women" and engaged with the current debate over marriage, motherhood, and women's self-fulfilment, initiated in the theater by HENRIK IBSEN. However, although it was hailed at the time as a "suffrage play," Rutherford and Son does not deal directly with the agitation for the vote; its protagonists are not suffragettes. Unlike Robins, Sowerby emulated Ibsen's studies of the intense and suffocating domestic tyranny that seethed behind the suffrage campaign. Her originality lies in providing an enduring and remarkably astute analysis of capitalist patriarchy.

"Rutherfords" is a family firm, a Tyneside glass manufacturers, dominated by a despot who also runs his motherless family as a system based on financial bargaining and the control of power rather than on love. The plot demonstrates him bullying his three adult children and manipulating his foreman. He emasculates his sons and humiliates his daughter; alienated, they leave home for good. Ideologically colonized, his sister and foreman faithfully continue to submit to his domination. The one person to stand up to him is the modern outsider, his working-class daughter-in-law, who uses his baby grandson as a bargaining ploy to escape the grind of office work. Although Sowerby claimed that the story was “imaginary,” it clearly drew on her own background. Her father had run Sowerby and Co., a glass-manufacturing firm on Tyneside founded by his grandfather. The play’s striking REALISM is due partly to her ear for language, especially regional dialect, and to her bleak socioeconomic analysis but also to the credible subtlety of her portrait of the industrialist John Rutherford, to whom she attributes considerable charm, dynamism, and ingenuity, as well as ruthlessness.

It is fitting that the play should have been mentioned by Emma Goldmann in The Social Significance of Modern Drama (1914), though few would now agree with her judgment that “the Rutherfords are fighting a losing game.” Contemporary audiences are more likely to agree with critics like Linda Fitzsimmons and Sheila Stowell, who regard the play as a plea for the self-empowerment of women in the face of patriarchal tyranny. As Julie Holledge (1981) indicates, the most forceful speech is made by the spinster daughter, exiled for asserting her sexual independence by initiating a cross-class extramarital relationship with her father’s foreman. She denounces Rutherford as “a man that’d take the blood of life itself and put it into the works.”

FURTHER READING

- Gardner, Viv, and Susan Rutherford, eds. The New Woman and Her Sisters: Feminism and Theatre, 1850–1914. Hemel Hempstead: Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1992.
- Goldmann, Emma. The Social Significance of the Modern Drama. Boston: R. G. Badger, 1914.
- Holledge, Julie. Innocent Flowers: Women in the Edwardian Theatre. London: Virago, 1981.
- Sowerby, Githa. Rutherford and Son. In New Woman Plays, ed. by Linda Fitzsimmons and Viv Gardner. London: Methuen, 1991. 133–189.
- Stowell, Sheila. A Stage of Their Own: Feminist Playwrights of the Suffrage Era. Manchester: Manchester Univ. Press, 1992.

Claire M. Tylee

RYGA, GEORGE (1932–1987)

CANADA lost one of its most challenging, honest, and courageously committed writers when George Ryga passed away on November 18, 1987, in Summerland, British Columbia, from stomach cancer. Ryga did, however, leave an oeuvre impressive in its breadth: his published works consist of plays, television and radio scripts, films, novels, poetry, journal articles, and short stories. There are also a large number of works still unpublished, most of which can be found in the University of Calgary Archives. The subject matter of Ryga’s writing ranges widely, often dealing with his Canadian-Ukrainian heritage, but also coming from his travels in Europe, MEXICO, and CHINA, frequently delving into mythology. Further, Ryga left a legacy of resistance, for both in his work and in his life he strove to make constant challenges to provoke change for the better.

Ryga was born on July 27, 1932, in Deep Creek, a small Ukrainian farming community in Northern Alberta. His early education was in a one-room schoolhouse built when he was seven, and Ryga completed the eighth grade by the age of thirteen, despite the challenge of learning English. He went on to take correspondence courses, as well as to borrow books en masse from the University of Alberta. By fifteen he was writing regularly, and at sixteen his essay “Smoke” won him a scholarship to the Banff School of Fine Arts. After winning the scholarship for a second year he produced a poem critical of the Korean War and was not invited back for a third year by his sponsors.

Even later, Ryga was always known to find joy in his connection to the land. He relocated the family home to Summerland in the Okanagan valley of British Columbia so he could grow enough to feed his family while he wrote. In fact, the primary breadwinner of the household was his partner, Norma, while most of Ryga’s nonwriting income was from seasonal labor, such as fruit picking. This was made somewhat more difficult by the fact that Ryga was missing three of the fingers on his right hand from an adolescent workplace accident.

Ryga’s background most certainly played a part in his politics; as a young man he joined his father working with the Communist Party, though after seeing firsthand the effects of these politics in Eastern Europe, Ryga became more of a free-association socialist. He was what Antonio Gramsci referred to as an “organic intellectual”: an artist arising out of a particular context—in this case, a rural Canadian—who produces art that challenges the complacent norms of an unequal social hierarchy.

Ryga is best known for his play The Ecstasy of Rita Joe (1967). However, Rita Joe was not his most popular play; Grass and Wild Strawberries (1968) played to larger houses. Nor did Ryga consider Rita Joe his best play; A Letter to My Son (1981) was his favorite. What these works all have in common, though, is their focus on normally marginal members of society: the native in Rita Joe, the countercultural hippie in Grass, and the Ukrainian farmer in Letter.

SELECT PLAYS: Indian (1964); Nothing But a Man (1966); The Ecstasy of Rita Joe (1967); Grass and Wild Strawberries (1968); Just an Ordinary Person (1968); Compressions (1969); Captives of the Faceless Drummer (1971); Paracelus (1972); Sunrise on Sarah (1972); Portrait of Angelica (1973); Last of the Gladiators (1976); Ploughmen of the Glacier (1976); Seven Hours to Sundown (1976); Jeremiah’s Place (1978); Laddie Boy (1978); Prometheus Bound (1978); A Letter to My Son (1981); One More for the Road (1985)

FURTHER READING

Hoffman, James. The Ecstasy of Resistance: A Biography of George Ryga. Toronto: ECW Press, 1995.

Innes, Christopher. Politics and the Playwright: George Ryga. Toronto: Simon & Pierre, 1985.

Ryga, George. The Athabasca Ryga. Ed. by E. David Gregory. Vancouver: Talonbooks, 1990.

———. Summerland. Ed. by Ann Kujundzic. Vancouver: Talonbooks, 1992.

———. George Ryga: The Other Plays. Ed. by James Hoffman. Vancouver: Talonbooks, 2004.

University of Calgary Libraries. Special Collections Division. The George Ryga Papers: George Ryga fonds, Renée L. Paris fonds, George Ryga & Associates fonds. An Inventory of the Archive at the University of Calgary Archive. Comp. by Juanita Walton and Sandra Mortensen. Ed. by Marlys Chevrefils and Apollonia Steele. Calgary: Univ. of Calgary Press, 1995.

Derek Irwin

SAALBACH, ASTRID (1955–)

The things are not coherent. They happen in leaps and repetitions, in that strangely manic way, that can drive you completely crazy. It is illogic and untruthful to create a coherent form.

—Astrid Saalbach, 1986

Born on November 29, 1955, in Søborg, DENMARK, playwright Astrid Saalbach trained as an actor at the Danish National Theatre School from 1975 to 1978. She is one of the most significant playwrights of her generation, having been performed at the most important theaters, been honored with a number of rewards, and been translated into more than ten languages. She also writes novels and short stories.

Frailty, with almost neurotic fear of (inner) chaos and of loss, was from the beginning a leitmotif. Her style was to a high degree realistic, like in her stage debut in 1985 in The Invisible Town (Den usynlige by), about conflicts and tensions at an old people's home; this play implied a social criticism and caused a debate of how old people are being treated. As time went on, Saalbach changed her way of writing toward more scattered and metaphoric forms. Two examples are the BOTHO STRAUSS–like Morning and Evening (Morgen og aften, 1993), which became the first part of a trilogy about modern society, and The Blessed Child (Det velsignede barn, 1996), described by critic Jette Lundbo Levy writing for the newspaper Information as “an end-game in the shape of a mystery about the last decades of our civilization.”

Characteristic is the complexity of realistic and nightmare-like situations, criticism of culture, mythological fragments, and surrealistic episodes, and an almost literary language in the dialogues and monologues. The Cold Heart (Det kolde hjerte, 2001) is a modern version of The Little Match Girl by Hans Christian Andersen, but in Saalbach's work, the girl is a junkie who, just before dying, imagines herself at a royal court that resembles the actual Danish royal family. The play was criticized for being uninspired and mechanical in its satire. The End of the World (Verdens ende, 2003) is a dream-like story about a woman who gets lost in a world that has gone out of control.

Ashes to Ashes. Dust to Dust (Aske til aske. Støv til støv, 1998) is the most successful of her texts. It is a modern version of the Medea myth, combined with a crime plot based on a real murder story, and includes a number of scenes that in different ways relate to the function of the human brain. The story concerns the brain specialist Michael, his wife Charlotte, and their two children. They part, Michael begins a relation with his colleague Nina, but for the children's sake, Michael and Charlotte reunite. In the end Nina kills Charlotte and the children and sets fire to their house. This plot is intermingled with a number of situations that have no apparent relation to the linear story, in a constant playing with associations and layers of fiction, sometimes satirical, sometimes (sur)realistic. In the end some of these episodes seem to take place in the mind of Charlotte in the moment of her death.

PLAYS: Traces in the Sand (Spor i sandet, radio drama, 1981); The Confirmation (Bekræftelsen, radio drama, 1982); A World that Fades Away (En verden der blegner, television drama, 1984); The Dance Lesson (Dansetimen, 1986); The Invisible City (Den usynlige by, 1986); Myung (television drama, 1989); Time of the Miracles (Miraklernes tid, 1990); Morning and Evening (Morgen og aften, 1993); The Blessed Child (Det velsignede barn, 1996); Ashes to Ashes, Dust to Dust (Aske til aske, støv til støv, 1998); The Cold Heart (Det kolde hjerte, 2001); The End of the World (Verdens ende, 2003)

FURTHER READING

Bille, Karen-Maria. “Tradition without Context.” Danish Literary Magazine 6 (1994).
Szatkowski, Janek. “Afjord er du kommet” [From Dust You Have Come]. In Teaterlegeringer [Theatrical Alloyings], ed. by Andersen and Lehmann. Århus: Aarhus Universitetsforlag, 1998.
Theil, Per, and Lise Garsdal. Hvem der? Scener fra 90erne [Who's There? Scenes from the 90's]. Copenhagen: Høst og Søn, 2000.

Bent Holm

SADO KÔSHAKU FUJIN See MADAME DE SADE

LA SAGA DES POULES MOUILLÉES See SAGA OF THE WET HENS

SAGA OF THE WET HENS

Saga of the Wet Hens (La Saga des poules mouillées) is the first full-length play written by Québécois author JOVETTE MARCHESAULT. The first production of the play, directed by Michelle Rossignol, premiered at the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde in Montreal, CANADA, on April 24, 1981. The English version, translated by Linda Gaboriau, was staged at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre in February 1982.

A feminist fantasia set in the Promised Land in the North of the Americas, the play assembles four of Québec's celebrated women writers: Laure Conan, Germaine Guèvremont, Gabrielle Roy, and Anne Hébert. Together, they share life stories and speak of hardships endured under patriarchal institutions. They explore their most vivid dreams, their worst nightmares, and other products of a repressed feminine unconsciousness. Aroused by passionate discussion, the women partake in a voluptuous feast. Inverting the sexist rituals of the Last Supper, they sanctify those normally excluded from the event: women who bake the communion bread and prepare the festive meal. They pool creative energies and prepare to write a history of forgotten women. They cluck, spread their wings, and give birth to a new dynasty of wet hens.

Propelled by a central concern of feminists in the male-dominated art world of the 1970s and 1980s, Saga attempts to reclaim an occluded history of female creativity. Rather than subordinating these recovery efforts to a documentary-like search for historical truth, Marchessault eschews REALISM, turning instead to the saga, a narrative form that freely mixes the mythic and the real. Her play exhibits a structural openness; its nonlinear construction presents a series of tableau verses. Marchessault's use of language is densely imagistic, giving the play a lyrical quality. Although the poetic style of Saga draws upon familiar conventions in Québec theater, reviewers in English Canada have found it unnecessarily opaque. Several critics of the Tarragon production dismissed her imagery as confusing and weighty, revealing a potential anglocentric bias in their reception of the play.

In its exploration of women's mythology, Saga can be situated within a wider feminist movement that aimed to retrieve lost female archetypes and culture. The third verse, for example, is dedicated to Ursa Major, the Great Mother Bear and Mother of the Skies. The play was strongly influenced by Gloria Feman Orenstein's essay on the reemergence of the Great Goddess in the visual arts. To the contemporary critic, Marchessault's Goddess figures and her appeals to a generalized "women's culture" may look like a naive form of essentialism. Critics might see the play as reinforcing patriarchal associations of women with nature, especially when female creativity is linked to biology (menstrual blood and mother's milk). Yet the enduring value of Marchessault's play lies in this body-centered imagery. It aims to redress the abjection of women's bodies and to return to women their diverse physical desires. Saga appeals to a universal femininity; at the same time, it shows women's bodily liberation to be vital particularly in Québec, a province traditionally dominated by paternalistic Catholic values.

FURTHER READING

- Gaboriau, Linda. "Jovette Marchessault: A Luminous Wake in Space." Canadian Theatre Review 43 (Summer 1985): 91–99.
- Harris, Norma. "Magic of Wet Hens Misdirected." Globe in Mail (February 20, 1982): E9.
- Orenstein, Gloria Feman. "The Reemergence of the Archetype of the Great Goddess in Art by Contemporary Women." Heresies 2, no. 1 (Spring 1978): 74–84.

Laura Levin

SAINETE

A Spanish comedy of manners, usually in one act, a sainete depicts the life and customs of lower- and working-class characters. Historically, most sainetes have been set in the poor neighborhoods of southern Madrid, SPAIN, although works set in small villages or in rural Andalusia are not uncommon.

The sainete developed in the 17th and 18th centuries as a short piece to be played either during the intermission or at the conclusion of a larger dramatic work. The genre disappeared at the beginning of the 19th century as the taste for shorter pieces declined. The revival of the sainete in the last third of the 19th century was built on two cornerstones. The first was the development of the "theater by hours" system, wherein theater impresarios took to staging three or four shorter works per evening instead of one full-length play, thus allowing them to earn more money by charging separate admissions for each work. The second factor in this revival was the introduction of musical numbers into the sainete, introduced in 1880 when Federico Chueca contributed music to Ricardo de la Vega's Lola's Song (La canción de la Lola). These lyric sainetes used the music of cafés and dance halls, such as waltzes, polkas, and mazurkas, to reflect the popular ambiance depicted in the plays. The best known modern sainetes, such as Vega and Tomás Bretón's The Festival of Our Lady of the Dove (La verbena de la paloma, 1894) or José López Silva, Carlos Fernández-Shaw, and Ruperto Chapí's The Mischievous Lass (La Revoltosa, 1897), are of the lyric variety.

The form of the sainete used throughout the 19th century was modeled directly upon the 18th-century work of Ramón de la Cruz (1731–1794), the acknowledged master of the genre. The key feature of the sainete is that its dramatic impetus does not stem from either the plot or the characters of the play, but from its depiction of daily life and customs. Thus, the dramatic interest is in what otherwise would be termed local color: the use of language, especially slang terms and colloquialisms, details of dress, and depictions of local festivals. The characters are either stock types (the jealous suitor, the lecherous old man) or are defined by solely by their occupation (night watchmen, washerwomen, street vendors). In addition, the characters depicted are of humble stature: the action centers on the working class or the peasantry, while the bourgeoisie and the aristocracy turn up infrequently and usually as figures to be mocked. The plot is always comic and usually revolves around a simple romantic conflict. This emphasis on the depiction of the life of the lower classes often led 19th-century critics to equate the sainete with the naturalist movement in literature.

The popularity of the sainete declined in the period after 1910 as the theater by hours gave way once more to full-length plays. Nonlyrical sainetes virtually disappeared, while lyrical works increasingly resembled in form and content full-fledged ZARZUELAS: their length grew to encompass a full evening, and as a result plot and characterization began to take precedence over the traditional depictions of daily life.

FURTHER READING

- Barce, Ramón. "El sainete lírico (1880–1915)" [The Lyric Sainete (1880–1915)]. In La música española en el siglo XIX [Spanish Music in the Nineteenth Century], ed. by Emilio Casares Rodicio and Celsa Alonso González. Oviedo: Univ. of Oviedo, 1995. 195–244.

Espín Templado, María Pilar. El teatro por horas en Madrid (1870–1910) [The Theatre by Hours in Madrid, 1870–1910]. Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Madrileños, 1995.

Membrez, Nancy Jane Hartley. "The teatro por horas: History, Dynamics and Comprehensive Bibliography of a Madrid Industry, 1867–1922 (género chico, género ínfimo and Early Cinema)." Ph.D. diss., Univ. of California, Santa Barbara, 1987.

Clinton D. Young

SAINT FRANCES OF HOLLYWOOD

Described as "sledgehammer satire" when it premiered at Alberta Theatre Project's "playRites '94" festival in Calgary (February 5, 1994), SALLY CLARK's dark COMEDY Saint Frances of Hollywood dramatizes the life of Hollywood legend Frances Farmer (1913–1970). It ranks among Clark's most ambitious plays.

Following the premier, which featured Megan Leitch in the demanding title role, Clark rewrote the play for production at Toronto's Canadian Stage Theatre (January 17, 1996) with Thea Gill as Farmer. The new version was published by Talon books that year. The play continues to receive professional productions across North America; it often receives amateur and school productions as well, including productions at Edmonton's Walterdale Playhouse (April 25, 2001) and the University of Manitoba's Black Hole Theatre Company (March 11, 2003), owing in part to its lengthy character list, twenty-nine in all.

Through fifty-one quick-paced scenes, the partly biographical, partly fictional account traces Farmer's precocious childhood from the age of sixteen to a bitter "better-to-burn-out-than-fade-away" exit at fifty-six. The first act follows Farmer's meteoric rise to stardom in the 1930s with the GROUP THEATRE (Golden Boy, Thunder Rock) and on the silver screen (Come and Get It, Rhythm on the Range, Son of Fury); it then stages her falling out with the stage and film industries, the critics, and consequently, her controlling mother Lillian. The second act stages her controversial incarcerations at Washington's Western State Hospital at Steilacoom during the 1940s, where she underwent hydrotherapy, electroshock treatments, and likely a lobotomy. It concludes with Farmer's bewildered appearance on the quiz show, This Is Your Life, and her death alongside her later-life partner, Jean Ratcliffe.

Clark's play explores the suspicion that Farmer's repeated incarcerations were more than just products of a chauvinistic film industry sick of dealing with a strong-willed leading lady, or even the inability of Farmer to cope with the roller coaster of celebrity status. Rather, they were part of a government conspiracy to take out of the public eye a woman whose one-time trip to Russia and associations with The Group forever implicated her among subversive communist influences in America. The play unapologetically explores the ludicrous and life-threatening pressures of public scrutiny, as well as the pressures placed upon Farmer by her "celebrity mom," who signed her daughter's commitment papers.

Clark portrays Farmer as a strong-willed saint who fought for her blond-bombshell heroines to speak their minds, even when producers and scripts demanded otherwise. She paid the ultimate price: the erasure first of her will (in rehearsals and film shoots), then of her body and mind (in experimental therapy), and finally of her life.

In dealing with what Clark calls the "primary obsessions of the 20th century—atheism, Communism, media manipulation, and psychiatry," Saint Frances of Hollywood suggests that the "modern Saint" is one whose faith is in herself, fighting against blind authority to the end. Everyone has had "one of those days"; Frances Farmer had one of those lives.

[See also Canada]

FURTHER READING

Friedlander, Mira. "Saint Frances of Hollywood." Variety (February 26 to March 3, 1996): 181.

Garebian, Keith. "Fraught with Background." Books in Canada 27, no. 4 (May, 1998): 24.

Wagner, Vit. "Frances Farmer Saga Stirs Emotions." Toronto Star (January 21, 1996, final ed.): F7.

Robin C. Whittaker

SAINT JOAN

Saint Joan: A Chronicle Play in Six Scenes, and an Epilogue, by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, was written and first performed at the Garrick Theater, New York, in 1923. The first performance in ENGLAND was at the New Theatre, London, in 1924. As early as 1913 Shaw had announced his intention to "do a Joan play some day" in a letter from Orleans to Mrs. Patrick Campbell. Frequent uses of Joan of Arc as an icon in pre-World War I suffragette agitation, together with her beatification in 1909 and canonization in 1920, had raised the level of public interest in her in the years leading up to the composition of Saint Joan.

The play gained immediate acclaim. In a notice of the first New York production, Italian dramatist LUIGI PIRANDELLO declared it "a work of poetry from beginning to end." English critic J. I. M. Stewart later described Saint Joan as "certainly Shaw's outstanding play, conceivably the finest and most moving English drama since The Winter's Tale or The Tempest." Dissenting voices about the merits of the work in the 1920s included that of T. S. ELIOT, who subsequently, however, admitted that he may have been influenced by Shaw in the writing of his own play MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL. The international success of the play was probably a factor in the decision to award Shaw the 1925 Nobel Prize for Literature.

Shaw described his treatment of the story of the 15th-century warrior-saint as a portrayal of "the romance of her rise, the tragedy of her execution, and the comedy of the attempts of posterity to make amends for the execution." In the composition of the play, Shaw drew extensively on translations of the records of Joan's trial in T. Douglas Murray's Jeanne d'Arc (1902). The dramatic action follows Joan's fortunes from securing permission to visit the Dauphin and his granting her the leadership of the French forces against the English, to her capture, trial, and burning at the stake in Rouen. The mainly comic Epilogue shows Joan and a procession of others visiting the Dauphin in a dream, twenty-five years after her execution, when, ironically, her sentence had been set aside.

The play counters sentimental and melodramatic 19th-century fictional accounts of Saint Joan, while at the same time borrowing structural patterns found in previous popular dramatizations of her legend. In the early scenes Shaw presents Joan as pert, forthright, energetic, and managing, but as the play develops he provides her with a powerful and authoritative voice, as in her final speech in Scene V and in many of the speeches during her trial at Rouen (which is the subject of Scene VI). In reference to her reliance on direct inspiration from God and her clash with established ecclesiastical authority, Shaw associated Saint Joan with the dawning of Protestantism.

A controversial feature of the play is the partly sympathetic treatment of the Catholic Inquisition: one of Shaw's most conspicuous departures from history is apparent in the portrayal of the Bishop of Beauvais, Pierre Cauchon, whom the play treats as far more benevolently motivated toward Joan than historical records indicate. But such criticism does not detract from the strength of the work as an imaginative interpretation of Joan's story and as an exploration of the self-justifying strategies of human systems of authority.

FURTHER READING

Bertolini, John. "Imagining Saint Joan." In Shaw's Plays in Performance.

Shaw: The Annual of Bernard Shaw Studies, 3, ed. by Daniel Leary. Philadelphia: Pennsylvania State Univ. Press, 1983.

Gibbs, A. M., ed. "Man and Superman" and "Saint Joan": A Casebook. London: Macmillan, 1992.

Stewart, J. I. M. Chapter on Shaw. In Eight Modern Writers, Oxford History of English Literature, vol. 12. Oxford: Oxford Univ. Press, 1963.

Tyson, Brian. The Story of Shaw's "Saint Joan". Kingston and Montreal: McGill-Queen's Univ. Press, 1982.

A. M. Gibbs

UNE SAISON AU CONGO See A SEASON IN THE CONGO

SAKATE YŌJI (1962–)

Sakate Yōji, Japanese playwright, was born in Okayama and majored in Japanese literature at Keio University in Tokyo. His lineage in the fourth generation of post-1960 "little theater"

(ANGURA AND SHŌGEKIJŌ) playwrights is clear. As a student he joined the theater group Transposition 21 (Ten'i 21), founded by Yamazaki Tetsu, a key member of the second generation, who had begun his career with the Situation Theatre (Jōkyō Gekijō) of KARA JŪRŌ, stalwart of the first generation. Sakate was influenced by Yamazaki's journalistic style of theater, which dramatized actual events. He established his own company, Phosphorescence Troupe (Rinkōgun), in 1983.

Sakate's approach is partly shaped by the considerable anxiety in JAPAN sparked by several unsettling events: the 1991 Gulf War, Japan's "bubble economy" that burst later that year, the Great Hanshin Earthquake, and the Aum Shinrikyō sarin gas incident in 1995, among others. He is also reacting to a strain of the third generation, embodied in the noisy, frenetic plays of NODA HIDEKI and others in the 1980s, who had turned the humor and youth-oriented topics of their second-generation mentor TSUKA KŌHEI into virtual manga (comic books) on stage. Their approach, Sakate felt, was devoid of social relevance and had worn thin. He opted for calmer expression, anchoring his plays in historical events and social trends to encourage consideration of current, often delicate, public issues.

For example, the bombing of a Korean Airlines plane informs Tokyo Trial (Tōkyō Saiban, 1988), a lesbian discovering her identity propels Come Out (Kamu Auto, 1989), and problems of the U.S. military in Okinawa underlie Demise of the Okinawa Milk Plant (Okinawa Miruku Puranto no Saigo, 1998). He links the issues of garbage disposal and the Aum Shinrikyō cult in Breathless (Buresuresu), which won the Kishida Kunio Drama Prize in 1991. In Epitaph for the Whales (Kujira no Bohyō, 1993), Sakate dramatizes a touchy subject in Japan, where forced compliance in 1988 to a worldwide whaling ban was considered unfair. The play's structure adapts a traditional nō technique, the principal action occurring within a dream of Ikkaku, youngest brother of a whaling family. In the dream, Ikkaku's brothers, who died when their ship sank, return and reflect on their lives. Regarding themselves as the transformed bodies of whales, the brothers lay bare their plight: if they cannot hunt whales, who are they? Under-scoring their common identity, Ikkaku states that humans and whales are the only mammals that commit suicide. As his dream ends, his brothers revert to the sea as whales. Sakate thus treats the demise of whaler and whale equally.

Sakate attempts to recover social relevance by even-handedly giving voice to all parties, oppressed or not, and exposing injustices. Still, his work is less overtly political than eminently dramatic; he is known as an outstanding storyteller. And in plays like Come Out, Breathless, and Epitaph, Sakate questions the very nature of theater and reveals a metatheatrical vision. Theater should not conform to what society condones but should instead transform the spectator, bound by set social assumptions, into a new sense of self—a transformation absolutely required, he is convinced, for theater to be even minimally dramatic.

SELECT PLAYS: A Dangerous Story (Kiken na Hanashi, 1988); Tokyo Trial (Tōkyō Saiban, 1988); Come Out (Kamu Auto, 1989); Breathless (Buresuresu, 1991); The Capital of the Kingdom of the Gods (Kamigami no Kuni no Shuto, 1993); Epitaph for the Whales (Kujira no Bohyō, 1993); Sōseki and Hearn (Sōseki to Haan, 1997); The Boiling Point of the Sea (Umi no Futen, 1998); Demise of the Okinawa Milk Plant (Okinawa Miruku Puranto no Saigo, 1998)

FURTHER READING

Nihon Kindai Engeki-Shi Kenkyūkai, ed. Nijusseiki no Gikyoku III: Gendai Gikyoku no Henbō [Twentieth-Century Plays III: The Metamorphosis of Modern Japanese Plays]. Tokyo: Shakai Hyōronsha, 2002.

Sakate, Yōji. Buresuresu/Kamu Auto [Breathless/Come Out]. Tokyo: Jiritsu Shobō, 1991.

———. Epitaph for the Whales [Kujira no Bohyō]. Tr. by Yuasa Masako. In Haifa Century of Japanese Theater I: 1900s Part 1, ed. by Japan Playwrights Association. Tokyo: Kinokuniya, 1999. 103–172.

Senda, Akihiko. Nihon no Gendai Engeki [Contemporary Theatre of Japan]. Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1995.

John K. Gillespie

SAKHARAM BINDER

In 1972 when VIJAY DHONDOPANT TENDULKAR wrote Sakharam Binder, the Marathi (INDIA) theater audience revered the institution of marriage and considered sexuality a taboo subject. The obedient, subservient wife sacrificing her life for the well-being of her errant husband, children, and family was a popular character on the Marathi stage. Sakharam Binder broke this tradition.

The play revolves around Sakharam, a binder by profession and a Brahmin by caste. Sakharam ridicules the institution of marriage: the fake respectability of married men and their double standards as they cheat on their wives. He is unmarried and frankly admits that he is a whoremonger and a drunkard. But he is honest and his logic is simple: a man needs sex and housekeeping, a woman needs security. Marriage legitimizes these needs, but it creates gutless men who cheat on their wives. There is no chance for a man to be honest in marriage. So Sakharam rejects marriage in favor of a system of contractual cohabitation with single deserted women. He expects his women to be subservient to him as the owner of the house, to live with him as a wife, and to provide him with every service, including sex—an expectation disturbingly similar to the advice a Hindu bride would get. There is no emotional involvement whatsoever. His expectations are, in fact, no different from traditional Hindu husbands. But unlike a Hindu husband, he does not impose anything on the women. Then two women enter his life: Laxmi, a typical religious Hindu wife who has been deserted by her husband, and Champa, the rebel wife of an impotent police constable whom she has deserted out of sheer contempt. The violent passions that arise out of fanatic religiosity, sexual possession, and violent jealousy weave a terrible net that catches Sakharam.

Tendulkar inverts the stereotypes of the weak, docile, and religious housewife (a role-model for a high-caste Hindu woman) and the sexually hungry, unruly wife (a detestable “Other”). The meek housewife Laxmi reduces Sakharam to impotence and manipulates him into killing Champa, while Champa’s aggressive physicality and drunken bouts actually hide a sympathetic and anguished heart. Champa’s death, however, seems inevitable.

Sakharam Binder seriously threatened middle-class morality, and that, combined with the violence on stage, the image of a woman drinking, and the obscenity of the dialogue, brought a storm of protest from the Censor Board and from audiences.

FURTHER READING

Bhalla, Neela. Ghasiram Kotwal: Essays and Annotations. Delhi: Worldview Publications, 2002.

Gokhle, Shanta. Playwright at the Centre: Marathi Drama from 1843 to the Present. Calcutta: Seagull, 2000.

Pandey, Sudhakar, and Freya Barua, eds. New Directions in Indian Drama. Delhi: Prestige Books, 1994.

Tendulkar, Vijay. Collected Plays in Translation. Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 1983.

———. Vijay Tendulkar. Delhi: Katha, 2002.

Maya Pandit

SALACROU, ARMAND (1899–1989)

One of the most successful French playwrights of the 20th century, Armand Salacrou, born on August 9, 1899, in Rouen, FRANCE, wrote over thirty plays, which were performed in both AVANT-GARDE and commercial theaters over nearly fifty years and were directed by the most notable directors of the period, including Aurélien Lugné-Poe, Jean-Louis Barrault, and Charles Dullin (who directed and acted in several of his premières). From his early surrealist-inspired short works, such as The Plate Breaker (Le Casseur d'assiettes) and The Glass Ball (La Boule de verre) (which was the basis and inspiration for ANTONIN ARTAUD’s JET OF BLOOD), to his later plays, Salacrou shared the driving existential concerns of younger contemporaries such as JEAN-PAUL SARTRE and JEAN ANOUILH. His plays, distinguished by outstanding technical skill, dramatize the plight of individuals caught between metaphysical pessimism, liberal humanism, and individual desire.

Salacrou’s work reflects his lifelong attempt to reconcile personal freedom and sociopolitical commitment, an awareness of the absurd, and a need for meaning. Having decided at an early age (after reading a scientific explanation of the universe) that God did not exist, Salacrou was determined to find direction for his life and was drawn to both artistic creation and engagement with leftist politics. As a youth before World War I, he wrote for the socialist paper L’Humanité and for the communist Internationale. However, after swiftly making a small fortune with an advertising company in the 1930s, he just as quickly sold the business to devote the whole of his life not to politics, but to playwriting. After a brief period in the armed forces in World War II, he worked for the underground Resistance press alongside Sartre.

His plays vary in dramatic form according to their central thematic concerns, resulting in an oeuvre that employs theatrical modes as diverse as SURREALISM, FARCE, NATURALISM, vaudeville, EXPRESSIONISM, and psychological REALISM. Some plays, such as the masterly Histoire de rire, begin as sharp, spirited farces, but they inevitably have undercurrents of excruciating ontological uncertainty that bring them closer to AUGUST STRINDBERG than to NOËL COWARD. The Unknown Woman of Arras (L'Inconnue d'Arras) splinters linear time in expressionistic fashion by dramatizing the fraction of a second in a man's mind before the bullet he has just fired enters his brain. Poof, an enormously successful comédie-ballet, reflects Salacrou's own short commercial career in the story of a salesman who discovers the secret of advertising, rises to the top of the business, and then, unable to live in a world he has marketed successfully, leads the campaign for his own downfall. Nights of Wrath (Les Nuits de la colère), demonstrating the social perspective of BERTOLT BRECHT and the theatrical awareness of LUIGI PIRANDELLO, dramatizes characters in the French resistance movement evaluating the ultimate significance of their lives.

Trapped by the insoluble dilemma of the need for faith and the inability to believe, Salacrou's characters wrestle with the attempt to create a stable identity, always undermined by a reliance on others to remain stable themselves. A reluctant belief in determinism, a painful desire for purity, intense sexual jealousy, and a pervasive comedic anguish populate Salacrou's thematically consistent and distinctive oeuvre. He died on November 23, 1989, in Le Havre.

PLAYS: Accessory Store (Magasin d'accessoires, c. 1923); Circus Story (Histoire de Cirque, 1923); The Plate Breaker (Le Casseur d'assiettes, 1923); The Thirty Tombs of Judas (Les Trente Tombes de Judas, 1923); The Glass Ball (La Boule de verre, 1924); The Bridge of Europe (Le Pont de l'Europe, 1925); Shore Leave (Tour à terre, 1925); Patchouli, or, the Disorders of Love (Patchouli, ou Les Désordres de l'amour, 1927); Atlas Hotel (Atlas-Hôtel, 1929); The Frenzied Ones (Les Frénétiques, 1929); The Good Life (La Vie en rose, 1931); A Free Woman (Une Femme libre, 1933); Poof (1933); The Unknown Woman of Arras (L'Inconnue d'Arras, 1935); A Man Like the Others (Un Homme comme les autres, 1936); The World Is Round (La Terre est ronde, 1937); When the Music Stops (Histoire de rire, 1939); Marguerite (La Marguerite, 1941); The Fiancés of Le Havre (Les Fiancés du Havre, 1942); The Soldier and the Witch (Le Soldat et la sorcière, 1943); The Lenoir Archipelago, or, One Must Not Touch Immobile Things (L'Archipel Lenoir, ou Il ne faut pas toucher aux choses immobiles, 1945–1947); Nights of Wrath (Les Nuits de la colère, 1946); Why Not Me? (Pourquoi Pas Moi? 1947); God Knew It, or, Life Isn't Serious (Dieu le savait, ou La Vie n'est pas sérieuse, 1950); No Entry, or, The Ages of Life (Sens Interdit, ou Les Âges de la Vie, 1952); God's Guests (Les Invités du Bon Dieu, 1953); Too Honest a Woman, or, It's All in the Way You Say It . . . (Une Femme trop honnête, ou Tout est dans la façon de le dire, 1953); The Mirror (Le Miroir, 1954); Boulevard Durand (1959); Like Thistles (Comme les chardons, 1964); The Black Street (La Rue noire, 1966)

FURTHER READING

- Hobson, Harold. French Theatre Since 1830. London: John Calder, 1978.
 Knowles, Dorothy. French Drama of the Inter-War Years. London: George G. Harrap & Co. Ltd., 1967.
 Looseley, David. A Search for Commitment: The Theatre of Armand Salacrou. Exeter: Univ. of Exeter Press, 1985.
 Sileniek, Juris. Themes and Dramatic Forms in the Plays of Armand Salacrou. Lincoln: Univ. of Nebraska Studies, 1967.
 Ubersfeld, Annie. Armand Salacrou: Textes de Salacrou, points de vue critiques, témoignages, chronologie, bibliographie, illustrations [Armand Salacrou: Texts by Salacrou, Critical Viewpoints, Testimonies, Chronology, Bibliography, Illustrations]. Paris: Seghers, 1970.

Kimberly Jannarone

SALVATION NELL

Salvation Nell opens with an unforgettable depiction of Sid McGovern's Empire Bar, a dive in New York City's Hell's Kitchen. When it premiered in 1908, American audiences had never before witnessed such a destitute scene or characters. Penned by young playwright EDWARD SHELDON, Salvation Nell contributed to the rise of REALISM on the American stage. Perhaps EUGENE O'NEILL said it best when he wrote that Salvation Nell "first opened my eyes to the existence of a real theater" (Barnes, 1957).

In the midst of this lower-class bar culture, Nell works scouring floors and emptying spittoons. Nell's boyfriend, Jim, becomes jealous of the men in the bar, and in a drunken rage beats a man to death. Consequently, Nell loses her job. With Jim in jail, she and her unborn baby become homeless. Desperate, Nell considers a job in a nearby brothel. Just as Nell descends into the underworld, Maggie from the Salvation Army intervenes. At the crossroad between vice and salvation, Nell chooses the latter and becomes known as Salvation Nell.

For eight years, Nell struggles as a single mother while working for the Salvation Army. Released from prison, Jim appears at Nell's apartment with foolish plans to make quick money. When Nell refuses to be a part of his criminal life, he strikes her and flees. In spite of Jim's violence, Nell does not lose hope. The play concludes with a moving speech by Nell in which she proclaims that love "always forgives an' waits with open arms fer every wanderin' sinner to come an' know the joy that lasts for all eternity!" Hearing these words, Jim seeks salvation and reconciles with Nell.

Scenic designers Ernest Gros and Frank Dodge also shaped the pioneering realism in Sheldon's text. Some critics claimed that Salvation Nell's realistic scenery had surpassed well-known director DAVID BELASCO's creations. Producer Harrison Grey Fisk, utilizing an almost photo-documentary approach, bought Sid Empire's bar in Hell's Kitchen and literally reassembled it on stage. Similarly, the design team achieved the much-celebrated recreation of Cherry Street tenement dwellings by photographing the slum area and meticulously copying it onstage. The elaborate set decoration, with real fire escapes, lampposts, and hung laundry, took over twenty-four hours to assemble.

Some reviews suggested that Salvation Nell's realistic artistry surpassed photography. Still others critiqued the play precisely because it was too realistic, calling it "slum realism" (Corbin, 1909). But if the play did portray the lower depths, it had an allure for upper-class audiences, who, as one article put it, took delight in "go[ing] slumming" (Review of Salvation Nell, Everybody's Magazine 20 [1909], 420.) Salvation Nell enjoyed a successful run of seventy-one performances and was subsequently chosen as the best play of 1908 by John Gassner.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

Barnes, Eric Wollencott. The High Room: A Biography of Edward Sheldon.

London: W. H. Allen, 1957.

Cohn, Art. "Salvation Nell: An Overlooked Milestone in American Theatre." Educational Theatre Journal 9 (1957): 11–22.

Corbin, John. "The Drama of the Slums." Saturday Evening Post (March 20, 1909): 15.

Dale, Alan. "Mrs. Fiske at Her Best—Play Held Audience Amazed." New York American (December 5, 1908).

"Salvation Nell": A Theatrical Report on Life in the Slums." New York Times (November 22, 1908): V1:7.

Katie N. Johnson

SAMFUNDETS STØTTER See PILLARS OF SOCIETY

SÁNCHEZ, FLORENCIO (1875–1910)

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, in 1875, Florencio Sánchez is inextricably linked with the origins of Argentine theater. Frustrated with the political confrontations between blancos (whites) and colorados (people of color) that plagued his native country, he sought temporary refuge in BRAZIL, where he supported the uprising of a leader of the Partido Blanco (White Party) against the Uruguayan government.

Beginning in 1900, he took up residence in Buenos Aires and became a leading figure in the city's bohemian circle. It was among this group that he expounded the libertarian ideals that he would try to capture shortly thereafter in his dramatic work. Sudden success came in 1903 with My Son the Doctor (M'hijo el doctor), in which explored the generational conflict between the father (Olegario) and his son (Julio). The father espouses an unbending traditional morality typical of the Creole farmer that clashes sharply with the liberalism of the son, who is anxious to elude individual responsibility.

Notable among his other rural dramas is The Hill Down There (Barranca Abajo), the tragic story of the elderly Zoilo, who loses his land, his honor, his family's respect, and ultimately his life. In this way, Sánchez comments upon the inevitable dissolution of the old modus vivendi of the gaucho in the countryside of the Río Plata. In The Foreigner (La Gringa), he sounds a note of optimism with the final reconciliation that occurs between Creole natives (Cantalicio) and immigrants (Nicola), precipitated by the love of their respective children, Próspero and Victoria.

The issue of immigration is seen in his pieces that are set in cities, such as The Eviction (El desalojo). Occasionally, as well, he paints dramatic portraits of urban plight and life under conditions of extreme poverty—Canillita, Marta Gruni, and False Money (Moneda falsa). In other instances, Sánchez describes the economic decline of the middle class and the moral degradation that results from it. Such is the case in In Family (En familia), detailing the fruitless struggles of a quixotic son to save his family from disaster. To a lesser extent, The Dead (Los Muertos) also portrays a topsy-turvy home, with the father demoralized by alcoholism and a finale marked by a violence that is rare among the Uruguayan's dramatic work. Our Children (Nuestros hijos), on the other hand, denounces the cynical submissiveness to social conventions on the part of the well-to-do with such paroxysm that it seems to undercut the playwright's very thesis.

With considerable creative energy and social values inspired by Anarchist trends, Sánchez was ARGENTINA's prodigal son of his era. He deftly expressed an unparalleled realist style and thereby liberated the drama of the Río Plata from the inoffensive costumbrismo (customs and manners) in which it had been mired for so long. Attentive to the injustices of his era, he nevertheless maintained a certain faith in progress—undoubtedly the product of positivist convictions that were soon to be embraced by many others. Ultimately, Sánchez's influence proved fundamental to the development of Argentine theater. A handful of his plays, written with a deliberate urgency and force, had enough of an impact that the first decade of the 20th century came to be known as "the golden age of native theater." Sánchez died of tuberculosis—far from his beloved Río de la Plata—in Milan, ITALY, at the end of 1910.

PLAYS: Canillita (1903); My Son, the Doctor (M'hijo el doctor, 1903); The Foreign Girl (La gringa, 1904); Poor People (La pobre gente, 1904); The Dead (Los muertos, 1905); Down the Cliffs (Barranca abajo, 1905); With Family (En familia, 1905); Health Rights (Los derechos de la salud, 1907); Our Children (Nuestros hijos, 1907); Marta Gruni (1908)

FURTHER READING

Giusti, Roberto. Florencio Sánchez: Su vida y su obra [Life and Works].

Buenos Aires: Agencia Sudamericana de Libros, 1920.

Imbert, Julio. Florencio Sánchez: Vida y creación [Life and Works]. Buenos Aires: Schapire, 1954.

- Murena, H. A. "La pugna contra el silencio: Florencio Sánchez" [The Struggle against Silence: Florencio Sánchez]. La El pecado original de América [America's Original Sin]. Buenos Aires: Sur, 1954.
- Richardson, Ruth. Florencio Sánchez and the Argentine Theatre. New York: The Hispanic Institute in the United States, 1933.
- Rojas, Ricardo. "El teatro de Florencio Sánchez." Nosotros V, no. 27 (April 1911).
- Viñas, David. Prologue to M'hijo el doctor. Buenos Aires: Huemul, 1964.

Norberto Cambiasso (Tr. by Gabriel Milner)

SANCHIS SINISTERRA, JOSÉ (1940–)

José Sanchis Sinisterra, born on June 28, 1940, in Valencia, SPAIN, is one of the most renowned Spanish playwrights of the last quarter of the 20th century. In his multifaceted career he has performed the various roles of director, professor, speaker, researcher, collaborator, and promoter of theatrical publications dedicated to theater and culture in general. A writer in constant process of renewal, Sanchis Sinisterra has pursued an ideologically novel theater discourse that is consistently concerned with formal expression and the construction of the dramatic text. Key influences on his work have been theoretical movements such as the Aesthetics of Reception as well as HAROLD PINTER's concept of ludic theater. Sanchis Sinisterra invites the spectator to participate through the imaginary, thereby modifying theatrical codes of spectatorial reception. His plays are sophisticated negotiations of popular consumerist productions and AVANT-GARDE theater. As a member of the so-called Generation of 1982, a group of university-trained playwrights whose first works coincided with the transition to democracy in Spain, he shares an interest in cultivated yet non-elitist formal innovations, intertextuality, subversion of traditional values and ethics, humor as instrument of social critique, and generational disenchantment.

Involved in theater from a young age, Sanchis Sinisterra began creating and directing diverse independent and university theater groups in 1957. In 1960 he traveled to Paris with a scholarship from the French Institute of Valencia. Through this transcendental experience, Sanchis Sinisterra would discover drama theorists that would have a permanent impact on his career, such as Jean-Louis Barrault, Louis Jouvet, ANTONIN ARTAUD, Jean Villar, and BERTOLT BRECHT. After 1966 he combined his theater activity with his university scholarship. In 1977 he founded Teatro Fronterizo (Border Theatre) as an aesthetic alternative to and an ideological critique of bourgeois theater. There he directed and staged original plays as well as adaptations of narrative and dramatic texts. In 1980 he wrote, staged, and published his first emblematic work, Naque o de piojos y actores, whose explicit references to Bertolt Brecht also appear in later works. Since 1988 he has been the director of Beckett Room (Sala Beckett), which later became the base for Teatro Fronterizo and a center for alternative theater in Barcelona. Among his many prizes, the most noteworthy is the National Award in 1990.

¡Ay, Carmela! was staged with tremendous success on November 5, 1987, in Zaragoza and went on to numerous Spanish, European, and U.S. cities, and was eventually adapted to the cinema by Carlos Saura. The play's formal innovations pay homage to Brecht and SAMUEL BECKETT, while its socio-political critique invokes his own Teatro Fronterizo. The motif of travel, intertextuality, metatheater, and the use of consciously vulgar humor fill this piece. ¡Ay, Carmela! relates the tragicomic story of Carmela and Paulino, two second-rate performers who accidentally cross enemy lines while in search of some sausage in the next town. They agree to perform in front of the national troops and adapt their performance accordingly. Carmela loses her life when, led by an irrational impulse, she makes common cause with the prisoners who are sentenced to death and are attending their performance. Paulino, on the other hand, saves his life by submitting to the nationalists in a humiliating way.

SELECT PLAYS: Tú, no importa quién (1962); Midas (1963); Demasiado frío (1965); Algo así como Hamlet (1970); Tendenciosa manipulación del texto de La Celestina de Fernando de Rojas (1974); Naque o de piojos y actores (1980); El retablo de Eldorado (1984); ¡Ay, Carmela! (1986); Crímenes y locuras del traidor Lope de Aguirre (1986); Pervirtimiento y Otros gestos para nada (1986); El canto de la rana (1987); Los figurantes (1988); Perdida en los Apalaches (1990); Naufrajos de Alvar Nuñez (1991); Misero Prospero (1992); Valeria y los pájaros (1992); Bienvenidas (1993); El cerco de Leningrado (1993); Dos tristes tigres (1993); Marsal Marsal (1994); El lector por horas (1996); La raya del pelo de William Holden (1999)

FURTHER READING

- Ferreras, Juan Ignacio. El teatro en el siglo XX (desde 1939) [The Theater in the Twentieth Century (Since 1939)]. Madrid: Taurus, 1988.
- Huerta Calvo, Javier. Historia del teatro español II. Del siglo XVIII a la época actual [History of Spanish Theater]. Madrid: Gredos, 2003.
- Pedraza Jiménez, Felipe, and Milagros Rodríguez Cáceres. Manual de literatura española XIV. Posguerra: dramaturgos y ensayistas. Pamplona: Cénit ediciones, 1995.
- Ruiz Ramón, Francisco. Historia del teatro español. Siglo XX [History of Spanish Theater. Twentieth Century]. Madrid: Cátedra, 1977.
- Sanchis Sinisterra, José. ¡Ay, Carmela! El lector por horas. Madrid: Austral, 2000.

Esther Lomas-Sampedro

SÁNDOR, MALENA (1913–1968)

For Malena Sándor the theatre was her passion and religion; her past, her present and her future, her sacrifice and her ambition.
—Silvina Bullrich, "Lo que pude decir," 1969

Malena Sándor was born María Elena James de Terza on December 31, 1913, and she died prematurely of an asthma attack on October 4, 1968. While she was not the first woman to write for the Argentine stage, she was definitely the most successful female playwright to emerge in early 20th-century ARGENTINA.

Her plays consistently debuted in Buenos Aires, received honors, and featured some of the city's best-known actors and directors.

Like most of domestic COMEDIES of her day, Sándor's works primarily dramatized contemporary urban scenarios and relied on mainstream conventions to draw in the spectator. Yet rather than the typical escapist storyline, she offered a glimpse of Argentine society as seen through a feminist lens. Sándor's first two plays, the one-act Daddy, I'm Getting a Divorce (Yo me divorcio papa, 1937) and the full-length A Free Woman (Una mujer libre, 1938), both criticize antdivorce laws. A Free Woman won the prestigious Premio Nacional de Cultura and was adapted to the cinema in a French-Italian coproduction. The subsequent play, Penelope No Longer Knits, is a feminist revision of the Odyssey in which the once-devoted wife quits waiting patiently at home for her cheating husband to return. She and Satan (Ella y Satán, 1948), may have been influenced by Sándor's predecessor, the poet Alfonsina Storni, who attempted to cross over into theater in the late 1920s. Like Storni's controversial play, The Master of the World (El amo del mundo, 1927), She and Satan revolves around the relationship between the rich, egotistical Claudio and his poor but dignified lover, Marga. An Almost-Believable Story (Una historia casi verosímil, 1966), Sándor's last play, takes place on Mars, demonstrating how ridiculous the social conflicts on Earth seem when viewed from another planet.

PLAYS: Daddy, I'm Getting a Divorce (Yo me divorcio, papa, 1937); A Free Woman (Una mujer libre, 1938); I'm the Strongest (Yo soy la más fuerte, 1943); Your Life and Mine (Tu vida y la mía, 1945); Penelope No Longer Knits (Pelélope no teje, 1946); The Bird Man (El hombre de los pájaros, 1947); She and Satan (Ella y Satán, 1948); The Answer Was Given (La respuesta fue dada, 1956); The Gods Return (Los dioses vuelven, 1958); A Boy Named Daniel (Un muchacho llamado Daniel, 1961); An Almost-Believable Story (Una historia casi verosímil, 1966)

FURTHER READING

- Bullrich, Silvina. "Lo que no pude decir" [What cannot be said]. In Teatro Completo [Complete Plays] by Malena Sandor, ed. by Edmundo Guibourg. Buenos Aires: Editorial Talía, 1969.
- Dauster, Frank. "Raising the Curtain: Great Ladies of the Theatre." In Performance, pathos, política de los sexos [Performance, Pathos, Politics of the Sexes], ed. by Heidrun Alder and Kati Röttger. Madrid: Iberoamericana, 1999. 23–40.
- Farnsworth, May Summer. "The Well-Made (Feminist) Play: Malena Sándor's Comic Innovations on the Argentine Stage in the 1930s and 1940s." Latin American Theatre Review 37, no. 1 (2003): 61–73.
- Jones, Willis Knapp. Behind Spanish American Footlights. Austin: Univ. of Texas Press, 1966.

May Summer Farnsworth

SARATOGA

Damn travelling for pleasure.

—Remington, Act 2

Saratoga, or, Pistols for Seven, BRONSON HOWARD's first professional production, opened in New York on December 21, 1870, at AUGUSTIN DALY's Fifth Avenue Theatre. For its day, the five-act play's 101-night run showed remarkable success, especially for a debut, earning Howard $175 per week. Considered one of his "social plays," Saratoga also established Howard's interest in the American business class, the group he explored throughout his career. Frank Marshall's British adaptation, produced by Charles Wyndham, opened as Brighton at London's Court Theatre on May 25, 1874. In ironic contrast to Howard's consistent respectability, Wyndham's version earned critic William Archer's (1882) denunciation for vulgarity, specifically for a woman character's remark, inserted in the adaptation, that implied she preferred a husband sleep nude. Wyndham produced the play in GERMANY as Seine Erste und Einzige Liebe; it was possibly the first German production of an American play.

Howard drew on America's reviving interest in the European COMEDY of manners for his cynical view of American socialites at play. The script's greatest weakness lies in Howard's attempt to combine COMEDY, FARCE, and social commentary, resulting in a script that lacks direction. The play also shows an early knack for dialogue and comic development, however, which offsets its shortcomings.

Set in the title's literal watering hole, Saratoga follows the romantic misadventures of Bob Sackett. The farcical story line merely forms a unifying device that Howard uses to set American and English social pretensions at each other, leaving both looking foolish at best. The competition is scattered through the story, interspersed with apparently tangential scenes that mock moral and racial hypocrisy; although carefully drawn, they often have little to do with Sackett's predictable escapades.

Simultaneously engaged to four women, Sackett finds himself at Saratoga's Congress Springs, where his fiancées all have arrived and become close friends. As he attempts to avoid exposure, Sackett realizes he actually loves one of them. Inevitably, his deception disintegrates, and he risks dueling four men. Sackett's solution contrives to avoid violence, reconcile one marriage, instigate two others, and ensure his own. In the process, Howard overturns contemporary notions of women's modesty and propriety and attempts to develop a sense of their cleverness and independence. Ultimately, however, notions of the women's insight and self-determination narrow to matters of marital choice.

In a broader sense, Saratoga reflects its society most strongly in the side events that Howard distributes throughout Sackett's story. In his treatment of African American characters, Howard reveals and may even subtly denounce white bigotry in the post-emancipation era. Though the black servant characters speak in exaggerated dialect, referring to themselves repeatedly as "we culled gemmen at Saratoga," their voice carries a double-edged sense of observation with potential for mockery. Howard also develops a slightly ambiguous sense of the black servants' awareness of their independence. Though possibly playing for laughs, he repeatedly records the hypocritical limits to black freedom, most notably when Sackett addresses the servants as "Fellow American citizens— . . . of African descent."

Saratoga has enjoyed various American revivals, and the Royal Shakespeare Company produced it 1978.

[See also United States, 1860–1929]

FURTHER READING

- Archer, William. English Dramatists of Today. London: Sampson Low, 1882.
- Bloomfield, Maxwell. "Mirror for Businessmen: Bronson Howard's Melodramas, 1870–1890." Midcontinent American Studies Journal 5 (Fall 1964): 38–49.
- Felheim, Marvin. "Bronson Howard, 'Literary Attaché.'" American Literary Realism 2 (Summer 1969): 174–179.
- Frerer, Lloyd Anton. Bronson Howard, Dean of American Dramatists. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001.
- Gottlieb, Lois C. "The Antibusiness Theme in Late Nineteenth Century American Drama." The Quarterly Journal of Speech 64 (1978): 415–426.
- Quinn, Arthur Hobson. A History of the American Drama from the Civil War to the Present Day, Vol. 1. New York: F. S. Crofts, 1943. 40–65.

Ron West

SARDOU, VICTORIEN (1831–1908)

